Starcke, Zeisius: An earthquake occurs when Christ dies upon the cross, an earthquake occurs when He rises again, to testify unto the majestic power both of His death and resurrection.—Christ's glorified body, that great stone could not restrain.—Oh, cunning Reason! how silly art thou in spiritual and divine things!—Canstein: If we find no help on earth to overcome hindrances in the path of duty, help will be sent us from heaven.—We shall live with Him. Where the Head is, there are the members.—2 Thess. i. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 13.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Behold, how glorious, etc. So glorious shall be our resurrection.—As glorious and consoling as Christ's resurrection is to the godly, so fearful is it to the godless.—Quesnel: God knows how at once to console His own, and to terrify the wicked, Ex. xiv. 24.—Luther's margin: Fear not ye, Fear not ye: be joyful and consoled.—Zeisius: Fearful as the holy angels are unto the unholy, just so comforting are they unto the godly, as companions, in the approaching glory.—Canstein: The servants of the word should exercise the office of comforting angels, or God's messengers of consolation, unto the anguished.—Bibl. Wirt.: As the woman was the first to sin, so have women been the first to realize Christ's purchased righteousness.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: The joyful message of the resurrection, and its fruits, are not for coarse, worldly hearts, but for longing disciples.—Those who have really experienced the joy produced by the resurrection, are anxious to impart that joy to others.—Jesus comes to meet us when we seek Him.—My brethren. A designation dating from the resurrection, Heb. ii. 12. For the disciples, it indicates something great, most consolatory.—The world boasts always of its high titles; but we, who are Christ's, have the highest, we are called His brethren.—We are heartily to forgive those who have not deserved well of us.

Gossner: It gleams and flashes once more. Before, all was dark and sad; but now again the rays of crucified truth appear, and they illuminate ever more and more gloriously.

Lisco: The women hear first that Jesus is risen. Then they see the empty grave, ver. 6. Finally they see, feel, and speak to Jesus, ver. 9.—The certainty of Christ's resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 1–8. Its importance, 1 Cor. xv. 12: 1. Proof that Jesus is the Christ; 2. that His death is an offering for us; 3. the ground for our hope of a resurrection. By His death, all the preceding testimonies borne unto Him seem to be proved false; by His resurrection, it is proved that nothing has been disproved. His resurrection is the seal of our redemption, the beginning of His glorification and exaltation.—The Easter festival is a call to a spiritual resurrection.—Gerlach: The Lord's body now a different body, and yet the same: 1. Free from all the bonds of weakness, of suffering, of mortality. 2. The meals of wonder: He ate and drank, though He needed not food.—The Lord's appearances, and all the accompanying circumstances, are in the highest degree full of meaning and importance. The women see the angels; the disciples do not. Jesus appears to the Magdalene, to Peter, to disciples on their way to Emmaus, to the Eleven; in each case, with the most tender and exact regard for the state of each.—All the external a revelation of the internal. So shall it one day be in our resurrection.

Heubner: The awe of the resurrection-morning.—Christ's resurrection is the type of our own.—Every morning should remind us of the coming resurrection.—Came Mary: The last witnesses by the grave, are the first. We should seek God early.—[Rieger:] They considered themselves bound to anoint Christ; but Christ must anoint them, and He will, with the Holy Ghost and with power.—This earthquake was a type of the awful convulsion of the earth at the last day and the general resurrection.—The angel, a type of the appearance of the angels at the last day.—The form of the angel's appearance. Servants as they are of the kingdom of light, their office is to introduce men into this kingdom.—The experiences of the guards, presages of what the unbelieving and sinners will experience at the last day.—Fear not ye! The higher spirit-world is the Christian's friend.—Seek Jesus, the way to life. —Nothing to be feared on that way.—The Lord is risen. The angel-world cries to the world of men, and all believers should cry to one another (only to one another?), "The Lord is risen."—Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where thy victory? (1 Cor. xv.).—Come and see: a summons to self-persuasion.—We should impart, spread abroad, the belief in the resurrection.—Our belief in the future life should thoroughly permeate our earthly life, and glorify it.—Christ's resurrection reunites the scattered disciples.—Love plans for eternity.—In the case of the women, faith went first, then came sight.—The perfect brotherhood of Christ, a fruit of God's adoption.—Three classes of topics for Easter: 1. Such in which the "factum" itself is considered; truth, certainty, power of the resurrection. 2. Such in which Christ's resurrection is made to introduce a discourse upon our own; e.g., the resurrection, the festival of our immortality. 3. Such in which faith on Christ in general is handled; e.g., faith upon a living Christ.—Braune: The existence of Christianity is bound up with the cross, but its form and manifestation with the resurrection.—The Church has been founded by the declaration of the resurrection.—The Apostles designate themselves, with most pleasure, the witnesses of the resurrection.—As the beginning of every life is hidden, so is the beginning of the life of the risen Lord hidden in mysterious darkness, Acts ii. 24.—Jesus has not simply taught the resurrection; He is the resurrection.—What caused the guards dismay, that deprived the women of anxiety.—With every advancing step, the path of truth brightens.—The fear of the women quite different from that of the guards.—To My brethren: He named them first disciples, then friends, then little children; now, brethren.

Reinhard: The Christian feast of Easter is a festival of perfect tranquillization: 1. Because it dissipates all the uneasinesses and sorrow which disturb our peace; 2. because it wakens in us all those hopes which must confirm our peace.—Christ's resurrection was the impartation of life unto God's holy Church on earth. God's holy Church, through His resurrection, received,—1. its existence; 2. its moral life; 3. its unceasing continuance.—Thiess: The cross illuminated by the Easter sun.—Ranke: A clear light is poured over the whole life of Christ by His resurrection.—Gaupp: The Easter history is also the history of the believing soul.—Ahlfeld: Jesus, and I with Him.—Otho: Easter-comfort and Easter-pleasure: 1. The sanctity of our graves; 2. the glory of the resurrection; 3. all our sins forgotten.—Petri: Christ's life, our life. Let that be to-day, 1. our belief, 2. our rejoicing.—Steinhofer:

Life from the dead: 1. In the Saviour; 2. in His people.—Rautenberg: The Christian by his Redeemer's open grave: 1. He lays his care in that grave; 2. he becomes at that spot sure of his salvation; 3. his heart fills with rapture.—Brandt: Jesus Christ the victorious prince. We may consider, 1. The foes He has subdued; 2. the obstacles He has overcome; 3. the means used to secure this victory; 4. its results.—Jesus, the risen Saviour, an object for holy contemplation: 1. See the counsel of hell brought to nought by Him; 2. see the method of the divine government glorified by Him; 3. the tears of true love dried; 4. the misery of this earthly life transformed; 5. the work of salvation finished; 6. the human filled with the powers of God.—Geibel: The Lord's resurrection, considered, 1. historically, 2. in its necessity, 3. import, 4. and immediate results.—Fickenscher: What should the grave be to us Christians, now that Jesus is risen? 1. A place of rest, 2. of peace, 3. of hope, 4. of transfiguration.—Rambach: The glorious victory of the risen Saviour: 1. Glorious considered in itself;—a. the most miraculous, b. most honouring, c. the most glorious victory. 2. Glorious in its effects;—a. victory of light over darkness; b. of grace over sin; c. of life over death.—Dräseke: Easter followed Good Friday: 1. God's Amen; 2. men's Hallelujah.—Sachse: The stone rolled away. It seems to us, 1. the boundary-stone of blasphemy against God; 2. as the monumental stone of the most glorious victory; 3. as the foundation of the building of Christ's Church.—Fr. Strauss: A long, sacred history is to-day presented to us, the history of the Easter festival: 1. The long-continued preparation; 2. the glorious manifestation; 3. the continual development; 4. the future consummation in heaven.—Alt: The new life to which Easter summons.—Liebner: We should enter the companionship, and follow the example, of the early witnesses unto the resurrection.—Shulz: The verities of our faith, unto which the resurrection of our Lord bears a certain and irresistible testimony: 1. That Jesus is the Son of the living God; 2. that a perfect atonement has been presented to God for us, in the Lord's death; 3. that our soul is immortal; 4. that our bodies also will rise.—All the difficulties in Christ's life are resolved by His resurrection.—Heidenreich: What a friendly dawn broke upon redeemed and blessed humanity on the morning of the resurrection!—Bretschneider: A proof of the resurrection of the body.—Schleiermacher: The consciousness of the never-passing overcomes the pain caused by the loss of the passing.—The life of the resurrection of our Lord is a splendid type of our new life.—Canstein: The joy of the Easter morning in yon future world: 1. What shall it be? 2. Who shall enjoy it?—F. A. Wolf: The true Christian, upon the festival of the resurrection, looks back as gratefully unto the past, as he gazes joyfully into the future.—Three stages in the soul-life are to be observed in the history of those to whom the risen Redeemer became the closest friend: 1. A sadness, which seeks Jesus; 2. a hope, which springs up at the first intimation of His neighbourhood; 3. the joyful certainty, to have found and recognised the Redeemer.—Tzschirner: The sufferings of time in the light of glory.—Death, the new birth into a new life.—Genzken: The path of faith is unto the risen Saviour.—Markeineke: The resurrection of Jesus is the main pillar of our salvation.—Theremin: Christ's resurrection should awaken us to repentance.—Niemann: The belief in the new world of immortality, which opened unto us in the Lord's resurrection.

SECOND SECTION.

JUDAISM, AND ITS SAYING; OR, THE IMPOTENT END OF THE OLD WORLD.

Chapter xxviii. 11–15.

11 Now, when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and showed unto the chief priests all the things that were done. 12 And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, 13 Saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole Him away while we slept. 14 And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you. 15 So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. When they were going.—The Evangelist does not seek to show that the soldiers arrived in the city before the women, but only that, contemporaneously, a second account reached the city,—that one message was borne to the friends, and another to the enemies.

2. And had taken counsel.—This is the last session of the Sanhedrim, so exacting of reverence, which is recorded by Matthew, and its last decision. By this transaction, we have a perfect revelation of the post-Christian, unbelieving Judaism given to our view, which is full of instruction. Some have considered this extremely disgraceful council-meeting to be improbable. But, standing as they did upon the brink of moral destruction and condemnation, this improbability becomes the most awful reality. Still, we are not compelled by our text to believe that they held the meeting for the express purpose of bribing the guards: that was merely a result of their council, and of their deliberations. Probably the matter was handed over to a commission, to be examined into and disposed of; that is, the council left the matter in the hands of the high priests, agreeing secretly with their designs.

3. Large money.—Increased bribes, as compared with the former bribery, that of Judas: 1. The bribery in this case was in consequence of a resolution of the Sanhedrim. 2. The bribery by means of large sums of money, contrasts strongly with the thirty pieces which Judas received. 3. The bribery of poor Gentiles, and these Roman soldiers, who were seduced into a breach of discipline and into lies, which might have cost their lives: and with this were connected self-humiliation and self-abandonment on the part of the Sanhedrim before these very Gentiles. 4. The formal resolution, which was aimed, though indirectly, at the corruption of the soldiers, was the culmination of that guilt to which they had subjected themselves in accepting the willing and volunteered treachery of Judas. The whole account expresses distinctly the extreme and painful embarrassment of the chief council. They thought that by means of thirty pieces of silver they had freed themselves of Judas; but now they begin first to experience the great danger to which the already crucified and buried Saviour has exposed them.

4. Stole Him away while we slept.—In addition to all the judgments of impotency, embarrassment, and rejection, they are now subjected to the judgment of stupidity. The soldiers are to have been asleep, and yet to see thieves, and know that they are disciples! Grotius, τὸ αὐτοκατάκριτον.

5. And if this come to the governor's ears.—Coram procuratore. Meyer interprets this in a judicial manner. Erasmus explains, When an examination shall be held before Pilate. But in that case, the mediation would come too late, because Pilate, according to military discipline, must have inflicted the penalty, if so great a military crime had been openly acknowledged. Accordingly, the most commentators interpret, When this rumour shall reach the governor, be repeated unto him. Then the danger became imminent; but, according to this assurance, it would have been already removed.—

That this was an excuse highly dangerous for the soldiers (see Acts xii. 19), and that the chief priests could by no means be sure of the result, although they might be ready to give to the avaricious and corrupt Pilate a large bribe, appears to be a matter which does not admit of doubt, as we may see from the account. The hierarchical spirit, which here reaches its climax, uses the Roman soldiers merely as tools to effect its own ends, as it had previously employed Judas; and was again fully prepared to let the despised instruments perish, when the work was finished.—We will persuade him, πείσομεν, over-persuade, talk over; without doubt an ironical euphemism, indicating the means of persuasion. This was the manner in which they will keep their promise to the soldiers.

6. This saying, ὁ λόγος οὗτος.—This does not mean that the entire account, sc. that the statement, was nullified by the rumour of its having its origin in lies (Grotius, Paulus), but the statement itself, which these soldiers themselves voluntarily adopt (De Wette, Meyer). Upon the doubts regarding the narrative itself, which Stroth maintained to be an interpolation, consult De Wette and Meyer. Among the opponents of the truth of the passage, are Paulus, Strauss, Weisse, Meyer; among the supporters, Hug, Kuinoel, Hoffmann, Krabbe, and Ebrard. Olshausen adopts a modified view, and thinks that the Sanhedrim did not act in a formal manner, but that Caiaphas arranged the matter privately. The most formidable arguments which De Wette brings forward against the correctness of the passage, are disposed of in ch. xxvii. 62. That it is improbable that the Sanhedrim (in which "sat men like Gamaliel") should have adopted so unworthy a resolution, see in reply, Note 2, and Olshausen; besides, this objection rests entirely upon a subjective view of the worthiness of the council. We have already learned from the history of the crucifixion, that it was a Jewish custom to employ bad means to effect the ends of the hierarchy, and to deal with the despised Gentiles as mere tools, who were to be used and then treated with contempt. The existence of this saying among the Jews is acknowledged. See the quotations which Grotius gives out of Justin, from which we learn that the Pharisees spread the report among the people by appointed messengers; and also out of Tertullian. The Talmudic tractate, Toledoth Jeschu. That the Evangelist has here imparted to us the prototype of the Talmud, and the Christ-hating Judaism, is only a proof of his deep insight into the significance of the facts, and testimony unto the unvarying character of his Gospel.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Some of the watch.—The other guards appear to have been so overcome, so prostrated by the phenomena of the resurrection, as to have recognised the matter as settled, to have recognised the attempt of the chief council to be futile, and, without further delay, to have returned to their military station. Only a part so far overcomes the influence as to go and give a report, probably in hopes of having a reward promised to them. They manifest their readiness to be bribed. These few are a type of all "trencher-soldiers," who must supply the hierarchy with power to compensate for their want of spiritual might. The nobler soldier, like the independent state, will not allow it even to be supposed that he will yield himself up to the hierarchy as its tool.

2. The developed heathenism of the disbelieving Judaism begins with disbelief regarding the resurrection of Jesus; and commences to collect around itself the characteristics of heathenism, forming a dark tradition. But the myths of the chief council are worse than the myths of heathenism. The latter, according to their bright side, point to Christ; but the Sanhedrim's fables form the dark contrast to the facts of light recorded in the Gospels. The myths of the heathen world are the germ of its worship; the lying myths of unbelieving Judaism are the seed of its obduracy.

3. Matthew, with prophetic spirit, has preserved this fact, the unmistakeable germ from which sprang the Talmud, along with which Judaism, that held in the Old Testament fast by the path of faith, and repelled all the myths of the heathen world, has now fallen, and manifests itself as the most intensified heathenism; resorting to the most debased of all myths, and endeavouring to destroy the evangelical history by a false exegesis of the Old Testament, by false traditions concerning facts of Gospel history, and by a false development of the Old Testament according to the letter of the law. Hence it is, that in the following section this type of the Talmud is succeeded by the type of the New Testament.

4. It is indubitable that our narrative is the history of the most extreme self-humiliation of the chief council, but is not the less worthy of belief; for it must not be imagined that such notices are mere matters of gossip. This is the perfection of the judgment of self-abandonment, under which the council had flung itself. Upon the special points of this self-rejection, see the Notes.

5. The hierarchical falsification of the resurrection history, the beginning of the "hierarchical-antievangelical" falsifications of history. The Ebionitic Apocrypha (the donatio Constantini, the pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, etc.).

6. Christ's resurrection, according to God's counsel, officially announced to the civil authorities,—officially announced to the hierarchy; and hence the evangelical faith, as belief in the resurrection, is independent and free.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Heathen guards, the messengers whom God had ordained to announce the resurrection unto the chief council. — Despairing sinners (Judas, the guards), the usual preachers of repentance, sent unto the hypocritical, ecclesiastical powers.—The unbelief of the chief council is bold enough to impart its own obduracy to affrighted Gentile hearts.—Money and bribery, the A and Ω (the beginning and the end) of the salvation which remained with the council.—Bribery of every kind is the principal lever of all antichristian systems: 1. Bribery by money, 2. by honours.—The utter incertitude of the Sanhedrim is clearly manifested by their last decision.—The perfect overthrow which moral self-destruction caused to follow the supposed triumph of their faith.—The imagination of blinded spirits, as though they could debase the grandest facts of heaven into the meanest stories (scandala) of earth.—The fruitless lies, which are imagined capable of converting the most glorious facts into a deceptive myth.—The criticism passed in the dark Jewish lane, upon the facts of Gospel history which took place upon the broad, open highway of the world.—This is the course which all the enemies of Christian truth must pursue, because of the concealed self-contradictions: 1. They imagine the most absurd fables, to destroy the glorious miracle; 2. they imagine the most senseless absurdity, to destroy what is full of meaning and clear to the soul; 3. they imagine what is mean, wicked, diabolical, to destroy what is sacred.—The latest criticism in the Talmud, and the Talmud in the latest works of criticism.—See how the hierarchy has corrupted even the soldier's honour.—Slander sneaks along in its impotent path, in pursuit of the Gospel rushing along its winged course: 1. Slander of Christ; 2. of the disciples; 3. of early Christendom; 4. of the Reformation. And so forth.—Judaism and heathenism unite to oppose Christianity.—The hierarchy leagues with the dissolute to battle against the faith.—It shall be discovered in hell that heaven has been benefited through the devices of hell.—God allowed the work of shame to run its wretched course, because the message of the resurrection was not intended to be extended in the form of worldly, but of heavenly certainty, by heavenly agencies.—Powerless as are such attempts, as concerns the Lord, they succeed in destroying many souls.—Thus has the Talmud, the production of the legal spirit of Judaism, placed itself between the poor Jew and his Christ, as a phantom. So too does the spirit of the law (legalism) endeavour to build up a wall of separation between the poor Christian and his Christ.—It is only the preaching of the Gospel which can overcome the enmity to the Gospel.—The more boldly the opposition advances, let the word ring out the clearer.

The present section considered in connection with the following evangelical narrative.—The twofold development of the Old Testament: 1. The false continuation of the Talmud. 2. The true continuation in the New Testament.—The great revolution in the life of Christ: 1. The apparent triumph of His foes becomes their most disgraceful defeat. 2. The apparent defeat of the Lord becomes His most glorious triumph.—The grand development of Christianity and its dark counter-picture: 1. The fleeing soldiers, the heroic women. 2. The great council, and its decision; Christ upon the mountain, and His sermon. 3. The ungrounded expectations and false position (of Judaism), and the actual testimony afforded by the Church of Christ.—The perfect impotence of the opponents, and the omnipotence of Christ upon earth and in heaven.

Starcke; Nova Bibl. Tub.: As divine wisdom has decreed, unto even the bitterest foes and persecutors of Jesus must the truth be told by their own beloved confidantes.—The world takes money, and acts as she is taught, against her better knowledge and her conscience, 1 Tim. vi. 10; 2 Pet. ii. 13, 15.—No compacts prevail against the Lord.—The devil seeks, where not by force and with boldness, still with lies and blasphemy, to oppose the kingdom and the life of Christ.—Money has great power, but thou and thy money shall perish together, Acts viii. 20.—Manifest lies require no refutation; they refute themselves.—Quesnel: What a misfortune, that a man will turn to lies to cover his sin, rather than unto repentance for forgiveness!—Zeisius: The lie, no matter how absurd, is believed rather than the truth, especially by the low and godless masses.—Murder and lies, the devil's weapons, John viii. 44.

Lisco: Hate and wickedness incite Christ's enemies to bribe the soldiers; low avarice makes them ready to free themselves from the crime of a neglect of duty by availing themselves of a convenient lie.—Heubner: Contrast between this account and the preceding: 1. There truth; here lies. 2. There the glorified Hero in His perfect purity; here the terrified priesthood, affrighted because of its crime. 3. There, among the disciples, overmastering joy; here anguishing terror. 4. There willing, unpaid servants of truth; here bribed servants of lies.—Injustice brings a man to humiliation, shame, before the instruments of his sin: he resigns himself to them, must fear them, and they laugh him to scorn.—Such people have never a clean mouth. The state of things might have been learned by the Apostles from secret friends and adherents among the priests, from several persons, perchance from converted soldiers.—Braune: As the friends heard from their own, so the foes from their own, the news of the resurrection.—Every day we see what money can effect.—Lies find admission, but they flee before the truth. Let no one, accordingly, be affrighted for what men can do; the Lord's counsel stands fast.—But let no one imagine that he must take in hand to destroy the attempts of another; leave that to the Lord.

THIRD SECTION.

THE OMNIPOTENT RULE, AND THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST, IN HEAVEN AND IN EARTH.

CHAPTER XXVIII. 16–20. (Mark xvi. 15–18; Luke xxiv. 44–49.)

16 Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. 17 And when they saw Him, they worshipped Him: but some doubted. 18 And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. 19 Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; 20 Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Then the eleven disciples.—They come forward here as the representatives of the entire band of disciples, and not as the select apostolic company of the Twelve, which makes its first reappearance after the selection of Matthias. This distinction is to be found in the remark that some doubted, which cannot apply to the Eleven; reference is made to many witnesses in 1 Cor. xv. 6.

2. Upon a mountain.—The Evangelist himself informs us that Jesus had appointed the place of meeting, but does not tell us when and where. Inasmuch as the disciples were bidden at first merely to go into Galilee, the more special direction must have been given at a later date. Grotius thinks that the command was issued while they were still in Jerusalem. We adopt the view of Ebrard and others, that Christ's meeting with the seven preceded and introduced this manifestation. That there is a reference to an actual mountain in Galilee, may be seen from the connection between this passage and the injunctions to proceed into Galilee, vers. 7, 10; also from the consideration, that in Galilee only could a place be found for so large an assemblage of disciples as is mentioned in 1 Cor. xv. 6. An apocryphal tradition, dating from the thirteenth century, named the northern peak of the Mount of Olives as the scene. This theory has undoubtedly originated early, in an improper and interested attempt at harmonizing, the first traces of which we find in the apocryphal Actis Pilati. It is upon this statement that Rudolf Hoffmann supports his views in his work, Ueber den Berg Galiläa, Ein Beitrag zur Harmonie der evangelischen Berichte. We saw above that Mount Tabor could not have been the scene of the transfiguration. "But should we conclude from this, that that tradition is wholly untenable? How easily could that which had been said of the second transfiguration of Jesus before the eyes of His Church, be confounded with the account of the former transfiguration! How well adapted, besides, was Mount Tabor for the accommodation of the disciples, who assembled for the purpose of celebrating the great Easter festival!" That the mount was then peopled, goes against the theory which makes it the scene of such an event as the first transfiguration, but not against the view which selects it as the centre to which the Galilean Christians were gathered. For the dwellers upon this mountain (if the mountain were not then, to some degree, waste and occupied only by ruins; see Schulz, Reisebeschreibung) could be but few in number, and would be, besides, friendly disposed to the Galilean believers, so that the assemblage upon this high peak of Galilee would not be in the least disturbed (see Lange's Leben Jesu ii. 3, 1730). Grotius, too, writing upon this passage, is in favour of Tabor. "Southwards from the Mount of Beatitudes, six miles distant from Nazareth, in an easterly direction (south-east), the Mount of Tabor rises on high, תָּבוֹר, i. e., peak, navel, Greek Ἰταβύριον (Hos. v. 1; Sept.); it is called by the aborigines Tschebel Tor, a great, well-nigh isolated ball of chalkstone, flattened on the top. Mira rotunditate sublimis.

In omni parte finitur æqualiter (Hieronymus). Upon the southern side, it sinks deep into the "Valley of Israel;" northwards it overlooks all the confronting mountains of the highlands of Galilee. The sides of Tabor are covered with a forest of oaks and wild pistachio-trees, which shelter wild swine and ounces. The whole mountain is rich in flowers, and abounds with trees. The flat top is about a mile and a half in circumference; upon it are the remains of a large fortress, and two churches may still be recognised." K. von Raumer, Palästina, p. 62. See Jer. xlvi. 18; Ps. lxxxix. 13. Upon the prospect from Tabor, consult works of travel, Schubert, Robinson; also Schulz (Mühlheim an der Ruhr, 1852, p. 260). Gerlach supposes the mountain to have lain in a lonely neighbourhood, in Lebanon, in the north of Galilee, but states no reasons.

3. And when they saw Him.—In the case of the Eleven, this was "neither the first occasion upon which they had seen Him since the resurrection, nor yet the first impression." Judging from the import of what follows, we believe that Matthew groups the eleven Apostles together with the assembled pilgrim throng of Galilean believers. To this congregated body does the prostration refer, and also the doubting of some. We consider, however, that the statement, "some doubted," is not applied to the reality of the Risen One, but is used in regard to the immediately preceding προσεκύνησαν. These "some" were not in doubt whether the person before them was really Jesus who had risen. That would have been a total inversion of the order of things, if they had come to the mountain believing, and had been plunged back into doubt upon the sight of the Lord. Why, it was this very vision of the Lord which made the women and the Eleven believing. So that they doubted whether it was proper to offer unto the Lord such an unbounded worship as was expressed in the supplications and prostration of the disciples. This view is held also by De Wette. The following declaration of Jesus refers to this hesitation. Hence we find in this a prophetic allusion by the Evangelist to that germ of Ebionitism which developed itself at a later period among the Jewish Christians, just as he had before pointed out the germ of the antichristian Judaism. These "some"—οἱ δὲ without a preceding οἱ μέν—constitute a particular section of that assembled mass, formerly mentioned as a body, to which special attention would be directed. The words, οἱ δὲ ἐδίστασαν, have received various explanations. 1. The reading itself, οὐδὲ: Bornemann. 2. The meaning, Some prostrated themselves, the others separated in dismay: Schleussner. 3. The occasion:

a. They doubted, because Jesus' body was already glorified: Olshausen et al.; b. dread of a phantom: Hase; c. on account of a change in the body of Jesus, which was now in the intermediate state, between its former condition, and glorification, which was completed at the ascension: Meyer. 4. The subject: a. The Eleven were they who doubted: Meyer; certain of the Seventy: Kuinoel; b. certain of the five hundred brethren, 1 Cor. xv. 6: Calovius et al. This last explanation is undoubtedly the correct one. (See above.)

4. Came (drew near), and spake unto them.—This drawing near was manifestly a special approach unto those who were doubting; and unto them likewise were the following words in the first instance addressed, though not exclusively.

5. Is given unto Me.—Expression of His glorification and victory. "It is an unfounded, rationalistic explanation, when this expression is made to mean, either Potestas animis hominum per doctrinam imperandi (Kuinoel), or full power to make all the preparations necessary for the Messianic theocracy. It is the Munus regium Christi, without limitation." Meyer. According to the doubts of the later Ebionites, Christ must share the power given Him by God, in heaven with the angels, on earth with Moses.

6. Go ye (therefore).—Οὖν is undoubtedly a gloss, but a correct one; for the majesty of Christ is the ground, not merely for His sending, but also for their allowing themselves to be sent.

7. Make disciples of, μαθητεύσατε.—Luther's translation, teach, is quite incorrect. So also is the Baptist exegesis, In every case, first complete religious instruction, then baptism. To make disciples of, involves in general, it is true, the preaching of the Gospel; but it marks pre-eminently the moment when the non-Christian is brought to a full willingness to become a Christian, that is, to become, through repentance and faith, a catechumen. This willingness, in the case of the children of Christian parents, is presupposed in the willingness of the parents, because it is an unnatural and impious treatment of children as adults, and of Christianity as a mere school question, when the parents do not decide unhesitatingly in favour of Christianity as regards their children, and do not determine to educate them as subjects of Christianity. Hence the children of Christian parents are born catechumens. The Holy Scriptures in every case place the spiritual unity of the household in the believing father or believing mother, representing this as the normal relation.

8. All nations.—Removal of the limitations laid down in ch. x.

5, according to the statements contained in ch. xxv. 32. By this, also, the universality of the apostolic commission is confirmed. The question, how the Gentiles are to be received into the Church, is not yet answered, though the unconditioned reception of believers is found in the appointment, that nations, as nations, are to be christianized, and are not first to be made Jews; that they are to be marked out as Christians by baptism, without any reference to circumcision. The development of this germ is left by the Lord to the work of the Spirit. The revelation, Acts x., is the Spirit's exegesis of the already perfect commission, and not a continuation or expansion of that commission, which was completed with the work of Christ. We cannot, therefore, assume that the Apostles, up to that time, held circumcision to be a necessary condition of baptism, or reception into the Church; they were merely in the dark regarding this question, and the Holy Spirit explained the statement unto them.

9. Baptizing them.—The reading βαπτίσαντες is more accurate. But μαθητεύειν is not completed in baptism. Rather are there two acts, a missionary and an ecclesiastical,—the antecedent baptism, the subsequent instruction.

10. In the name of.—That is, in the might of, and for, the name, which was the badge and the symbol of the new Church. Εἰς τό. "Note," says Meyer, "that the formula of the administrators, In nomine, In the name of, rests entirely upon an incorrect translation of the Vulgate." Yet, not so entirely, because the expression ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι is found in Acts x. 48 (compare Matt. iii. 11). De Wette and Meyer explain εἰς τὸ, with reference to the name. But εἰς τὸ, in other passages, means either the element into which one is baptized (Mark i. 9, εἰς τὸν Ἰορδάνην; Rom. vi. 3, εἰς τὸν θάνατον); or the object, εἰς μετάνοιαν, Matt. iii. 11; Acts ii. 38, εἰς ἄφεσιν; or the authority of the community, under which and for which one is baptized (εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν, 1 Cor. x. 2). The last meaning is, accordingly, the prominent one of this passage, the New Testament opposite of the baptism into the authority of Moses; a baptism under the authority, and of subjection unto the authority of the Trinity. But, as the context shows, we have expressed likewise the baptism into the name of the Three-one God, as the element, and the dedication unto this name. The expression, ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι, Acts ii. 38, brings out most fully the idea of the authority, in virtue of which, or the foundation upon which, baptism is administered. In so far, now, as baptism has the Triune name as ground, means, and object, the combined signification may be partially expressed by with reference to; more distinctly, however, In the name of: that is, upon the ground of this name, in the might of this name, as dedicated unto this name, or for this name. Meyer: "The name of the Father is to be the object of faith, and the subject of confession." This expresses only the third conception, and that but half. Upon the import of the name, see Matt. vi. 9. The name refers to each of the Persons of the Godhead. The plural form, τὰ ὀνόματα, would have pointed to Tritheism; while the singular, in its distributive application to Father, Son, and Spirit, brings out in the one name, not only the equality, but also the personality, of the three Divine Names. In an emphatic sense, may it also be said, that τὸ πνεῦμα ἁγίον is an "especially Christian characteristicum of the Spirit" (see John vii. 39). Not "improperly is the passage under consideration termed the baptismal formula." We must dissent from Meyer, when he maintains, "Jesus does not, assuredly, dictate the words which are to be employed in the administration of baptism. (No trace is to be found of the employment of these words by the Apostolic Church: compare rather the simple form, εἰς Χριστόν, Rom. vi. 3, Gal. iii. 27; βαπτίζειν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα X., Acts viii. 16; and ἐπὶ τὸ ὄνομα X., Acts ii. 38.) It is the 'telic intention' of the baptismal act that is given in this expression. Consult Reiche, de baptism. orig., etc., Göttingen, 1816, p. 141. The baptismal formula was drawn up according to these words, at a later period (see Justin, Apol. i. 61), just as was the baptismal confession of the three articles." But it is exactly this gradual development of the apostolical confession of faith which conducts us back to the germ, which we find here deposited in the New Testament. A baptism in the name of Christ were conceivable only when that confession was accompanied by the acknowledgment of the Father and the Holy Spirit; and this so-called "telic import" points us back to the homogeneous foundation upon which that import rests. It is true, indeed, that the apostolic age was not bound to formulas, as mere dead formulas. Meyer, however, is right, in his opposition to De Wette, Strauss, and others, who have impugned the historical truth of this direction of Christ. And finally, it is certainly true that this is not the only instance in which we have presented a more specially defined statement of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and of the essential points of the Christian confession (see 2 Cor. xiii. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Tit. ii. 11, 13, etc.).

11. Teaching them.—These words mark, on the one hand, the continuation of the apostolic activity, after that μαθητεύειν and βαπτίζειν had preceded; upon the other, the course of the Christian, which should run on parallel to this activity. The statement concerning the new ἐντολή, John xiii. 34, which refers undoubtedly to the institution of the Holy Supper, shows us, that the "all" commanded by Christ concentrates in the truth, and the spiritual observance of that Supper. See Lange's Leben Jesu ii. 3, p. 1330.

12. And, lo.—Excitation and encouragement to fulfil the apostolic commission, and the duties of the Christian life, which are here enjoined.

13. I am with you, not merely through the agency of the power which has been given Me, but rather in the person of the Holy Spirit, or the Paracletos (John xiv. 16, 26, etc.), and in His own personal agency, through His word (John xiv. 23) and sacrament (Matt. xxvi. 28). There is reference also to their vital union to, and communion with Him, in the might of His Spirit (John xiv. 20, xvi. 22), and of His life (John xv. 5).

14. Always.—These words (πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας, every day) mark not only every year which will elapse till the world's end, as years of redemption, but also every day, even the darkest, as days of redemption.

15. Unto the end of the world.—That is, until the completion of the state of time which accompanies the parousia. The completion of the world is also involved. Hence this fact is also included, that Christ accompanies His own, when they go to the most remote boundaries of the world to preach the Gospel.

16. On account of this all-encompassing, this "heaven-and-earth-including" presence of Christ, the fact of the ascension is omitted by our Evangelist, which is done also by John, as a point which is self-evidently comprehended in this Omnipresence.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The mountain in Galilee.—The appearance of the risen Lord upon this mountain recalls in its every part the transfiguration upon the mountain in Peræa, and also Peter's confession, which preceded that transfiguration. Hence it is, it seems to us, that tradition has connected the second event with the first, in regard to the locality, and has named Mount Tabor as the scene of the transfiguration. Upon this occasion we have a repetition of the two points of the solemn confession, and of the transfiguration. The two scenes agree in kind, but this present one surpasses in degree. There, Peter confessed, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God; here, a disciple-band of more than five hundred believing souls fall in adoration at the feet of the risen Lord. There, Christ confirmed Peter's confession, as a revelation from the Father; here, He declares, All power is given unto Me in heaven and upon earth. There, He proclaimed the institution of His Church (ἐκκλησία) upon the foundation of this confession; here, He appoints His disciples apostles unto all nations, while these nations were to take the place of the disciples (μαθητεύσατε), He institutes holy baptism, and recalls the more special institution of the ministerial (teaching) office (John xx. 21), and of the Holy Supper (see above, Note 12).—And as He made manifest, upon the Mount of Transfiguration, His connection with the heavenly world of spirits, and with the entire past of God's kingdom (Moses and Elias), so He certifies here His connection with the entire future of God's kingdom, His eternal presence in the Church in this world, by means of these words, Lo, I am with you always (every day) till the completion of the Æon, of the world's course and time.

2. When Matthew mentions in this passage only the Eleven, he will merely mark them out as the leaders of the Galilean disciple-procession, but in no sense as those to whom the institutions of the glorified Lord were exclusively entrusted. Gerlach is of opinion, that the principal, the predominating thought with Matthew, was the office of the public teacher; "and hence it is that all the appearances of our Lord, which were enjoyed by different parties, are omitted." But we have just seen that Matthew reports an appearance of Jesus unto the women. But even if Gerlach's statement could be established, namely, that Matthew here records the same meeting of Jesus with the disciples which is mentioned by Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 6, it would be equally established that the Lord has committed His formal institutions and commissions to the assembled Church, with the Apostles at her head, just as He at a later date poured out His Spirit upon the whole assembled Church. And from this, then, we argue, that, according to the law of Christ, the apostolic office and the Church are not two distinct sections. In the commission to teach and to baptize, the apostolical community is one, a united apostolate, involving the idea of the Church, or indeed, a united Church, involving the idea of the Apostles. In this unity, we may unquestionably mark the distinction between the leader and the led, which comes out in a more positive way in the entrustment to the Apostles of the official keys (Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; John xx. 21). But that is an organic contrast, arising from, and conditioned by, the unity of the apostolic association (1 Cor. v. 4).

3. The declaration of Christ, All power, etc., and also the command, Baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, etc., show that He, when He thus received this adoring homage, presented Himself, not only in the majesty of His exalted humanity, but also in the brightness of His divinity. In the words, "is given unto Me," there is, undoubtedly, emphasis laid upon His mediatorial relationship, which is frequently illustrated by the Apostle (1 Cor. xv. 28; Eph. i. 20; Phil. ii. 9 foll.); but, at the same time, with equal distinctness is the homoousia of Christ with the Father and the Holy Spirit expressed in the second name of the baptismal formula. Under the old economy, the predominant reference was in all the divine procedure to the glorification of the Father; under the new economy, to that of the Son; while, in the final completion, the Father shall be glorified with the Son in the glorification of the Holy Ghost.

4. It is manifest that the kingdom which Christ here describes, is not only a regnum gratiæ, but also a kingdom of power and glory; but it does not manifest itself as three distinct kingdoms, but the power which He exercises is subservient to the interests of the kingdom of grace, and that kingdom of grace issues from, and finds its goal in, the kingdom of glory (see Lange's Positive Dogmatik).

5. That the Anabaptists ground their views without reason upon ver. 19, has been often enough pointed out (see the Notes). But, upon the other hand, it is presupposed in μαθητεύσατε, that persons are to be induced to be baptized by the use of Gospel means, not by forcible conversion,—are not to be made catechumens by compulsion; and also, that baptism is administered to children really upon the ground of a veritable catechumen-house, or at least of a god-parentship, which represents spiritually such a house. Upon the baptism of children, consult W. Hofmann, Gespräche über Taufe und Widertaufe; Culmann, die Bewandtniss der Kindertaufe mit der Taufe, Strassburg, 1847; the writings of Martensen, Rudelbach, etc.

6. In the name.—As we saw before, the name is not the essence itself, but the type, the manifestation of the essence, among those of God's intelligent creatures who name the name. So then, In the name of the Triune, signifies: 1. The ground; a. objectively, according to His revelation, under His authority, by reason of His command, and agreeably to His institution; b. upon the confession of this name. 2. The means; a. objectively, into the revelation of His name as the spiritual element; b. subjectively, for the revelation of His name in the positive confession. 3. The object; a. objectively, for the glorification of the Triune name in the subject baptized; b. to seal the baptized in the Triune name. All the significations are combined in, and expressed by, "in the name of." Gerlach says, "To do something in the name of God, means, not only upon His commission, but to do it in such a manner that the power and being of God shall appear as if directly and immediately working in the particular event. Thus, to bless in the name of the Lord (2 Sam. vi. 18; Ps. cxxix. 8); to adjure one in the name of the Lord (1 Kings xxii. 16); to curse one (2 Kings ii. 24); above all, to pray in Jesus' name (John xvi. 23)." The person baptized is, accordingly, "fully committed unto the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—consecrated, made over to experience the blessing, the redeeming and sanctifying influences, of each of the three Persons; hence, also, he is said even to exist by the name of the Lord (Isa. xliii. 7, lxiii. 19; Jer. xv. 16; compare Ex. iii. 18)." Baptism is, as the analogy of the circumcision proves, a covenant transaction, and is indeed the dedicatory covenant transaction, the sacrament of regeneration, to which the Lord's Supper, as the completed covenant act, the sacrament of sanctification, corresponds. Baptism is the birth, the Supper the solemn manifestation, of Christianity. Considered in this light, however, we must bring out prominently, that God in this covenant is its author, who invites, reconciles, lays down conditions, and that all the vows and performances of men are to rest upon God's promises. Second, that the promises of God are promises of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in which the personal Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, specializing and individualizing the Gospel, makes Himself over, with all His own peculiar gifts, to each individual subject of baptism; the Father, with the blessing of creation and regeneration; the Son, with the blessing of history, i.e., of salvation; the Holy Spirit, with the blessing of His life and of the (entire) Church. The promise contains the assurance of the paternal guardianship and blessing of God, of the grace and merit of Christ, of the consolation, illumination, and direction of the Holy Spirit. But all this under the condition of the subject's own personal appropriation and application. And in accordance with this, we must, thirdly, direct attention to the vows presented to the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. In the case of children, these vows are made by parents or god-parents; and where these guarantees are entirely wanting, there is the limit of Christian baptism.

7. In the name, etc.—"This passage is the chief proof of the doctrine of the Trinity. 1. These three must be subjects distinct from one another, and true persons, because τὸ ὄνομα is never in the entire Bible used of abstractis, of qualities, but only of true persons. 2. They must be equal, consequently divine persons; because they are placed upon an equality, and because like reverence is assured unto each (even Julian acknowledged the force of this passage, and accused the Christians of being polytheists)." Heubner. This taunt is to be avoided by our showing no favour to the vulgar conception of three beings and individuals. For more exact details, see the works upon systematic theology. We would only add, that the doctrine of the Trinity is to be regarded as the fundamental, theological doctrine of Christianity, to which the soteriological doctrines of election, of the atonement, and the Church correspond.

8. Institution of the Church.—With this apostolic commission, and with the institution of baptism, which had been preceded by that of the Supper and of the ministerial office, and by the presentation of the "keys," the institution of the Church is finished, as regards her elements. This can be doubted only, when we do not see that the existenee of the Christian Church consists in the union of word and sacraments, that the word calls the Church into being, that baptism is the foundation, and the communion in a more special sense is the manifestation, of the Church. The doubt if Christ Himself founded the Church, originated with those who sought the nature of the Church in the constitution of the ecclesiastical association; as e.g., B. J. H. Böhmer, G. J. Plank, Geschichte der christlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung i. p. 17. (We may notice in passing, that the germs of Bauer's "Ebinioten Hypothese" are to be found in this book.) The evangelical history teaches us that the institution of the Church arose first gradually, that the institution was announced and prepared for in the word ἐκκλησία, Matt. xvi. 18; was decided by the fact of Christ's death and resurrection; and completed, when the Spirit was poured out at Pentecost. Then it was that the organism of the Church, which the Lord had gradually formed, received the quickening Spirit.

9. The resurrection as the Lord's exaltation.—Because Matthew and John do not record the ascension, some have drawn conclusions from this silence adverse to the reality of the ascension. These deductions rest upon two essential errors. The first error concerns the character of the evangelical writings: the Evangelists are held to have been chroniclers, who relate all they know of Jesus. But we have already shown how far they surpassed these demands; that each Evangelist viewed his materials, and arranged them, influenced by a conception of the Lord's glory peculiar to himself, and according to one plastic, fundamental thought. But far below a proper appreciation of the Gospels as this error lies, equally far below a proper appreciation of the resurrection of Christ, in its full, eternal significance, does the second error lie. Some, in accordance with the low belief of the Middle Ages, have conceived the resurrection to have been a kind of awaking, on the Lord's part, unto a life in this world similar to that of Lazarus, so that He might possibly have died again. Then the ascension came in, as the second, entirely new, in nature much greater miracle, and decided the matter then, and only then. This may be the view of monks of the Middle Ages, but it is not the view of the Apostolic Church. According to this latter conception, the ascension is united with the resurrection into a unity. Both events are combined in the one fact of Christ's exaltation. The resurrection is the root, the beginning of the ascension; the ascension is the blossom and crown of the resurrection. Hence the apostolic writings take the ascension always for granted (Acts ii. 31, 33, v. 31, vii. 55; ch. xxii. 17; Eph. i. 20; ch. ii. 6, iv. 8; Phil. ii. 6–10; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 22). The ascension is as really presupposed by John (vi. 22, ch. xx. 17) and by Matthew (xxvi. 24), as it is distinctly related by Mark and Luke. The Lord, that is to say, after His resurrection, returned not again into this present life; and yet quite as little did He, as a simple, spiritual existence, enter into the unseen world. He has become through the resurrection, which was at the same time transformation, the first fruits of the new life, the spiritual and human of the life of glorified humanity; hence is He the Prince of the visible and the invisible worlds, which find here the point of union (Eph. i. 21). But this life, as regards its essence, is the heavenly life; and, as regards its character, the entrance into that estate was accordingly the beginning of the ascension. We cannot indeed say (Kinkel), that the early Church united the resurrection and the ascension; or, that the latter occurred upon the first day of the resurrection; or, that there was a succession of ascensions. The resurrection marks the entrance into the heavenly state; the ascension, into the heavenly sphere. With the first, His early intercourse with the disciples ceased, and was replaced by His miraculous appearances; with the last, His visible intercourse with the disciples generally has ceased; and then came the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost. This is the reason why the ascension presents a sad side as well as a joyful, being the departure of Jesus from the earth. It is both Good Friday and Easter. By it the Church of Christ is marked out as both the Church of the cross, and the Church of the crown. Christ's ascension is accordingly His positive glorification, and the resurrection His transformation. The unity of the exaltation of Christ predominates to such a degree in the apostolic view, that the final ascension is taken for granted by the Apostles. John sees the representation of the ascension in this, that Christ will continue to live in the Church, as she is presented in the Petrine and Johannine writings; Matthew in this, that He will be with His own till the completion of the world, hence omnipresent with His people in His majesty, as regards both time and space. It is not to be overlooked, that such an active and spiritual omnipresence of Christ is conceivable only upon the pre-condition of the ascension. That "the feast of the Ascension did not make its appearance until a late period" (Gerlach), is to be explained by the fact, that originally the forty days of the glorification of Christ made up one continuous festival. Then the ascension rose just in proportion as the festival of the Forty Days sank. Upon the corporeality of the risen Saviour, see Lange's Leben Jesu ii. 3, p. 1750. In that work, we have considered connectedly the conceptions of transformation and glorification, as is quite justifiable, for transformation is the basis of glorification. But the latter, which is the fully developed bloom of transformation, does not fully manifest itself till Christ's appearance upon the mountain in Galilee, and till the ascension.

10. Matthew's three sacred mountains: 1. The Mount of the Seven Beatitudes; 2. the Mount of Transfiguration; 3. the Mount of the great Resurrection-festival. (De Wette: The self-consecration of Jesus,—Transfiguration,—Farewell.)

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The revelation of our risen Lord in the great congregation of the disciples upon the mountain: 1. The festival which succeeded the palm-entry, after they had been scattered. 2. The festival which preceded the feast of Pentecost, when they became perfectly one. 3. The festival of Easter in its complete form.—How great the gain when we believingly place ourselves where the Lord has commanded us to go! 1. In the Lord's house; 2. at the Lord's table; 3. before the Lord's throne.—The believing Church is constituted by its appearance before the Lord: 1. It is only the appearance before the Lord which makes a true Church; the appearance before men can form only a picture of a Church, or form only a party. 2. The appearance before the Lord unites the everlasting Church.—The Easter Church, kneeling before her Lord, receives His resurrection-benediction: 1. The kneeling Church. 2. The resurrection-benediction: a. The most blessed assurance that His royal glory is their shield and salvation; b. the most extensive commission unto all the world with His salvation; c. the solemn assurance of His presence and His conduct to the end of the world.—How Christ replies to doubters in His Church: 1. By a reference to His unbounded power; 2. by the institution of His unbounded Church; 3. by the assurance of His ever-abiding presence.—The believing Church participates in the glory of her glorified Lord: 1. She shares His might, in the guardianship and blessing which she experiences; 2. she shares His fulness of grace, in the office she discharges; 3. she shares His victory, in the assurance received by her.—The risen Saviour in His majesty: 1. In His royal glory; 2. in His divine glory; 3. in the glory of His victory.—All power in heaven and upon earth united in the Lord for His people.—Jesus' omnipotence, an omnipotence of grace, and an omnipotence of judgment.—The Church's institution and commission is one: 1. The institution, a commission; 2. the commission, an institution.—The holy (sacrament of) baptism, as the foundation of Christ's Church: 1. The pre-condition, catechumens who have been won by the Gospel; 2. its meaning, the covenant grace of the Triune God; 3. its object, the sacramental intercourse, and the blessing received in the sacrament (i.e., the Supper).—Baptism in the name of the Triune God is a personal covenanting: 1. The promises of God, Father, Son, and Spirit, unto the baptized one; 2. his vows, in which he yields and binds himself unto the Father, Son, and Spirit.—Baptism, the Gospel in its special application to the subject of baptism.—The rite of pædo-baptism: 1. The Lord's title to the children of Christians; 2. the children's title to the Lord.—The sanctification of pædo-baptism.—The doctrine of the Trinity in its practical significance: 1. A threefold Gospel; 2. a threefold Christian calling; 3. a threefold creation and summons unto a spiritual life.—The religion of the Trinity and the religion of the Spirit are one.—Christ's servants should teach others what Christ has commanded, not command others what Christ has taught.—The blessing of the risen Lord unto His people: 1. Near all and with all; 2. every day, upon every way; 3. till the world's end; 4. and till the world is perfected.

Starcke: Man must contribute his part; then will God meet him with His promises.—But some doubted. Because they were so tardy in believing, we may receive their testimony as so much more trustworthy.—Is given Me: This is a divine, eternal power,—the foundation of the Gospel, the ministerial office,—the ground of our responsibility to obey His commandments, of the baptismal covenant, and of His gracious presence in the Church.—This is the greatest loss, both at the appearance and the beginning of piety, in very many souls, that many will not deny their own strength and cast themselves down at Christ's feet.—The boundless power and exaltation of Jesus Christ, the ground of faith and all consolation; and from this must we obtain the victory over sin, death, the devil, hell, and the world.—Hitherto ye have been My disciples and scholars; but now ye are to become masters and teachers, and are to make disciples of others.—The preaching of the Gospel, along with these attestations, is a precious and incomparable fruit of the death and resurrection of Christ.—To preach and administer the sacraments, are the chief duties of the New Testament minister, Acts iv. 6.—Teaching them to observe, Heb. vi. 1, 2; 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16.—To these duties belongs the observance of the Lord's Supper.—Zeisius: It is not enough to be baptized, but there is likewise demanded a holy zeal, to live after the baptismal covenant, and to walk blameless, 1 Pet. iii. 21.—Quesnel: A preacher's true fidelity consists in this, that he preaches nothing but what he has learned from Jesus Christ.—Believest thou His promise, then canst thou in Him and through Him easily overcome all things.

Lisco: Christ even in His human nature is the administrator of the divine laws over men, yea, over all creatures.—I have been baptized; the pledge of God's grace unto me.—Baptism is an incorporation into the body of Christ, which is governed by His Spirit.—Gerlach: That belief in the divinity of Christ, which was partly slumbering during His state of humiliation, is awakened in all, as with one blow, through this miraculously imposing view of the risen Saviour.—Acknowledgment of repentance and of faith, even when it was not associated with a clear knowledge concerning the Lord's person and teaching, was deemed sufficient by the Apostles to justify baptism, Acts ii. 41, viii. 12, ix. 19, x. 47, 48, xvi. 33, xix. 5.—Unto the end of the world; i. e., till the new world appears, in which God's kingdom appears in its glory. Their administration of baptism and their teaching were accordingly to be accompanied and blessed by His omnipresent, everywhere mighty, efficient power.—Heubner: The authority of the Father continues, but He performs everything through the Son (and for the Son).—Thereupon rests the obligation to worship Christ.—The Lord sends to His subjects.—Christ declares here distinctly the equality of His Church. It was His own clear will to be a common Saviour.—By the ordinance of Christ, baptism has the divine sanction for all times and peoples.—Teach them all. Nothing is to be made obsolete. Nothing is contained in Christ's law which was merely a toleration of an error of the times.—I am with you: The most glorious word of consolation was spoken at parting. The most sublime conclusion of the Gospel: 1. For all Christians unto all time. 2. The import of this promise. With His Spirit, and His actual manifestation of power.—Christ shall be preached to all in their own time, even in the other world.—The revelation of the glory of Jesus on parting from His Apostles and Church.

Braune: Previously He had appeared suddenly, unexpectedly; now He makes a special appointment with them.—In Galilee, the despised, He had the most friends.—Christ is the Lord of the visible and invisible Church, of the Church militant and triumphant.—[Rieger:] Some doubted: wonder not that in thy case faith is a constant subjugation of unbelief.—In flaming hearts, the light of conviction must kindle.—Is given Me. With joyous assurance He awaited His departure. He had won so few, and His task embraced all peoples, all times, Eph. i. 20, 23.—If He is busy and efficient at creation, much more is He at regeneration.—The first disciples, Christians, became missionaries, messengers of salvation, as soon as the Church was founded at Pentecost. Upon that first feast of Pentecost, there were three thousand Christians; at the end of the first century, five hundred thousand; under the first Christian ruler, Constantine the Great, about ten millions; in the eighth century, some thirty millions; at the era of the Reformation, nearly one hundred millions; and now, well-nigh two hundred millions.—Missionaries from England and Ireland brought the Gospel to us. The mission-field is the work for the Church. There are still eight hun- dred millions who have not the Gospel: one hundred and sixty millions Mohammedans, ten millions Jews, six hundred and thirty millions heathen.—Missions are now beginning to receive from the Church that attention they demand. Oh, if it were only held fast! Go ye, preach the Gospel. Many act as if the Redeemer said, the Confession.—[Rieger:] The preaching of the Gospel is an address made in Christ's name unto the whole world: it has not to do with an emendation of the Jewish religion, nor with an elevation of heathen morality, nor with the establishment of civil rights; but it is a Gospel of the kingdom, a proclamation that Jesus is the Lord; a Gospel of glory, that the Son of God hath appeared and taken away the power from death, and from the subjection unto vanity, beneath which the whole creation groaneth,—has appointed a goal, etc.—Baptism. Immersion, which signifies the death and burial of sinful humanity, became an asperson to signify the outpouring of the Holy Spirit for the soul's renewal, or a sprinkling to indicate purification and dedication, sanctification of heart and life: the external mode may change (but still the idea must obtain this depth, Rom. vi. 4, baptized into the death of Christ and to a new life).—Baptism is the sacrament through which one becomes a Christian.—Lo, I am with you: He is not coming, He is here: 1. He is with weak and strong; 2. in battle as in victory; 3. in life and in death; 4. in time and eternity.—Here Jesus is with us in His word, there we shall be with Him in His glory.—Uhle: What the exalted Son of man in His state of exaltation is unto men: 1. What do His friends possess in Him? He is, a. their royal Brother, b. their eternal High Priest, c. their almighty Protector, d. the unfailing Accomplisher of their perfection. 2. What do His enemies possess in Him? He is, a. their almighty King, b. an all-wise Witness, c. a patient Forbearer, d. a righteous Judge.—Ahlfeld: The last wish of our Lord Jesus Christ: 1. Believe on the Risen One; 2. extend the Church; 3. console thyself with the Lord's gracious assistance.—Heubner: The everlasting endurance of the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK;

BEING THAT OF THE NEW AND DIRECT MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST FROM HEAVEN, OF HIS ALL-CONQUERING DIVINE POWER, AND OF HIS DIVINE VICTORY.

(SYMBOLIZED BY A LION.)

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1.

DISTINCTIVE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SECOND GOSPEL.

THE Gospel by Mark claims kindred to that of Matthew, while at the same time it occupies perfectly distinct and separate ground. In contradistinction to the narratives of Luke and John, which exhibit the universal bearing of the life and work of Christ—its application to mankind generally, the two first Evangelists present the sacred history in its theocratic aspect. But, on the other hand, while Matthew points to the Saviour as the New Testament King of the Jews, Mark exhibits Him in His independent Personality, and as that new and absolute manifestation of the Deity in Israel which the Old Testament was intended to prepare and proclaim. Matthew presents the history of the Lord as that of the true Prophet, Priest, and King, in His conflict with the spurious representations thereof set up by traditionalism; while Mark shows how all the powers existing in the world, representing as they did the various phases of unbelief, rose in opposition to the Lord, and how all were vanquished by His divine power. Hence, in the narrative of Matthew, the history of Jesus is presented as the summing up and culminating of the martyrdom of all the Old Testament worthies and prophets, as that deepest and fullest suffering which, through the Spirit of all grace, becomes and forms the expiatory service of the great High Priest. In the Gospel of Mark, on the other hand, the element of victory and of triumph (Isa. ix.) is scarcely kept in the background, even amidst the scenes of intensest suffering. In the narrative of Matthew, Christ enters upon the scene in order to remove the conditions and limitations which had hitherto beset the course of history, and thereby to give it a new direction; in the Gospel by Mark, the coming of Christ is presented as the breaking up of the former state of things, the elements of the old world serving merely as the material out of which the new kingdom of salvation and of liberty is constructed. The first Evangelist delineates the life of Jesus in its theocratic aspect and bearing on universal history; the second shows that, besides this aspect and bearing, the life of Jesus has, both in itself and in His work, the direct impress and stamp of divinity. Thus the Gospel of history is followed by the only history of the Gospel; that which details suffering in glorious act and deed, by the Gospel which delineates His achievements in and by suffering voluntarily borne; the Gospel, which has appropriately been symbolized by the sacrificial bullock, by that to which even antiquity attached the symbol of a lion. (See the Introd. to the New Testament.)

Hence, in tracing the Gospel history, Mark seems to have viewed his glorious subject mainly in the light of that prophecy of the patriarch Jacob: "Judah is a young lion" (Gen. xlix. 9)—a prediction taken up once more by Hosea (xi. 10) and by Amos (i. 2), and swelling into a note of triumph in the last pages of Scripture (Rev. v. 8). Accordingly, although the great adversary of that Lion, even Satan himself, goeth about like a roaring lion (1 Pet. v. 8), he is not a lion in the genuine and spiritual sense. The simile applies only allegorically, in reference to his bold appearance in the open persecution of believers; in its higher symbolical meaning, that title belongs to the Lord Himself. In this respect Peter well described the work of Christ (Acts x. 38) as "healing all that were oppressed of the devil." Our Evangelist delineates the Saviour as, from first to last, pre-eminently the victorious Conqueror of all satanic powers. He has left us a record of the manifestation and the triumph of Christ's power, when that great Lion seized upon the ancient world, and of His brief but decisive victory. After that, only the ruins of the ancient world were left, which in turn furnished the materials for reconstructing a new world.

This Gospel of the intrinsic power and life of Christ, as reflected in the kindred soul of the Evangelist, possesses a great variety of distinguishing characteristics, both of a negative and positive kind. It is on this ground that we account for the con ciseness of this the briefest of the Gospels, and not on that of the historical occasion for its composition (Mark, one of Peter's Evangelists, relating the events of evangelical history by way of explaining his preaching). We can understand how, in the circumstances, Mark had no leisure for pausing and meditating; how meditation gave place to rapid and rapt contemplation; how he omits the larger discourses of Jesus, and how, when he does record any of His discourses, he selects those burning words of controversy, denunciation, judgment, or triumph; how, occasionally, there is a carelessness of expression (such as not to "put on two coats," ch. vi. 9); how, towards the close, he breaks off abruptly (ch. xvi. 9); and how the arrangement of his material, though distinct, is so frequently obscured by the rapid succession of the great events described, that Papias suggested Mark had not written in the order of succession, such as he conceived it to have taken place (οὐ τάξει, Euseb. iii. 39).

These negative traits owe their origin to the positive characteristics of this Gospel. The deeds of divine heroism which it describes, find, as it were, an appropriate body in peculiarities of expression, whether by an accumulation of negatives (οὐκέτι οὐδείς) and by rapid transitions, or by rapid succession in the narrative. In fact, the word εὐθέως may be designated as the characteristic expression of our Gospel. While Matthew transports us amidst the events of his time, when he relates what "came to pass in those days," the peculiar expression "immediately," employed by Mark, hurries us from one event to another. So frequently, indeed, does the term occur, that ancient copyists not unfrequently questioned its authenticity, and that in Cod. D. it is even omitted in several instances. (See Credner, Introd. i. p. 102.) This vividness of description leads to the frequent use of the Present tense in the narrative (ch. i. 25, 40, etc.), and to the introduction of the very language used by individuals (ch. iv. 39, v. 8, etc.). On the same ground also, an event is recorded in the Aramæan words used in the actual occurrence (ch. iii. 17, 22, v. 41), and new, customary or popular expressions are used (δηνάριον; κεντυρίων). But while the Evangelist rapidly sketches his great picture, he also delights to dwell on those particular events which, so to speak, form its essential features. That enthusiasm and vividness of realization which account for the brevity and rapidity of the narrative, also explain the introduction of details which seem to give life to the scene. Thus we come upon certain graphic touches of description,—such as Christ being in the wilderness among wild beasts; the cursed fig-tree withering to the root; Jesus asleep on a pillow in the hinder part of the vessel while crossing the lake. Along with those lifelike touches of the historian's pencil, which appear in the delineation of that beautiful simile in ch. iv. 26, or in that of the gradual cure of the blind man in ch. viii. 22, we naturally find a freshness and accuracy of recollection, as in recalling, for example, the name of Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, the blind beggar on the road to Jericho, and a childlike affectionateness, leading to the frequent use of diminutive forms of expression, such as "little daughter," "little child," etc. Lastly, from the same causes there is a marked accuracy of details in reference to the persons introduced on the scene, the particulars of time and place, numbers, secondary circumstances, and other small points, more especially when the Evangelist describes the miraculous cures performed by the Lord. (See Credner, p. 103 and following.) Thus the second Gospel may be characterized as that of a rapt vision of the Son of God, manifesting His divine power by His divine working. The glorious work of Christ is set before us in a series of great pictures, rapidly succeeding each other. His mission of pardon and grace is accomplished in a few great stages, each the result of deepest energy and zeal, and the manifestation of His inmost life. It is as if the heavens were rent asunder, and eternally pouring down their richest showers of blessing. Hence also both the attractive and the repulsive influence of Christ are set before us; the enmity of unbelievers becomes immediately mortal hatred, while the people also crowd around Him in immense numbers, bearing with them those who need His help. Sometimes there is not even room to stand, nor leisure so much as to eat. "Nay, His love shines forth in such bright effulgence, and kindles such enthusiasm among the multitudes which surround Him, that on one occasion His kinsmen were about forcibly to remove Him from the throng, from an apprehension that He was beside Himself (ch. iii. 21). The impression produced on the people is of the deepest character: they are filled with wonder, astonished beyond measure, and dismayed, wherever He makes His appearance to manifest His power and love." The results produced correspond to the influence felt. "He healed many, insomuch that they rushed upon Him for to touch Him, as many as had plagues." Wherever His arrival is announced, the sick are brought from all the neighbourhood, and laid in the streets on their couches; and they beseech Him that they might touch if it were but the border of His garment, "and as many as touched Him were made whole." Even His appearance among them made the people greatly amazed, so that they trembled for joy and awe (ch. ix. 15). But every deed He performs is a victory over the hostile powers. Our Gospel is not pervaded by the same anticipation of death as that of Matthew. Even of His last words on the cross, only these are recorded, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?"—as if in this hour of agony also, we were only to hear the Lion's cry of woe. In the same manner, the striking effects of the resurrection are prominently brought forward. In their distress, the disciples believe not the tidings of His resurrection, whether from the lips of Mary Magdalene, or from those of the two disciples to whom He had appeared by the way. But whenever Christ Himself appears among them, and upbraids them with their unbelief, they are completely changed; they are now ready to receive the commission, "Preach the Gospel to every creature." A continued manifestation of His power attends, after His resurrection and ascension, the messengers of Christ, and confirms the word. Thus characteristically closes the Gospel by Mark, even as, throughout his narrative, his eye was mainly fixed on those miraculous and healing manifestations of divine power by which the world was shaken and transformed. In this respect his narrative is unique; it exhibits the life of Christ as divine power pervading the world. Throughout, it presents the history of Christ as the working, manifestation and influence of the God-man. From the pages of Mark we gather how, at the time, He touched every chord of feeling in the souls of the people—amazement, fear, confidence, hope, joy, and delight; and how He adapted His divine power to those varying states of emotion, whether by reproof, healing, or sanctification. The rapidity with which the Saviour achieved such immense results, the glorious day's work in which He pervaded the world with the power and efficacy of His name, and the victorious strength with which He burst the cords of the world and the sorrows of the grave, and rose to His throne of glory, are here presented as the grand characteristics of the divine Redeemer, who, by a series of rapid victories, accomplished His work of redemption.

At the same time, this glorious life of work and victory is to serve as a symbol, in the light of which we are to view and to understand every deed wrought in the name of the Lord, every awakening impression or revival brought about by men full of the Holy Ghost, every progress of the kingdom of God, every victory of faith upon earth, in short, every outgoing of power from the throne of the Son of God. (See Lange, Life of Jesus i. p. 248.)

Another peculiarity of our Gospel deserves special mention. It will readily be noticed that the Evangelist lays emphasis on the periods of pause and rest which regularly intervene between the victories achieved by Christ. Each fresh progress, each new contest and fresh victory, are preceded by a period of retirement. Thus the Saviour, at the commencement of His work, leaves the obscure abode of His humiliation at Nazareth, in order to submit to the baptism of John, and thereby to insure His victorious progress. Thence He retires into the wilderness; again and again He repairs into the desert, to issue forth anew and to achieve ever larger conquests. Even His ascension is presented in our Gospel under the peculiar aspect of Christ retiring in order to conquer, by His power and blessing, the whole world, through the instrumentality of His ambassadors.

---

§ 2.

HISTORY OF MARK THE EVANGELIST.

In the Book of Acts, the writer of our Gospel is first designated as John Mark (ch. xii. 12, 25), then as John (ch. xiii. 5, 13), and lastly as Mark (ch. xv. 39; Col. iv. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Philem. 24). Originally he seems to have borne the Jewish name of John; but it must not be imagined that on entering upon the duties of an Evangelist he arbitrarily adopted the Roman name of Mark. His familiarity with the Latin, which may be gathered from the circumstance that he afterwards became "the interpreter of Peter" (his ἑρμηνεύτης, according to Papias in Euseb. iii. 39, Iren. iii. 1 and in other places, Tertullian, Jerome), may have been due to some connection between his family and Italy. His father, or some other of his relatives, may have been a proselyte from Rome; or else a wealthy family like that of Mark may have had other reasons for giving him, along with the Hebrew, a Roman name. Certain it is that, in his capacity of companion to the Apostles, he is generally designated Mark, just as Saul took the name of Paul when engaged in his great work. A later tradition has in the present, as in other instances, availed itself of this circumstance to transform our Evangelist into two or three saints. The Evangelist Mark was represented as being a different personage from John Mark; and again, these two as distinct from the relative of Barnabas (compare the art. Mark in Winer, Real-Encycl.). Among later divines, Grotius, Calov., and Schleiermacher (Stud. u. Krit. for 1832), and still more recently Kienlen (Stud. u. Krit. for 1843, p. 423), have endeavoured, though unsuccessfully, to maintain the existence of two biblical personages of the name of Mark,—the one a companion of Peter, the other of Paul. The fact that Mark acted as Evangelist alternately in connection with Paul and with Peter, is readily accounted for, both from his peculiarities of temperament and character, and from the mutual understanding and accord between the two Apostles themselves. Nor is there more solid reason for including Mark among the seventy disciples. Thus it is conjectured that he was one of those disciples who were offended by the saying of Christ, about the necessity of eating His flesh and drinking His blood (John vi. 53, 60); but that he was afterwards restored through the admonitions of Peter. Stronger probability attaches to the supposition that Mark himself was the young man, of whom he relates in his Gospel (ch. xiv. 51), that on the night of the Lord's betrayal he followed Him clothed in a light night-dress, which he left in the hands of the officers when he fled from them (comp. Olshausen; Lange, Life of Jesus i. p. 245, and our comment on this passage). From the Book of Acts we gather that the mother of Mark was a wealthy proprietress; and the supposition does not appear far-fetched, that she may have owned a country-house in the valley of the Kidron, at the foot of the Mount of Olives—perhaps even the garden of Gethsemane. At any rate, there is a striking resemblance between the character of that young man and the life of Mark, in whose quick and ardent disposition sin required to be specially met and conquered by sovereign grace. Thus we find that, while Mark boldly accompanied Paul on his first missionary journey, he suddenly forsook him, but afterwards again recovered himself, and offered his services in other expeditions of the same kind. For further particulars about ch. xiv. 51, see the Notes below.

As already noticed, Mark was the son of an influential Christian matron of Jerusalem, called Mary, in whose house the disciples were wont to meet for united worship, according to the custom of those days. Mary had wholly devoted herself to the cause and service of Christ (Acts xii. 12). At a time when James the Elder had just fallen by the sword of Herod Agrippa, and Peter lay in prison awaiting a doom from which he was only delivered by a miracle, Mary risked her all by converting her house, so to speak, into the principal church of Jerusalem. Indeed, so well was this understood, that after his miraculous liberation from prison, Peter at once directed his steps to her house, as the great centre and meeting-place of the disciples. The son of such a woman—a worthy companion of the other Maries of the Gospels—could not but be early acquainted with the blessed truths of Christianity. From the expression in 1 Pet. v. 13 (υἱός μου), it has been inferred that the Apostle Peter had been the instrument of his conversion. That his religious convictions, however, depended not on those of any man, is evidenced by the fact, that his peculiar relation towards Peter did not prevent him from joining Paul and Barnabas on their return from Jerusalem to Antioch, probably with a view to that missionary tour on which he afterwards accompanied them in the capacity of an evangelist or minister (ὑπηρέτες, Acts xiii. 5). But this step was probably taken, mainly at the suggestion of his uncle Barnabas (Mark was ἀνεψιός to Barnabas, Col. iv. 10). We are not informed on what ground our Evangelist deserted the mission at Perga in Pamphylia, and returned to Jerusalem. Luke is silent on the point; although Paul regarded the conduct as so blameworthy, that when he and Barnabas resolved to undertake a second missionary tour (Acts xv. 36), he firmly refused to accept the proffered assistance of Mark (Acts xv. 38). Nay, of such importance did he deem the matter, that, when Barnabas insisted on allowing his nephew to accompany them, Paul, rather than yield, separated from his old companion, and that although he was in many respects under considerable obligations to one who, under the influence of that love which thinketh no evil, had first introduced him to the Apostles at Jerusalem, and afterwards, with an unselfishness truly Christian, had brought him to Antioch, to share in the work going on in that city. We cannot doubt that Barnabas had spiritual grounds for his conduct in reference to Mark, beyond a mere natural feeling for his young relative, and that large-hearted charity of which he otherwise had given proof (see Acts iv. 36). Still, it may be supposed that the well-merited reproof administered by Paul, proved of greater use to Mark in after life than the apology offered for him by Barnabas. It is just possible that, at the time, some of the views on which Paul acted in his missionary labours had appeared too liberal to the young convert from Jerusalem. Even Barnabas does not seem to have always felt equally confident on the subject (Gal. ii.). Suffice it that the presence of Mark was the occasion of "sharp contention" and separation between the two missionaries, who now took up different fields of labour. Paul went from Syria directly to Cilicia; while Barnabas took ship for Cyprus, his native island, where, on the former occasion also, he had commenced his missionary work. It deserves special notice, that while Paul was in the habit of commencing a missionary tour by revisiting the place where on a former occasion he had first laboured, he this time ceded it to Barnabas. It is on this occasion that Luke for the first time designates our Evangelist simply by the name of Mark (Acts xv. 39). But the spirit of apostolic peace soon took the place of temporary misunderstanding and disagreement. Hence we afterwards find the name of Mark among the assistants of Paul during the time of his first captivity at Rome (Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24), or about the year 62. At a somewhat later period, however, he seems to have been with Peter at Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13), whence the Apostle, addressing the disciples in Asia Minor, sends salutations from Marcus his son. For we regard the following as settled points: First, that Babylon means the place of that name, and not Rome, as it could have served no rational purpose to conceal the name of a place under a mystical title, which might so readily be misunderstood. Secondly, that the First Epistle of Peter bears evident marks of having been composed at the time when the persecution of Christians throughout the Roman Empire commenced, and the Jews were preparing for their last great war of nationality, or some time after the year 62. But as, during his second captivity, Paul charged Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 11) to bring Mark with him to Rome (probably from Asia Minor), the supposition lies near, that our Evangelist was at the time returning from Babylon. It may have been, in those great and portentous days—when, in rapid succession, the Epistle of James, that to the Hebrews, and the First Epistle of Peter were addressed to Jewish Christians, with the view of warning them against the spiritual dangers impending, and of entreating them to bear with patience the trials and sufferings which were approaching—that Mark had been employed as the medium of special communication between Paul and Peter. At any rate, there is nothing strange in an interchange of service in the common work of the Lord, just as Silas was both a companion of Paul, and also engaged with Peter in the work of the Lord. Such special missions would be peculiarly in consonance with the character of Mark. From the same cause, we do not wonder to find him ranged by the side of the chief Apostles at the most dangerous points of attack, now at Babylon, and again at Rome. But from this commission of Paul to Timothy, it does not necessarily follow that the latter was in circumstances to obey it. In all probability, Peter arrived at Rome about the same time as Mark; as there is sufficient evidence of the fact, that Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome, along with Paul, about the year 68. This fact is again the basis for the other statements of antiquity (Papias in Euseb. iii. 39; Iren. iii. 1, and others), to the effect, that Mark had acted as interpreter (ἑρμηνεύτης) to Peter. Nor is it necessary to suppose, with Kuinoel, that, according to this statement, Mark translated into Greek what Peter spoke in Aramæan; nor, with Meyer, that the expression Hermeneutes merely meant a secretary, whose duty it was to put on paper the oral communications of the Apóstle (comp. Meyer, Introd. to the Gospel of Mark, p. 3). It is evident that Mark, who was familiar with the manners and language of Rome, could render important assistance to Peter in Italy as "interpreter," in the strictest sense, and that notwithstanding the apostolic gift of tongues. Similarly, it is well attested (Euseb. vi. 14; Clemens Alex. Hypot. 6) that Mark was with Peter at Rome—a statement wholly unconnected with the stale hypothesis, according to which the Babylon of 1 Pet. v. 13 meant the city of Rome (Euseb. ii. 15; Hieron. vir. ill. 8). The Gospel of Mark presents evidence of a protracted intercourse with Peter, just as that by Luke shows that this Evangelist must have enjoyed continued fellowship with Paul. It is indeed true that the New Testament idea of the kingdom is not so fully developed in the Gospel of Mark as in the Epistles of Peter; but the narrative of the Evangelist also presents Christ chiefly as the Lord of that kingdom, and as the conqueror of Satan and his legions,—and that in so marked a manner, as if the sacred historian had adopted for his motto the testimony of Peter, Acts x. 38. Similarly, Irenæus (iii. 1; comp. Euseb. v. 8) also records that, after the death of the Apostles, Mark had, as the disciple and interpreter of Peter, written down the statements of that Apostle. According to the testimony of Clemens Alex. (Hypot. 6; see Euseb. vi. 14), Mark composed his Gospel during the lifetime of Peter, in accordance with the request of that Apostle's converts, and Peter, who was cognisant of the fact, did not interpose in the matter. (For other similar testimonies, see Credner, p. 113.) · In that case, we must, of course, not confound the first draft with the final revision of the work. According to the unanimous testimony of antiquity, Mark went, after the death of Peter, to Alexandria, where he founded a Christian church (Euseb. iii. 39), became its first bishop, and suffered martyrdom (Epiphan. Hæres. li. 6; Euseb. ii. 16; Hieron. vir. illust. ii. 8, and others).

There is a striking correspondence between the character of Mark and that of his Gospel. Another evidence this of the fact, that the human form and aspect of a Gospel depended on the individuality of the Evangelist, and on the point of view which he took, deciding him in selecting, arranging, and presenting the historical material at his command. It may yet take some time before views like these will prevail in the schools, and the common error be discarded, that the auxiliaries and aids which the writer had enjoyed were the main thing, and the mental characteristics of the historian only secondary, if, indeed, at all to be taken into account. Mark the Evangelist, ardent and energetic (a kindred companion to Peter), kindly, warm-hearted, and affectionate (a nephew of Barnabas, in the spiritual sense also), liberal and fresh in his views (a friend of Paul), was called by the Lord to transmit unto the Church a Gospel, in which it is shown how the Lion of the tribe of Judah became the Lamb of God, and how all human heroism finds both its expiation and transfiguration in the glorious achievements and conquests of the God-man. Thus the Gospel of spiritual deed in suffering, follows that of history and of historical suffering.

---

§ 3.

COMPOSITION AND INTEGRITY OF THE GOSPEL.

The oldest testimony as to the origin of the second Gospel is that of Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, dating from the first half of the second century, and communicated by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 39): "Mark, being the interpreter of Peter, wrote down with great accuracy whatever he interpreted (in other words, what Peter stated), though he recorded not in the order in which it was spoken or done by the Lord (i.e., as Matthew, who arranged and joined together the sayings and the history of the Saviour); for he neither heard nor followed our Lord (as His disciple), but, as before said, he was afterwards the companion of Peter, who arranged his instructions as was necessary, but did not give a history of our Lord's discourses (which was one of Matthew's main objects). Wherefore Mark has not erred in any way by writing some things as he remembered them. For he was careful of one thing, not to omit anything of what he had heard, or to falsify (or add) anything in these accounts." It appears to us, that in his excessive anxiety to vindicate the apostolic authority of this Gospel, Papias has represented the undoubted fact of a connection between Mark and Peter, as if the Evangelist had been merely the penman of the Apostle. Hence the other ancient testimony, derived by Clement of Alexandria from primitive tradition, and recorded in extracts from the Hypotyposes (in Euseb. vi. 14), must be regarded as supplementary of this account. According to the statement of Clement, a great number of those who had heard Peter proclaiming the word of God at Rome, requested Mark, who had followed the Apostle for a long time, and well remembered what he had said, to reduce to writing what the Apostle had declared. It is added that Peter was cognisant of this, and encouraged it (the work as a whole); while, at the same time, he abstained from all active interference, either in the way of directing or restraining (in its individual parts). We leave it to others to translate the passage so as to mean that he (προτρεπτικῶς) neither restrained nor encouraged the matter. His encouragement of the work as a whole (προτρεπτικῶς) consisted in this, that he did not find it necessary to omit anything from, or to add unto, its individual portions. It was the approbation of a work bearing evidence of independent authorship. This view of the passage agrees with the earlier account in Eusebius (ii. 15). In both cases, the ostensible reason assigned for the work is the same. We are told that Peter was cognisant of the fact that Mark had composed the Gospel by the revelation of the Holy Spirit, and that he rejoiced in the zeal of those who solicited the Gospel; finally, that he gave his authority to the work in order that it might be read in the churches. On these grounds the earlier Fathers were warranted in designating our Gospel as that of Peter, so far as its substance is concerned, without thereby invalidating the originality of Mark, so far as the arrangement of the material is concerned.

A very slight examination will suffice to convince the student that in the third Gospel the distinctive mental characteristics of Luke coincided with the views of the Apostle Paul, and exactly met the wants of well-educated Grecian inquirers and converts. Similarly, in our Gospel we note how the mental characteristics of Mark corresponded with the manner in which Peter presented the truth, while at the same time it also harmonized with the wants of Roman Christians, and was peculiarly suited to the popular mind in the capital. This, along with the special occasion for the composition of the Gospel, must be regarded as giving its tone to the narrative. But before proceeding further, we must refer to and refute other theories on the subject. These are: 1. Mark was merely a compiler, who derived his Gospel from those of Matthew and of Luke, if not from the former alone. 2. The Gospel of Mark was the original record from which the other two were copied. 3. The Gospel of Mark and that of the other two Evangelists were equally derived from a primitive Gospel or tradition. 4. The Gospel of Mark was written for a special purpose. Lastly, 5. The special notion of those who carry their views of inspiration so far as to ignore throughout Scripture, and in our Gospel also, all human individuality.—The first of these views, that Mark was the pedisequus et breviator of Matthew, was propounded by Augustine, de consensu Evang. 1, 2, and after him by Euthym. Zigabenus and Michaelis. On the other hand, Michaelis, Griesbach, Saunier (on the sources of the Gospel of Mark, 1825), Theile, Strauss, von Ammon, and others, maintain that our Evangelist had made use both of Matthew and Luke. To this we reply, 1st, That Mark introduces a number of things not mentioned in the other Gospels (ch. iii. 20, 21, iv. 26–29, vii. 31–37, viii. 22–26, xi. 11–14, xiv. 51, 52, xvi. 9–11); and that, in general, he has a peculiar way of presenting matters (ch. i. 42, v. 4, 5, vii. 3, 4, ix. 21–26, x. 24, 34, 49, xii. 32–34). 2. The Gospel of Mark commences and closes in a distinctive manner, and the material which it has in common with Matthew and Luke (39 sections), with Matthew alone (23 sections), or with Luke alone (18 sections), is presented in a distinctive form. Hence these critics felt it necessary to modify the original hypothesis of Augustine, as stated above.—The idea that the Gospel of Mark contains the original and primitive record from which the other narratives were derived, was first propounded by Herder, and adopted by Storr, Wilke, Weisse, Reuss, and Ewald. Of late, critics have even gone further, and assigned to our Evangelist the authorship of the Book of Revelation (Hitzig on John Mark; or, which John was the author of the Book of Revelation? Zor. 1843). But it is evident that the other two Evangelists furnish too many details of their own—such as the history of Christ's infancy, the longer discourses of Jesus, etc.,—to warrant us in supposing that their narrative was derived from Mark. Add to this the consideration, that they also have their peculiar manner of presenting and arranging the evangelical history.—The third hypothesis, about the existence of some primitive Gospel, from which all the others had been derived, may now be regarded as finally discarded. The Aramæan text of Matthew, to which Papias refers, could not have been that Gospel, as Corrodi and others suggest (see Ebrard, Evangelien Kritik, p. 5), since our first Gospel is itself a Greek version of it. The same objection applies to the Gospel of the Hebrews (Niemeyer and others), which was just a Judæo-Christian and interpolated edition of Matthew; while the hypothesis of Herder and of Eichhorn, that the original Gospel was wholly lost, is evidently a baseless fiction. Greater importance attaches to the supposition of the existence of an original evangelical tradition, which in great measure existed in the very form, and with the expressions handed down to us (Eckermann, Gieseler). Nor is it sufficient to object, that the Apostles had at so early a period separated from each other, since every original witness told and retold the evangelical narrative. There was a mutual and unceasing narration of the same history. Besides, we gather from Luke i. 1, that at a very early period there existed special narratives of portions and events in the history of our Lord. It will be readily understood how witnesses of such events would feel constrained to write down these glorious facts; nor is it improbable that such narratives may have been disseminated, until they were incorporated into, or superseded by, the four Gospels. But this hypothesis about an original Gospel must be somewhat modified in its application. For, 1. The first, second, and fourth Gospels are evidently derived from the personal recollection of the Apostles; and the third Gospel, at least indirectly. 2. We must bear in mind that the unique style of the Gospels, with their peculiar apostolic simplicity, was reproduced by the continuous influence of the apostolic spirit. 3. Lastly, we must remember, that so far as the form was concerned, the mental individuality of the Evangelists formed a most important element in the shape which the historical materials at their command received.—In reply to the supposition of Baur, Schwegler, Köstlin, and others, that the Gospel of Mark was written with a special object, it is sufficient to say, that this hypothesis has fallen to the ground, along with the peculiar notions about Ebionism upon which it was reared. The main source whence the Gospel narratives were derived, was the vivid recollection of the Apostles, deepened, strengthened, and purified by the Spirit of God. Thus Mark depended on the narrative of Peter, which shaped itself in accordance with the peculiar point from which that Apostle viewed the facts of the Gospel. As a secondary source of information, our Evangelist, no doubt, drew from that general evangelical tradition, which had in particular instances been chronicled by eye-witnesses. As to the origin of this tradition, it is of great importance to bear in mind, that both the Gospel narratives themselves, and the peculiar form in which they were couched, originated in Gospel principles, and that their integrity, affectionateness, and simplicity were due to the inspiration of these writers. Thus our Evangelist drew his material from subjective recollection (on the part of Peter), which in turn rested on the more general basis of objective recollection (in apostolic tradition). This material took form in agreement with his particular charisma; i.e., objectively under the influence of inspiration by the Spirit, and subjectively under that of his mental idiosyncrasy.

According to the statement of Irenæus (iii. 1), Mark published his Gospel after the death of Peter and Paul ("ἔξοδον, not their departure, as Mill, Grabe, Ebrard, and Meyer render it"). There is no contradiction between this and the statement of Clement of Alexandria, to the effect that this narrative had been composed during the lifetime of Peter, as Irenæus refers not to the commencement, but to the close of its composition. For the purpose of introducing the apocryphal story of the victory of Peter over Simon Magus at Rome, Eusebius has fixed the time of the Apostle's stay in the capital in the third year of the Emperor Claudius, evidently post-dating it. The publication of our Gospel must have taken place between the year 68 and 70. That the Gospel was written prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, we gather from the circumstance that in ch. xiii. the Evangelist relates the prediction of that event without referring to its fulfilment. Hence our Gospel must have been composed about the same time as those by Matthew and by John; the Gospel of Luke having been published several years earlier.

According to the testimony of Clement, Eusebius, Jerome, and others, our Gospel was composed at Rome—a tradition which is credited by most modern theologians. Richard Simon and others have, on the strength of a statement by Chrysostom that our narrative was written at Alexandria, conjectured that it existed in twofold recension. A fanciful comparison of the notice in ch. xv. 21 with Acts xi. 20, led Storr to adopt the groundless hypothesis that it was composed in Antioch.

As our Gospel was, in the first place, intended for Roman Christians, it naturally addressed itself mainly to such as had formerly been Gentiles. Still, it cannot be inferred, from the total absence of Old Testament proof passages (with one or two exceptions), that it was exclusively designed for Gentile Christians (Meyer). We have already seen that it was one of the characteristics of Mark to present Christ as manifesting His divinity directly by His divine working. That Mark introduces no Judaizing elements (Köstlin), is a trait which he has in common with all the New Testament writers. On the other hand, it cannot be doubted that, when the ardent Evangelist found himself addressing Latin readers, this may have influenced his style, as in the choice of Latin expressions (ch. vi. 27, vii. 4, 8, xv. 39, 44), in giving explanation (ch. xii. 42, xv. 16), and in making certain additions (ch. x. 12, xv. 21).

There is the strongest historical evidence in favour of the genuineness of Mark. Besides the general ecclesiastical testimonies, commencing with Justin Martyr and Tatian, and those of Irenæus, Clement, and Tertullian, we have a sufficiently clear quotation in Justin and the primitive testimony of Papias in his favour, as in that of Matthew. But, just as the testimony of Papias in favour of Matthew has been turned against him by putting a peculiar meaning upon the words τὰ λόγια, so in the present instance also it has been sought to invalidate the evidence in favour of our Gospel by an appeal to the expression οὐ τάξει, used by Papias. This view was first propounded by Schleiermacher in the Studien u. Krit. for 1832, and for a time adopted by Credner, although that writer has since discarded this interpretation. The criticism of Schleiermacher was based on the ungrounded hypothesis, that our Gospel was written in chronological order. Meyer denies the latter suggestion, but simply refers the expression οὐ τάξει to the first outlines of notices which Mark had made after hearing the discourses of Peter, and which were afterwards revised and arranged. In our opinion, the remarks of Papias refer more particularly to the contrast between the Gospel of Mark and the careful arrangement adopted by Matthew, especially in recording the Lord's discourses. Baur, as might be expected, supposes that the original Gospel of Mark was a work similar in character to the Clementines; Köstlin speaks of an original Gospel by Peter; while other writers indulge in similar fancies. In support of such freaks of critical imagination, each of these critics appeals to the fatal οὐ τάξει of Papias, no matter whether it was originally well or ill founded, or is at present properly or improperly interpreted. Others, such as De Wette, have cast doubts upon the testimony of Papias, in order thus to invalidate the authenticity of Mark. According to Ewald, there were many recensions of Mark, which underwent different variations. All these suggestions are sufficiently refuted by a proper appreciation of the testimony of our Gospel concerning its authorship.

The conclusion of ch. xvi. 9–20 has given rise to critical difficulties and doubts, which are better founded than any of those above referred to. Eusebius did not admit the authenticity of this passage (ad Marin. Quæstio I.), remarking, that in almost all manuscripts our Gospel closed with a description of the flight of the women from the sepulchre. Jerome (though not uniformly), Gregory of Nyssa, and Euth. Zigabenus adopted the same view. Besides, the passage is awanting in the Vatican Codex B.; and the Syriac Philoxeniana adds, that the close of the Gospel was different in other codices. Credner points out certain divergences from the ordinary modes of expression used in this Gospel. It is asserted that, while the distinctive characteristics of Mark are awanting in this passage, others not found throughout his Gospel may be traced there. Among the latter are such expressions as πᾶσα κτίσις, γλώσσαις καιναῖς λαλεῖν, etc.

On the other hand, it should be noticed, 1. That even Irenæus, adv. Hæres. iii. 10, 6, was acquainted with the present conclusion of our Gospel, as appears from the following passage: In fine autem Evangelii ait Marcus (xvi. 19): et quidem dominus Jesus, postquam locutus est eis, receptus est in cœlos et sedet ad dexteram Dei. Considering how much older and more important the testimony of Irenæus is than that of Eusebius, we are naturally led to suppose it more likely that our present conclusion of the Gospel had originally been found in all manuscripts, but was afterwards left out from ecclesiastical prejudices (because the Apostles were reproved in it, etc.), than that it had afterwards been added. 2. In opposition to those codices in which this portion was awant-

ing, we have the evidence of other codices in which it existed. 3. While small details, characteristic of Mark—such as, that the expressions εὐθέως, πάλιν, are awanting in this section—are prominently brought forward by opponents, the leading features of the passage are overlooked. But these are quite characteristic of our Evangelist, and show how the conclusion of his Gospel is quite in unison with the narrative itself. Among these we reckon the fundamental idea of the section, that the risen Saviour overcame the unbelief of His disciples, and the promise of the Lord, that those who believed on Him should triumph over devils and serpents, and over the powers of death. Similarly, the form and contents of the section correspond with the idea of the Gospel generally. Hence the strong expression, "Preach the Gospel to every creature" (especially taken in conjunction with the statement at the beginning of the Gospel, "Jesus was with the wild beasts"), and the closing words. "the Lord confirming the word with signs following." Add to this, that the Gospel could not have closed with verse 8 without being fragmentary. Still, we cannot ignore the fact, that at an early period our Gospel seems to have existed in twofold recension or form. This may perhaps be explained by the supposition that an incomplete work of our Evangelist may have circulated among the Christian public before our present and complete Gospel. A certain degree of probability attaches to this hypothesis from the circumstance, which the Fathers record, that the Roman Christians were very anxious for the appearance of our Gospel. "This rapid compilation and publication, followed by doubt and hesitation in view of another event, and, lastly, the final completion of the work, are so many traits in accordance with the general character of Mark, as it otherwise appears. Nor should it be forgotten that, as hierarchical views gradually spread in the Church since the third century, the fragment in question may have excited greater interest from the idea that the Apostles had been presented by Mark in an unfavourable light in his narrative of the resurrection. Considerations like these may have weighed with such men as Eusebius. Thus, it would almost seem as if the marked characteristics of our Evangelist had given rise to the doubts about the authenticity of this passage. But there also Mark seems mainly bent upon presenting the risen Saviour in the full majesty of His power, as He transforms, by one stroke, the remaining unbelief of His followers into a faith that overcomes the world." Lastly, we remark that the following critical writers have impugned the authenticity of our passage, viz., Michaelis, Griesbach, Credner, Hitzig (who ascribes its composition to Luke), and many others; among them Meyer, who designates the passage as an "apocryphal fragment." Its authenticity is defended by Richard Simon, Wolf, Bengel, Kuinoel, Hug, Guerike, and others.

In consequence of the supposition that Mark had composed his Gospel at Rome, and for Romans, the idea was broached in the Syrian Church, that our Evangelist had originally written in Latin. Hence the old Syriac Peschito concludes with the remark: he declared the Gospel at Rome in the Roman language. This view was adopted by the Philoxeniana and some Greek manuscripts. Baronius availed himself of this notice in his Annals (ad ann. 45), with the view of adding to the authority of the Vulgate. Though adopted by others, the idea has been abandoned even by Romanist writers, since the time of Richard Simon. A supposed Latin autograph at Venice has been found to be taken from the Vulgate. The older Fathers partly imply, and partly expressly state, that Mark wrote in Greek.

---

§ 4.

THEOLOGICAL AND HOMILETICAL WORKS ON THIS GOSPEL.

For those exegetical and homiletical works which treat of the Gospel of Mark, along with other smaller or larger sections of the New Testament, we refer the reader to our General Introduction, and to our remarks prefatory to the Gospel by Matthew. To the writings then enumerated, we would add, the Homiletical and Theol. Comment. on the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, by Drs Val. Loch and W. Reischl (Roman Cath.), Regensb. 1827, and Luther's Expos. of the Gospels, edited by Eberle, Stuttg. 1857. Besides these, we would mention Gossner's Edification of Christians; or, Exposit. of the New Testament; Besser, Bible-Exposit. (Bibel-Stunden); Harms' and Josephson's works on the Sermon on the Mount; and Kinewel's Sermons on the Gospels, adapted for the Family Circle. For special works on the Gospel by Mark, comp. the Encyclop. of Lilienthal, Danz and Winer. Rolle, J. B. Koppe, and Wilke, have written in defence of the originality of our Gospel; while the opposite view has been maintained chiefly by Griesbach and H. Saunier. Compare also the works of Knobel, Hitzig, Baur, and others. Of homiletical works, we specially mention those by Schleiermacher (Berlin, 1835), C. Brieger (Berlin, 1856), and W. L. Bauer (Dillenb. 1859).

---

§ 5.

FUNDAMENTAL IDEA AND ARRANGEMENT OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK.

As motto of this Gospel, we regard the declaration of Peter in Acts x. 38,—"Jesus of Nazareth, anointed by God with the Holy Ghost and with power, who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him."

Jesus, the mighty God (אֵל גִּבּוֹר, Isa. ix. 6), who broke through all fetters and bonds, appeared as a Divine Person, both in His origin, mission, and preparation, and as Prince of the kingdom of heaven, engaging in warfare with, and achieving the victory over, Satan and his powers. Throughout, the narrative presents to view a continuous series of victorious onslaughts followed by withdrawal on the part of Christ. Each victory is succeeded by a withdrawal which serves as preparation for fresh progress. The ascension of the Lord forms His last withdrawal, which is to be followed by His final and absolute victory.

Part First.

Grand preparation. Royal appearance of Jesus by the side of John the Baptist. First manifestation, when He quits the retirement of His humiliation at Nazareth, and first withdrawal.—In principle and germ all the succeeding contests are now decided. (Ch. i. 1–13.)

Section 1. John (vers. 1–8).
Section 2. Christ (vers. 9–13).

Part Second.

Royal appearance of Christ after the Baptist. His wars and victories in Galilee among the ancient people of God. (Ch. i. 14–ix. 50.)

Section 1. Announcement of the kingdom of heaven (ch. i. 14, 15).

Section 2. Conquest of the first disciples at Capernaum, victory over the devils in that town, and withdrawal into the wilderness (vers. 16–35).

Section 3. Conquest of disciples in Galilee, victory over the devils in the country, and withdrawal into the wilderness (vers. 36–45).

Section 4. Attracting and repelling influence of the Lord. The multitude filled with enthusiasm; the traditionalists offended. Conflicts with the powers of evil under the form of traditionalism. Hardening, and mortal hatred of the hostile party, and withdrawal of Jesus into a ship. (The preaching in synagogues gives place to that on the sea-shore.) (Ch. ii. 1–iii. 12.)

Section 5. Conflict of Jesus with the unbelief of His countrymen, and withdrawal into the villages (ch. iii. 13–vi. 6).

Section 6. Conflict between Jesus and the hostility of Herod. Calling and mission of the Apostles. Beheading of John, and withdrawal into the wilderness on the other side of the lake (vers. 7–45).

Section 7. Contest between Jesus and the scribes of Jerusalem, and withdrawal into the country about Tyre, and into that about Decapolis (ch. vi. 46–viii. 9).

Section 8. Decisive conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees in Galilee, and withdrawal to the mountains east of the lake. The new community prepared (ch. viii. 10–ix. 29).

Section 9. Secret abode of Jesus preparatory to His journey to Peræa and Jerusalem. Further preparation of the new community (vers. 30–50).

Part Third.

Conflicts and victories of the Lord in Peræa. Transition from the old to the new community. Withdrawal of the Lord for the purpose of collecting the disciples for His last journey. (Ch. x. 1–34.)

Section 1. Carnal views of the Pharisees, and spiritual law of the Lord, concerning marriage.

Section 2. Rabbinical views of the disciples, and theocratic and New Testament arrangements of the Lord (vers. 13–16).

Section 3. Temporal and spiritual riches of the world, and poverty of believers in both respects (vers. 17–31).

Section 4. Solemn gathering of the disciples on the road to impending sufferings (vers. 32–34).

Part Fourth.

Conflicts and victories of the Lord in Judæa. Christ founding the new Church. (Ch. x. 35–xv. 47.)

Section 1. The departure and the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem (ch. x. 35–xi. 26).

Section 2. Decisive conflict of Jesus with His enemies at Jerusalem, and withdrawal of the Saviour to the Mount of Olives (ch. xi. 27–xiii. 37).

Section 3. The Saviour's conflict of suffering, and His rest in the grave. Withdrawal into the realm of the dead. (Ch. xiv. 1–xv. 47.)

Part Fifth.

Resurrection of the Lord. The great victory, and appearance of the Victor in the midst of the Apostles for the purpose of completely establishing the new Church. Ascent to heaven (or last retirement), to achieve His victory throughout the whole world. (Ch xvi.)

Section 1. The risen Saviour victorious for the Church; or, preparation for belief in the resurrection. The three Easter messages: the angel, the woman, the two men (vers. 1–12).

Section 2. The risen Saviour victorious in the Church, sweeping away the unbelief of the disciples, perfecting their faith, and giving them their glorious message and commission (vers. 13–18).

Section 3. The risen Saviour ascending to heaven victorious with His Church, confirming the "word" and message of the disciples throughout the world (vers. 19, 20).

These periods of rest and withdrawal on the part of the Saviour, preparatory to fresh progress and victory, are also indicated by the other Evangelists, but not in so striking and marked a manner as in our Gospel. In one or two instances, indeed, they appear less clearly, showing that, while it was the leading idea of the sacred historian to mark these contrasts, his Gospel was not strictly and uniformly constructed or arranged upon such a plan. We subjoin a brief survey of the Gospel, with the view of setting more clearly before the reader these contrasts of withdrawal and renewed progress.

The Prelude: John in the wilderness; John arousing the whole country.

Fundamental Fact: Jesus (the Son of God) concealed in Nazareth; glorified in consequence of His baptism in the river Jordan.

1. Sojourn of Jesus in the wilderness; His appearance in room and stead of John; conquest of Capernaum.

2. Retirement of the Saviour into the wilderness; evangelization of Galilee—to the preliminary conflict with traditionalism, ch. i. 40, etc.

3. Retirement of Jesus into the wilderness (ch. i. 45); commencement and completion of the conflicts in Galilee.

4. Retirement (from intercourse with the synagogue) to the ship, and commencement of the open-air sermons (ch. iii. 7); as also, of the contest of the Saviour, in fellowship with His disciples, with the unbelief of the people.

5. Retirement to the villages in the mountains—and reappearance of the Saviour, to enter, in fellowship with His disciples, into conflict with the enmity of Herod—in the way of healing and feeding the people.

6. Retirement into the wilderness on the other side of the Lake of Galilee (ch. vi. 30); and reappearance of the Saviour to enter into conflict with the scribes of Jerusalem. Preliminary separation.

7. Retirement into the Gentile border land of Tyre and Sidon, and to Decapolis (ch. vi. 24, etc.); and decisive conflict with Pharisaism in Galilee. Final separation from the hierarchical party.

8. Retirement to the mountains on the other side of the Lake of Galilee, and secret sojourn in Galilee (ch. viii. 13–ix. 50); journey to Peræa.

9. Gathering of the disciples on the journey to Jerusalem (ch. x. 32), triumphal entry into the city, and decisive conflict in Jerusalem. Separation from the temple and the ancient theocracy.

10. Retirement of Jesus to the Mount of Olives (ch. xiii. 1), and reappearance to enter on His conflict of suffering.

11. Rest and concealment of Jesus in the grave (ch. xv. 42), and reappearance in the personal victory and triumph of His resurrection. Victory over the realm of the dead.

12. Ascent of Jesus, being His personal retirement from this earth and His reappearance in the victories achieved by His Church. Victory over the world.

We conceive that there is scarcely any room for questioning the correctness of this arrangement, except perhaps so far as sections 5 and 9 are concerned. But section 5 is also specially marked by the calling of the Twelve, which was preceded by solitude and prayer. Similarly, if it is objected that section 9 is not clearly marked in our Gospel, we reply that it is very distinctly pointed out in the Gospel of John as the last sojourn of Jesus before His entry into Jerusalem (John xi. 54, etc.). But even in our Gospel it is indicated with sufficient distinctness, provided we attach their full and proper meaning to those important words in ch. x. 32: "καὶ ἦν προάγων, etc., καὶ ἀκολουθοῦντες ἐφοβοῦντο." And then: "καὶ παραλαβὼν πάλιν τοὺς δώδεκα," etc. Meyer rightly observes: "Hitherto the disciples had only partially and timidly followed Him; most of them filled with consternation, had left Him by the way. But now the Saviour halted on His journey, and again called the Twelve around Him. This event marks the gathering of the disciples of Jesus in the wilderness of Ephraim for the solemn and avowed purpose of surrender to the final entry into Jerusalem, and all that it implied." In this progressive series of victorious conflicts, the four chosen Apostles form the first conquest of Jesus—the final subjection and possession of the whole world, His last triumph!

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK.

PART FIRST.

FIRST SECTION.

JOHN.

CHAPTER I. 1–8. (Parallels: Matt. iii. 1–12; Luke iii. 1–20; John i. 19–28.)

1 The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; 2 As it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send My messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee. 3 The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight. 4 John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. 5 And there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins. 6 And John was clothed with camel's hair, and with a girdle of a skin about his loins; and he did eat locusts and wild honey; 7 And preached, saying, There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose. 8 I indeed have baptized you with water: but He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

Ver. 2. We regard the testimony of Irenæus and other Fathers, with Codd. A.P., as sufficient to establish the reading ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, against the reading of Codd. B.D.L. and others, ἐν Ἡσαΐᾳ τῷ προφήτῃ, which Griesbach and most recent critics would prefer on their authority. The correction of the text by our reading is scarcely conceivable; on the other hand, the reading "in Esaias" might have been inserted from the second citation through an inexact reminiscence, especially as Mark is not elsewhere accustomed to quote minutely (ch. xi. 17, xii. 10, xiv. 27). If the reading "in Esaias the prophet" be preferred, the passage of Malachi must be introduced as a further development of the main passage in Isaiah, which is made prominent as the first announcement of the forerunner.

Ver. 2. ἔμπροσθέν σου is not sufficiently supported.

Ver. 5. The πάντες belongs to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, according to the best MS., and does not come after ἐβαπτίζοντο.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. The beginning of the Gospel.—The superscription includes in its scope from ver. 1 to 3 (make straight His paths). The Evangelist designs by both expressions to indicate the forerunnership of John. Hence the beginning goes on, according to Meyer, to ver. 8, and not, as Ewald says, to ver. 15. There is an analogous superscription in Matt. i. 1. When Mark points to John the Baptist as the beginning of the Gospel, he refers to his whole development, and that leads to and includes the narrative of his infancy. But he does not include in his design generally, processes and means: hence John also must come upon the scene as the perfect man. In this concise and sudden introduction, the Evangelist himself appears before us in all his own peculiarity. It is true that this beginning of the Gospel was in the apostolical age the customary commencement of evangelical tradition, and as such always accompanied the apostolical preaching. It always started with the appearance of John the Baptist. The history of the infancy and the doctrine of the Logos followed later for the initiated, the believers.

2. Of Jesus Christ (Genitive of the object), the Son of God.—Matthew: The Son of David. In Mark, the theocratic relation of Jesus recedes, as he wrote especially for Gentile Christians.

3. In the desert.—See on Matthew. So also Luke.

4. The baptism of repentance.—Baptism as not only obliging to change of mind (μετάνοια), but also exhibiting and symbolizing it.

5. For the remission of sins.—Meyer rightly: To be received from the Messiah; and not, as Hoffmann in the Schriftbeweis asserts, as assured by John's baptism. Thus it denotes the preparatory reference of John's baptism to Christ, or to the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

6. All the land of Judea, and (even) all they of Jerusalem.—Peculiar to Mark, is this strong expression. But it is so far not hyperbolical, as the Baptist had at this crisis overpowered and led captive, not only the consciousness of the people, but that of the hierarchy also.

7. And John was clothed.—See on Matthew.

8. There cometh one after me.—Present. Decision and vigour of the Baptist, reflecting itself in the view of the Evangelist. Christ is already in the company.

9. To stoop down.—Pointing to his self-depreciation and humility. In this descriptiveness peculiar to Mark.

10. With the Holy Ghost.—As Mark does not record the severity of John's preaching, and his announcement of the judicial work of Jesus, he omits the clause "and with fire." Thus the omission proves nothing against the genuineness of the clause.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Jesus the Christ, and Christ the Son of God, in the full apostolical meaning. Thus the Gospel of the manifestation of the Mighty One of God is described and opened.

2. The Baptist is here, as in the Gospel of John, ch. i., the representative and final expression of the whole Old Testament. But the Old Testament itself, terminating in him, becomes one great forerunner, and the voice of the Spirit of God in the wilderness, which proclaims the manifestation of Christ; that is, it becomes a compendious introduction to the original New Testament, springing from heaven.

3. John appears here as at once summing up his office as forerunner: 1. Himself the preparer of the way; 2. and the voice summoning to prepare the way. For the prophecies of Isaiah and Malachi, see on Matthew.

4. The great baptism of John: its seemingly slight, but yet great and decisive, results.

5. John in the desert as a hermit; John arousing the land: preludes of the Lord's self-humiliation and retreats, and of His victorious comings forth into the world.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The beginning of the Gospel of Christ in the manifestation of the Baptist: 1. In his appearance, as described by the prophets; 2. in his vocation (preaching and baptism); 3. in his demeanour; 4. in his alarming influence; 5. in his reference to Christ.—The two Testaments, as they concurrently glorify Christ as the Lord.—How far the Lord will have a way prepared for Him, and how far He makes a path for Himself.—Repentance and faith a miraculous path through the wilderness.—The confession of sin, and its significance for piety: 1. Oftentimes, alas! nothing, or less than nothing; 2. oftentimes very much; 3. oftentimes everything.—

John's great renunciation of the world, the silent condition of his great influence.—The hermit and the shaken land.—Collectedness in secret, victory in the world.—The two strong men, with whom the kingdom of heaven breaks into the world: 1. John, the strong man; and 2. Christ, the stronger than he.—The anointing of the Holy Ghost: the consummation of the baptism of Christ.—The greatness of John the Baptist, that he always, and in all things, points out of and beyond himself: 1. A preparer of the way, who summons his people to prepare their own way; 2. baptizing, and preaching the baptism of repentance; 3. the overcomer of the people, who predicts Christ as overcoming himself; 4. pointing from his own water-baptism to the baptism of the Spirit.—The baptism of water and the baptism of Spirit.—The heroic constancy and decision of John in his work, a symbol for all believers.

Starcke: Thus the last messenger of the old covenant points to the first of the new. Thus truth agrees with truth.—The New Testament looks back upon the Old.—The wilderness in which the Baptist appeared, a shadow of this world.—Word and sacrament the two essential elements of the preaching office.—Preachers furnished with the Spirit and power may have great concourse around them; but Israel soon becomes weary of the manna, John vi. 66.

Gerlach: John's baptism as the conclusion, and consequently also the epitome, of all that the legal economy contained in itself.—It was not itself to communicate forgiveness of sins, but prepare the way for it.—Even Christians should not despise such preparations through the law for the Gospel.—In times of great declension in morals, the servants of the Lord appear with a special self-renunciation even in external things. So the ancient Elijah, 2 Kings i. 8.—Gossner: A preacher should be only a messenger who proclaims the coming of the Lord and Saviour.—W. L. Bauer: The man of humility, who aimed only to prepare the way.

SECOND SECTION.

CHRIST.

CHAPTER I. 9–13. (Parallels: Matt. iii. 13–iv. 11; Luke iii. 21–iv. 13; John i. 29–42.)

9 And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan. 10 And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit, like a dove, descending upon Him: 11 And there came a voice from heaven, saying, Thou art My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. 12 And immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness. 13 And He was there in the wilderness forty days tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts: and the angels ministered unto Him.

Ver. 11. After B.D., etc., Lachmann and Tischendorf read ἐν σοί, "in Thee."

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the exposition of the parallels in Matthew and Luke.—Straightway, εὐθέως. Mark's watchword, constantly recurring from this time onwards. But here it means that Jesus only in a formal sense submitted to the act, and therefore did not linger in it. Much in the same way as Luke hastily passes over the circumcision of our Lord.

2. He saw the heavens.—Not John, as Erasmus and others, but Jesus is the subject of the seeing (Meyer): but the concurrent and mediate beholding of the Baptist is not excluded; see John i. That the occurrence should not have been only an external one, but also an internal (Leben Jesu ii. 1, S. 182), Meyer calls "fantasy." But it is certain that without the fantasy of theological spiritual insight we cannot penetrate the internal meaning of the text, and must fall now into mere dogmatism, and now into rationalistic perversions.

3. And immediately driveth Him.—'Εκβάλλει is stronger than the ἀνήχθη of Matthew and the ἤγετο of Luke.

4. And He was there forty days tempted of Satan.—According to Meyer and others, Mark is here (with Luke) out of harmony with Matthew. This difficulty springs from neglecting to distinguish, 1. between real difference and less exactitude, and 2. between the being tempted generally of Satan, and the being tempted in a specifically pregnant and decisive manner. But it is evident that Mark places the crisis of Christ's victory already in the baptism. That act of victory over self, and humiliation under the baptism of John, had already assured Him the victory over the now impotent assaults of Satan.

5. With the wild beasts.—Ancient expositors find in this circumstance a counterpart of the serpent in paradise. Starcke: The wilderness was probably the great Arabian desert; and Satan attacked Him also through the beasts. Usteri and others: Christ as the restorer of paradise, and conqueror of the beasts. De Wette: This is a mere pictorial embellishment. Meyer: He is threatened in a twofold manner: Satan tempts Him, and the beasts surround

Him But this is a misleading view. A threefold relation of Jesus is here depicted, 1. to Satan, 2. to the beasts, 3. to the angels; and it is arbitrary to separate the second from the third, and make it the antithesis of the first. There is nothing in the μετά to justify this.

6. The angels.—Not merely fortuitous individual angels. By the individuals which minister to Him, the angel-world is represented. Meyer: By the ministering we are not to understand a serving with food, but a sustaining support against Satan and the beasts. This is more than fantasy.

7. The theory concerning the various forms of the history of the temptation, of which Mark is supposed to have used the earliest and simplest, we pass over, as flowing from the well-known scholastic misapprehension of this Evangelist's original view and exhibition of the Gospel.

8. Ex ungue leonem! This holds good of Christ, as He is introduced by Mark; and in another sense it holds good of the beginning of the Gospel itself. Remark the expressions: οἱ Ἱεροσολυμῖται πάντες—κύψας λῦσαι—εἶδε σχιζομένους τοὺς οὐρανούς, etc.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The self-denial and self-renunciation with which Christ, the Son of God, had lived in the seclusion of Nazareth, was the condition and source of that strength in which He subjected Himself to the baptism of John in the Jordan. This act of subjection sealed His submission under the law, His historical fellowship of suffering with His people, and His passion. The baptism of Christ was consequently the pledge of His perfect self-sacrifice. Hence it was in principle the decision of His conflict and His victory; and therefore it was crowned with His glorification. In this one act there was a consummation of the emergence of His divine consciousness, of His Redeemer-consciousness and of His Victor-consciousness.

2. Christ really decided, in His baptism, His victory over Satan. He went into the wilderness and made it a paradise. The serpent in this paradise assaults Him, but cannot hurt Him; the wild beasts sink peaceably under His majesty; and the angels of heaven surround and serve Him.

3. John is in the wilderness, and Satan tempts him not. Jesus is led up from the wilderness into the wilderness,—that is, into the deepest wildness of the wilderness (this being the residence of the demons, see on Matthew),—and Satan comes down to assault Him there. But the Evangelist deems it superfluous to remark that Jesus overcame Satan. After what had just preceded, this was self-understood. And it is in the casting out of the devils that he presents to us the concrete victories over him. Yet this victory is intimated in the fact that He maintained His abode in the wilderness for forty days in spite of all the assaults of the devil, and that in that very wilderness the angels ministered to Him. The incarnate Son of God could hold His heavenly court in the place which Satan pre-eminently arrogated for himself. The Lord's relation to His surroundings is threefold. 1. It is a sovereign and inimical one to Satan, whose temptations appear only as impotent assaults. 2. It is a sovereign and peaceful one towards the beasts: they dare not hurt the Lord of creation, nor do they flee before Him. Jesus takes away the curse also from the irrational creation (Rom. viii.). According to the same Mark, who places this circumstance at the outset of his Gospel, Jesus commanded at its close that His Gospel should be preached to every creature. See Daniel in the den of lions. Compare Göthe's Das Kind und der Löwe. 3. A sovereign and friendly one towards the angel-world. The world of the angels is subjected to the dominion of Christ: Eph. i 21; Col. ii. 10; Heb. i.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The abode of Jesus in Nazareth, or His self-humiliation, the foundation of all the divine victories in His life, Phil. ii. 6 seq.—The greatness of Christ by the side of the greatness of John.—Even in humiliation Christ is above John, in that He submits to his baptism.—With the submission of Christ under the baptism of John, and what it signified, the whole course of His life, and also His victory over Satan in the wilderness, were decided. Hence His tarrying in the wilderness was the festival before a new career.—The perfected unfolding of the consciousness of Christ at His baptism, in its eternal significance.—With the self-consciousness of Christ was perfected the consciousness of the Son of God and of the Son of man at one and the same time: Thus, 1. the consciousness of His eternity in His Godhead, and 2. of His redeeming vocation in His humanity.—The significance of perfect self-knowledge in self-consciousness: 1. Finding self, 2. gaining self, 3. deciding and dedicating self in God.—The relationship and distinction between the development of the Redeemer's consciousness and that of the sinner:

1. Relationship: humiliation, exaltation. 2. Difference: a. Christ's humiliation under the judgment of His brethren; b. the sinner's under his own judgment;—a. Christ's exaltation through the contemplation of the communion of the Trinity; b. the sinner's exaltation through faith in the fellowship of the Redeemer.—As our consciousness, so our history: This holds good, a. of our true consciousness, b. of our false.—The abode of the Baptist and of the Lord in the wilderness, a token of the destruction of the satanic kingdom.—The inseparable connection between the divine dignity and the redeeming vocation of Christ: 1. He is Christ, and submits to John's baptism of repentance; 2. He seeth the heavens open upon Him, and enters into the depths of the wilderness to contend with Satan.—The connection between the Lord's baptism and His temptation.—The connection between the humiliations and the exaltations of our Lord, an encouraging sign to all who are His.—The connection between the invigorations and the new conflicts of Jesus, an admonitory sign to all who are His.—Christ takes possession again of the wilderness (the world), without asking Satan whose dwelling it is.—Christ in the wilderness Ruler of all: 1. Of the abyss, whose assaults He regards not; 2. of the earth, whose wild beasts and passions sink to rest at His feet; 3. of the heavenly world, whose angels minister to Him.—Wherefore the Lion of Judah, according to Mark, so often goeth into the wilderness.—How the Holy Ghost opens, with the manifestation of Christ, the decisive and deciding conflict with the spirit of apostasy.—How the Holy Ghost, as the Spirit of might, drives the Lord into the decisive conflict. Even Christ did not go led by self into the contest.—Christ changing the wilderness, despite Satan, into a paradise.—Adam in paradise, and Christ among the beasts in the wilderness.

Starcke: Humility the best adornment of teachers.—Jesus of Nazareth, etc.: So little does the great God make Himself, and thus at the same time constructs a ladder by which we may go up.—Jesus sanctifies through His baptism the laver of regeneration in the word.—Rejoice, O soul, in that God is well pleased with His Son, and with thee also, who through Him art reconciled to God! But thou must in faith be made one with Him, Eph. i. 5, 6.—As soon as we become God's children, the Holy Ghost leads us; but the cross and temptation come forthwith.—What the first Adam lost among and under the beasts, the Second Adam has asserted and regained among the beasts.—A pious man has nothing to fear, among either wild beasts or bestial men.

Schleiermacher: The legal excitement which John occasioned, and the excitement which Jesus enkindled.—Gossner: Solitude and the wilderness have their temptations equally with the world.—Bauer: Is no one near to celebrate this victory, yet God's angels are there to glorify Him.

PART SECOND.

CHAPTER I. 14–IX. 50.

FIRST SECTION.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

CHAPTER I. 14, 15. (Parallels: Luke iv. 14, 15; Matt. iv. 12–17; John iv. 43 seq.)

14 Now, after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the Gospel of the kingdom of God, 15 And saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the Gospel.

Ver. 14. Codd. B.L., and other less authorities and versions, leave out τῆς βασιλείας. So Lachm. and Tisch. Meyer thinks it an exegetical addition. But what follows might also have caused the omission.

CRITICAL NOTES.

See on Matthew, ch. iv. 12–17.

1. Jesus came.—Ewald: He would not let the Baptist's work fall to the ground. Meyer, on the contrary: that He might be safe; but see our Notes on Matthew in refutation of this. By the Baptist's imprisonment the Baptist community in Israel was broken up; Jesus therefore took occasion to receive to Himself the poor people in Gentile Galilee, and that as the representative of John. John was put in prison by the Galilean prince; Jesus summons the people of this prince to repentance, and to faith in the Gospel: this is the true political retaliation, and the sacred way to salvation and the restoration of right.

2. The time, ὁ καιρός.—Not the period, but the right time; the great, fore-ordained, predicted and longed-for time of Messianic expectation; more closely defined by the following "the kingdom of God is at hand." (See Gal. iv. 4.)

3. Repent, Μετανοεῖτε.—See the lexicon for the original meaning and the various significations of the word.

4. Believe the Gospel, Πιστεύετε ἐν. Gal. iii. 26; Eph. i. 13.—By this expression faith is more strongly emphasized. Entering into the Gospel, we have decisive faith. The object of faith in this view is the manifestation of the kingdom of God.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. From the still prayer of the wilderness, or from the new paradise in which Christ had conquered Satan, He has now come forth to endure all the individual conflicts of life for the founding of His eternal kingdom. Adam came from his paradise conquered, to endure in his descendants a constant succession of defeats.

2. As here, so everywhere, the economy of the Gospel takes the place of the economy of the law. The legal economy yields at last to the lawlessness of the world: the economy of faith and salvation triumphs over it even in yielding, and saves with itself also the ideality of the law.

3. An economy of the law which, in its tragical conflict with the spirit of the world, recognises not the deliverance which is in the coming economy of salvation, like Elias (1 Kings xix. 13), is thereby converted into an economy of carnal precepts, which finally combines with the world against the economy of salvation. But, on the other hand, true evangelical faith knows how to give its due to the precursory office of the law, just as Christ gave His honour to His forerunner, John the Baptist.

4. "Almost all the Jews of that time hoped for the kingdom of God; but it was a strange and unrecognised idea, that repentance and faith must be the entrance into it. Jesus begins with the promise, but immediately goes on to the conditions." Gerlach.

5. Mark, like Peter in his first and second Epistle, places the announcement of the kingdom of heaven at the head of his writing. The kingdom is his fundamental thought.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Jesus, in the silent conflicts of the wilderness, prepares for the open conflicts of life—takes the place of John, delivered to death by the carnal mind. 1. The history: A testimony, a. that He honoured the Baptist, b. that He did not fear the enemy, and c. that He was faithful to His people and His vocation. 2. The doctrine: a. The witnesses of the kingdom of God cannot be destroyed; b. after every seeming triumph of the kingdom of darkness, still stronger heroes of God come forward. 3. Christ is always Himself victorious at last in every scene.—Persecution the primitive furtherance of the kingdom of God.—The blood of the Church, the seed of the Church.—Where the law falls in the letter, it is re-established in the spirit.—The preaching of Christ: 1. It appears as the announcement of salvation in the place of danger and ruin. 2. What it announces: that the time is fulfilled, and that the kingdom of God is come. 3. What it requires: repentance (as change of mind, μετάνοια) and faith. 4. What it signifies: the saving presence of Christ Himself.—Christ and John as preachers: the might of their preaching itself. 1. John preaches in his whole life and manifestation; 2. Christ preaches out of the depth of His own divine life.—The seal of evangelical preaching the full harmony of the person and the word.

On the whole section (ch. i. 14–45).—The first victorious appearance of Christ, the prelude of His whole path of victory: 1. In the announcement of His Gospel; 2. in His dominion over the hearts of the chosen; 3. in His victory of the kingdom of Satan; 4. in His miraculous removal of human misery; 5. in His salutary shaking of the world.—The glory of the Lord in its first actual exhibition: 1. A glory of grace (vers. 16–20), 2. of sacred judicial and redeeming power (vers. 21–28), 3. of healing mercy (vers. 29–39), of purifying purity (vers. 40–44).—Christ proceeds from the wilderness of the earth into the wilderness of human life for the restoration of paradise.—Christ confirms His victory over Satan in the solitude of the desert by His victories over satanic powers among all the people.

Starcke: Satan seeks to bind and to oppress Christ and His Gospel; but God's wisdom and power set at nought all his aggression.

Gerlach: With the public appearance of Jesus, the end of John's work had come.—Gossner: He who understands repentance to mean that he must first become pious and good, and then come to Jesus, and believe His Gospel, goes out at the door of grace instead of entering in. Repenting and believing the Gospel, or believing in Christ, must go together and be one.

SECOND SECTION.

CHAPTER I. 16–35.

1. The Authoritative Word of Jesus, which calls the four first and greatest Disciples. (VERS. 16–20.)

Parallels: Matt. iv. 18–22; Luke v. 1–11; comp. John i. 35–42.

16 Now, as He walked by the Sea of Galilee, He saw Simon, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea: (for they were fishers:) 17 And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after Me, and I will make you to become fishers of men. 18 And straightway they forsook their nets, and followed Him. 19 And when He had gone a little farther thence, He saw James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, who also were in the ship mending their nets. 20 And straightway He called them: and they left their father Zebedee in the ship with the hired servants, and went after Him.

Ver. 16. The expression παράγων is recommended by B.D.L. and others. Instead of αὐτοῦ, Lachm. and Tisch. read, better, "Simon's."

Ver. 18. Not "their" nets: αὐτῶν is wanting in B.C.L.

Ver. 19. "Thence" is wanting in B.D.L., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on Matthew.

2. As He walked by.—The Evangelist would make prominent the apparently fortuitous character of this first vocation.

3. Who also were in the ship.—Both pairs of brothers were seized in the earnest prosecution of their craft. The first two were throwing their nets into new positions in the water; the two others were mending them for new draughts.

4. With the hired servants.—Why this addition? Paulus: It was to be made clear, how they could without impiety forsake their father. Meyer (after Grotius): It was only a proof that Zebedee did not follow his craft in a petty way, and that he probably was not without means. In any case, it also shows that Zebedee was not left helpless. That they forsook so thriving a business (Ewald), is indeed of less significance.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Christ Himself is the great Fisher of men. He catches the four elect ones at one draught. These are the three and the four confidential Apostles of after times. Thus there were first four fishermen called.

2. The power of Christ's word over these souls here appears direct and immediate. We learn the mediating circumstances of this vocation from John i. At the same time, this calling was something entirely new (see on Matthew), and their following so wonderful, as that they at once forsook their calling, in the very act of pursuing it. The fishing life of these men was a preparation for their higher calling, as being fidelity in that which was least.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Lord knoweth His own.—The Lord and His elect quickly know each other.—The great increase of grace swiftly enters into our daily life.—Christ's walking by the sea apparently for relaxation, but at the same time the most noble work.—Christ's mark in this world the heart of man.—The great Fisher of men, and His art of making human fishers.—The calling of Jesus a call to become something new.—The mighty calling of the Lord: 1. Gentler than any human request; 2. mightier than any human command; 3. unique as the victorious wooing of heavenly love.—The calling of Jesus a calling at once to one thing and to many: 1. To one thing: into His discipleship and the fellowship of His Spirit, or to the Father; 2. to many: to discipleship and mastership, to co-operation, to fellowship in suffering, and community in triumph.—The greatness of the following of the four disciples was the effect of the great grace of their vocation. They broke off suddenly in the midst of a new career of their labour, as a sign of the decision of their following.—The spiritual and the worldly vocation of Christians: 1. Opposition; 2. relation; 3. union.—The twofold earthly companionship of the disciple a foundation for the higher: 1. Companions in fishing,—companions in fishing for men; 2. brethren after the flesh,—spiritual brethren.—Leaving all for Christ's sake.—The Christian and ecclesiastical vocations in harmony with the sacred natural obligations of life.

Starcke: Never be idle.—Pious handicraft acceptable to God.—The calling into Christianity binds us to faith and the following of Christ; how much more the vocation to spiritual office!—A true follower of Christ forgets everything earthly.—He who follows Christ loses nothing, though he may forsake all; for he finds in Him a full sufficiency, Matt. xix. 29.

Lisco: The forsaking all must be experienced inwardly by every believer; and must be fulfilled outwardly also, in particular circumstances and occasions, Matt. xix. 27.—Schleiermacher: The two tendencies in the life of the Redeemer: preaching to the multitude, and the separation of individuals to Himself.—Gossner: The Lord's fishermen actually catch the fish; the world's fishermen swim with the fish.—Bauer: One glance of the Lord, and He knows the heart under its rough garment.

2. The Word of Authority, which delivers the Demoniacs and attracts the People. (VERS. 21–28.)

Parallel: Luke iv. 31–37.

21 And they went into Capernaum; and straightway on the Sabbath-day He entered into the synagogue, and taught. 22 And they were astonished at His doctrine: for He taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes. 23 And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out, 24 Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth? art Thou come to destroy us? I know Thee who Thou art, the Holy One of God. 25 And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. 26 And when the unclean spirit had torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him. 27 And they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What thing is this? what new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth He even the unclean spirits, and they do obey Him. 28 And immediately His fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee.

Ver. 24. Ἔα is wanting, it is true, in B.D. and others; but it is as accordant with Mark as with Luke (ch. iv. 34).

Ver. 27. Lachm., following B.L.Δ., etc.: τί ἐστι τοῦτο; διδαχὴ καινή; κατ', etc. Tischendorf connects διδαχὴ καινὴ κατ' ἐξουσίαν. Lachmann's is better.

Ver. 28. Καὶ ἐξῆλθεν: "And the fame," etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. The Evangelist, in harmony with his main point of view, proceeds at once to the act by which the Lord approved Himself the conqueror of the demons.

2. As one that had authority.—See on Matt. vii. 29.

3. With an unclean spirit, ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ.—He was in the unclean spirit; that is, in his power, under his influence. Concerning the demoniac, see on Matt. iv. 24.

4. Thou comest to destroy us.—The demoniac consciousness still predominant on the part of the demon. Hence, "to destroy us!" Bengel: "Communem inter se causam habent dæmonia." The word involves also, 1. a testimony of the decided opposition between the demon empire and Christ; 2. a testimony of the perfect supremacy of Christ; 3. and of the beginning of the subversion of the satanic dominion.—"To destroy us." Meyer: By dismissing them to Hades. But even in Hades Christ does not leave their empire to the demons. Thus it was, by the destruction of our empire generally. Certainly it was by dismissing them to the Gehenna of torment (according to which, the expression in Matthew, "the Hades of torment," is to be corrected).

5. I know Thee who Thou art.—The demoniac consciousness in its involuntary presentiment. See Acts xvi. 16. It feels already the influence of Jesus, who would draw it from the side of the demon to His side. The word is ambiguous, so far as it belongs to the demon and to the man.

6. The Holy One of God.—In the emphatic sense, and thus, according to John vi. 69, Acts iii. 7 (comp. John x. 36), the concealed designation of the Messiah. ("So Origen:" Meyer.) As the typical Old Testament anointed ones represented the Messiah, so the typical saints, priests, prophets, and kings (Ps. xvi.) represented the Holy One κατ' ἐξοχήν. The unclean spirit, however, describes Him by that opposite to himself which torments him, when he terms Him the Holy One of God.

7. Hold thy peace.—This is rightly referred to his utterance. The Messiahship of Jesus was not to be prematurely spread abroad, least of all by demons. The kingdom of God and the invisible world scorns such precursors and co-operators. It bears testimony to itself by overcoming all these. Only after the decisive victory are such testimonies supplementarily, and in their own significance, admissible; then, when no intermingling is any longer possible.

8. Torn him.—The decisive paroxysm with which the healing was declared; at the same time, a phenomenon exhibiting the knavish, spiteful, and degraded nature of the demons (ch. ix. 26; Luke ix. 42).

9. Questioned among themselves.—The spirits are awake. They do not first ask the priests and Rabbis, but proceed to independent suppositions and conclusions.

10. New doctrine.—From the appearance of a new power of redeeming, they infer the appearance of a new revelation; for revelation and deliverance, miracle and prophecy, always to the Israelites were reciprocal in their influence. For various constructions and interpretations of this passage, see Meyer.

11. Throughout all the region round about Galilee.—That is, through all Galilee, and beyond into the boundaries everywhere.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The first miracle recorded by Matthew is the healing of the leper by a touch; for one main point of view with him was the opposition of Christ to the hierarchical theocracy and their ordinances. The first miracle which John records is the changing of water into wine; for his main point of view is the glorification of the old and darkened world into a world of spirit. The first miracle which Luke and Mark relate is this casting out of demons in the synagogue at Capernaum. But their several points of view in this matter are as different and characteristic as their respective Gospels. Luke, in harmony with his predominant object (the divine humanity of Christ), has in view pre-eminently the healed man. The demon threw him down, and departed from him, without hurting him at all. To Mark, on the other hand, the supremacy of Christ over the kingdom of the demons is the grand object, even as it declares and approves His doctrine to be a new one. Hence he makes it emphatic, that Christ commanded even the unclean spirits, and that they obeyed Him. This point of view runs through his whole Gospel, down to its concluding words.

2. Here belong the chief records of Christ's victory over the devils in Mark, as generally in the other Evangelists. In John we do not find deliverances of this sort; on the other hand, he gives prominence to moral possession (John vi. 70, viii. 44, xiii. 27),—an idea which is found approximately among the other Evangelists as sevenfold possession. Further, here we must mark the relation of Christ and His kingdom to Satan and his kingdom, according to the New Testament teaching. Dogmatics must, more rigorously than heretofore, distinguish between the devil and this kind of demons, as well as between the children of the devil and these bound ones of Satan.

3. The synagogue cannot hinder a demoniac from entering, nor that Satan should in it declare the victory of the kingdom of order and light. Christ cleanses the synagogue.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Christ the Saviour of the synagogue and of the Church.—The adherence of Christ to the sanctuary of His people, legal and yet free.—By the perfect sanctification of the Sabbath and the synagogue, our Lord established the Sunday and the Church.—How the Child of the synagogue became the Prince of the Church.—

Sabbath and synagogue; or, the holy time and the holy place in their symbolical meaning: 1. They signify rest from the toil of sin, and the temple; 2. the Christian Sunday and the Church; 3. the heavenly feast and the heavenly Church.—The demoniac in the synagogue; or, the daring incursion of Satan into the legitimate Church of God to be restrained only by the word of Christ.—How Christ always victoriously confronts the satanic power which insinuates itself into the Church.—Heavenly and hellish powers meet in the Church.—The healing of the possessed in the synagogue a decisive token of the redeeming empire of Christ: 1. Of His victory over the kingdom of Satan; 2. of His saving mercy to the wretched; 3. of His miraculous sealing of the Gospel; 4. of His awakening conquest of the world.—The consciousness of Christ a healing power for the consciousness disturbed by Satan.—The spiritually disturbed consciousness a figure of the curse of sin: 1. In its destruction and contradictions; 2. in its restraint; 3. in its despair; 4. but also in its dim feeling of its misery and of the coming of its Saviour.—The characteristics of the wicked: 1. Knowledge without love; 2. hatred to the Lord, and withal flattering acknowledgment; 3. pride even to madness, and yet impotent fear and flight. Or, 1. Darkness in its lie; 2. murder in its hatred; 3. death in its rending.—Christ immovably opposed to the flattery and hypocrisy, as well as to the threatening and pride, of Satan.—The antithesis of heaven and hell in the conflict of Christ with the demon: 1. Peace of soul and passion (the devil assaults first); 2. collectedness and distraction; 3. the spirit of mercy and the spirit of torment; 4. dignity and degradation; 5. victory and prostration. —Christ scorns the testimony of the demons, and obtains the praise of the people.—The glory of Christ, that He came into the world to destroy the works of the devil, 1 John iii. 8.

Starcke: The public service of God not to be neglected, Heb. x. 25.—Unclean spirits are found even in the Church, Jas. ii. 19.—Christ will have no testimony from the spirit of lies.—Osiander: If the devil must give way, yet he rages fearfully: he must, however, give place to the Holy Spirit.—Gossner: The devil knew Him as the Holy One of God, but not as the Saviour.—Braune: The possessed trembles before Him who is his Deliverer.

3 Healing among the Disciples; Healings and casting out Demons in Capernaum; the first Return of Christ after He had thus dealt with the prepared in that city. (VERS. 29–35.)

Parallels: Matt. viii. 14–17; Luke iv. 38–41.

29 And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue, they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John. 30 But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and anon they tell Him of her. 31 And He came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them. 32 And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto Him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils. 33 And all the city was gathered together at the door. 34 And He healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils; and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew Him. 35 And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, He went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed.

Ver. 33. Some codd. add, "that He was Christ."

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on Matthew.

2. They entered into.—Jesus, Peter, and Andrew are meant; the two latter as the ordinary occupants of the house, which Peter or both possessed in Capernaum (see on Matthew). In addition came James and John. Thus the Lord was with the collective four disciples who had been already gathered.

3. And anon they tell Him of her.—Here also we have εὐθέως thrice in rapid succession. Immediately into the house, immediately to the matter, immediately healed. Matthew transfers this miracle to a later period (see on Matthew). Starcke for harmony: "It may have been that the mother-in-law of Peter twice had the fever, and that Christ healed her twice." (!)

4. At even, when the sun did set.—The full close of the Sabbath. "Judæos religio tenebat, quominus ante exitum Sabbati ægrotos suos afferrent." Wetstein.

5. Sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils.—The physically sick and the demoniacs clearly distinguished (ver. 34; Matt. viii. 16); just as they are in relation to the opposite charisms which were given with respect to them, 1 Cor. xii. 9, 10.

6. And He healed many.—Not as opposed to all who were brought to Him, but for the description of the abundance and variety of the healings which took place so late in the evening.

7. Into a solitary place.—To a secret place in the wilderness. It is to be noted that Jesus, according to Mark, thrice in quick succession, withdrew into the wilderness, vers. 12, 35, 45. Here we can understand only a solitude near Capernaum. That He thus took up His abode time after time in the wilderness, declared His supremacy over the demons of the wilderness. He made the desert place a temple of God by His prayers.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The succession of events marks the development of Christ's work. 1. The synagogue at home. 2. The house of Peter, as the hearth of the new community of disciples at its outset. 3. The whole town of Capernaum. 4. The entire land of Galilee.—The progression of the influence of our Lord's preaching: 1. His fame goes out through all Galilee. 2. The whole town of Capernaum presses for help at His door, yea, into His doors. 3. All seek Him after He had withdrawn. 4. Even in the wilderness they come to Him from all parts.

2. In order that they may punctiliously guard their own rest on the Sabbath, the people of Capernaum wait till evening with their sufferers, and rob the Lord of His rest in the night.

3. Compare on Matthew.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Jesus the Saviour of the new as of the old community (Peter's house, the synagogue).—And they told Him of her: with faith waxes intercession.—Peter, as householder, a type of the ecclesiastic at home: 1. He is not hindered from his calling by domestic trouble (he also went into the synagogue); but, 2. he took his domestic trouble with him into his calling (he prayed the Lord for the sick).—The people at Capernaum seeking help; or, Christ the true Physician: 1. As revealer of human misery; 2. as the marvellous deliverer from it.—An evening and a morning in the life of Jesus; or, His holy day's work: 1. Closed in the blessing of toil; 2. renewed in devotion.—The rapid diffusion of Christ's work and influence: 1. Through the believing house; 2. through the susceptible town; 3. through the amazed land.—New seclusion for new conflicts.—Private prayer the source of Christ's victories.—The Lord's early hours.—His morning devotion.—The significance of morning in the kingdom of God: 1. A festal time in the life of Jesus; 2. an image of His whole life; 3. a blessed time in the life of Christians; 4. figure of their regeneration and their eternity.—How Christ sanctifies all times and all places.

Starcke, Quesnel: The dwelling of a poor fisherman pleases Christ more than a great palace.—Osiander: God is oftener in little huts than in rich palaces.—Christianity and household life agree well together.—Marriage unfits no man for the ministry.—Compassionate love suffers not the wretched long to wait, but thinks at once of help.—Quesnel: The love of Jesus is never weary.—There are always wretched ones in this vale of tears, who stand in need of the help of the Most High.—Christ the most approved Physician.—It does not become the man spiritually possessed of the devil to reveal Christ.—Early hours must be thought much of.—For prayer even sleep must be abridged.

Gerlach: The gracious love of Christ amidst the household necessities of the poor and neglected.—Lisco: Jesus connects together prayer and work, solitude and public life, in order to do good. —Euth. Zig.: We must shun the praise of men, and thank God in silent secrecy.

THIRD SECTION.

Chapter i. 36–45.

1. The Preaching and Healing of Jesus. (Chap. i. 36–39.)

Parallel: Luke iv. 44.

36 And Simon, and they that were with him, followed after Him. 37 And when they had found Him, they said unto Him, All men seek for Thee. 38 And He said unto them, Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth. 39 And He preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and cast out devils.

Ver. 36. The Rec. omits ἀλλαχοῦ: it is supported by B.C.L.
Ver. 39. "Into their:" εἰς τὰς in A.B.C. and others.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And Simon, and they that were with him.—Simon placed first, not on account of any superiority, but as the head of the house and the guide.

2. Into the next towns.—The κωμοπόλεις only here in the New Testament. The primary object is to record the travelling through the Galilean hill-country, and its villages and towns.

3. For therefore am I come.—The question is, whether the meaning be, "I am come from the Father to preach generally" (Bengel); or, "I have left the house (or Capernaum) in order to preach in the neighbouring villages" (Meyer). We think that Christ lays stress upon preaching as His great vocation, in opposition to the pressure of individual applicants for help in Capernaum; and this confirms the former of the two interpretations.

4. In their synagogues (into).—The Accusative, twice occurring, makes it emphatic that He filled the synagogues and all Judea with a might of preaching that formed a contrast to the synagogue style.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Jesus prepared Himself in the desert for His second great expedition. The spiritual awakening and conquest of the land of Galilee was now in question.

2. Here also Mark (like Luke) gives special emphasis to the casting out of devils, and to the command of silence, by which Jesus hindered the devils from uttering His name.

3. It is observed also that Jesus places preaching expressly above miraculous healings; this is seen in the use of the participle, δαιμόνια ἐκβάλλων. But the preaching has its root in the secret devotion: His public work sprang from His solitary prayer.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

How the Lord equipped Himself anew for new labours.—Christ goes with His first four disciples into the land of Galilee: the small beginning of the universal mission.—How the Lord's preaching approves itself as the power of divine life: 1. As the spiritual word of His working; 2. as delivering power for the suffering; 3. as judicial power of victory over the demons.—Christ confronting the increasing pressure of the people: 1. How He restrains it (withdrawal into the wilderness); 2. how He regulates it (preaching on the individual miracles); 3. how He surrenders Himself to it (responding to every demand of help).—Christ does not shut up His activity within the walls of Capernaum, nor within the limits of any one people or any one confession.—The way of Christ among the surrounding villages: 1. Already to as many as possible; 2. one day to all.

Starcke: We must have village preachers.—The Gospel of Jesus must sound out in all places.—Where Christ's kingdom is to be established, the devils must be abolished. So also in thee.—Schleiermacher: The preaching of the kingdom of God was Christ's vocation: 1. Concerning Himself, as come to save men; 2. concerning the true righteousness which avails before God; 3. concerning the worship of God in spirit and truth.—Within these limits it was His vocation to spread that kingdom so far as He could.—Gossner: To this end am I come (He says) to save men.—Christ did not scorn the little towns and villages.

2. The Touching of the Leper, and the Return into the Wilderness. (Vers. 40–45.)

Parallels: Matt. viii. 1–4; Luke v. 12–16.

40 And there came a leper to Him, beseeching Him, and kneeling down to Him, and saying unto Him, If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean. 41 And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth His hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean. 42 And as soon as He had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed. 43 And He straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away; 44 And saith unto him, See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them. 45 But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places: and they came to Him from every quarter.

Ver. 40. The omission of καὶ γονυπετῶν αὐτόν in B.D., and Lachm. and Tisch., is not sufficiently supported.

Ver. 41. Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς omitted in B.D., etc. So Lach., Tisch. Meyer explains this omission, as also the dropping out of εἰπόντος αὐτοῦ, ver. 42, from an intention to conform the text with Matt. and Luke. So also with the μηδέν, ver. 44.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. For this narrative, and the leper, see on Matthew. The occurrence follows the Sermon on the Mount; and this is here intimated by the return of Jesus to Capernaum, ch. ii. 1.

2. And He straitly charged him.—The ἐμβριμησάμενος is the opposite of the preceding σπλαγχνισθείς. Probably the leper had overstepped the limits of his discipline (lepers were not suffered to intrude into others' houses) and of the law, and had penetrated to the house where Jesus might have been tarrying in one of the towns. This Meyer reasonably infers from the ἐξέβαλεν—He forthwith sent him away. First of all, Jesus regarded the misery of the case, and, seized with compassion, healed the sick man. But then He proceeded to guard the legal obligation under which the sick man stood, and household rights and general order. Mark gives us a vivid view of the sending away of the healed man, and exhibits the scene in his own lively expressions.

3. To the priest.—The Vulgate romanizing: Principi sacerdotum. But it only means the priest whose function concerned the man.—For a testimony unto them. The actual cleansing must be confirmed in a Levitically legal manner.

4. To blaze abroad the matter, τὸν λόγον.—Fritzsche: The word of Jesus. De Wette: The matter. Meyer: The narrative of what had passed. That is, there is a distinction between his narrative and the embellished report of the event which was spread abroad, and to which it gave occasion.

5. Could no more openly enter.—The reason of this withdrawal was not merely to obviate the increase of the crowd, but the fact that Jesus had touched the leper, which, according to the law, made a man unclean for a season. See Leben Jesu ii. 2, 639. Moreover, this solitude imported a new withdrawal for a new advance.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew.

2. Wherefore does Mark close the delineation of Christ's first manifestation in public with the healing of the leper? This narrative is, first, a witness that Christ entered into the fellowship of sinners' sufferings, in order to suffer for them; and so far was a prelude of the end. Secondly, it marked His relation to traditionalism, the offence and assaults of which now follow.

3. The present withdrawal of Jesus took place under the presentiment of His conflicts with traditionalism, and for a preparation to meet them.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The healing of the leper a testimony of the mightily purifying purity of Christ.—Christ even in the influence of His purity the Lion of Judah.—Redemption, like creation, an omnipotent Let there be! (He speaks, and it is done: I will, be thou clean.)—The need of deliverance breaking through the law. The leper presses into the house, like the paralytic through the roof, and the sinner into the Pharisee's house.—The leper a pattern of those who seek help, but not of those who give thanks: 1. His perfect trust and humble submission (If Thou wilt, etc.); 2. regardlessness of his friends, lack of the disposition to follow and of discipline.—Christ's interchange with the leper a symbol of His interchange with the sinner: He makes the leper clean, and contracts Levitical defilement. So Christ was made sin for us, that we might be made righteousness in Him.

—The compassion of our Lord the source of our salvation.—The miraculous hand of Christ the instrument of all heavenly healing: 1. As delivering, 2. as distributing, 3. as consummating.—The disobedience of the leper; or, lack of discipline in the reception of healing: 1. Excusable as far as it was the interchange of illegality and freedom; 2. blameable, because he constrained the Lord (even in His Church) to atone for transitory illegality by the legalities of prudence.—Christ in the wilderness and everywhere the centre of a wretched and needy world.—Christ, through His divine compassion, involved with human tradition.—A new retirement of the spirit, a new blessing and victory.

Starcke: The spiritual leper.—Quesnel: Prayer, humility, and faith as the source (the organs for the reception) of all righteousness.—We are directed to keep all right ordinances, etc. Abide by the public service of God.—Deliverance from misery demands its right and peculiar offerings of praise.—The more a servant of God withdraws himself from the world, the more highly does the world esteem him.

Gerlach: The healed leper was like those who, out of thankfulness of heart indeed, but yet inconsiderately, neglect the inward commandment of the Holy Spirit, and make too much talk about the grace of God, to their own and others' hurt.—Schleiermacher: The Redeemer by His touch took away the ban which sundered the leper from all human intercourse.—Likeness between leprosy and sin.—The one leper and the ten.—Bauer: How Jesus respected the ordinances of His people.

FOURTH SECTION.

CHAPTER II. 1–III. 12.

First Conflict.—The Paralytic, and the Power to forgive Sins. (CHAP. ii. 1–12.)

Parallels: Matt. ix. 1–8; Luke v. 17–26.

1 And again He entered into Capernaum after some days; and it was noised that He was in the house. 2 And straightway many were gathered together, insomuch that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door: and He preached the word unto them. 3 And they come unto Him, bringing one sick of the palsy, which was borne of four. 4 And when they could not come nigh unto Him for the press, they uncovered the roof where He was: and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed wherein the sick of the palsy lay. 5 When Jesus saw their faith, He said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. 6 But there were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts, 7 Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins but God only? 8 And immediately, when Jesus perceived in His spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, He said unto them, Why reason ye these things in your hearts? 9 Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk? 10 But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (He saith to the sick of the palsy,) 11 I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house. 12 And immediately he arose, took up the bed, and went forth before them all; insomuch that they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion.

Ver. 1. Lachmann: ἐν οἴκῳ, after B.D.L. "Interpretation." Meyer.

Ver. 5. Σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι is best supported. Lach. after B. ἀφίενται.

Ver. 7. Lachm., Tisch.: οὕτως λαλεῖ, after A.B.D., etc.; βλασφημεῖ, after B.D.

Ver. 8. Αὐτοί before διαλογίζονται, after A.C., etc., and Bengel.

Ver. 10. Various order of the words: The ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἀφ. ἁμ. is given by Griesb. and Lach., after C.D.L. and others.

Ver. 12. Tisch.: οὕτως οὐδέποτε, after B. and L., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the exposition on Matthew and on Luke. Mark introduces the conflicts of the law with traditionalism earlier than Matthew; hence the earlier position of this narrative. Matthew, indeed, represents the chronological order, according to which the paralytic was healed after the journey to Gadara. The conclusion in Mark itself intimates that this must have been one of the later miracles.

2. That He was in the house, εἰς οἶκόν ἐστι.—This means the house which Jesus occupied with His mother and His brethren, after His settlement there, ch. iii. 21. His adopted sisters probably remained, as married, in Nazareth (see ch. vi. 3), when the family of Joseph passed over with Him to Capernaum.

3. Brought one sick of the palsy.—See on Matthew. Κράββατος, a portable bed, used for mid-day sleep, and for the service of the sick.—Borne of four. Pictorial definiteness. So also the vivid description of the uncovering of the roof, or the breaking of a large opening through it. Luke tells us how they did it: "through the tiling;" thus they must have taken away the tilings themselves. Meyer: We must suppose Jesus to have been in the upper room, ὑπερῷον, where the Rabbis frequently taught: Lightfoot, Vitringa, Syn. 145. Meyer rightly rejects the view of Faber, Jahn, and others, that Jesus was in the court, and that nothing more is meant than a breaking up of the roof-awning. Certainly it is not improbable that the roof and the upper room were connected by a door; at least, the supposition of steps leading from the street to the roof suits that view. It is not at variance with the text to assume, with Lightfoot and Olshausen, an extension of the door-opening already there. Uncovering the roof can mean nothing else, whether or not by means of an already existing opening. Strauss, after Wetstein, remarks, that the proceeding would have been too dangerous for those below. But see Hug's observations. Moreover, a little danger would better suit the heroism of the act. It takes for granted the Oriental house with a flat roof, to which men might gain access either through the neighbouring house, or by the steps on the outside.

4. Certain of the scribes.—According to Meyer, Luke introduces the Pharisees too soon at this place. But why may not the scribes have been mainly of the pharisaic party? These were so manifestly.—The scribes: see on Matthew, and the article in Winer.

5. Why doth this man thus speak? He blasphemeth.—That is, such a man (scornfully), such things (such great words as are fit only for God, or for the priests in His name). Meyer rightly: "This man in this wise: emphatic juxtaposition." The idea of blasphemy, expressed by Luke, is thus shown to be indirect blasphemy: they cast that upon Him, because He was thought to have wickedly intruded into the rights of the Divine Majesty.

6. And immediately, when Jesus perceived in His spirit.—The Searcher of hearts. In that lay already the proof that He could forgive sins. Matthew here takes as it were the place of Mark: Jesus seeing their thoughts.

7. The Son of man hath power.—Dan. vii. 13; comp. Leben Jesu ii. 1, 235. Meyer asserts, without reason, against Ritzschl, that Christ by this expression declared undoubtedly, and even technically, His Messiahship. Certainly Daniel's Son of man signified Christ; but the understanding of this expression does not seem to have been current in the Jewish scriptural learning. Hence the choice of the expression here. They should know Him to be the Messiah, not according to their false Messiah-notions, but according to His true demonstrations of Messiahship; and the expression was meant to lead them to this.

8. We never saw it on this fashion.—We must assume in εἴδομεν an object seen; and that can be no other than the essential manifestation which corresponds to essential seeing—the appearance of the kingdom of God. But it is also included, that the omnipotent working of miracles had never been so manifest in Jesus before.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew, and the parallel in Luke. Quickly as the glory of Christ was manifested in His first works, so quickly did the contradiction of the pharisaic worldly mind develop itself. It is most significant that the evangelical forgiveness of sins was the first stumblingblock.

2. The healing of the palsied man gives us, in a certain sense, the key to all the miraculous works of our Lord; inasmuch, that is, as the healing of the members is here definitely based upon the healing of the heart, the forgiveness of sins, awakening and regeneration. Because Christ Himself was the new birth of man from heaven, He was the principle of regeneration to sinful man. That is, in other words, because He Himself was the absolute miracle—the new principle of life breaking into and through the old—therefore the miraculous energies for the renewal of life proceeded from Him as sudden and great vivifications, which, proceeding from the heart of the renewed, pervaded their whole life. The quickening of the heart was, therefore, always the soul of light in the miracle; the external miracle was its dawning manifestation, though not all such quickenings resulted in permanent renewal. Therefore also the kernel of the miracle has remained in the Church, and becomes most fully prominent, that is, regeneration. The dawn has retreated and vanished, since this sun of the inner life has come forth. Yet the dynamic unfolding of the heart's renewal in the renewal of the members has in reality remained; only, now that Christianity has been incorporated with human nature, it develops itself only in gradual effect, until its full manifestation in the day of resurrection. The regenerating principle works in the regenerate gradually, and in almost invisible, leaven-like influence and transformation. But, as certainly as the regeneration of the heart is effected, so certainly is the germ of the renewal of the whole life present. Our school notions have too carefully separated the external miracle from the internal, making it almost of itself a higher class of miracle. Luther, however, recognised regeneration as the great and abiding miracle, and had some feeling of its connection with the resurrection, as symbolized in the Supper of the Lord.—The power of Christ over the whole life, a demonstration of His power over the centre of life, the heart.

3. Christ the Searcher, knowing all things. In His vocation, in His concrete sphere of life, He approved His divine omniscience, and that in the personal unity of the God-man. This concrete divine-human knowledge He Himself distinguished from the universal omniscience of the Father. Starcke: "Christ knoweth all things even according to His human nature; not, however, through the human, tanquam per principium quo, but through the divine." In a certain sense, also, through the human; through human sensibility to hostile dispositions, which assuredly had its source in the divine nature.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.—How the Lord's redeeming power breaking in, awakens the daring courage of faith.—Christ the restorer of victorious courage on earth.—Man inventive, above all in his faith.—The inventions of faith.—The boldness of faith, which leaps out of the anguish of a believing spirit.—How the miracle of Christ is appended to the word of Christ.—The miracle not without the previous word.—The return of Christ to His town; or, Christ does not willingly leave the place in which He has once settled.—And it was noised abroad that He was in the house. When Christ is in a church, or in a house, it cannot be hid.—The courage of faith by which they uncovered the roof, in connection with the divine courage in which Christ uncovered their hearts.—Great faith discovers and adopts wonderful plans.—Christ the Searcher of hearts: 1. This has a many-sided confirmation, 2. is full of comfort, 3. and full of terror.—The power of the forgiveness of sins a free and legitimate prerogative of Christ's rule: 1. A free exercise of His love; 2. a legitimate administration between free grace and free faith; 3. therefore the free prerogative of Christ.—The divine love will not be restrained by man's narrow-heartedness.—God's grace is not bound to the ordinances of man.—The Gospel makes the Church, not the Church the Gospel.—The ordinance of absolution no monopoly of absolution.—The glorious and boundless blessings for the life which result from the forgiveness of sins.—The paralytic more troubled about his sins than about his bodily suffering.—Christ the fundamental Healer.—As the paralytic had a new power of moving, so the witnesses had a new power of seeing.—Only he who has seen Christ has learned rightly to see.—Christ's miracles of grace always preachers of salvation, which prepare for new miracles.—All awakenings in order to regeneration are miracles of Christ, the subsequent influences of which must be manifest in the bodily life, though, it may be, in a very gradual manner.—The harder and the easier miracle: 1. The internal miracle was, in the Lord's judgment, greater and harder, inasmuch as it was the condition of the external. 2. The external miracle was greater and harder in the judgment of His opponents, as something impossible to the absolving priests. 3. Both were equally hard, in as far as both were impossible to man; and hence the external miracle was Christ's authentication in opposition to His enemies.—The limited gift of healing a witness for the unlimited gift of forgiveness of sins.

Starcke: Moving to the house of God with the crowds.—The sick should come to Christ, the true Physician.—Benevolence, and still more, Christian love, demands that we should serve and help the sick in every possible manner.—He who would be a true Christian must strive to bring to Christ others who are weak and sinful, by prayer and all good offices, Jas. v. 16.—Canstein: We must somehow come to Christ, whether through the door or through the roof; that is, either in an ordinary or in an extraordinary way.—True faith, working by love, breaks through all impediments.—Love makes all things good and decorous, though they may not externally seem so.—Those who are troubled we should not trouble more, but comfort, Ps. xxxii. 1; Isa. lxi. 2.—The ungodly change the best medicines into poison, and pervert the holiest truths.—Majus: The slanderer's manner is, not to try to seek what meaning the speaker has, but to pervert at once and wrest his words.—That which is visible and before the eyes seems to men harder than the invisible; and they prefer what is bodily to what is spiritual.—Quesnel: Christ by His visible miracles taught men to understand His invisible miracles.—The priceless benefit of the forgiveness of sins worthy of all praise and thanksgiving.

Schleiermacher: We have two things to mark in this whole narrative: first, that which passed between the Redeemer and this sufferer; and then, what referred to the thoughts of the scribes congregated around Him.—As sure as we are that the Redeemer knew what was in man, we must assume that the sufferer thought most of the spiritual gift of Christ, and its importance to himself.—The more powerful the might of love is, as being the energy of faith, the sooner vanish all lesser evils, losing their sting, which is the consciousness of sin.—Thus we see in miniature, in this history, the whole history of the kingdom of God upon earth.—Bauer: We can thus, by our faith and our intercession, be helpful to the good of others.

Second Conflict.—The Eating with Publicans and Sinners. (Vers. 13–17.)

Parallels: Matt. ix. 9–13; Luke v. 27–32.

13 And He went forth again by the sea-side; and all the multitude resorted unto Him, and He taught them. 14 And as He passed by, he saw Levi the son of Alpheus sitting at the receipt of custom, and said unto him, Follow Me. And he arose and followed Him. 15 And it came to pass, that, as Jesus sat at meat in his house, many publicans and sinners sat also together with Jesus and His disciples: for there were many, and they followed Him. 16 And when the scribes and Pharisees saw Him eat with publicans and sinners, they said unto His disciples, How is it that He eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners? 17 When Jesus heard it, He saith unto them, They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

Ver. 17. The addition εἰς μετάνοιαν only in lesser codd., after Luke v. 32.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.—The narrative of Mark has here also its characteristic traits of vividness. A congregation of the people around Christ at the sea-side, and a discourse uttered there, form the introduction to the calling of Matthew. From ver. 15 we learn that many followed the Lord who belonged to the class of publicans and sinners (excommunicated persons; in some codd. vers. 15 and 16 are inverted, the publicans being thus more strongly marked as sinners). Meanwhile Matthew alone has our Lord's appeal to the saying of Hosea (ch. vi. 6).

2. Forth (from the town), again (ch. i. 16) by the sea-side.—Setting plainly before us the position of Capernaum, connected probably with the sea by a suburb of fishers' huts and custom-houses.

3. Levi (see the explanation in Matthew) the son of Alpheus.—Not to be confounded with Alpheus the father of James the Less. —In his house. Not in his own house, as Meyer thinks. See on Matthew. The ἠκολούθησαν must be understood of the spiritual following of the disciples, and not merely of outward accompanying.

4. When the Pharisees (see on Matthew) saw Him.—Not coming into the house, which is improbable; but as observers of the feast, after which they came forward towards the disciples coming out.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.

2. The offence taken at our Lord's table-fellowship with publicans and sinners has significance, first, in respect to Church principles as against Donatism and Novatianism; and, secondly, in relation to the true idea of communion as against Confessionalism; and, thirdly, in favour of Christian and social intercourse in opposition to the narrowness of Pietism.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. See on Matthew.—The multitude of the needy people gave the Lord occasion to summon helpers to Himself.—Levi (Matthew) better than his report: a warning sign against all premature condemnation of our neighbour.—How different is the glance of our Lord's eyes into the world from that of the Pharisees' eyes!—Christ in the house of publicans and sinners an offence to the Pharisee; Christ in the house of the Pharisee was not strange and repulsive to sinners (the woman, Luke vii. 37): 1. Historical; 2. typical.—The feast in which Christ is a guest.—The feasts in which Christ was a guest, all-saving and decisive for souls.—The slavish dread with which our Lord's enemies come to attack His disciples.—The attempt of His enemies to turn away His disciples from the Lord.—The narrative of the gradual boldness of our Lord's opponents: 1. The features of its development; 2. its symbolical character.—The mission of Christ a Gospel for sinners, who are in evil case: 1. For them with full assurance; 2. for these pre-eminently, and before those who think themselves sound; 3. for them in contradistinction to the others.—Jesus come for all, according to the law that He has come only for the sick.—The feast of Christ an expression of His Gospel.—The feast of a Christian an expression of his Christian vocation.—How this history stands in full harmony with Ps. i. 1.

Starcke, Quesnel: Grace draws Matthew from the love of gold, and makes of him an apostle; the love of gold drew Judas away from Christ and his apostleship.—Hedinger: As soon as God is revealed in thee, take no long counsel with flesh and blood.—Jesus receiveth sinners.—A converted man should bring all his acquaintance to God, and take care for their salvation.—These are shameful enemies of the truth, who put on the guise of godliness but deny its power.—Quesnel: He who has not love cannot understand what another may do in care for his neighbour's salvation.—Be patient, and slow to judgment, 1 Cor. iv. 3.—That in which the children of God find their joy and blessedness is hateful to the wicked.—The more a man thinks himself righteous, the further does he remove himself from Christ.—Jesus calls to repentance.—We must bring into the pastoral work a heart filled with true sympathy with the wretched, and with Jesus the Physician.

Gerlach: Every invitation to a feast was for Jesus an occasion for issuing His invitation to the heavenly feast.—Lisco: Jesus the one Physician for all.—Schleiermacher: The Pharisees a pure counterpart of the publicans.—The calling to repentance (that is, to change of mind) the essence of the work of Christ.—He describes them (the Pharisees) as they described themselves; but in such a manner that they could not but see that He thought quite differently concerning them (irony).—And we should always, in our friendly social life, have spiritual things in view.

Third Conflict.—The Fasting of John's Disciples and of the Pharisees. (Vers. 18–22.)

Parallels: Mark ix. 14–17; Luke v. 33–39.

18 And the disciples of John and of the Pharisees used to fast: and they come and say unto Him, Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, but Thy disciples fast not? 19 And Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bride-chamber fast while the bridegroom is with them? as long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. 20 But the days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days. 21 No man also seweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment; else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse. 22 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the new wine doth burst the bottles, and the wine is spilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine must be put into new bottles.

Ver. 18. The reading of the Rec., οἱ τῶν Φαρισαίων, is not supported.
Ver. 20. Rec.: ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις, is an emendation.
Ver. 21. We follow the reading: αἴρει ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τὸ πλήρωμα τὸ καινὸν τοῦ παλαιοῦ.
Ver. 22. The Present is more vivid than Lachmann's Future, ῥήξει, B.C.D.
Ver. 22. The addition "new," ὁ νέος, is from Luke v. 37.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matt. and Luke.—The offence at Christ's meal with Levi, as it might represent similar meals, was twofold: 1. As an eating with publicans and sinners; 2. as the opposite of fasting. In the former view the Pharisees took umbrage; in the latter, the disciples of John,—the Pharisees also joining them. This offence was a point in which the legal Pharisees and the ascetic disciples of John, as spiritually related, might meet.

2. Used to fast: ἦσαν νηστεύοντες.—Meyer: They were then in the act of fasting. It may be easily supposed that the imprisonment of John would give occasion to his disciples, and with them to many of the Pharisees, for an extraordinary fast (see art. "fasten" in Winer). An ordinary legal season of fasting is not meant; for Christ and His disciples would not have neglected or outraged that. But if an extraordinary fast, occasioned by the Baptist's imprisonment or by any other cause, formed the primary reason of this question, yet we think that the participle is to be taken as emphatic, according to the parallels in Matthew (νηστεύουσι πολλά) and Luke (νηστεύουσι πυκνά).

3. And they come.—Of course only some, as representing the mind of all (Weisse); not necessarily all, as Meyer thinks. The combination of both parties on this point does not exclude the prominence of John's disciples, according to Matthew.

4. In those days.—Emphatically, in those dark days.

5. Else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse.—The new piece is rent away from the old: the most approved reading is also the most expressive. The inappropriate and disproportionate is again made emphatic by the antithesis.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.

2. Compare the word concerning fasting, Matt. vi. 16. We may distinguish: 1. Legal-symbolical fasting (Lev. xvi. 29, xxiii. 27); 2. personal, real fasting—Moses (Ex. xxiv. 18), Elias (1 Kings xix. 8), Christ (Matt. iv.); 3. ascetic, penance fasting (the Baptist); 4. hypocritical fasting (Isa. lviii. 3, 4), which may easily combine with 1 and 3. Fasting generally is the ascetic symbolical exercise of real renunciation of the world, in which all true fasting is fulfilled.

3. Application of the two parables concerning old garments and old bottles to the history of Ebionitism, of the interim in the Reformation age, and of analogous incongruities in the present day.

4. The meal of Christ everywhere a sacred, spiritual feast.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

How often do sincere legal souls suffer themselves to be led away by traditionalists into an assault upon the freedom of the Gospel!—The greatest danger of the weak brethren (Rom. xiv. 1, 15), that they fall under the bondage of false brethren (2 Cor. xi. 26; Gal.

ii. 4), and thus become separated from the peace of the Gospel.—Wrong alliances of Christians in the Church lead to wrong alliances of ecclesiastical things, even in opposition to the right alliances of both.—Openness a characteristic of John's disciples as of their master: they apply themselves, as later the Baptist did, with their offence to Christ Himself.—Yet they are infected with the policy of the Pharisees; for they ask, Why fast Thy disciples not? (see on Matthew).—Christ at once the Physician and the Bridegroom: 1. The Bridegroom as the Physician; 2. the Physician as the Bridegroom. Or, Christ is the supreme festal end, and the only means of salvation, in the kingdom of God: 1. He is the means of healing, while He calls souls to the participation of His blessedness; 2. He is the Prince of the blessed kingdom in the midst of His redeemed.—We should think, on our feast-day, of our coming fast-day.—Even in the greatness of His fast, Christ with His disciples leaves far behind Him all the severe penitents of the old theocracy.—The secret fasting of Christians; or, the great, silent, and festal renunciation of the world: 1. Its form; 2. its reason, the reconciliation of the world; 3. its goal, the glorification of the world.

Starcke: It is a pharisaic and very common evil, that men are very much more troubled about setting others right in their living than about directing their own.—Quesnel: The busybody begins by talking about others, and comes afterwards to himself, but makes the best of his own case, 1 Tim. iv. 8.—Cramer: Fasting is good; but to make a merit of it, or even to burden the conscience with it, is opposed to Christian freedom.—It is spiritual pride when, in matters which God has left to our freedom, people desire that others should regulate their piety by their rules.—The fasting of a penitent does not consist only in abstinence from food, but in abstinence also from all the pleasures and all the occasions of sin, Joel ii. 12.—Where Jesus is the Bridegroom of the soul, there is joy and refreshment; where He is not, there is mourning and grief of heart.—Canstein: The right measures of pacification in religion are those in which truth and sincerity are consulted.—Majus: The nakedness of sin cannot be covered with old traditions.

Gerlach: Jesus terms Himself the Bridegroom of His Church.—Longing for the Bridegroom is the feeling of the Church, when He is away; bridal love and delight, when He is present again.—Braune: It is a special temptation to well-meaning souls, not quite reconciled to Christ, His doctrine, His discipline, His life, His Church, when evil-minded cavillers light upon them.—The disciples of Jesus a wedding company.—In all Christians there is more or less interchange of cheerful joy and gloomy sorrow, although the joyous temper when the Lord is near predominates.—New wine, new bottles.—Schleiermacher: How Jesus would have us understand and treat the great new period which He came to bring in.—Thus the Redeemer compares Himself with John, Matt. xi. 18 seq.—That time: the interval of uncertainty concerning the further course of the divine economy for man's salvation.—The old garment: He would thereby intimate that it was by no means lawful to cut up and divide the spiritual power with which He was furnished by God that He might communicate it to men, in order to repair and set in order again that which was obsolete and effete.—In our joyous fellowship with the Lord, let us preserve the happiness which He declares to be the prerogative of His people.—Gossner: They have now once more discovered something. Envy looks at and judges only others, without caring about correcting itself. Another failing of the Pharisees was, that they required all pious people to measure according to their standard, and adopt their usages. The third error was, that they began to speak about others, in order that they might come to themselves, and exalt their own reputation at the expense of others.

Fourth Conflict.—The Ears of Corn on the Sabbath; the Son of Man and Lord of the Sabbath. (VERS. 23–28.)

Parallels: Matt. xii. 1–8; Luke vi. 1–5.

23 And it came to pass, that He went through the corn-fields on the Sabbath-day; and His disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn. 24 And the Pharisees said unto Him, Behold, why do they on the Sabbath-day that which is not lawful? 25 And He said unto them, Have ye never read what David did, when he had need, and was an hungered, he, and they that were with him? 26 How he went into the house of God, in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shew-bread, which is not lawful to eat but for the priests, and gave also to them which were with him? 27 And He said unto them, The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: 28 Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath.

Ver. 26. "Under Abiathar the high priest" is wanting in D.; omitted on account of the historical difficulty.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.—In regard to the time, it is to be observed that this event belongs to a later section of the life of Jesus (after He had returned from the Feast of Purim in 782), when persecution took a decided form against Him. The same holds good of the healing of the man with a withered hand. But the motive of Mark in inserting the matter here, was evidently to connect appropriate facts. The first offence and the first conflict referred to the forgiveness of sins, which Christ uttered, and which was alleged against Him as a blasphemous invasion of the rights of God, meaning especially the rights of the priests; the second offence was the intercourse of Christ with publicans and sinners; the third, the opposition of His festal, social companionship to the ascetic and pharisaic fasts,—on which then follows in our narrative the account of the offence taken at the freer position which He and His disciples assumed towards the Sabbath.

2. Went through the corn-fields.—The παραπορεύεσθαι marks the circumstance that He opened His way right and left through the overhanging ears; whereas the disciples began to make their path by plucking and rubbing these ears. Thus does Meyer explain, and doubtless rightly, the ὁδὸν ποιεῖν τίλλοντες τοὺς στάχυας. It is true that Mark says nothing directly about eating; but that is to be taken for granted in any rational rubbing of the ears, and is further manifest from the Lord's justification of them, appealing to the fact of David having eaten the shew-bread. According to Meyer, the allusion to the history of David aimed only to vindicate the rubbing of the ears as an act of necessity; and he thinks that the unessential circumstance of the shew-bread having been eaten, led to the insertion into the other Gospels of the tradition concerning eating the ears. This needs no refutation. It is impossible to make the rubbing corn in their hands, in order to clear the way, into an act of sheer necessity, such as eating the shew-bread was. In fact, Mark takes pleasure in presenting a vivid picture of everything. He here tells us how the disciples attained two objects by one and the same act. The less of the two, making a way, occupied his mind merely as the counterpart of Jesus' πορεύεσθαι in another manner; and the suggestion of plucking the ears was quite enough to denote synecdochically the eating them also.

3. Why do they on the Sabbath-day that which is not lawful?—Meyer tries to establish this difference between the other Evangelists and Mark, that he makes the Pharisees ask, Why do they on the Sabbath-day something that is already forbidden in itself? But in that case Jesus would have replied only to the first and less important part of their accusation. But if we regard their words as a question of surprise, abruptly asked, and as it were answered by themselves, the harmony of the accounts is sufficiently established. For the Sabbath traditions of the Rabbins, consult Braune. "It was not a journey, being only a walk through a bypath; 2800 ells distance from the town were permitted by the law."—"To pluck and rub with the hand ears from the field of a man's neighbour, was allowed; Moses forbade only the sickle (Deut. xxiii. 25). But the matter belonged to the thirty-nine chief classes (fathers), each of which had its subdivisions (daughters), in which the works forbidden on the Sabbath were enumerated. This was their hypocritical way, to make of trifling things matters of sin and vexation to the conscience."

4. In the days of Abiathar the high priest.—According to 1 Sam. xxi. 1, Ahimelech was the high priest who gave David the shewbread (Joseph. Antiq. vi. 12, 6). His son Abiathar succeeded him, who was David's friend (1 Sam. xxii. 20; 1 Kings i. 7). Moreover, in 2 Sam. viii. 17 Ahimelech is inversely called the son of Abiathar. So also in 1 Chron. xxiv. 6 and 31. Hence it was early supposed that the father and son had both names (Euth. Zig.), or that the son was the vicarius of his father (Grotius); while some have proposed to modify the meaning of the ἐπί (under Abiathar). Later expositors, on the other hand, have assumed that the names have been interchanged; but to insist, with Meyer, upon this view, appears to us hypercritical and arbitrary, when we remember that in Ex. ii. 18 the same father-in-law of Moses is once called Raguel and then Jethro, and especially that Jewish tradition was possessed of many supplements of the holy narrative, as appears from the discourse of Stephen (Acts vii.), and the allusion to the Egyptian magicians, 2 Tim. iii. 8. Here the Old Testament itself gave occasion to supplementary tradition, and the scriptural knowledge of the time incorporated and used it. Moreover, it is to be assumed that the priest's son Abiathar stood in a nearer relation to David, which made the unusual proceeding more explicable. The tabernacle was then at Nob.

5. Therefore the Son of man is Lord.—The Son of man, and not merely as man (Grotius); not, however, the Messiah in the official sense, but the Son of man in His inviolable holiness, and in His mysterious dignity (intimated in Daniel) as the Holy Child and Head of humanity appearing in the name of God.—Lord over the Sabbath; that is, administrating and ruling over it in its New Testament fulfilment and freedom (comp. Meyer).

6. A clause is found appended to Luke in many codd.: "The same day Jesus saw one working on the Sabbath, and said unto him, "Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, thou art happy; if thou knowest not, thou art accursed." This historically questionable saying has been placed by some in the same traditional category with the words, "To give is more blessed than to receive," Acts xx. 35. See Meyer and Braune.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.—For the Jewish Sabbath and the Sabbath ordinances, consult the article in Winer. First, the opponents of Jesus thought that He sinned against sound doctrine; then they went further, and urged objections against His free treatment of discipline and pious usages; but now, finally, they would allege that He, in the person of His disciples, sinned against the decalogue, and against one of its most sacred commandments, that concerning the Sabbath. And if at first their exasperation against Him was only an internal matter, they now directly attack Himself in the persons of His disciples, as appears without any disguise in the history that follows in the text.

2. Christ, even in the silent corn-field, is not safe from the plots of His enemies.—The different manner in which Jesus and His disciples made their respective ways through the field.

3. Abiathar = Ahimelech; or, the freer relation of the New Testament believers to the Old Testament. For the shew-bread, consult the article in Winer, as well as the various writings of Bähr, Kurtz, Hengstenberg, Sartorius, etc., on Old Testament Symbolism.

4. The Sabbath for man, not man for the Sabbath.—The spirit of traditionalism and fanaticism perfectly inverts the ordinances of the kingdom of God; making the means the end, and the end the means.

5. The Son of man the Lord; or the roots of the supremacy and dignity of Christ which are found in the relation of His sacred human nature to mankind. The Son of man, the Lord in all aspects and on all sides; therefore Lord of the Sabbath.—But the Lord is a ruler, administrator, and fulfiller of His ordinances; not the abolisher of them.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Lord's patience in making His way, and in abstaining, as contrasted with the conduct of His disciples.—Christ in the field among the ears of corn, a noble figure.—The blessing of nature and the blessing of grace in their unity.—The first tokens of the coming freedom of the disciples in its significance; or, Christian freedom a child of need and justification felt in the spirit of Christ.—The peculiar need of the moment pointing to the means of help for ever: 1. The failing way; the lacking bread; the idea that one need might be removed by the other. 2. The significance of this fact for the spiritual relations of the kingdom of God.—To make a way for the Lord the best means of nourishment for His disciples.—The Pharisees everywhere like a shadow of the free Gospel.—Man himself the oldest divine institution, and what follows from it: 1. Nothing in favour of the arbitrary treatment of divine institutions; 2. but much in favour of free dealing with human traditions.—The kingdom of heaven is pre-eminently a kingdom of personal life or of love.—The Sabbath for man; that is, 1. its law is for the life of the soul, 2. its rest is for devotion, 3. the ordinance for salvation.—The Sabbath for man, and therefore for his eternal Sabbath; and this also was made for man, as man for it.

Starcke, Quesnel: Christ never performed miracles to feed Himself and His disciples in their hunger; in order to teach them that they should never without necessity seek extraordinary ways, and that their neighbours' need should press on their hearts more than their own.—Jesus hungers, while His disciples eat; and thereby shows that a teacher, ruler, and leader should be more perfect than his disciples.—Osiander: We should learn to suffer need with Christ, and to abound with Christ.—Quesnel: The pride of the Pharisaic nature drives a man to make himself a judge of others, and to demand of them an account of all they do.—Canstein: God's will is that we should diligently read the books of the Old Testament, and set them before the people; that we may derive thence teaching and example.—Majus: All errors must be refuted out of Holy Writ.—Quesnel: The usages and ordinances of religion should have for their object the glory of God and the profit of men.—The true Sabbath festival.—Believers are with Christ and through Christ lords of the Sabbath, that they may use it for their own and their neighbours' necessities.

Lisco: The highest end is man himself. The whole law was only the means for the education of men, whom God keeps thus under external discipline until the law is inwardly and spiritually apprehended and obeyed. But believers adapt themselves, in the spirit of love, to all outward ordinances (although, of course, in the spirit of the Lord).—Gerlach adds: To all outward ordinances that assist the need of the Christian Church.—Every arbitrary violation of legal discipline, without the justification of the spirit of grace and love in Christ, is a heavy sin.—Only the spirit of adoption makes free from the yoke of the law.—Braune: As David was pitilessly persecuted by Saul, so were the disciples by the Pharisees.—Men are to find rest and refreshment in holy days, but not to suffer hunger and distress.—There is no law given to the righteous; and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.—Schleiermacher: The Redeemer might have more easily vindicated Himself had He referred to the words of the law, Deut. xxiii. 24, etc.; but He aimed at something higher, to show that all such laws were subjected to a higher spiritual law (the example of David).—The Son of man Lord of the Sabbath; the Redeemer is the measure of all; the question must be, whether a thing is according to His mind and of advantage to His kingdom.—Bauer: The Lord of the Sabbath has given to every believing mind a Sabbath-law, for its direction and not for its trouble: Thou shalt worship God in spirit and in truth.

Fifth Conflict.—Healing of the Withered Hand on the Sabbath. The Traditionalists hardened into purposes of Murder. Withdrawal of Jesus to the Sea. (CHAP. iii. 1–12.)

Parallels: Matt. xii. 9–21; Luke vi. 6–11, vers. 17–19.

1 And He entered again into the synagogue; and there was a man there which had a withered hand. 2 And they watched Him, whether He would heal him on the Sabbath-day; that they might accuse Him. 3 And He saith unto the man which had the withered hand, Stand forth. 4 And He saith unto them, Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath-days, or to do evil? to save life, or to kill? But they held their peace. 5 And when He had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, He saith unto the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it out: and his hand was restored whole as the other. 6 And the Pharisees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against Him, how they might destroy Him. 7 But Jesus withdrew Himself with His disciples to the sea: and a great multitude from Galilee followed Him, and from Judea, 8 And from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, and from beyond Jordan; and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things He did, came unto Him. 9 And He spake to His disciples, that a small ship should wait on Him because of the multitude, lest they should throng Him: 10 For He had healed many; insomuch that they pressed upon Him for to touch Him, as many as had plagues. 11 And unclean spirits, when they saw Him, fell down before Him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. 12 And He straitly charged them that they should not make Him known.

Ver. 5. "Whole as the other" wanting in the most important codd. Probably brought over from Matt. xii. 13.

Ver. 7. Εἰς, after D.P., Lachm., Tisch.; stronger than the πρός.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels.—The narrative of Mark is here particularly vivid and pictorial. He places the scene actually before us, giving his relation very much in the Present tense. Like Matthew, he regards the incident in the light of an important turning-point. But he omits the parabolic word concerning the sheep fallen into a pit.

2. And He entered again.—According to Luke, this occurred eight days later, on the Sabbath which immediately followed the Sabbath of the previous narrative. By the side of the reading εἰς τὴν συναγωγήν, Cod. D. places the reading εἰς συν., into a synagogue: probably an exegetical hint that it was not the same synagogue as before. But the expression, "into the synagogue," does not designate of itself any definite synagogue. It has, however, this advantage, that it marks the fact of Jesus having gone into the synagogue again, in spite of all the machinations of the Pharisees and scribes.

3. Stand forth.—Meyer: "Up! into the midst!"

4. To do good.—The ἀγαθοποιῆσαι and κακοποιῆσαι may be taken generally, to do good and to do evil; or, more concretely, to benefit and to injure. Erasmus, De Wette, and others, take it in the latter sense; Meyer, in the former, and Matthew decides us for this. The question of Jesus, that is, was an answer to their question, May a man heal on the Sabbath? This question Jesus answers by an impregnable principle; as appears also from the words, It is lawful to do good, to perform a good act, on the Sabbath-day (καλῶς ποιεῖν).

5. To save a life.—The antithesis of doing good and doing evil now receives its concrete force, to benefit or to injure, and thereby its application to the present case.

6. With anger.—Mark gives vivid prominence to the indignation of Jesus. With a glance of displeasure and discomposure He looked round upon the assembly of men who were hardening their hearts before His eyes, as they could not refute or resist His vindication of the right of healing by reference to the destination of the Sabbath.

7. Grieved, συλλυπούμενος.—The συν establishes Meyer's translation, "feeling compassion for."

8. With the Herodians.—Compare on Matthew. De Wette, without reason, thinks that the Herodians have been by error introduced here out of Matt. xxii. 16. Tiberias in Galilee was a place of residence for the Herodians, that is, the Herodian-political party; and the time had come when they began to take part in the persecution of the Lord. But it marks a great advance in the enmity of the Pharisees, that they, who had before leagued themselves with the disciples of John for the sake of gathering weight against Christ, now entered into fellowship with the Herodians, whom in reality they hated, in order to destroy Him whom they hated still more by machinations behind His back.

9. How they might destroy Him.—Thus the Galilean conflicts had in rapid process reached their conclusion.

10. To the sea.—Not merely to the coast. The life on the sea, in the ship which was now His chief place of instruction in opposition to the synagogue, and which more than once served Him for a transient retreat to the opposite bank, here had its commencement. Matthew also had made this turning-point prominent. But in Mark it is plainly enough characterized as a withdrawal of Christ from His customary work in the synagogue to the ship.

11. And a great multitude.—The great crowds who heard the ship-discourses of Jesus were formed of two main masses, who are distinguished by ἠκολούθησαν and ἦλθον πρὸς αὐτόν. Thus, after the words "followed Him," we must, with Griesbach, and De Wette, and Meyer, place a period. The Jews from Galilee followed Him. The strangers from other parts came to Him. The following does not merely indicate external following; it includes a moral element also. In the conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees, they held with Jesus. It was the beginning of a specific discipleship, from which indeed most afterwards receded, but from which the germ of the Galilean believers was afterwards developed. The remaining multitude testifies the extent of the fame of Jesus; but we must also take into account the Jewish traffic, and the commercial way through Capernaum, which attracted multitudes in that direction. The description of the crowd brings them from all parts.—They about Tyre and Sidon are the Jews of that district. We quote the good remark of Meyer: "Observe the different position of πλῆθος in ver. 7 and ver. 8. In the one, the greatness of the mass of people is prominent; in the other, the idea of the mass itself is presented;" or rather their coming from all distances. With the followers, the most important thing was, that it was a great multitude; with the crowds coming, it was that they came from all parts, and from all distances. Compare Luke vi. 17; Matt. xii. 15. Moreover, we must remark that the concourse of people round Jesus stood in a reciprocal relation to His excitement and His breach with the Pharisees. The time had now come when the people began to display an inclination to make a political party in His favour, and to exalt Him into a king. And on this account, also, He was constrained to withdraw from the people, now to this and now to the other side of the lake, in the ship that was provided. Comp. Mark iv. 1 seq.; John vi. 15. We must bear in mind the tendency of the vigorous and brave Galilean people to insurrection and uproar, ch. iv. 24, 25.

12. And from Idumea.—John Hyrcanus had brought the Idu means by violence to embrace the Jewish faith. There were possibly some of that people by this time who voluntarily adhered to it, notwithstanding that unholy violence. But the words may refer to Jews who had been dispersed so far as Idumea and Arabia.

13. A small ship should wait on Him.—The immediate object was that the people should not throng Him. But this does not exclude the ulterior purpose, of having a freer position in the ship, and retreating often to the other shore.

14. Insomuch that they pressed upon Him.—The reason of the thronging before. It was not merely the pressure of a vast listening multitude towards the central speaker; it was rather the intenser earnestness of many who were urged by their desire to touch Him for their cure.

15. Unclean spirits.—That is, demons, who identified themselves with these.

16. That they should not make Him known.—That is, as the Messiah.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.—The Pharisees now seek to involve the Lord Himself in the charge of Sabbath desecration. The present case seemed to differ from the former in this, that the healing of the withered hand was a matter that might have been postponed. And it did not appear to be one of those urgent works of necessity which even the Pharisees permitted themselves to do. On the other hand, the Lord declares the work of compassionate love, or doing good generally, to be of itself always urgent; and the thought is further involved, that sickness does not tarry at a stand, but that there is a continual sinking into deeper danger and need.

2. On the previous Sabbath a work of necessity was justified and established; on the present, the Lord justifies and establishes a work of love. The Christian glorification of the Sabbath into the Lord's day assumes two aspects: 1. The ethical law of the day of rest is, with the other laws of the decalogue, transformed into an ethical principle for the Christian social world, especially the State. 2. The divine law, and the human tradition, of the festival become now the Incarnate Lord's creation and institution of the Sunday. The Sabbath was the end of the old world,—a figure of its rest in death after its labour under the law. The Sunday was the beginning of the new world,—a figure of the rising to a new life, which began with the resurrection of Christ. The former was the close of a week of labour which had passed in restless activity, like the days' works of creation; the latter was the beginning of a festal week, the works of which should be performed in the joyful light of the Spirit and of love. On the historical and general relations of the day, consult Hengstenberg's treatise (Berlin, 1852). Compare also the writings of Rücker, Liebetrut, Oschwald, Wilhelmi, and others.

3. Christ the personal fulfilment and manifestation of the law in glorified form, and thus also of the Sabbath. The source and the founder of the day; Himself the Sun of the Christian Sunday.

4. The Pharisees and the Herodians. "Hierarchs and despots are necessary to each other." F. v. Bander.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See the parallels.—The Lord's Sabbath work: saving life and the soul; the traditionalists' Sabbath work: destroying life (that of the Messiah Himself).—The needy and wretched in the synagogue; or, the school of the law cannot save and heal.—The envious glance of the spy in the sanctuary; or, how carnal zeal does not look up to the Lord, but sideways at what others are doing.—Christ performs the glorious work of heaven in the midst of the dark contentions of those who harden themselves in unbelief: standing alone as Saviour with His faithful few.—The Lord's glance in the world is a looking around in indignation, or a looking upon in love.—The hardening of His enemies under the very eye of Christ.—Christ is to some a savour of life unto life; to others, a savour of death unto death.—As the paralytic, who could not move, took the boldest course through faith (over the roof); so the man with the withered hand learns by faith to come forward and stretch out his hand in spite of the mightiest enemies of faith.—As it was divinely great to work wonders in the midst of this envious circle of enemies, so it was humanly great to maintain faith in such a circle.—The old and new connection between need and the boldness of faith.—The leagues between carnal religious zeal and secular power against Christ (Pharisees and Herodians).—The transference of Christ's preaching from the synagogue to the ship, in its significance; or, God's word is not bound.—The thronging of the people round the Lord, in its various aspects: 1. A confused impulse to seek help, confused by a craving for the miraculous in that help; 2. an act of homage to the Prince of life: at Calvary a band of deadly enemies, who cast Him out as if He had been the great enemy of man and destroyer of the people.—How men have ever sought to change the pastoral office, and preaching of the Gospel of Christ for the good of souls, into an office of external acts and helps (changing the spiritual Messiah into a worldly one).—Christ must often withdraw Himself, not only from His enemies, but also from His friends, in order to maintain the spirituality and freedom of His vocation.—It is beyond all important that we should accept Christ as the Physician of souls; for the redemption of the soul is now, the resurrection of the body at the last day.—The earthly mind would fain invert this order.—The ship of the Church must save Christianity from intermingling with the politics of the world.—How often did Jesus retreat before the disposition of the people to proclaim Him as a Messiah in the carnal sense!—The crying demons mislead the people.—The infinitely discordant mixture of dispositions and characters in an excited mass of people.—The test of right coming to Jesus: 1. A coming to Him alone, not only with, but also in spite of, the multitude; 2. a being alone with Him, whether among many or few; 3. a remaining alone with Him, and entering through Him into the fellowship of the saved.—The confession of the demons: how the Lord estimated its ambiguity and recoiled from it.—The demons first in the confession that Jesus was the Messiah, but their confession was a slavish one.—The Lord had here to do not merely with the words of truth, but with the truth of the words.—The glance of Christ's anger a prelude of the judgment; yet it was qualified by compassion.—Christ, the gentlest friend of men, will one day be a most terrible personage to many.

Starcke, Majus: The contradiction and slander of enemies should not restrain us from avowing the truth, but make us more courageous and joyful in our confession.—Quesnel: A miser, an unfruitful Christian, a negligent ruler, a strong man that will not help, are all mere withered hands.—O avarice, how withered is thy hand!—To suck poison out of what is good, or to slander, is devilish. —Hypocrites are very urgent about ceremonies; but as it regards true discipline, they know nothing about it.—When we do what is right, we need not fear secret slanderers.—True love is not afraid of wicked men when it would do good to others.—Canstein: The enemies of Christ are not sincere; they have seared consciences, and backbite in secret.—Quesnel: There is much silence that comes from the Spirit of God, but there is also a devilish silence.—Here anger and love meet together; but the Socinians cannot, and will not, reconcile these.—The passions of Christ are a great mystery. —Majus: Divine zeal against sin must be connected with love, with tender compassion towards the sinner.—Quesnel: What is an envious heart? It poisons everything, and extracts poison from everything.—When Jesus is persecuted or forsaken of all, there is yet a little company of the faithful who follow Him.—Osiander: The more fiercely the Gospel of Christ is persecuted, the more surely and widely it is diffused.—The hearing about Christ is not saving of itself; it must lead the soul to Himself.—Quesnel: True love makes no difference among men, but does good to all, even to those who come with excitement and at an unseasonable time.—Christ would receive no testimony from lying spirits.

Gerlach: The Sabbath was to remind us of, and introduce us into, that rest which God enjoyed when He contemplated the creatures happy in Himself after creation was finished, that into which redeemed men shall again enter at the finishing of the new creation.—This rest is not the rest of death, but the highest life; and to spread abroad life and blessedness in the spirit of love, is the proper business of the Sabbath.—Lisco: Herod's servants are his dependants. (This is true; for the dependants of an absolute despot can only be his servants.)—Braune: That the Sabbath would not tolerate what might be postponed, was a law to them: he that had the withered hand was not in deadly danger, and his cure might as well take place the next day. Jesus penetrated their thoughts.—Jesus established, that the not doing good was equivalent to the doing of evil; the sin of omission as bad as the sin of commission.—Their mouth was stopped, but their heart was not emptied of envy and malice.—Jesus' glance: the enemy of sin, the friend of the sinner.—The withered hand, 1 Kings xiii. 4.—Instead of joining the tempted Saviour, they made a compact with their deadliest enemies, the dependants of Herod; and instead of sanctifying the Sabbath by doing good and preserving life, they engaged in plans to put to death the Lord of the Sabbath and of life.—The hatred which Jesus encountered was already an earnest of His death; and the multitude of the people coming to Him from Gentile lands was already an earnest of the blessing of His death.—The praise of the Holy One cannot issue from unholy lips and an unclean spirit.—Beda: Jesus had victoriously defended His disciples from the charge of violating the Sabbath; but the Pharisees were all the more vehement in involving Him, the Master Himself, in the same condemnation.—Chrysostom: Jesus places the unhappy man in the midst of the assembly, that his appearance might excite compassion, and his healing shame the wickedness of the enemies.—Schleiermacher: What good thing we have to do, we must set about doing at once.—These (the Pharisees) confederated with the officials of Herod against Him; those in Jerusalem brought the affairs of the Redeemer before the Roman governor.—We see how one party stood in need of the other in order to accomplish that which was in each party a foul wrong, though there was something at the bottom like a dependence upon what they thought was the law of God.—How many examples of a similar kind in the history of the Christian Church!—(The withdrawal to the sea.) Here also He remained in the way of His vocation, and retreated from them without neglecting His mission.—(The cry of the demons.) The Redeemer would not that any faith in Him should arise which had not the right foundation.—Gossner: The Saviour can be severe; but He is grieved that He must be angry.—Bauer: The Pharisees were silent. The eye of the Lord rested upon them, but none of the Pharisees could stand that glance.—They kept angry silence, like that which precedes the storm.

FIFTH SECTION.

CHAPTER III. 13–VI. 6.

Beginning of the conflict. The Lord providing helpers in the calling of the Apostles. (VERS. 13–19.)

Parallels: Matt. x. 1–8; Luke vi. 12–16.

13 And He goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto Him whom He would: and they came unto Him. 14 And He ordained twelve, that they should be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach, 15 And to have power to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils. 16 And Simon He surnamed Peter; 17 And James the son of Zebedee, and John the brother of James, (and He surnamed them Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder;) 18 And Andrew, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Matthew, and Thomas, and James the son of Alpheus, and Thaddeus, and Simon the Canaanite, 19 And Judas Iscariot, which also betrayed Him: and they went into an house.

Ver. 15. "To heal" sicknesses, wanting in B.L.Δ. and others. It is omitted by Tisch., and seems a supplement from Matt. x. The omission of this makes all the more prominent the casting out of the demons, in Mark the main point.

Ver. 19. The reading κανανaῖος here, as in Matt., is safe.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels.—Into a mountain. Not "up into the mountain of that place," for the locality was the margin of the sea; but it is used in accordance with the relations of the land in Palestine, and of the phraseology concerning it: going up into a mountain, in contradistinction to abiding in the narrow vales or low strips of land. And it is to be observed that the expression is used to signify a withdrawal of the Lord, especially for solitary devotion.

2. And calleth unto Him.—The manner of the call is not defined, whether sending for them, or otherwise. The main point is the free choice of the Twelve out of the rest of the discipleship. Meyer supposes that Jesus made first a larger selection, and then in ver. 14 the narrower choice. But there is nothing to hinder our regarding ver. 14 as expressing the more specific end of the call, that is, the appointment and mission.

3. And Simon He surnamed Peter.—Some MSS. put first πρῶτον Σίμωνα; and, according to De Wette, Mark passed over the statement of Peter's call, because the change of name was to him of special moment. But we may regard the statement of Peter's call as included in the ἐπέθηκε. Thus He added, not merely to his name, but rather to his general vocation, the distinguishing name of Peter. On account of these distinguishing names, Andrew follows in the fourth rank, after the two sons of Zebedee. The solemn appendage of the name in this place does not contradict the preliminary naming of Simon, which had taken place before, John i. 42.

4. Boanerges: בְּנֵי רְגַשׁ; in Aramæan, the schwa being equivalent to oa. The רֶגֶשׁ, in Hebrew meaning a threatening people (Ps. lv. 15), in Syriac meant thunder.—That the name refers to the event mentioned in Luke ix. 54 (Calmet, Heumann, etc.), is not contradicted by the supposition that it must have been a surname significant of praise, and not of blame: compare on this point the notes on Matthew. According to the ancients, the sons of Zebedee were so termed as μεγαλοκήρυκες καὶ θεολογικώτατοι (Theophylact, and others), because thunder is the ordinary symbol of solemn and profound utterances. We understand the expression to refer to the fiery, grand, sublime spirit, which found its utterance in correspondingly high, strong, and pregnant words. That the name was not habitually used, like the name Peter, may be explained by the fact that it was a collective one. It was distributed later, or merged in the several dignities of the first apostolical martyr, and the disciple who lay on the Lord's bosom, the last great Evangelist.

5. Canaanite.—Though the form of the surname has in it something startling, yet it is easily explicable by the term ζηλωτής in Luke, and the accompanying reading κανανίτης.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare on the parallels.—It is characteristic of Mark, that he gives prominence here to the sons of thunder. On the fiery zeal of John, compare Gerlach, S. 118. "The peculiarity of John was, as pure simplicity, so also glowing and fiery zeal; this having been at first disturbed by impure passion (ch. ix. 38; Luke ix. 54), but sanctified afterwards by inward love to Christ. His epistles contain some of the strongest passages in the New Testament. See 1 John ii. 22, 23, iii. 8; 2 John 7–11. Compare also the Seven Epistles in the Apocalypse. Church history also records many things of his sacred zeal." And then he introduces the narrative of John's hastily leaving the bath in which the heretic was found.

2. As it respects the calling of the Twelve, it must be observed that it falls into two separate crises, according to Mark, ch. iii. 13–19, and ch. vi. 7 seq. Only it is evident that the more precise characterisation of the mission in ch. vi. 7 is identical with the mission in Matt. x. 1 seq., and Luke vi. 12 seq. Hence, we assume that Mark here describes a selection of the Apostles preliminary to that mission, one that was a continuation and enlargement of the call of the four most select disciples at the Sea of Galilee, and intended primarily as a vocation to more decided discipleship and engagement in helping the Redeemer's work. Yet the more express apostolical vocation is kept in view even here, as is manifest from the very solemn account of Mark, in which he anticipates some features of the later vocation. It would appear, indeed, that the point of time to which Mark here carries us, was even later than the proper historical epoch of the more express vocation. The motive for placing it in this connection was the fact of the commencement of the great conflict of our Lord with the unbelief of the world, as it is exhibited in this section.

3. The names of the Apostles, or their call, introduced with respect to Christ by the appointment of the Father: mediate, and yet immediate.

4. Judas specially endowed; and the doubtfulness of such special endowments in the affairs of Church and State; inasmuch as the superficial ability may easily outweigh the central character.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels.—The call of Christ's servants a call from the mountain: 1. Christ stands on the mountain; 2. those called go up the mountain to Him; 3. they come down from the mountain into the world of men. See Isa. lii. 7.—The place of Jesus' prayer the birth-place of apostolical and evangelical vocation.—Fellowships and collegiate bodies in the kingdom of God: 1. In their meaning: union of the divine and the human, even here. 2. Their design: mutual supplementing and strengthening, lessening of human one-sidedness, and increase of divine power.—Casting out of devils a main branch of ecclesiastical vocation.—The variety and differences of the disciples of Jesus: an unfolding of the riches of Christ and of His kingdom.—Judas Iscariot among the Twelve an eternal sign, 1. Of the all-endeavouring love of Christ, 2. of the greatness of human depravity, 3. of the dangers of the spiritual office (or of a mere external connection with the Lord) without perfect fidelity in the spiritual life (an internal union with Him), 4. of the end of the Church (not a community of perfect saints, but of redeemed men).—Degrees in the apostolical circle, notwithstanding their unity and equality.—Even the dark power which was displayed by the last of the Twelve testified of the spiritual abilities of this company, over which Jesus reigned in kingly majesty.—"Who betrayed Him:" the called Apostle a denounced traitor.

Starcke: The choice of a pastor should be entered upon with prayer, Acts i. 24.—He who would be fit for the work of the Lord must first be much with the Lord.—Quesnel: Spiritual pastors make up, with Christ the chief Pastor, only one Priest; His priesthood in the preaching of the Gospel being continued, diffused, and perfected, 1 Pet. ii. 9.—The Lord gives the word to the great host of the Evangelists.—They who take their ease when they are placed in office, often become brethren of Judas.—It is a miserable delusion to repose in a legitimate call, while negligent of fidelity and diligence in discharging its functions.—Not all the names of Christians are written in heaven, though they may stand recorded in the books of the Church below.

Gossner: He who would be a witness for Christ and His Gospel, must be much with Him, and by constant communion have learned to know Him.—How will they stand before Him, who learn what they have to say by heart, stand up, and only declaim, or read it off! —Bauer: The death-roll of the Twelve Apostles itself a sermon.

1. Conflict of Jesus with the blaspheming Unbelief of His Enemies, and His Triumph over Human Wisdom. (CHAP. iii. 20–30.)— 2. His Conflict with the well-meaning Unbelief of His Friends; Triumph over Devilish Malice and Human Policy. (VERS. 20, 21, and VERS. 31–35.)

Parallels: Matt. xii. 22–50; Luke viii. 19–21, xi. 14–26.

20 And the multitude cometh together again, so that they could not so much as eat bread. 21 And when His friends heard of it, they went out to lay hold on Him: for they said, He is beside Himself. 22 And the scribes which came down from Jerusalem said, He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the devils casteth He out devils. 23 And He called them unto Him, and said unto them in parables, How can Satan cast out Satan? 24 And if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. 25 And if a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand. 26 And if Satan rise up against himself, and be divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end. 27 No man can enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house. 28 Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme: 29 But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: 30 Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit. 31 There came then His brethren, and His mother, and, standing without, sent unto Him, calling Him. 32 And the multitude sat about Him; and they said unto Him, Behold, Thy mother and Thy brethren without seek for Thee. 33 And He answered them, saying, Who is My mother, or My brethren? 34 And He looked round about on them which sat about Him, and said, Behold My mother and My brethren! 35 For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is My brother, and My sister, and mother.

Ver. 28. The words τοῖς υἱοῖς come first in the best codd.; and so they are placed in Griesb., Lach., Tisch. The ὅσα, instead of ὅσας, after preponderating authorities.

Ver. 29. The reading ἔνοχός ἐστιν αἰωνίου ἁμαρτήματος, B.L.Δ., and others, is accepted by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch. The readings κρίσεως and κολάσεως seem to have been explanatory paraphrases of this strong and pregnant expression.

Ver. 32. His mother and His brethren. More firm than the order in the Rec., His brethren and His mother. Meyer holds to this last, thinking that the mother was afterwards put first on account of her rank, and the parallels in Matthew and Luke. It may have been the purpose to make the mother less prominent, in a case of seeming error.—The order is περὶ αὐτὸν ὄχλος.—An additional clause, "and Thy sisters," has A.D.G., etc., for it; B.C.L. and many against it. Griesb., Lachm., Tisch. accept it; so De Wette and Meyer. We think the omission harder to account for than the insertion would be,—which probably had reference to ch. vi. 3.

Ver. 34. And. The καὶ is firmer than ἤ.

Ver. 35. The μου after ἀδελφή is omitted by Lachm. and Tisch., following preponderating authorities.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels.

2. And they went into an house.—For the chronology, compare the notes on Matthew. The Evangelist's arrangement here is not according to time, but regulated by a classification of the facts. For the circumstance described, does not, as Meyer thinks, fall into the period after the return from the Sermon on the Mount, but into a later period, when Christ's work in Galilee was drawing to its close. According to Ewald, an original form of Mark might have introduced before this section the Sermon on the Mount, and the narrative of the nobleman in Capernaum. These and similar suppositions of Hilgenfeld, we have sufficiently dealt with in our introductory account of this Evangelist. Finally, it does not follow from their coming into an house, that the ensuing scene took place in that house.

3. When His (friends).—This very important trait in the evangelical narrative is peculiar to Mark. According to Bauer, Mark here represents the mother of Jesus, with His brethren, as confederate with the Pharisees. Meyer, on the contrary, shows that their opinion, ὅτι ἐξέστη, was honest error (not wickedness), and that their design was to provide for Christ's safety. But if they really had thought Him beside Himself, their care for His safety would have taken the form of an attempt forcibly to seize and detain Him. We regard the step as having been the result of fearful policy. At the crisis when Christ's breach with the powerful party of the Pharisees was decided, they sought by a fiction to remove Him from publicity and a supposed extreme danger. We may regard the adoptive brethren of Jesus as the representatives of this idea; but it is evident that Mary also was drawn into this error of worldly policy (see the Notes on Matthew). It is quite in keeping with the character of such a policy, that these brethren soon afterwards sought to thrust Him forward, John vii. 1 seq.—The household of Jesus did not come from Nazareth to Capernaum, as Meyer supposes, but from the house of their abode in Capernaum to the place where the crowds were thronging Him. That the Pharisees would here come against Him with a public accusation, they would know very well in Capernaum.

4. For they said.—Themselves of course, the household of Jesus: and not, as Olshausen thinks, "it was said" by the malicious Pharisees, or, by others generally (Ewald), or by messengers (Bengel).

5. He is beside Himself.—Not, as Luther says, "He will be beside Himself;" but not, with Meyer, "He is mad." It is designedly ambiguous, inasmuch as the ἐξέστη may mean, in a good sense, the being for a season rapt into ecstasy by religious enthusiasm (2 Cor. v. 13), as well as, in a bad sense, the being permanently insane. In His ecstasy, He is no longer master of Himself. The involuntary, religious μαίνεσθαι is, indeed, not an Old Testament idea, but a Greek one: it was, however, current in the Jewish popular notion; and the more ambiguous it was, the better it would suit the aim of their policy. It must not be confounded, as Theophylact confounds it, with the allegation of the opponents. On the contrary, if they knew that the adversaries would say that He was raging in demoniacal possession, the politic answer was at hand, "He is indeed beside Himself, but it is in a good demoniac ecstasy." According to Meyer, this cannot be reconciled with the previous history of Mary in Matthew and Luke. The supposition of Olshausen (and Lange), that this was a moment of weakness in her life, he thinks very precarious. And Pius IX. would agree with him, though for a different reason. For the various interpretations of the passage, see Meyer. Euthym. Zigab.: Some envious ones said so. Schöttgen and Wolf: The disciples said that the people were mad. Grotius: Report said that he had fainted. Kuinoel: It was the message to come home to eat, for maxime defatigatus est; and so forth.

6. An unclean spirit.—Characterisation of Beelzebub, in opposition to the Holy Spirit.

7. And He looked round about.—Mark often gives prominence to the Lord's glance around. Here it is in contrast with the angry look round of ch. iii. 5.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.—Mark omits, among other things, to give us the immediate occasion of the main matter of the section—the healing of the demoniac. The reason that His people came out to Him as they did, seems now to have lain in the thronging of the crowds, and in the fact that there was no room to eat. However, these only furnished them with a pretext for rescuing Him from the hands of His enemies, whose designs and power they well knew. John came not eating and drinking, and they said, He hath a devil. Spirit-like oblivion of the body and of its nourishment, they interpreted as involuntary demoniac enthusiasm. Thus did it seem to be with the Lord at this time; and using this representation, His family went out to gain their object.

2. The choice of the Twelve was soon followed by this erring conduct of His own people towards Him, several of the Twelve being among them. These, therefore, mistook their vocation, in the same manner as Peter and the sons of Zebedee mistook theirs on another occasion. The new impulse given to the Lord's cause, and the new step it had taken, is followed by a new defeat and counter-stroke. As soon as He takes assistants to Himself, they aim to infuse earthly policy into His plans.

3. The worst manifestation of the kingdom of evil is the blasphemy with which hypocrites, unconsciously standing in the service of darkness, interpret the most glorious manifestations of the kingdom of heaven as works from below. The blasphemy against the Son of God as approximating to the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost: the most fearful display of the power of the arch-blasphemer.

4. While the pictorial vividness of the Evangelist is observable throughout the whole of the conflict which he depicts, he, however, omits the sign of Jonas, the word concerning possession by seven devils, and the like.

5. And looking round.—Jesus, in His conflict with His enemies and the dark kingdom which they serve, does not trust to men, but does trust to His own influence on mankind; that is, He does not confide in His own people, so far as they would dictate to Him with carnal policy as His natural family; but to His people as they trustingly hang upon His lips as His spiritual family.

6. Christ's defence becomes immediately an attack. Earnest apologetics pass over into polemics.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels.—No room to eat. How often did the Lord, in the zeal of His vocation, forget eating and drinking and sleep!—The highest freedom of spirit and self-government are interpreted even by His people as bondage and being beside self.—How much to be reprobated is an ambiguous and feigned adoption of the notions of the enemies of truth, on the part of those who would represent the truth!—The concessions of carnal ecclesiastical policy to the unfriendly world always spring from evil.—The sound concession: the infinite forbearance with which Christ enters into the notions of His opponents to refute their assertions.—Christ exalted equally above the protection of His friends and the attacks of His foes.—Contrast between the Lord's great conflict with His opponents and His disciples' little help: 1. Contrast in temper: heroic reliance in divine truth; petty trust in human cunning. 2. Contrast in the conflict itself: simple defence and simple attack; ambiguous apology and mediation. 3. Contrast in the result: high victory; deep humiliation.—The false and the true family of Jesus: 1. The one would watch over Him and His cause, the other will be watched over by Him; 2. the one would lead Him, the other will be led by Him; 3. the one would save Him, the other will be saved by Him; 4. the one would restrain and bring Him into danger, the other will be restrained and bound by His word and Spirit.—The Lord detects and cuts asunder the bands of perilous fellowship between His people and His enemies: 1. He detects them: worldliness in religion, fear, cunning and policy; 2. He cuts them asunder by the word of severance, by warning, and by blessing.—The divine dignity of our Lord in the decisive conflicts of His kingdom: 1. As opposed to His enemies, the instruments of darkness; 2. as opposed to His family, as they are confused by the apparent danger of His cause; 3. as opposed to His Church, which hangs upon His lips with childlike simplicity, not suspecting its danger.—Christ says to His people, in the days of apparent peril to religion: My thoughts are not your thoughts; neither are My ways your ways.—Christ's defence is, in its own nature, also a victorious attack.—Blasphemy against the Spirit, eternal guilt, and therefore exposed to eternal condemnation.—The peaceful declaration of Christ that He wrought in the power of the Holy Ghost, in opposition to His blaspheming enemies, who charged Him with being possessed by a spirit of darkness and working under his influence.—Maintenance of this opposition: 1. Divine repose against devilish excitement; 2. divine forbearance against devilish hatred; 3. divine illumination against devilish self-confusion.

Starcke, Canstein: If Christ endures, the Christian Church endures.—Zeisius: The devil never gives up the work that his name imports,—slandering the good; nor do those who are on his side, John viii. 44.—Quesnel: We must strive to preserve our honourable name, so long as it is possible.—It is awful to ascribe to the devil that which comes from God. Thus God is made into Satan. —The Creator endures this blasphemy, in His patience and long-suffering, and men will endure nothing. We should be imitators of God.—Wolf does not eat wolf, nor does Satan drive out Satan. —Satan does not persecute Satan, yet Christians persecute Christians. O fearful wickedness!—Rebellion and insurrection are destructive and ruinous.—Quesnel: When once the devil is master of any heart, none but Jesus Christ can drive him out.—Cramer: Children must honour their parents; but in matters that pertain to office, and the things of God and conscience, they should not be overruled by any.—There is no carnal prerogative in the kingdom of God.—Quesnel: He who doeth the will of God to the end, enters into an eternal alliance with God as his Father, with Jesus Christ as his Brother, with the angels and saints as his sisters, and with the heavenly Jerusalem as his mother.—Gerlach: According to Mark, Jesus distinguishes general blasphemy against God from the particular blasphemy against the Holy Ghost; according to Matthew and Luke, He distinguishes from it also the blasphemy against the Son of man: in both cases there is the contrast between a revelation which has always been more external, and one which has seized the inner man with more convincing divine power.—He that doeth the will of God: He means thereby faith, which is the fount and beginning of all holy obedience.—Braune: We must watch over zeal, as over fire in a house. But that cold moderation which the world loves so well, is most offensive to Christ, who will spue the lukewarm out of His mouth, Rev. iii. 16. This is our Lord's official fidelity: in the presence of this blaspheming malignity, the Redeemer exhibits a simplicity, a security, a freedom from all bitterness, which must have produced a sacred impression upon all who beheld, even as upon us now.—It is in the Spirit of God that Jesus overcomes Satan.—Schleiermacher (on the words, He is beside Himself): So those have always been accounted whom God in hard times has chosen for His special instruments: it was so in the time of the Church's Reformation, and it will always be so again when times of darkness shall return.—There have never been wanting such enemies of the truth, who have similarly sought to put another character upon that one only institute for human salvation, which can never find a substitute. But, as in the text, their efforts are always vain.—How far blind and rash zeal may lead men!—"He that gathereth not with Me, scattereth."—"He that for My sake forsaketh not father and mother, is not worthy of Me."—Christ on the cross: Behold thy son! Behold thy mother!—There will be then no conflict between our natural and spiritual relationships. —All the household must be members of the one same family.

3. Our Lord's Conflict with the carnal Unbelief of the People by Parables, and His triumph over Human Narrowness. (CHAP. iv. 1–34.)

Parallels: Matt. xiii. 1–23, vers. 31–35; Luke viii. 4–18.

1 And He began again to teach by the sea-side: and there was gathered unto Him a great multitude, so that He entered into a ship, and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land. 2 And He taught them many things by parables, and said unto them in His doctrine, 3 Hearken; behold, there went out a sower to sow: 4 And it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the way-side, and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up. 5 And some fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth; and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth: 6 But when the sun was up, it was scorched; and, because it had no root, it withered away. 7 And some fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up and choked it, and it yielded no fruit. 8 And other fell on good ground, and did yield fruit that sprang up, and increased, and brought forth, some thirty, and some sixty, and some an hundred. 9 And He said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. 10 And when He was alone, they that were about Him with the twelve asked of Him the parable. 11 And He said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables: 12 That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them. 13 And He said unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables? 14 The sower soweth the word. 15 And these are they by the way-side, where the word is sown; but, when they have heard, Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts. 16 And these are they likewise which are sown on stony ground; who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness; 17 And have no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time: afterward, when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended. 18 And these are they which are sown among thorns; such as hear the word, 19 And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. 20 And these are they which are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit, some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some an hundred. 21 And He said unto them, Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick? 22 For there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was anything kept secret, but that it should come abroad. 23 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. 24 And He saith unto them, Take heed what ye hear: with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you; and unto you that hear shall more be given. 25 For he that hath, to him shall be given; and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath. 26 And He said, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; 27 And should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. 28 For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. 29 But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come. 30 And He said, Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what comparison shall we compare it? 31 It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth: 32 But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches; so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it. 33 And with many such parables spake He the word unto them, as they were able to hear it. 34 But without a parable spake He not unto them: and when they were alone, He expounded all things to His disciples.

Ver. 1. Συνάγεται, Lachm., Tisch., after B.C.L.

Ver. 4. "Fowls of heaven." Τοῦ οὐρανοῦ only has D. and others for it. Probably added from Luke.

Ver. 5. Καὶ ἄλλο, Lachm. and Tisch., after the best documents.

Ver. 6. Ἀνέτειλεν, after B.C.D., etc.

Ver. 10. The parables. Τὰς παραβολάς, Tisch., after B.C.L.Δ. The parable just delivered gave them occasion to ask about the design of parables generally.

Ver. 11. The γνῶναι is wanting in A.B.C. So Lachm., Tisch.

Ver. 18. Καὶ ἄλλοι εἰσί, Lachm., Tisch., after B.C.D., etc. Τούτου is wanting in decisive codd.

Ver. 20. Ἐκεῖνοι, Tisch., after B.C.L.Δ.

Ver. 22. "If not revealed." Ἐὰν μή, the hardest and best authenticated reading (A.B.C., Tisch.). The seeming contradiction occasioned the variations.

Ver. 24. Τοῖς ἀκούουσιν, omitted in Lach. and Tisch., after B.C.D.G.L.

Ver. 28. The γὰρ must be given up. Πλήρης σῖτος, B.

Ver. 30. Πῶς, Tisch., after B.C.L.Δ. Ἐν τίνι αὐτὴν παραβολῇ θῶμεν; Tisch., Lach., after B.C.L.Δ.

Ver. 31. Lach.: ὡς, after A.B., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels.

2. Matthew gives us a collection of seven parables; Mark, of three. Thus it is a round holy number in both. Here also the individual parables are combined into one collective view of the kingdom of God. In Matthew we see the chronological development of the kingdom of God in its historical periods; here we have a picture of its development in space (statistically) according to its immanent principles of gradual expansion. The first parable depicts the kingdom of God in its everywhere difficult foundation; the second (a precious addition to the treasury of parables, in Mark alone), its certain and natural development; the third, its wonderful and glorious spread and consummation. It is probable that these three parables formed originally one single connected discourse; furnishing the basis of a later historical representation of the kingdom in the seven parables. The beginning of the parabolic discourses, however, had an earlier position than Mark indicates. His purpose is to connect them with the transference of Jesus' teaching to the sea-side; but he has also an interest, arising out of the nature of the events, for placing these parables here. They form a crisis in the conflict of Christ with unbelief in Galilee, and mark His conflict with the specially sensuous unbelief of the people. Hence, in ver. 12, he has the well-known strong ἵνα (βλέποντες βλέπωσι καὶ μὴ ἴδωσι); while Matthew has the ὅτι. He also quotes in a very suggestive manner, vers. 21–23, the words of Christ which we find in Matthew's Sermon on the Mount, ch. v. 15, and in the instructions to the Apostles, ch. x. 26, and which in Luke, ch. viii. 16, are connected with the parable of the sower. There is nothing improbable in the supposition that our Lord used these figures in various relations. Here the figure of the candle is designed to teach that the parables have it for their positive purpose to enlighten, that is, that the disciples should at the right season discover the spiritual meaning of the parables; and the figure of the measure, that the disciples were to measure out instruction liberally in hope.

3. And He began again to teach by the sea-side.—Another emphatic reference to the contrast of this with the customary order of things; and as an expression of His decided breach with the Pharisees.

4. In His doctrine.—In His doctrinal instructions. "Of much else Mark makes some things prominent." Meyer.

5. Fruit that sprang up and increased.—We understand the former of strong and vigorous upward growth; but the latter, the αὐξανόμενον, of the seed-corn's spreading out into a number of stalks, as is the case with prosperous increase. Meyer also understands the καρπός as meaning the stalks in contradistinction to the grains, these not being mentioned till later: "some," etc. But the idea of the fruit is thus artificially weakened. The actual and excellent growth is described; but under the point of view of its fruit, this and the luxuriant stalk being embraced in one. It is better to understand the springing up and increasing of the fruit as meaning the springing up of the ears of grain with the stems.

6. They that were about Him, with the Twelve.—The specific company of Christ's disciples, independent of and with the Twelve. Euthym. Zig.: The Seventy. But these were not distinguished from the rest until later.

7. Unto you is given the mystery.—Significant; and to be explained in accordance with Matthew and Luke. The mystery is given through the knowledge of it.—But unto them that are without, οἱ ἔξω: in later phraseology, all not Christians; with the Talmudists, all who were not Jews; but also the uninstructed and uninitiated Jews. Here, however, it is doubtless a hint of the germ of the opposition between the old and the new community, which in the word ἐκκλησία (Matt. xvi. 18) came somewhat later into full use.

8. They may see.—The ἵνα is not to be softened, as if ita ut, as Rosenmüller and others assert. We must maintain that this hard utterance was based upon Isa. vi. 9 seq., and therefore that it must be interpreted in the meaning of that passage: not as an absolute sentence, but as a deserved, economical, and pedagogical visitation. See on Matthew.

9. Ye know not this parable?—The first parable of the kingdom is the basis of all the rest. If they understood not this, they could not understand any that followed. If they had the explanation of this, they had the key for the understanding of all others. According to De Wette, these are rebuking words; according to Meyer, they are a mere recurrence to the question of ver. 10. But it is certainly, at the same time, an intimation of the connection of all the parables in the idea of the kingdom of heaven; so that with the explanation of this one, all were explained.

10. These are they by the way-side, where the word is sown.—Through the whole parable we must embrace in one view the field with the seed on it. In Luke, the idea of seed predominates; in Mark, the idea of ground sown over; in Matthew, there is a change. In the first two, the view of the ground sown predominates; in the last two, the view of the seed scattered.

11. Which are sown.—Mark the change of tense in Mark: σπειρόμενοι, vers. 16 and 18, and σπαρέντες in ver. 20.

12. They have heard the word, ver. 18.—Hearers pre-eminently. Diligent hearers, but not doers; ἀκούσαντες, B.C.D.L.Δ., Tischendorf. Mark gives the most vivid picture of them.

13. Is a candle brought to be put?—Not an exhortation to virtue, as Theophylact and others thought, but a statement of the end for which He confided to them the mystery of the kingdom in parables. According to Erasmus: "Do not suppose that what I now commit to you in secret, I would have concealed for ever; the light is kindled by Me in you, that by your ministry it may disperse the darkness of the whole world."

14. For there is nothing hidden.—The concealed is in its very nature destined to be revealed in its time. A thing only concealed, would not be concealed; it would as such have no meaning. There is this design in all the concealments of the kingdom of God. Thus the clause forms the complement of the ἵνα above, ver. 12.

15. With what measure ye mete.—De Wette (after Euthym. Zig.): "According to the measure of your ability and diligence (as hearers, see the preceding verse), ye will receive instruction." But it seems more obvious, in the process of the thought, to say, According to the measure of your diligence in teaching will your Master add to your knowledge (docendo discimus, especially in the kingdom of God). For the mere hearing and receiving cannot well be described as a measuring out.

16. For he that hath.—The word has here a more plain reference to zeal in the teaching function. The living treasure of knowledge will always, by its own nature, go on increasing. We may compare the words concerning the spiritual life springing up within, John iv. 14, vii. 38; for living knowledge is never separable from internal spiritual life.

17. Vers. 26–29. Continuation of the parabolic instruction, addressed to the people. Meyer: Observe the Aorist βάλῃ, and then the following Presents: has cast, and then does sleep.

18. When the fruit is brought forth, ver. 29.—But the παραδῷ is not intransitive: When the fruit shall have yielded itself. This relative spontaneousness of the fruit is as if it did not suffer premature cutting before its full ripeness.

19. Vers. 30–32. Or with what comparison.—Meyer: The hearers are formally included in the act of consideration.

20. And with many such parables.—Manifestly Mark knew of other parables of our Lord, which he passes over.

21. As they were able, ver. 33.—This does not refer to their worthiness (Grotius), but to their ability to apprehend (Theophylact, De Wette). It also includes, however, their being able to bear without being offended. Thus it is not a mere literal ἀκούειν in the sense of being able to receive, as Meyer thinks.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.

2. On the ἵνα, ver. 12, see the notes above.

3. The parable of vers. 26–29 teaches, in the figure of the relative independence of nature in the regular development of the seed through an internal energy of growth (αὐτομάτη), the higher relative independence and regular development of the growth of the kingdom of God, or the establishment of Christianity and the Church in the world down to its consummation for the final manifestation of the kingdom of God. (The reapers: the angels, Matt. xiii. 39.) The proper point of comparison is the seed's impulse of growth from within outwardly, as if by an internal energy of its own, whence follow the apparent spontaneousness, regularity, gradualness, progressiveness, security, and perfection of the development. Thus the naturalness of nature, so to speak, the "metamorphosis of plants," becomes a symbol of the development of the divine life from the seed of the divine word or regeneration. The germinant energy of growth is here the actual freedom of the new divine-human (not abstractly human, but also not abstractly divine) energy of life in humanity; whether in the regeneration and sanctification of the believing community, or in that of the individual Christian. Here also the development proceeds from within, from the conscious internal being: independent or free (not from God, but in God), naturally and regularly legitimate, gradual, progressive down to certain and decisive consummation. But it is assumed that human nature in its essence bears the same relation to the word of God, and has as much in common with it, as the ground to the seed-corn. And as this ground only by culture, and tillage, and sowing overcomes its tendency to wildness, and the bringing forth of thorns and thistles, so also the human heart is set free from its wicked bias, and its thorns and thistles, only by the culture of grace and the seed of the word of God. Meyer: The spontaneousness here set forth does not deny the divine energies of grace; but the end of the parable is not to make the latter prominent, but the former. De Wette: The parable teaches patience, as that of the tares forbearance.—The period of the New Testament Church presents the natural development of the kingdom of God, yet not without the Lord's overruling, and not without the constant energy of His Spirit. The miraculous seed has become a new nature, from which at the Lord's appearance new fruits will grow.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels.—Christ teaching in the ship a parable itself of the kingdom of heaven: 1. A figure of the form of that kingdom: a. of the evangelical ministry, b. of the Church, c. of missions. 2. A figure of its condition: a. small beginnings, b. poverty, c. mobility, freedom.—Christ in conflict with the sensuous unbelief of the world.—Christ the deliverer of the people from the bonds of ignorance, of carnal notions, and sensuous narrowness.—The teaching wisdom of Christ, as it speaks in parables, a seal of His divine power (of His love as of His wisdom).—He that hath ears to hear, let him hear!—The parables of Jesus as signs of the divine judgments: 1. Figuring the judicial concealments and symbols of truth in the spiritual life of mankind, a. in the Gentile world, b. in the people of Israel, c. in the Christian, specially the medieval Church; 2. figuring their scope and purpose, a. to spare, b. to instruct, and c. to discipline and educate the soul.—The interpretation of the parable of the sower a key to the interpretation of all the rest.—The three parables of our chapter combined, present a figure of the unfolding of the kingdom of heaven, as to its foundation, progress, and completion.—The parable of vers. 26–29. Nature, in its normal development from within, a representation of human freedom, and its development in the kingdom of grace.—The word of life in the figure of a grain of wheat: 1. Its internal energy of life; 2. its growth according to laws; 3. its gradualness; 4. its progressive stages; 5. the certainty of its development.—The work of grace, its normal unfolding, in the Church and in individuals.—In the kingdom of grace we must learn not to misapprehend even the immature forms of development (not counting the green stalk as common grass, etc.).—The seed of divine grace requires patient waiting for its maturity.—The human heart may become one with the word of God (in consequence of its original relation to it) through faith; and then there is unfolded in it a divine energy of new life.—For him who rightly cares for the seed, the fruit gradually ripens, although he himself may not know it.—Even in unconscious life the divine word goes on maturing. (Narratives of the feeble-minded, in whom it gradually was developed. The working goes on in the sleeper.)—The influences of weather: sunshine and rain in the kingdom of grace, mysterious influence and government of the divine nature.—The seed, with all its certainty of development, under the necessary condition of sunshine and rain. Application of this to the work of divine grace in the soul of the believer.

Starcke, Quesnel: An imperfect church, an unworthy pulpit, and poor hearers, may nevertheless form a true church, accepted of God.—Cramer: Jesus makes the little ship His pulpit; if we do not diligently hear and obey, He removes Himself with His little ship and pulpit.—Canstein: Tilling the land is the oldest work of men's hands, and the most pleasing to God; therefore Christ took His parables so willingly from that occupation.—God's word is a living seed, by which the spiritually dead hearts of men are made living and fruitful.—Hedinger: Unchanging seed, variable hearts.—Osiander: If men did not harden themselves, they would not fall into the danger of reprobation.—Hedinger: We must not look at the mere shell, but at the kernel of Holy Scripture (on ver. 13).—Quesnel: The knowledge of divine mysteries is of God, and not of man.—The wisdom of God has not always remained secret, but at the right season has been made manifest to men, 1 Cor. ii. 7.—All things must come to light, whether after a longer or a shorter time.—Faithful pastors and diligent hearers obtain from day to day a larger measure of light and grace.—A faithful and diligent soul has a great treasure—its riches extend to eternity; but an idle soul becomes every day poorer, until at last it loses all.—O how far should we have advanced in the way of salvation, if we had only always used aright the means of grace!—By the sleeping is signified an expectation of blessing, which leaves all care to God; as one may say, I sleep, but my heart wakes.—Majus: God's servants should not be impatient when they do not at once see the fruits of their labours.—We must do our work sincerely, and commit to God the result; He will make His true servants rejoice in the day of harvest.—God conceals from His ministers some of the fruits of their diligence, to keep them in humility.—Hope in God, who will not neglect His work in thee.—Christians must aim high, and strive after perfection.—Where God's word is rightly sown and received, it is never long without fruits of salvation.—Osiander: We must not expect at once perfect trees of righteousness in the paradise of the Christian Church; time is required for rooting, growing, and bringing forth fruit.

Gerlach: The longer man retains and studies any one divine truth, the more manifest it becomes, and itself brings all others to light.—Braune: The unostentatious development of the divine word and the kingdom of God in the heart of man.—As the husbandman hardly distinguishes seeds, so is it with the results of the seed of the word. Learn patience.—Schleiermacher: (He observes that Christ was not misled by the flocking of multitudes around Himself, but perfectly penetrated His whole auditory—four kinds of soils; but that at the same time He was not angered by this character of His auditory.) If the divine word is received and retained, it is changed into the life of the man; and then in a natural manner his acts are like his words, and become more and more the expression of the divine word.—The fruit is that which is to be detached again from the plant, itself to be again sown, and from which new life is to arise.—The Redeemer says truly, that there is no other power by which the kingdom of God prospers than this power of the seed, this power of the divine word; that is, in relation to the office and work of the human sower.—The preparatory work, the tilling of the land, must be distinguished from the sowing.—Gossner: On ver. 22. Him who made the ear, man will not hear.—If we mete out with the measure of Christ, it shall be meted to us again with the same.

4. Conflict of Jesus with the feeble-minded Unbelief of the Disciples; the Stilling of the Storm; and His Triumph over Human Seafarers in their vocation. (VERS. 35–41.)

Parallels: Matt. viii. 18–23, 27; Luke viii. 22–25.

35 And the same day, when the even was come, He saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side. 36 And when they had sent away the multitude, they took Him even as He was in the ship. And there were also with Him other little ships. 37 And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was now full. 38 And He was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: and they awake Him, and say unto Him, Master, carest Thou not that we perish? 39 And He arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. 40 And He said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? how is it that ye have no faith? 41 And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey Him?

Ver. 37. Lach., Tisch., following B.C.D.L., etc.: ἤδη γεμίζεσθαι τὸ πλοῖον.
Ver. 40. The οὔτω is contested by Lachm., after B.D.L.Δ. Tischendorf defends it by important codd. The insertion, indeed, is more easily explained than the omission. Griesb., Lach., οὔπω, B.D., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels.—Pictorial vividness in the narrative of the voyage: evening, the sudden departure, the convoy of ships, the violence of the storm, the ship all but sinking, the image of Him who slept on the pillow, the reproach of the distressed men that Jesus cared not, the words of rebuke to the wind, the strong reproof of the disciples, their great fear, and its effect.

2. Besides the arrangement according to matter, there is here a definite historical sequence to the preceding section.—And the same day, He saith unto them. Thus it was before the stormy voyage that our Lord uttered the first parables concerning the kingdom of heaven.

3. Even as He was in the ship.—That is, they proceeded at once, before they could make specific preparation for the voyage. The evening voyage over the sea to the south-east coast was extended to several hours, and became a night voyage.

4. Meyer: The disciples' weakness in knowledge and faith (ver. 40) is made more prominent by Mark than by the other Synoptics: comp. ch. vi. 52, vii. 18, viii. 17, 18, 33, ix. 6, 19, 32, 34, x. 24, 32, 35, xiv. 40.

5. The waves beat into the ship.—The ἐπέβαλλεν intransitive, referring to the waves.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.

2. Significance of the crisis of deep excitement: mutual reproaches. The disciples allege against the Lord, groundlessly and irreverently, the reproach of not caring for them; He on His side inflicts the well-grounded reproof of despondency and lack of faith. They uttered their charge prematurely, before they had waited to see the Lord's manner of action; Christ did not utter His reproof (fully, comp. Matthew) until He had brought relief in the danger. This often recurs in the history of the Church's great tribulations, as well as in the private difficulties of the Christian life.

3. The personification of the wind and sea in Christ's address is most emphatic in the rebuking words of Christ, as found in Mark. But at the base of this personification there is a dogmatic element, to wit, that nature has acquired a character of apparently wild independence and anarchy since man became unfaithful to his destiny: Rule over it, and make it subject to you. But in this seeming anarchy, which is under the power of God, and is used by Him as means of discipline and judgment, is reflected that real anarchy, that lack of obedience and faith in the human breast, which is at the same time felt as a lack of self-government and rule over the creature. Therefore we see confronting the unbelief of the disciples Jesus' confidence; His peace is opposed to their excitement, His self-possession to their distraction; His majestic supremacy over the winds and waves is opposed to their subjection to natural terrors. And the effect is, that His own disciples experience towards Him the same awe of reverence and fear which they had experienced before towards the frightful sublimity of nature. But now they are the subjects of a fear which passes over into the utterances of a rising and blessed faith.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels.—The voyage of the disciples of Jesus (according to Mark; see the notes).—A nightpiece in the life of the disciples: 1. the history; 2. its significance.—The victory of the Lord over feeble-minded unbelief: 1. He leads little faith into danger; 2. He lets it wrestle with the peril to the utmost point; 3. He convicts, humbles, and heals it.—The fear of man before the terrors of nature, a sign that he is not consecrated through the terrors of the spirit.—The Lord's supremacy over human vocations (seafaring, fishing, government, learning).—Test of the disciples in the danger of death.—The pride of the little apostolical crew, and its humiliation: a sign.—Jesus' sleeping and awaking: 1. His sleeping, the repose of His divine power, an exercise and test of the human; 2. His awaking, a new glorification of the saving divinity in humanity needing salvation.—Jesus the star of the sea (the anchor, the rudder, the lighthouse, the rescuer of the wrecked).—Danger to life always danger to the soul.—Divine help in our human life should be to us a sign for quickening and salvation.—How all fear of the creature should be changed by the awe of Christ's presence into peace.—To reverence the Son of God, and to obtain kingly power over the creaturely world, are one and the same.—Perfect love casts out fear.—The wide wild world glorified by the Spirit of Christ into a blessed house of God.—Jesus Christ, the commander of wind and sea: 1. in nature; 2. in history; 3. in the fates of the Church.—What follows from His being obeyed by the winds and the waves,—as to Himself, as to the world, as to us?—Christ as the Ruler of nature, and Restorer of its paradisaical peace.

Starcke: The evening may be very different from the early morning.—Faithful servants of God may have some seasons of rest permitted them, lest they sink under their burden.—Going forth with Christ into a sea of tribulation.—If He be with us, we shall not sink and perish.—The little ship of the Church is often so beaten by the storms of tribulation and persecution, that it seems as if it must go down.—Distress teaches man to pray, although faith is never without prayer.—It is the error of men, that they take at once danger to be a mark that God takes no heed of them.—Canstein: A great storm followed by a great calm: so is it ever with God's consolations after trial.—Quesnel: God is so gracious and gentle, that He does not despise a slender faith, or reject an imperfect prayer, or cast out a fearful heart.—How profitable would Christians find it, if they would discourse in their social meetings about the wonders of God and the glory of Jesus Christ!

Gerlach: It is always a blameable unbelief, when we fear to enter the ship with Christ.—Braune: The difference between Jonah's sleeping in the ship and that of Jesus.—He that is in us is greater than he that is in the world.—Schleiermacher: That was their unbelief, He meant, that they thought He could go down at a time when He had not yet given them any commission; that they thought God could take so little care of His work, as that it should go down with them.—There is no one among us who can assure himself that the old man, however entirely he may seem to be buried into the death of Christ, will not rise up with his giant lusts, and involve the soul into storm and tempest.—But if we are members of His body, we should maintain the sure confidence, that in all times of severe test and temptation, the bond of union between Him and us will not be severed.—As certainly as He could not go down with His people on that day, He will not suffer His people to go down in this.—Gössner: When the help of man ceases, God's help begins; or, faith in the sure word.—When there is storm in the soul, and when thou art in great peril, thou knowest what it is for, and whither to fly.—What calmness in the soul, when the Lord arises and utters His voice!

5. Conflict of Jesus with the despairing Unbelief of the Demoniac, and the selfish Unbelief of the Gadarenes; Healing of the Demoniac, and Triumph over Human Devices for Security. (CHAP. v. 1–20.)

Parallels: Matt. viii. 28–34; Luke viii. 26–39.

1 And they came over unto the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gadarenes. 2 And when He was come out of the ship, immediately there met Him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, 3 Who had his dwelling among the tombs; and no man could bind him, no, not with chains: 4 Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces: neither could any man tame him. 5 And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones. 6 But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshipped Him, 7 And cried with a loud voice, and said, What have I to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of the most high God? I adjure Thee by God, that Thou torment me not. 8 (For He said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit.) 9 And He asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion: for we are many. 10 And he besought Him much that He would not send them away out of the country. 11 Now there was there, nigh unto the mountains, a great herd of swine feeding. 12 And all the devils besought Him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. 13 And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine; and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea (they were about two thousand), and were choked in the sea. 14 And they that fed the swine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that was done. 15 And they come to Jesus, and see him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind; and they were afraid. 16 And they that saw it told them how it befell to him that was possessed with the devil, and also concerning the swine. 17 And they began to pray Him to depart out of their coasts. 18 And when He was come into the ship, he that had been possessed with the devil prayed Him that he might be with Him. 19 Howbeit Jesus suffered him not; but saith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee. 20 And he departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men did marvel.

Ver. 1. Many codd. read ἦλθεν. But this is not sufficiently authenticated: "probably from Matt. viii. 28." Lach. and Tisch. read Γερασηνῶν; L.Δ., etc., Γεργεσηνῶν; Cod. A., Rec., Vulgate, Scholz, Meyer, Γαδαρηνῶν. Comp. the parallel in Matt.

Ver. 3. ἁλυσει, Lach., Tisch., after B.C.L. Οὐκέτι οὐδείς, after B.C.D.: strong negation.

Ver. 5. In the tombs and upon the mountains, is the best attested order.

Ver. 9. Instead of ἀπεκρίθη λέγων, the better reading is λέγει αὐτῷ

Ver. 12. Πάντες is wanting in many codd.; so οἱ δαίμονες.

Ver. 13. The ἦσαν δὲ is wanting in B.C.D., etc. So Griesb. and Tisch.
Ver. 18. A.B., etc., ἐμβαίνοντος.
Ver. 19. Καὶ οὐκ, A.B.C.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare on the parallels.—Mark's vividness of realization here again appears in many characteristics: the untameableness of the demon, whom no man could bind, even with chains; his crying in the mountains, and the self-tormenting fury of his cutting himself with stones; his seeing Jesus afar off, running to Him, and crying with a loud voice at the first sight of the Lord; the adjuration of Jesus by God; the vehemence of his anxiety that He should not send him away out of that country (Luke: into the abyss); the number of the wretched swine, two thousand; the contrast of the demoniac who was possessed by the legion, sitting clothed and in his right mind; the observation, that the healed man spread the report of the miracle through all Decapolis; and other similar traits. Luke, in his representation of the event, approximates to Mark. Matthew alone makes mention of two demoniacs, on which we may consult the parallels. As it respects the chronology, Mark goes back in the history, manifestly because his order is that of things and not of time. The voyage to Gadara fell in the first year of Christ's work, and preceded the healing of the paralytic and the controversies touching the Sabbath.

2. Fetters and chains.—This distinction has been explained by referring the former fetters to the hands, which Meyer rejects. Fetters are fetters, to whatever part of the body applied. However, these chains were ordinarily used for the hands.

3. Crying and cutting himself with stones.—Fearful picture of a demoniac terror; having reached the extreme point of madness, down to rending his own flesh.

4. When he saw Jesus afar off.—Vivid description of the wonderful influence of Christ upon the demoniac. Probably some intelligence concerning Jesus had reached his ears; but that he knew Him at once in this His appearance, can be explained only by an intensified spiritual presentiment. It is not probable that he was a heathen.

5. I adjure Thee by God.—The daring misuse of the name of God in the mouth of the demoniac has nothing in it inconsistent, as Strauss and others have thought. The intermixture of praying and adjuring is characteristic of the demoniac, as under the influence of Christ.

6. That Thou torment me not.—Meyer: "The possessed man, identifying himself with his demon, dreads the pains and convulsions of the casting out." But if that had been meant, the possessed man would have distinguished himself from his demon, and not identified himself with him. In that identification he felt the nearness and the supremacy of Jesus itself a torment, and still more banishment into the abyss.

7. For He said (already).—Compare Luke: παρήγγειλε γάρ, etc.—"If we rely on the exactitude of the sequence of the particulars in the narrative of Mark and Luke, we find here the remarkable circumstance, that the demoniac was not at once healed when the Lord spoke the decisive word. Christ had said to him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit! Now by this the demoniac consciousness in this man was shaken to its depths; but as he then felt himself to be possessed of a legion of evil spirits, the demoniac in him was not reached altogether by an address in the singular. Christ saw at once how the healing was to be perfected, and He asked him his name, etc." Leben Jesu i. 296.

8. Legion.—"The word occurs also in the rabbinical writings." Description of a psychical victim of all possible demoniac influences and possessions. At the same time, it gives a frightful picture of the unclean country in which so many impure spirits were congregated. At this crisis, however, it was partly a word of resisting pride, which sought by boasting to resist the influence; partly a word of silent complaint, in as far as the suffering consciousness of the possessed man co-operated. He does not give his own name, because he still identified his consciousness with that of the unclean spirits, and spoke through them. But when in this sense one calls himself Legion, he describes himself as their leader: as it were, as the head of a whole regiment of demons. But the indistinctness and the error of the reply is characteristic of the condition of the man.

9. Not send them away out of the country,—where they found themselves so much at home; especially, as Luke adds, into the hateful abyss of hell. The lawless nature of the country (where Jews lived mingled with Gentiles), which pleased the demons well, Mark denotes by the circumstance of the two thousand swine, emphasizing the greatness of the herd. If their owners were only in part Jews, who merely trafficked in these animals, still they were not justified before the law. Certainly we cannot regard this as exclusively a Gentile territory.

10. And in the country.—In the villages and peasants' huts, where the swine-feeders partly lived. The whole scene derives from this circumstance a colouring in harmony with the country and the then state of things.

11. Him that was possessed, sitting.—Beautiful and moving contrast.

12. They began to pray Him to depart.—Gradually, after they had received intelligence of their loss, they took heart to desire Christ's departure, in the conflict of fear and anger, fawning and obstinacy.

13. That he might be with Him.—According to Euthym. Zig., and others, fear of the demons conspired with other feelings in this request. Meyer thinks this could not have been the case, as the engulphing of the animals had already taken place; as if the man believed that, with the swine, the devils also had perished. But, doubtless, his present fearlessness stood on a surer foundation.

14. Jesus suffered him not.—Wherefore? The healed man had friends at home. Probably he was now in danger of despising his own people. But Jesus appointed him to be a living memorial of His own saving manifestation for that entire dark district.

15. In Decapolis.—See on Matthew. "That Jesus did not forbid, but command the promulgation of the matter, is explained by the locality (Peræa), where He was less known, and where there was not the same danger as in Galilee from uproar concerning His person." Meyer. We must also observe that Christ gave him notice of the things that he was to say. He was to announce to his friends how great things the Lord (the covenant God of Israel, the God of revelation) had done for him. This commission was enlarged by the man in two ways: he preached not only to his friends, but to the whole of Decapolis; and not only what the Lord had done to him (Perfect), but also what Jesus (as the revelation of the Lord) had done to him, in that He had had mercy upon him (Aorist: ἠλέησεν).

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels, and also the heading.—Christ the victor over despairing, as also over selfish, unbelief; and His elevation above human policy for safety, and care of the sick.

2. Demoniac faith, or the faith of fear (Jas. ii. 19), in all its characteristics: 1. Exalted presentiment without the true spirit. 2. Contradiction and internal distraction: running, deprecating, confessing, denying, praying, adjuring. 3. Slavery: deliverance described as torment, and abandonment to a state of torment as deliverance. 4. Impure and hurtful to the last breath (entering the swine and injuring the people).

3. Christ can change the demoniac faith of fear into a blessed and spiritual faith.

4. The entrance of Christ into the land of the Gadarenes a type of His victorious entrance into the kingdom of the dead: 1 Pet. iii. 20, iv. 6.

5. To a stupid and carnal people, under the power of demons without being fully aware of it, Christ discloses the terrors of the world of spirits, to give them a warning and arousing sign.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew and Luke.—The majestic entrance of our Lord upon the district of Gadara: 1. The terror of the evil spirits in the land; 2. the deliverer of those who were bound by Satan; 3. the avenger of the law without legal judgment; 4. a living condemnation of the earthly-minded in His going as in His coming; 5. the rejected one, who, after His rejection, leaves behind Him the preaching of the Gospel.—Christ annihilates, by the divine, awe-inspiring presence of His person, the horrors of darkness, even as the gentle light of day disperses the blackness of night.—Christ's stepping over the threshold, and its importance: 1. Over the border of a land, 2. over the threshold of a house, 3. and entrance into the heart.—The land of the Gadarenes a figure, 1. of sunk and darkened Judaism (lawlessness), 2. of degraded Christendom (estranged from the law of the Spirit, externalized), 3. degenerate Protestantism (indifferentism).—Image of a corrupt state of things in Church or State: 1. Perverted morals—swine cared for, men abandoned; 2. perverse policy—trade unlawful, the ways given up to madmen; 3. perverted legislation—demons tolerated legionfold, Christ rejected; 4. perverted religiousness—driving away Christ by prayers.—The true demons in the land mock at fetters and chains, but Christ rules them with a word.—The demons enter gladly into the swine; the devilish nature into the animal nature (the old serpent; half serpent, half swine).—Spiritual rebellion against God passes into the unbridled, animal nature.—To a besotted people the Lord preaches by grievous and terrific signs.—The towns and peasant villages of the Gadarenes; or, the hindrances which the kingdom of God meets with in the land.—Christ passes a milder judgment upon the common ignorance of spiritual sloth, than upon the false knowledge of the hardened; He leaves a preacher of salvation for the Gadarenes in the person of the healed demoniac.—The compassion of Christ in His final glance upon the land of Gadara.—Christ uttered no word concerning His rejection His only answer was the appointment of this preacher.—The greatest demoniac of the New Testament narrative becomes a preacher of salvation to ten cities.—In the dark land of Gadara Christ leaves for a while a representative of Himself, since they cannot bear His personal presence.—All things in the kingdom of Christ have their time: He sometimes silences, and He sometimes stimulates the witnesses of His miracles.—The rejections of Christ in their several and yet single character: 1. From Nazareth (through envy); 2. from Gadara (through selfishness and base fear); 3. from Samaria (through fanaticism); 4. from Galilee (through fanaticism and policy); 5. from Jerusalem (through obduracy).

Starcke, Majus: Christ, the true light, shines in all places, and sends forth His beams even into the Gentile country.—Unrestrained rebellion.—Quesnel: Hell is a tomb out of which the spirit of impurity proceeds, until God's judgment binds him in it for ever.—Cramer: As the devil raged mightily at the time of Christ's first coming, so also will he at the time of Christ's second coming, knowing that his time is short, Rev. xii. 12.—Hedinger: The delight of worldlings and slaves of sin, corruption and the grave.—How tyrannically the devil deals with his slaves.—Canstein: The devil has special delight in tombs.—The devil's love for mischief.—Bibl. Würt.: The ungodly do not love to consort with the godly.—It is a fiendish spirit to take it as torment when men receive benefits from Christ and His people.—O how many are in a spiritual sense possessed by a devil! so many ruling sins, so many unclean spirits.—That He desired to abide in that country, was, doubtless, because there were many Jews there who had fallen from their Judaism. (For, as Josephus tells us, this district was full ἑλληνιζόντων.) Eph. vi. 12; 1 Pet. v. 8.—The devil is in truth a poor spirit; he has nothing of his own, and is driven hither and thither by the glorious power of God.—Majus: The children of God should have no fear of the devil, or of wizards, or of any other creatures of Satan.—If God be for us, who can be against us? Rom. viii. 31.—It is better that earthly creatures should perish, than that a child of God should be kept from salvation.—God's goodness may be discerned not only in manifest kindnesses, but also in misfortunes.

—In rude and earthly hearts God's wonders excite only fear and flight.—Quesnel: He who loves this world's goods will not have Christ long in his heart.—The converted soul longs to be with Jesus.—Canstein: God uses every one as His wisdom sees will best subserve the interests of His kingdom.—Quesnel: The grace of conversion is a talent which must be put out to interest, partly in spreading abroad God's grace and mercy, partly in edifying others in salvation.—Osiander: God sends preachers for a season even to the unthankful.—Wonder the first step to faith in Jesus.

Gerlach: The manifold misuse of the name of God among wicked men, shows the falseness of the early notion that the devil could not utter it. (Yet this notion contains, in a mythical form, a secret truth, which appears in the declaration that no man can call Jesus Lord but by the Holy Ghost.)—Braune: We see the same thing now in a certain sense: many there are who reject Christ or repel Him, in the secret consciousness or fear that if they obtain His help they will have to suffer much interruption of their ordinary habits of life, have to submit to many things unpalatable, and endure many severe sacrifices.—When the Christian spirit revives, there are many who would have it shut up in the minds of others, or who would bind it in a dead letter, because they are concerned to save their unrighteous possessions, or their abused rights, or their licentious wickedness, or their cowardly idleness; not remembering the destruction which came upon those towns forty years after the rejection of Christ, and which always surely comes upon the same sin, and often in a much shorter time.—We must frankly and freely acknowledge the salvation of God and His grace in Christ.—Schleiermacher: For all the perverse anxiety of men, who set not before them that goal of union with God which Jesus presents to us,—who indeed live under rule, but not that of the kingdom of God,—there is much of the same recoil from Christ as that of the demoniac; they are not in the way to reach the right end, any more than the miserable man in our Gospel. That which holds us firm to Him and His great design, is the immediate influence of the nearness of Christ the Redeemer, which holds fast our minds in a firm and established order, makes our steps sure in this changeable world, and surely guides our steps to that ultimate goal, to guide men to which He came into the world.

Gossner: He (the devil) marked that he was going to be hunted out, and therefore he cried. So is it with all hypocrites.—They saw Jesus, they saw the man, they saw the miracle on the man; but their swine they saw no longer, and that was their grief.—Bauer: When the Lord comes to demand a sacrifice from them, how many are there in our own day who rather, that being the case, would send Him away altogether!

6. Conflict of Jesus with desponding Unbelief on the Sick-bed and Bed of Death; Healing of the Woman with the Issue of Blood; Restoration of Jairus' Daughter; and Triumph of Jesus over the Healing Art, and the World's Lamentations for the Dead. (VERS. 21–43.)

Parallels: Matt. ix. 1, 18–26; Luke viii. 40–56.

21 And when Jesus was passed over again by ship unto the other side, much people gathered unto Him; and He was nigh unto the sea. 22 And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name; and when he saw Him, he fell at His feet, 23 And besought Him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray Thee, come and lay Thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live. 24 And Jesus went with him; and much people followed Him, and thronged Him. 25 And a certain woman, which had an issue of blood twelve years, 26 And had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, 27 When she had heard of Jesus, came in the press behind, and touched His garment: 28 For she said, If I may touch but His clothes, I shall be whole. 29 And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up; and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague. 30 And Jesus, immediately knowing in Himself that virtue had gone out of Him, turned Him about in the press, and said, Who touched My clothes? 31 And His disciples said unto Him, Thou seest the multitude thronging Thee, and sayest Thou, Who touched Me? 32 And He looked round about to see her that had done this thing. 33 But the woman, fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her, came and fell down before Him, and told Him all the truth. 34 And He said unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague. 35 While He yet spake, there came from the ruler of the synagogue's house certain which said, Thy daughter is dead; why troublest thou the Master any further? 36 As soon as Jesus heard the word that was spoken, He saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe. 37 And He suffered no man to follow Him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James. 38 And He cometh to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly. 39 And when He was come in, He saith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth. 40 And they laughed Him to scorn. But when He had put them all out, He taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with Him, and entereth in where the damsel was lying. 41 And He took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Talitha cumi; which is, being interpreted, Damsel, (I say unto thee,) arise. 42 And straightway the damsel arose, and walked; for she was of the age of twelve years. And they were astonished with a great astonishment. 43 And He charged them straitly that no man should know it; and commanded that something should be given her to eat.

Ver. 22. The ἰδού not in B.D.L., etc.
Ver. 23. The Present παρακαλεῖ, Tisch., after A.C.L.
Ver. 25. Τίς wanting in A.B.C.
Ver. 36. Παρακούσας, Tisch., after B.L.Δ.
Ver. 38. The Plural ἔρχονται has most support.
Ver. 40. The ἀνακείμενον is set aside by Tisch., after B.D.L.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels.—Mark connects the return from Gadara with the narrative of the first raising of the dead, in accordance with his own principle of arrangement. According to the more exact account of Matthew, we must place in the interval the healing of the paralytic, the calling of Matthew, and the offence taken by the Pharisees and John's disciples at Jesus' eating in the house of the publican. In his presentation of the events that now follow, we once more observe the exact delineation of Mark. Concerning his little daughter (θυγάτριον), the father here says ἐσχάτως ἔχει, and in an appeal which announces itself at once by an ὅτι. In the account of the woman with an issue, Mark makes it very prominent that she had suffered much from many physicians, which Luke, the physician, much more gently intimates. And the woman's healing is emphatically expressed: The fountain of her blood was dried up; she felt in her body (in her feeling of bodily vigour) that she was delivered from her plague (scourge). He does not (like Luke) expressly mention Peter as the one who replied to the Lord's question as to who touched Him, "Thou seest the multitude, etc.;" but he records once more that Jesus turned and looked round this time to find out who had done this. We see how the woman comes forward trembling with fear, falls down before the Lord, and confesses all. We see Jesus separating Himself, with Jairus and the three elect disciples, from the multitude, in order to go into the house of death. The tumult of the lamentation for the dead is here vividly depicted. He defines accurately the group of those who enter; we hear the original Talitha cumi; we see the damsel at once, after her restoration, arising and walking, as she was able, being twelve years old; and hear how rigorously Jesus charged the people not to make much rumour about the miracle (which in itself could not be concealed); and finally, how He commanded that they should give the maiden food. Here and there Luke, and here and there Matthew, approximate to Mark's description.

2. He was nigh unto the sea.—Meyer: "Here there is a discrepance with Matthew's account, in which Jairus entered the house of Jesus in Capernaum." But it was neither in Jesus' house, nor in that of the publican Matthew; for the transaction with the Pharisees and the disciples of John doubtless took place after the meal in an open scene. Hence there is no difference in the narratives.

3. For my little daughter.—(Tender expression of the troubled father.)

4. That Thou mayest come.—The ὅτι and the ἵνα give vivid reality to his urgent words; they are to be referred to the kneeling and cry for help (παρακαλεῖ). Hence there is nothing to be supplied in the text.

5. Had suffered many things from many physicians.—"How various were the prescriptions of Jewish physicians for women in that case, and what experiments they were in the habit of making, see in Lightfoot, p. 614." Meyer. Compare also the article Krankheiten in Winer. "She probably suffered from a chronic hæmorrhage in the womb, and its long continuance endangered life." See also the article Reinigkeit. "Such a woman was, according to Lev. xv. 25, through the whole time unclean, and was required, after the evil had passed, to bring on the eighth day an offering for purification." On the strong Oriental abhorrence of such persons, see the same article.

6. For she said—thinking in audible words.—Touch but His clothes. That the more precise "hem of His garment," occurring in Matthew and Luke, is wanting in Mark, gives no warrant for conjectural emendation.

7. The fountain of her blood.—Not euphemistic description of the womb, but vivid description of the cause of the evil; the blood being represented as flowing from a fountain.

8. She felt in her body.—Euth. Zig.: As her body was no longer, etc. But here there is something greater signified: she experienced the healthy feeling of new life.

9. Virtue had gone out of Him.—Meyer maintains that Jesus perceived the flowing of His virtue after it took place; a simultaneous knowledge of it being thought at variance with the words. But, on the contrary, it must be observed that the simultaneousness of the knowledge is declared in the ἐπιγνούς; first by the ἐπι, and then by the Aorist. The opposite explanation might be made to favour a magical interpretation of the event, and Strauss' criticism upon it. Yet Meyer himself refers with an emphatic note of exclamation to Calovius: "Calovius quoted the passage against the Calvinists: vim divinam carni Christi derogantes."

10. Them that wept.—A scene of Jewish ceremonial lamentation over the dead, in which Mark omits the minstrels (see Matthew), and lays less stress than Luke upon the weeping and bewailing, but only to give more prominence to the tumult and mechanical liturgical cries (by ἀλαλάζειν). On the Jewish lament for the dead, see Grotius on Matthew, and Winer's article Trauer.

11. Talitha cumi, טְלִיתָא קוּמִי.—Similar original Aramaic words occur in Mark, ch. iii. 17, vii. 11, 34, xiv. 36.

12. She was of the age of twelve years.—Reason for the statement that she arose and walked at once. Bengel: Rediit ad statum ætati congruentem.

13. That no man should know it.—That is, should know the occurrence in its precise characteristics, as a restoration of the dead. On the motive of this prohibition, see Meyer.

14. That something should be given her to eat.—Theophylact: That the raising might not be regarded as only an appearance. Meyer: In order to show that the child was not merely delivered from death, but from sickness also. Chiefly, however, because she was in need of strengthening by food.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.—The touching of Christ's garment, and the conscious issuing of a divine virtue from Him as the result, are a testimony to the living unity and reciprocal influence of the divine and human natures in His personal consciousness; in which the human nature was not (as the old dogmatic taught) merely in a passive relation.

2. Two miracles of healing were wrought on diseased women. Otherwise, they are mainly male sufferers who are adduced as examples of His healing acts. Not that other instances were wanting; for the very first healing recorded by the Evangelists took place on a woman, Peter's wife's mother. Luke mentions some women who were dispossessed of devils, ch. viii. 2. But the deliverance of Mary Magdalene from seven devils we regard, after the analogy of Matt. xii. 45, as a symbolical expression of an essentially great conversion.—The woman with an issue of blood, the dead maiden: progression in the manifestation of suffering in the female sex. That the former had been afflicted twelve years, and the latter was twelve years old, was a coincidence from which rash criticism has vainly sought to extract ground of suspicion.

3. We term this narrative a history of victory over despairing unbelief. This appears in the comfortless wail of the Jewish lament over the dead; in the circumstance that the people around the dead maiden laughed at the Lord, when He declared that she was not dead, but slept; but especially in the message which they sent to the ruler of the synagogue, Why troublest thou the Master any further? wherein there is an evident tone of bitter and almost ironical unbelief. The faith of Jairus itself appears, at first, as only a fruit of distress. Hence it was subjected to a severe test, that period of deep anxiety during Christ's delay while He cured the woman with the issue of blood. The weak germ of Jairus' faith was encompassed by desponding unbelief. Even the faith of the sick woman struggles with the despondency into which a long series of disappointed acts of trust in physicians had thrown her. She does not venture to bring her distress publicly before the Lord's notice; the rather as, being ceremonially unclean, she had in a forbidden manner mingled with the crowd, and as her malady was of such a kind as shame would not allow her to speak of. Hence her faith must be brought to maturity by a public confession, even as that of Jairus by a season of delay.

4. As Christ's work of salvation assumed a specific form in many acts of benediction in favour of the male sex, so also Christianity has wrought immeasurable specific benefits for the female. Here we see, first, a wretched sick woman, lost in the crowd; and Christ delivers her not only from her sickness, but also from the morbid dread and fear of her feminine consciousness. Even shame required redemption and sanctification by the Spirit of truth. And so the female sex has been redeemed from the reproach of inferiority, impurity, the rude contempt of man's prejudice, and the ban of self-depreciation.

5. Reischl: "The woman was afraid; partly ashamed on account of the nature of her malady, partly disturbed by the consciousness of impropriety, as having, while Levitically unclean, mingled with the people, and even touched the great Teacher Himself." In the last point she forms a contrast to the leper, whom the Lord Himself touched. Under the veil of diffidence, however, there was a touch of womanly boldness, which was excused by the faith that the touching of Christ would heal her.

6. "Daughter, be of good courage, thy faith hath saved thee: go in peace. Thus He blessed her in the same manner as He had blessed that palsied man. And in fact we must connect together these two petitioners for help, in order that we may see two characteristic forms of faith in the male and in the female contrasted. Both applicants pressed through with confidence, and seized their deliverance almost by force: the man did it in man's fashion, entering through the roof like a robber; the woman in woman's fashion, as it were, like a female thief. But both were recognised by the Lord, as showing the pure spirit of confidence." (Leben Jesu ii. 682.) But the faith of this woman had a superadded conflict to maintain with her timorous natural feeling confronting the fearful power of prejudice.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels.—The miracles of Christ a wonderful connected chain.—New life added to new life in the way of Christ, until the great word is fulfilled, Behold, I make all things new!—Christ at once ready to help the man who comes from the powerful party of His opponents.—The ruler of the synagogue at the feet of Jesus; or, the victory of the Gospel over party spirit.—The triumph of Christ over the whole domain of sickness and death, a sign also of His supremacy over all natural means of help and human skill in healing.—Christ the Physician of physicians (as the Preacher of preachers, the Teacher of teachers, the Judge of judges, the Prince of kings).—Christ's divine power the sign of salvation to all the despondency, little faith, and unbelief of man.—Christ in our history the conqueror of all hindrances to His own work and man's faith.—The woman with the issue, and the dead maiden; or, Christ the Helper in all suffering, whether secret or public.—Christ the Prince of salvation in the domain of secret sorrows and silent sighs. —Hearing and answering all the sighings of faith.—The test to which the faith of the ruler and of the woman was subjected: 1. The element common to both: they were wanting in the full surrender of trust. Both must be set free from fear and despondency. 2. The difference: the spiritual ruler must retire, wait, submit, despair of all signs for hope, and then in his despair learn to believe. He scarcely believed in the invigorator of the sick, and now He must believe in the awakener of the dead. He must, at the same time, in humility yield precedence to a poor unclean woman, and in the case of a seeming religious impropriety.—The woman must come forward and confess.—Even amidst the pressure of thousands the Lord perceives the silent and gentle touch of a single believer. —Internal union with Jesus high above the external.—The hastening and the delaying of Jesus sublime above the haste and delay of the world.—Christ purposed here to effect, not the healing of the sick, but the raising of the dead.—Twice (in the history of Lazarus too) He first yielded the point to death, that He might approve Himself afterwards his conqueror.—With the Lord the spiritual is everything, and the edification of the inner life the great concern. —The gradually progressive manifestation of Christ's power in raising the dead, a sign and symbol of the great and universal resurrection.

Starcke, Quesnel: God has His own times and seasons; He delays and yet helps. Have patience, and walk in the way He marks. —Hedinger: Daring wins.—Quesnel: Men are slow to do for the healing of the soul what they are ready enough to do for the cure of the body.—Cramer: Medicines are not to be despised, Ecclus. xxxviii. 1; but God does not always see fit to prosper them.—To use them is not displeasing to God, but ungodly trusting in them is. —The humility of the woman.—Canstein: Shame and fear would keep us back from Christ, but faith presses near to Him with a sound and laudable shamelessness.—Osiander: In our sickness we should put our trust, not in medicine, but in God.—Faith is stronger than all earthly medicaments.—The Lord is not ignorant what benefits we have received from Him, and He will demand an account of all the good deeds He has done to us.—Bibl. Würt.: Tempted souls think that God takes no care of them, but He faithfully remembers their case; the deeper they are in misery, the more graciously does His compassionate eye rest upon them.—Canstein: To acknowledge our own weakness and God's power, is to speak the truth indeed.—What God has done for us in secret we should publicly speak of to His glory.—Go in peace.—Hedinger: Reason despairs at sight of death.—In perfect faith there is no fear.— Quesnel: Let us learn from Christ to confide only to a few elect ones the works of God which we have to do, that those works may not be thwarted.—To sorrow in secret over our dead is Christian, but to howl and cry is heathenish.—Hedinger: God's wonderful works must have devout and attentive witnesses: away with tumult! —Nova Bibl. Tub.: Why do ye mourn, ye parents, over the departure of your children? Jesus will one day lay His mighty hand upon them, raise them, and give them back to you.

Lisco: The question of our Lord was designed to free the woman from her false fear of man.—The delay of help, and the message, were severe tests of Jairus' faith; but the healing of the woman strengthened his faith again, as did the word of Jesus, ver. 36.—Braune: The urgency and continuance of her malady, the vanity of all human help, the lack of substance, were three steps which brought the sick woman to faith; and the feeblest cries of the believing heart were understood by her Lord.—The Jews received this custom of lamentation from the Romans [Qy.: see Jer. ix. 17]. This purchased grief was intended to make the occasion of death important, to distribute the impressions of sorrow over many, and lighten the grief of the friends. Thus it was mere heathenish vanity.—Schleiermacher: The more mighty love is in those who can help others, and, on the other hand, the more longing and trust there is in those who need help, the more good will be the result in the particular case, though we may not be able to show how, and the beginnings of cause and effect may be concealed from us.—It is always the case that from those whom God has called to do good, many influences proceed which they themselves do not in the special cases know of. But how much more efficacious would charity be, if those from whom the influences proceed did not think so much about those which they receive!—How important it is for the general order of the community that we should not neglect our own individual personal relations!—Christendom has now still to press through the world violently with its blessings.—Although the power of Christ is continually entering more and more into the order of nature, yet that which Christianity has wrought in the world from its beginning is the greatest miracle that we know; but we must be careful to distinguish from it the internal miracle, which only those see who live in internal fellowship with the Redeemer.—Bauer: Mark how He does not break the bruised reed, or quench the smoking flax!

7. The Lord's Conflict with the envious Unbelief of His own City; His triumph over Human Prejudice; His Return to the Mountain Villages. (CHAP. vi. 1–6.)

Parallels: Matt. xiii. 54–58; Luke iv. 14–30.

1 And He went out from thence, and came into His own country; and His disciples follow Him. 2 And when the Sabbath-day was come, He began to teach in the synagogue: and many hearing Him were astonished, saying, From whence hath this man these things? and what wisdom is this which is given unto Him, that even such mighty works are wrought by His hands? 3 Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon? and are not His sisters here with us? And they were offended at Him. 4 But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour, but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house. 5 And He could there do no mighty work, save that He laid His hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. 6 And He marvelled because of their unbelief. And He went round about the villages, teaching.

Ver. 1. Tisch., ἔρχεται. B.C.L.Δ.
Ver. 2. Codd. C*.D.K., ἵνα γίνωνται. See other readings in Tisch.
Ver. 3. The carpenter, after A.B.D., etc. The reading Ἰωσήφ occurs in lesser codd.

CRITICAL NOTES.

See the parallels on Matthew and Luke.—As to Nazareth, consult Robinson iii. 419; Winer, Reallex.; my Leben Jesu ii. 550. Our narrative is not only identical with Matt. xiii. 54 seq., but also in its leading features with Luke iv. 16, as is manifest from the recurrence of the question, "Is not this Joseph's son?" and the saying, "A prophet, etc." Notwithstanding, the points of time are so diverse, and have such an interval between them, that we must, following Matthew and Mark, assume a second and later appearance in Nazareth; one, however, which was only transitional and brief, inasmuch as the unbelief of the people of Nazareth remained the same. The specific features of the narrative seem to belong mainly to the former of the two occasions. But how can a second visit of our Lord to Nazareth be conceivable, after He had been once rejected there? The first rejection had been no better than a tumult. This time He visits His own city in quietness, and for His own repose, after the decree to kill Him had gone forth from the Galilean Pharisees. But, experiencing the same utter lack of sympathy and regard on the part of His former fellow-citizens, He retreated back into the surrounding mountain villages. It was the time (in the first year of His ministry) when He had accomplished the itineration of the mountains in the first Galilean journey, as also the second Galilean voyage over the sea to the farther bank; and when He was on the point of travelling over the towns of the valley of Southern Galilee, in the direction of Jerusalem. As He would confirm and corroborate this third and last Galilean preaching journey by sending out the Twelve, a retreat into the mountains, and especially to a particular mountain, was fixed upon to precede. And He most probably took this occasion of visiting the district of Nazareth.

2. And He went out from thence.—Not merely, that is, "from the house of Jairus." From this time forward, He ceased to have His abiding residence in Capernaum, although He still assembled His disciples around Him there on passing occasions. After the first conflict in Nazareth, He went down to Capernaum; He now designedly abandons again His permanent abode in Capernaum, without formally giving up His residence there.

3. He began to teach.—This does not mean His first entrance and its result; it rather refers to the interruption that soon followed.

4. That even such mighty works are wrought by His hands.—The ἵνα is characteristic. They regard the doctrine of Christ merely as a secret doctrine, which was intended to be the medium or instrument for the ultimate end of working miracles. And they enviously assume that this mysterious doctrine must have been entrusted to him by some one in a suspicious manner. Hence the emphasis laid upon the hands (laying on of hands, touching, etc.), as the method of performing the miracle. The working hands of the carpenter, they would say; as appears from what comes next.

5. Is not this the carpenter?—According to the custom of the Jewish people, even the Rabbis learned some handicraft. We have the example of the Apostle Paul: see Lightfoot, Schöttgen. But Justin Martyr (contr. Tryph.) has the tradition, that Jesus made ploughs and the like. "Whether with an ideal allusion, so that they became in His hands symbols, as Lange (Leben Jesu ii. p. 154) thinks, may very properly be left to fancy." Meyer. That Jesus regarded with a symbolizing mind and interpretation the toil of the fisherman, the fall of the sparrow from the housetop, the play of the children in the market-place—all this is not matter of mere fancy. But there is a kind of fancy, which men call inductive proof. It is represented, further, as a mere airy and baseless notion, to suppose that the brethren of Jesus would hardly have suffered Him to work much, because they saw in Him the glory of Israel. And yet it is not an airy and baseless notion, that His brethren early sought to deliver Him from the machinations of His enemies. What really deserves to be called fancy in the theological domain, is that aggregation of myth and anecdote which the scholastic learning of the present day so much abounds in.

No dogmatic importance can be attached (with Baur and others) to the omission of "the carpenter's son," which Matthew has; since the expression, "the carpenter," is only a stronger declaration of the same thing. But the former expression would not occur to the people of Nazareth, since they spoke from recent observation or past remembrances. In this way, the position of Jesus was referred back to, or identified with, Joseph's. And it is obvious to suppose that Joseph had long (between the twelfth year and the thirtieth of the Lord's life) gone off the scene. As τέκτων has primarily a general meaning, and signifies any artisan, some, following Justin, have thought it signified here a maker of carriages, etc.; while others have interpreted it into "smith." But smith in the New Testament is ὁ χαλκεύς, and τέκτων is specifically a faber lignarius. Whether workmanship in wood was distributed into various kinds of handiwork, is a question not settled.

6. The brother of James.—As to the brethren of the Lord, compare on Matthew. The apocryphal tradition adds to the four brethren, two sisters of our Lord: Esther and Tamar or Martha. Romanist expositors have, without reason, or for reasons well known, made these the sisters of His mother. These sisters seem to have been married in Nazareth; and therefore did not accompany the migration of Mary's family to Capernaum.

7. Among His own kin.—Naturally, the immediate dependants and followers of Jesus stood related in manifold ways to the people of Nazareth. Christ does not say that His own house remained unbelieving, in the common sense of the term. But that there were restrictions of faith to be overcome even in this circle, springing from too great familiarity, is proved not only by the history of the Lord's brethren, but also by that of His mother.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew.—This narrative exhibits to us the narrow, petty, bigoted, envious unbelief, which was unable to apprehend and understand the Divinely great in its human nearness and familiarity; and this makes the section a most striking example of unbelief, as it confronts and embarrasses the Lord. It is the unconscious self-condemnation and self-contempt of the spirit which, alienated from God, and sunk into the lowest level, cannot appreciate the prophet that has arisen in its own city. In our Lord's experience of this kind of unbelief,—to which a prophet is nowhere less esteemed than in his own country, and among his own kin,—we have forewritten for us a long chapter of the history of the world and of the Church. The history of Monophysitism, on the one hand, and of Nestorianism and Rationalism, on the other, may be referred to this principle. The prejudice of the base nature, that out of Nazareth, in the immediate neighbourhood, from our own home, and finally out of humanity itself, nothing good can come, led to all those systems in succession which, on the one hand, dehumanize the God-man, and, on the other, undeify Him. But when we say that Christ celebrated His triumph over this unbelief of envious prejudice, of human self-depreciation, we do not thereby assert that He removed that unbelief in anything like a magical manner. He triumphed over it rather by leaving it alone, by going on His way, and by performing His miracles in the neighbourhood around. He drew round the pestilent prejudice a circle of divine manifestations, like a besieger. The honour paid to the Divine, which from all sides works back upon this centre of prejudice, which leads back the homeborn, with acclamation and celebrity on all hands, to his home again—that is His final triumph over Nazareth, over Judaism, over humanity.

2. And He could there.—This does not express inability in itself; but, as Theophylact rightly observed, it indicates the absence of the ethical conditions on which the miracles of Jesus depended. His miraculous power was not magical; but an ethical influence which required and presupposed faith. It is true that Christ also creates faith; but then that presupposes the felt need of faith. It is true that He excites that feeling also; but then that presupposes susceptibility, and the capacity of reception. And if this likewise is awakened by Him, it further presupposes sincerity, and a certain devotion which could not become hardened through evil motives into the always evil act of the heart of unbelief. The Evangelist further shows us that Jesus wrought miracles, even in this circle, according to the slender measure of faith there was; for he adds the observation, that He laid His hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. Thus, he distinguishes from these lower miraculous works, the great manifestations of His wonder-working power; this last could have and should have no demonstration under such circumstances. The condition on which the miraculous power of Christ was suspended, was the reflection and copy of the conditions of the divine omnipotence in love, wisdom, and righteousness, as dealing with the freedom of the world of spirits.

3. And He marvelled.—Fritzsche: "ἐθαύμαζον (they wondered at Him, on account of their unbelief), following only two minuscula: manifest error of copyist." Meyer: Stress has with great propriety been laid upon the contrast between the wondering of our Lord at the faith of the Gentile centurion, and His wondering at the unbelief of His own countrymen, who had so long been witnesses of His divine life. Jesus does not marvel at other human things generally; but He does marvel, on the one hand, at faith, when it overcomes in its grandeur all human traditional hindrances, and, on the other, at unbelief, when it can, in the face of multitudes of divine manifestations, and under the daily view of the opened heavens, harden itself into the pitiful acceptance of dead traditional prejudices. The former wondering might, humanly speaking, elevate and strengthen Himself; the latter, on the other hand, grieve and restrain His divine Spirit. He hastens away from the sphere of such spiritual evils, that He may in the distance unloose those spiritual breezes that shall dissipate them all. The Accusative (διὰ τὴν), "on account of their unbelief," makes His astonishment all the more emphatic. It was hard for Him to reconcile Himself to this seemingly unconquerable dulness and limitation.

4. The history of Nazareth has been repeated on a large scale in the history of Israel. Israel, as a whole, also made the nearness of Jesus, His external "not being afar off," an occasion of unbelief and fall. This temptation, resulting from the constant beholding the Holy One with common eyes, was pointed to in Deut. xxx. 14, according to Paul's interpretation of it in Rom. x. 8. It is the temptation which besets the dependants and fellow-citizens of chosen spirits —theologians in the daily study and service of the truths of revelation, ministers in their commerce with the ordinances of grace, and all the lesser officers of the house of God in their habitual contact with the externals of divine things. It is the temptation also of ancient towns and churches, which have enjoyed exalted privileges, and indeed of the whole Church itself. "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke.—Jesus was renounced by His own city, both at the beginning and at the end of His Galilean labours: or, the stiffneckedness of prejudice, which is bound to the lower and earthly sense by a thousand bonds (envy, cowardice, softness, self-delusion, dissipation, slavish sympathies and antipathies, etc.).—How far was Jesus actually of Nazareth, how far not?—No man is altogether of the place where he was born or brought up: 1. He is so in his derivation, but not in his individuality; 2. he is so in his outward lot, but not in his personal endowments; 3. he is so in his external training, but not in his internal education; 4. he is so in his human relationship and acquaintance, but not in his highest relations; 5. he is so in the petty events of life, but not in his greater fates; 6. he is so in his immediate calling, not in his highest vocation and destiny.—Christ an alien, and yet at home in His own city; both in an infinite measure: every man the same in his own degree.—The error of the men of Nazareth concerning the coming of Christ: 1. They forgot that He was of Bethlehem; 2. they did not know that He was from heaven.—The double origin and the double home of Christ: 1. An original contrast in Him; 2. an imitative contrast in every man's life below.—How Christ victoriously contends with the unbelief of prejudice among His own countrymen: 1. Prejudice everywhere opposes Him; and that, a. in an impure and gross apprehension of His dignity, as of a magical secret doctrine and art; b. in the reckoning up of all His earthly relationships, in order to urge them to the disparagement of His heavenly dignity; c. in a slavish community of envious and low judgment upon His life. 2. How the Lord lays hold of and overcomes this prejudice: a. He refers it all to a universal fact, which they might afterwards reflect upon (a prophet is not without honour, etc.); b. He does not forget, but heals, the few who needed and were susceptible of help among His scorners; c. He gathers up His influences, and withdraws; d. and He causes the light of His presence to shine brightly throughout the whole district around.—How the Lord surrounds the places which exhibit a corrupted prejudice against Him with the fiery circles of His divine deeds, in order to subdue them.—The Lord's not being able in Nazareth, an expression of the divine freedom as over against the abuse of human freedom.—The Lord's impotence a testimony to His perfect power and ability: 1. Of the divine power of His love (patience); 2. of the divine skill of His love (wisdom).—The sacred conditionality and free self-limiting power of Christ.—The omnipotence of God is not lessened, but glorified as spiritual power, by the fact that it conditions itself in love, wisdom, and righteousness.—To the man who had lost himself, and become to himself an object of contempt, the Lord brings back again his life.—Christ is far off and nigh at hand, in order to overcome the stolid, careless minds of those who are bent on this world.—Christ's retirement among the villages; or, the loftiness of the Gospel in its humility.—Christ's own city, the old and the new: 1. Poor Nazareth, which rejects Him; 2. the great city of God in heaven and upon earth, in ten thousand places, which glorifies Him.

—Nazareth a symbol of multitudes of streets and places rendered desolate by spiritual guilt.—How the Lord's love with holy tenderness encircles His poor land and people.

Starcke, Majus: The unreasonableness and wickedness of our countrymen should never restrain us in the performance of our duty, or cause us to forget any of our obligations to them.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Birth, lineage, and descent are far from making a man a Christian; they often rather, on account of prejudices, are the greatest hindrances to Christianity.—Quesnel: Wicked men often admire and magnify gifted preachers; but they are never without some excuse or other for not obeying their instructions.—It is common enough for those who would defeat the force of a sermon, to exalt themselves above the preacher.—When we entertain ourselves with a thousand strange matters that have no connection with profit, the power of the divine word is lost.—Canstein: He who built heaven and earth became, in His humbled condition upon earth, a carpenter.—Christ honoured and sanctified all honourable human employments and handiwork.—Quesnel: Christ's humiliation has been to many a stone of stumbling and an occasion of falling; while it was most essentially necessary to our eternal exaltation.—Hedinger: What is there that can grieve the Christian teacher beyond contempt and evil fruits?—Christ's example is a most mighty consolation.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Thou complainest that God saves thee not, and dost not reflect that thou thyself hast bound His hands.—Quesnel: The unbelief of a whole people does not hinder the mercy of God from extending to the small number of the righteous who are found amongst them.—Braune: Faith, which in its nature is receptive love, alone makes us partakers of the grace of God, which is imparting love.

Schleiermacher: We find this (that a prophet is without honour in his own country) true among men, even as we sometimes find the contrary of it true. When any one is distinguished beyond others in any particular, his fellow-townsmen take pride in him, their vanity being flattered. Yet the contrary is not arbitrary, but usually dependent on the earlier or later period, and various spiritual or worldly influences. (The prophets killed, and the sepulchres of the prophets garnished.)—Much impressive truth is lost upon men, because they do not so much regard the matter as the source from which it comes.—Christ has as much cause to marvel at the unbelief of the present time, as He had to marvel in His own time. —Gossner, on ver. 4: A warning to all preachers who do not like to leave their own home, kin, and country.—Nothing more outrages God's goodness than unbelief or rejection of it.

SIXTH SECTION.

CONFLICT OF JESUS WITH HEROD. THE CALL AND MISSION OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. THE BEHEADING OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

1. The Calling and Mission of the Twelve. (VERS. 7–13.)

7 And He called unto Him the twelve, and began to send them forth by two and two; and gave them power over unclean spirits; 8 And commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse: 9 But be shod with sandals; and not put on two coats. 10 And He said unto them, In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye depart from that place. 11 And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment than for that city. 12 And they went out, and preached that men should repent. 13 And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.

Ver. 9. The best reading is ἐνδυσήσθε (A.C.D.E., etc.), which Griesb., Lach., Tisch., and others adopt. The change in the construction, or the direct quotation of this command, makes it more emphatic.

Ver. 11. Tisch., after B.L.Δ., etc.: ὅς ἂν τόπος μὴ δέξηται μηδὲ ἀκούσωσιν ὑμῶν. Preferable in importance of codd., and is the harder reading. "Verily, etc.," wanting in B.C.D.L.Δ. Probably taken from Matt. x. 15.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare on the parallel passages of Matt. x. and Luke ix.—It has been already observed, on Matt. iii. 13–19, that he distinguishes the separation of the Twelve from their first mission: Luke does the same, but Matthew combines their call and mission in one. The two events are indeed one, as Matthew records them, in this, that the separation took place with reference to an appointment of duty which then immediately impended. But they are distinguished by this, that the election occurred in the solitude of the mountain range (hence Mark and Luke place them on a mountain, the latter connecting with the event the Sermon on the Mount); while the mission, on the other hand, occurred at the beginning of the third preaching journey, on which our Lord passed through the sea-towns of Galilee, as we are told by Matthew. But, since the calling of the Twelve was, between the Sermon on the Mount and the passage to Gadara (the second Galilean journey), only as yet a preparatory vocation, we must make a distinction between a general separation of the narrower circle of disciples and that calling of the Twelve on the mountain which briefly preceded their sending forth in the valley, during the first year of Christ's ministry. Now it is peculiar to Mark, that he gives prominence only to the most essential points of the mission; that he records it as the beginning of the apostolical missions (ver. 7), and as a mission in pairs; that he lays emphasis exclusively upon the power given over unclean spirits (not that of healing the sick), in harmony with his fundamental point of view, and that to him this involved at the same time the preaching of the kingdom; that he most precisely gives the Lord's injunctions touching their staff, their shoes, and their clothing; and that he finally makes allusion to the anointing the sick with oil, in its relation to the work of the Apostles—here mentioning the sick, who had been previously omitted. His more limited account of the instructions given to the Apostles, as recorded by Matthew, is to be explained by the fact, that he has this first mission exclusively in view; while Matthew combines it with all subsequent missions, and consequently presents it in its ideal meaning.

2. Save a staff only.—Meyer insists that there is here a difference between Mark, on the one hand, and Matthew and Luke, on the other—to be explained, as it regards the two latter, by exaggeration. (Comp., on the contrary, Ebrard, S. 382; Lange, Leben Jesu ii. 2, S. 712.) They were to go forth with their staff, as they had it at the time; but they were not to seek one carefully, or make it a condition of their travelling. And thus it becomes no more in Mark than a rather more precise statement of the meaning of Matthew and Luke. The same may be said of the permission to take sandals, in opposition to the prohibition of the ὑποδήματα, or travelling shoes proper, in Matthew. So the injunction not to put on two coats (in change), is only another form of the injunction not to have two garments. The fundamental idea is this, that they were to go forth with the slightest provision, and in dependence upon being provided for by the way. Gfrörer and Baur see in Mark's expressions only intentional qualifications and softenings. We find in them no other than a more express view of their pilgrim-state, burdened with the least possible incumbrance, and as free as might be from all care.

3. For a testimony against them.—As a symbolical, but to an Israelite perfectly intelligible declaration, that they were excommunicated,—"no better than heathen."

4. Preached, that men should repent (ἵνα).—They not only preached the doctrine of repentance, amongst other articles of doctrine; but their whole preaching had for its end the awakening of penitence, and change of mind.

5. And anointed with oil.—Oil was generally a very important medicament among the Orientals, according to Lightfoot and others. Here it is simply a symbolical medium of the miraculous work; just as the application of the spittle was (ch. viii. 23; John ix. 6), on the part of the Lord Himself. Meyer does well to contend against the supposition that the oil was applied as a natural means of cure (Baur, Weisse), or that it was used as a mere symbol (Theophylact, Beza, etc.),—not to mention other still less tenable notions. He is not right, however, in altogether detaching the symbolical significance from the medium. It is fact, that the Old Testament anointing with oil preceded, as the symbol of the New Testament bestowment of the Spirit. It is also true that the Romanists have introduced it again, where the real impartation of the Spirit retreats or becomes subordinate. And it may be assumed that for the disciples, who could not, like the Lord Himself, awaken faith, it was appropriate to appoint such a medium for their miraculous power as would be at the same time a symbolical sign of the impartation of the Spirit, and the energy that awakens faith. Thus the anointing was a symbol of the bestowment of the Spirit as the preliminary condition of healing; consequently, not of the divine mercy (Theophylact), the healing virtue of which was symbolized by balsam, or of the divine regeneration (Euthym. Zigabenus), the symbol of which was water. The anointing with oil, which James prescribed to the elders in their ministry for the sick (ch. v. 14), appears, on the other hand, to have been a blending of the natural means of health with the saving energy of prayer as symbolized by it.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke.

2. The sending of the Apostles by two and two.—According to Grotius, with allusion to the Old Testament law concerning witnesses ad plenam testimonii fidem. But also for mutual complement, and encouragement, and strengthening. We have, accordingly, six special embassages: six was the number of labour and toil. The twelve sendings of the individual Apostles was only as yet in the prospect.

3. We need only suggest here, that the New Testament anointing with oil—even that later one which James prescribed to the elders in their care of the sick—forms a perfect contrast to the idea of the extreme unction of the Romish Church. To us, this ecclesiastical anointing seems no other than an unconscious admission, on the part of the ceremonial church, that it had yet to bestow on its dying member the real communication of the Holy Spirit, whose type the oil was.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The sending of the Apostles first abroad into the world, may also be likened to the little seed-corn.—He began to send: the end of His sending is the end of the world.—The mission of the Apostles by two and two, in its significance for the Church: 1. As to ecclesiastical office, 2. as to the people.—The blessing of the mutual help of labourers in the kingdom of God.—The embarrassments, dangers, and disgraces which so often follow a too early isolation in office, and in the religious life generally.—Christianity in life and office is a discipline of unenvying brotherly love.—The messengers and pilgrims of Christ not without need, but without careful need.—The world loses, amidst its external equipments and means of resource, the internal end of life: the servants of the Gospel obtain, while they supremely regard the end, all the other equipments and resources.—The destruction of the kingdom of Satan, and the abolition of his power, is the great task of Christ's servants, after the example and in the strength of their Lord.—The shaking the dust from their feet is in its kind a Christian martyrdom to the disciples of Jesus (a testimony in suffering).—The anointing with oil; or, how the miracles of the kingdom of Christ have rested upon the marvellous powers of the kingdom of nature. —The kingdom of the Son attaches itself to the kingdom of the Father in the great whole as well as in individual things.—Those bound by Satan, and the sick, everlasting tokens of the need of Christ and His messengers.

Starcke: This authorisation a demonstration of the divinity of Christ.—The ministers of the Gospel should be one and united.—Quesnel: Ambition and avarice perilous things to the preacher and his work.—Osiander: Ministers should be satisfied, though they do not at once have all advantages they could desire, and things at their will.—Gerlach: On account of their weakness, the Lord does not send His disciples alone. Labourers in the Lord's harvest should look round for helpers in their work.—Schleiermacher: The Lord's direction in regard to the equipments of the Apostles no literal rule [he refers to the cloak of Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 13], but a rule of wisdom.—If the provision of all these external things is so great as to rob us of a portion of our true strength, they are no real advantage, but tend rather to impair our usefulness and peace.—Bauer: They were not to act as if they thought they might force men to hear.

2. Beheading of John the Baptist. (VERS. 14–29.)

Parallels: Matt. xiv. 1–12; Luke ix. 7–9.

14 And king Herod heard of Him; (for His name was spread abroad;) and he said, That John the Baptist was risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him. 15 Others said, That it is Elias. And others said, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets. 16 But when Herod heard thereof, he said, It is John, whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead. 17 For Herod himself had sent forth and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison for Herodias' sake, his brother Philip's wife; for he had married her. 18 For John had said unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. 19 Therefore Herodias had a quarrel against him, and would have killed him; but she could not: 20 For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly. 21 And when a convenient day was come, that Herod, on his birth-day, made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee; 22 And when the daughter of the said Herodias came in, and danced, and pleased Herod, and them that sat with him, the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. 23 And he sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom. 24 And she went forth, and said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And she said, The head of John the Baptist. 25 And she came in straightway with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me, by and by in a charger, the head of John the Baptist. 26 And the king was exceeding sorry; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her. 27 And immediately the king sent an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought: and he went and beheaded him in the prison, 28 And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel: and the damsel gave it to her mother. 29 And when his disciples heard of it, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

Ver. 16. The reading which drops ἐστιν, αὐτός (B.D.L.Δ., etc.), is strongly authenticated; but the omission is explained here by the similarity of οὗτος and αὐτός.—The omission of ἐκ νεκρῶν (Tisch., after B.L.Δ.) is not sufficiently supported.

Ver. 20. The reading πολλὰ ἠπόρει has B.L. in its favour. So Ewald and Meyer. But it is probably a modification of the strong πολλὰ ἐποίει.

Ver. 22. Instead of the part. καὶ ἀρεσάσης, the Codd. B.C*.L. and others read ἤρεσεν, and afterwards εἶπε δὲ ὁ βασ. This construction loses the emphatic preparation of the words, "Then the king said unto the maiden." But the Greek construction of the Rec. may seem to be simply a softening of the text.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke.—The time of this occurrence was the return of Jesus from the Feast of Purim at Jerusalem, in the year 781; that is, in the second year of His ministry. On His return from this feast, the disciples were once more gathered round Him at the Sea of Galilee. It is peculiar to Mark, that he connects the watching observation of Herod Antipas (see Matthew) with the work of Christ as extended by the twelve Apostles. And this is quite natural; since the fame of Jesus was not only extraordinarily increased by their means, but also invested with the semblance of a political import. With regard to Herod's judgment of Jesus, Mark is more distinct than Luke; in exhibiting the relation in which He stood to the Baptist, he is more distinct than Matthew. He is moreover very circumstantial in detailing the binding of John, the favourable crisis for Herodias, Herod's promise to the dancer, the scheme concerted between mother and daughter, the daring urgency of the latter, and other similar traits. But he omits the circumstance, that the disciples of John carried intelligence of the event to the Lord.

2. King Herod.—The βασιλεύς in the ancient and wide sense. Matthew and Luke say more precisely, the tetrarch (here equivalent to prince). Starcke: "Luke calls him, after the manner of the Romans, a tetrarch; Mark, after the manner of the Jews, a king." Heard: that is, that the disciples of Jesus preached and performed such miracles (Meyer), and that Jesus sent them forth. Hence what follows: for His name was spread abroad. Thus, not, according to Grotius and others, he heard the name of Jesus.

3. John the Baptist: ὁ βαπτίζων, substantively. Yet probably hinting a paraphrastic acknowledgment of his authority. According to Luke, others declared that John was risen from the dead, and Herod was troubled at it. But the apparent contradiction is solved by our assuming that the idea was introduced by the courtiers, and that Herod, after slight hesitation, entered into their views with hypocritical superstitious policy (Leben Jesu ii. 2). The expression might then be regarded as blending in itself a political secret meaning and a more popular one. According to the former it says, This new movement proceeds from the execution of John the Baptist; and if John was politically dangerous, the appearance of Jesus with His twelve Apostles is tenfold more so.

4. Therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him.—John had wrought no miracle; and the prince seems to have made this his excuse, the high legitimation of a prophet having been wanting to the Baptist. Now, in his new form, said the theologising king, it is seen that he is actually a prophet; the miraculous powers at length manifest themselves in him.

5. As one of the prophets.—That is, of the old prophets, even if not so great as Elias. It is manifest that the opinions which then were predominant concerning the Person of Jesus, coincided, first, in a certain acknowledgment of His higher mission; secondly, they deviated in the more specific definition of His dignity; thirdly, they presented a descending scale of lessening honour paid to Him, starting from a point below the original recognition that He was the Messiah. And thus they mark the time when the persecution of Jesus was beginning, although the people generally were, in a narrower sense, entirely absorbed with His works and words. Matthew introduces the notes of public opinion in connection with another event, which, however, falls within the same year of persecutions, ch. xvi. 14; and now this wavering judgment has become the popular cry.

6. Whom I beheaded.—Meyer: "ἐγώ has the emphasis of a guilty conscience." "Mark the urgent expression of confident assurance which the terrified man utters: This is he; he is risen."

7. For Herod feared John.—Seeming discrepancy when compared with Matthew, as Meyer here and always urges. Compare, on the contrary, Ebrard, S. 384; Lange, Leben Jesu ii. 2, S. 783. The θέλειν often indicates, in the New Testament, the natural willing in its weakness, the fain would, which, however, does not involve necessarily the full and perfect purpose of the will. Matthew, in his exhibition of the feeble, vacillating Herod, at the same time has in view his position on the side of Herodias as in opposition to the people; while Mark has in view his position on the side of the people in opposition to the thoroughly decided and resolute Herodias (see Macbeth).

8. And observed him, or kept him.—Not, esteemed him highly (as Erasmus and others, with De Wette, contend), but he kept him a long time safe against the attempts of Herodias (as Grotius and Meyer). And this at the same time reveals the vacillation of the man, since, as prince, Herod might have set John free. "Herodias was instigated partly by revenge, but partly by fear, that her present husband might, in consequence of the exhortations of the Baptist, repent of his evil, and separate from her." Beda.

9. And when a convenient day was come; that is, favourable for Herodias.—Grotius: Opportuna insidiatrici, quæ vino, amore et adulatorum conspiratione facile sperabat impelli posse nutantem mariti animum."

10. Lords, high captains, and chief estates.—The first two classes are servants of the state, civil and military officials; the third includes the great men of the land generally.

11. The king said unto the damsel.—The antithesis between "king and damsel" gives emphasis to his blasphemous folly.—To the half of my kingdom. Starcke: "This was a grand imitation of the great Ahasuerus; but in one without the supreme power it was idle and boastful enough."

12. I will that thou give me, by and by.—Strong emphasis, in the θέλω ἵνα.

13. Would not reject her.—The ἀθετεῖν, to make any one an ἄθετον, lawless and improper. It is to make invalid, or abolish, a decree, ordinance, covenant, or oath; and, in reference to persons, means to deprive of a legal claim, or declare one unjustified: hence it involves the notion of humiliating, the repudiare. But the translation to "suffer her to ask in vain," is much too weak.

14. An executioner, σπεκουλάτορα: one of his body-guard.—"To them was committed the execution of capital sentences (Seneca, de Ira i. 16, Wetstein)." Meyer.

15. And the damsel gave it to her mother.—Salome, the dancer, afterwards married her father's brother, the tetrarch Philip.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke.

2. The institution of the apostolate, and the mission of the Apostles, like a revelation of spirits to worldly policy and despotism, cowardly and superstitious, from the beginning suspicious and fearful.

3. Herod a forerunner and confederate of Pilate in this, that he acknowledged the innocence and dignity of John, and yet had not the courage to set him free. He is also like Pilate in the vacillation of his weak character.

4. The opinions of those who surrounded Herod: the verdicts of the great world concerning Christianity.

5. Herodias a typical character: woman in the demoniac grandeur of wickedness—the opposite of Mary. The New Testament Jezebel, as Herod is the New Testament Ahab. Herodias, the murderess of the greatest prophet, with whom the old covenant ended; Mary, the mother of the Lord, in whom the new covenant is sealed.

6. The intriguing woman, the courtezan in the royal court, an historical symbol. So also the dancer, and the vain festivity, and the sympathies of pride and presumption.

7. One sample of the influences of Grecian habits, as introduced into Palestine and spread there by the Herodians. Doubtless this influence could not but serve to efface the limits between Judaism and heathenism; but the true reconciliation between Greece and the theocracy could be effected only by Christianity.

8. The oath, and the word of honour, and the honourable deeds of the worldly-minded great, as they often clash with the eternal laws of God. In the godless oath there is a real and essential nullity; for God cannot be the avenger of a broken vow which was in itself impious. "But the breach of an ungodly oath demands an open confession." Gerlach. "Herod should have said, Thou askest of me more than my kingdom, for what shall it profit a man, etc.?"

9. Fearful contrasts, in which are reflected the satanic powers of wickedness: the head of the greatest preacher of repentance in the ancient world made a fee by an Israelite prince to a little Greek dancer at the court (a Jewess, who dances after the Greek fashion at the Israelite court); Christ, the Messiah of the Jews, betrayed by the kiss of a disciple to the hierarchy, condemned and given over to the Gentiles by the high priests and the priesthood in Zion.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke, and also the Reflections above.—Christ, with His twelve Apostles, described as John the Baptist risen from the dead: 1. How far this was a gross error, composed of a mixture of guilty conscience, superstition, policy, cunning, ignorance, and blindness; 2. how far, in another sense, a great truth, in which the living law of the kingdom of God found expression (ineffaceableness, growth, progress, consummation, "the blood of the martyrs, the seed of the Church").—The internal conflict of Herod and Pilate: 1. Similarities: impotent striving, long delay, critical suspense, shameful surrender. 2. Differences: a Jew, a Gentile; Herodias in the one case, the warning devout woman in the other; the people against the evil deed, the people in favour of it.—John the Baptist dignified and self-consistent as the great, heroic preacher of repentance: 1. Confronting the prince of the land, Herod; 2. in prison, and with the fear of death before his eyes.—The good impressions, which even Herod had lost: therefore, 1. He continued in the sin; 2. in vacillation between the right and wrong; 3. in self-deception; 4. under the power of temptation.—The conflict between good living and living good.—The convenient season; or, the feasts and banquets of the world, and those of the kingdom of God.—The world's estimate of the value of things: the head of a prophet of less importance than a dance; a blasphemous, drunken oath more sacred than the eternal law of God.—How the weak and wavering characters are, whilst they delay, overcome by the bold and daring conduct of those who are resolute in their wickedness.—The judgment which followed the beheading of the Baptist: pierced conscience, further guilt touching Jesus, a death of misery.—The frightful abandonment by the Spirit, which, in the great world, may cloke itself under the disguise of brilliance and vigour of spirit.—The fidelity and troubles of the disciples of John figurative of the troubles of faith as held bound in legality: 1. The heroic courage with which they buried their master; 2. the lack of believing courage to attach themselves to Jesus.

Starcke: Even the great of this world have always been excited and moved by the Gospel of Christ.—Quesnel: The sinner has no peace when he would seek it; because he rejected it when it was offered him by God.—Hedinger: The judgments of this world are always out of square when they deal with spiritual things; therefore, dear fellow-Christian, inquire not about them.—Public teachers should without fear rebuke the sins and blasphemies even of the great; they may rely, in doing so, on the divine help.—Lange: O ye court preachers, learn of John what your duty is: he was no court preacher, and yet he bore fearless testimony to the truth.—Hedinger: Devotion is always honourable, even in the eyes of the most frenzied children of the world.—Carnality befouls the best thoughts.—Quesnel: The festivities of the world are the best appointed tables of sin.—Zeisius: The poor have to give the rich their sweat and blood, and they riot in the proceeds, etc.—Vain swearing.—Promises made over the wine-cup.—Osiander: At the court there are often heavy payments for ridiculous trifles.—A foolish promise brings repentance after it.—Quesnel: The oath is sinful, and therefore null, when it cannot be carried out but with sin and injustice.—Lange: No servant or official should let himself be made an instrument of injustice; rather should he let everything go.—Christians pay honour to the pious on their death, and carry them reverently to their tombs.—Gerlach: Close connection between debauchery and cruelty.—Gossner: Thus does the world deal with God's ambassadors.—Bauer: See, what a marriage this was!

3. Return of Jesus into the Wilderness on the other side of the Sea of Galilee, and the miraculous Feeding of the Five Thousand. (VERS. 30–44.)

30 And the apostles gathered themselves together unto Jesus, and told Him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. 31 And He said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while: for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. 32 And they departed into a desert place by ship privately. 33 And the people saw them departing, and many knew Him, and ran a-foot thither out of all cities, and outwent them, and came together unto Him. 34 And Jesus, when He came out, saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd: and He began to teach them many things. 35 And when the day was now far spent, His disciples came unto Him, and said, This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed; 36 Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat. 37 He answered and said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they say unto Him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat? 38 He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes. 39 And He commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass. 40 And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by fifties. 41 And when He had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, He looked up to heaven, and blessed, and brake the loaves, and gave them to His disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided He among them all. 42 And they did all eat, and were filled. 43 And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes. 44 And they that did eat of the loaves were about five thousand men.

Ver. 30. The καὶ of the Rec. has the strength of the codd. against it.

Ver. 33. The οἱ ὄχλοι is an addition (from Matt.), and is wanting in A.B.D., etc. Lachm. and Tisch. have συνέδραμον ἐκεῖ καὶ προῆλθον αὐτούς. The many variations are essentially the same in meaning.

Ver. 36. 'Αγοράσωσιν ἑαυτοῖς, τὶ φάγωσι. Tischendorf, after B.L.Δ., etc.

Ver. 38. "And" see. Wanting in B.D.L.

Ver. 43. Tischend., following B. and the lesser codd., reads κοφίνων πληρώματα.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew, Luke, and John.—The essence of the whole is given most strikingly by John. Jesus has returned from the Feast of Purim (in the second year of His ministry) to Galilee; and the journey sets out probably from the district of Tiberias. The time is evidently just before the Passover; as it is manifest, from Mark's mention of the green grass, that the spring was just beginning. According to Luke, it was, at the same time, the period when the Apostles once more assembled around their Master, and when Herod began to take an interest in Him and in His doings. According to Matthew, finally, this crisis coincided with the time immediately after the execution of the Baptist, and the report brought concerning it. The peculiarities of Mark in this section are as follows:—The disciples tell the Lord also what they had taught. They were to take a little rest in the desert place. As elsewhere there was no time for either the Lord or His disciples to eat, on account of the press of the people, so it was here. The fact also is mentioned, that the Lord's departure was made known to many, and that the crowds hastened to anticipate Him. We must add the allusion to these as sheep without a shepherd, and the vivid description of the people's dejected state under several heads.

2. When He came out.—The crowds of people might seem to have rendered abortive the design of Jesus to retreat for a season with His disciples; for, according to the most obvious connection, we should suppose that ἐξελθών must mean, "When He came forth from the ship." But as the Evangelist has mentioned the fixed purpose of Jesus to go into a desert place apart, we must hold fast the declaration, and assume that the "coming out" refers to His leaving the wilderness again.

3. And He began to teach them many things.—This certainly confirms the previous view. Since a large portion of the day was gone, the time must have been drawing too near to the decline of day; and hence His discourse was interrupted by the remembrance of the disciples.

4. Two hundred pennyworth.—See for the details in John. "By which this part of the scene, not recorded by Matthew and Luke, obtains the confirmation of primitive originality." Grotius: The amount that happened to be in the chest was two hundred denarii. Meyer: "This does not follow; it was the estimate made by the disciples of what the provision would cost." But they would doubtless make their estimate according to the condition of their treasury. The denarius, δηνάριον, was a Roman silver coin; it was used also at a later period among the Jews; somewhat lighter than the Attic drachma, but current at about the same value, being the customary hire of a day's labour, about sevenpence halfpenny. See particulars in Winer.

5. By companies, συμπόσια συμπόσια.—A Hebraism, like the subsequent πρασιαὶ πρασιαί. Starcke: "So that there was on each side 50, and 100 everywhere together. Fifty such tables full made them about 5000. Or, there were 50 seats in breadth, and 100 in length." But, why not simply companies of 100 and 50, through which they might freely pass? A living town in the wilderness. Gerlach: Two longer rows of 100, a shorter one of 50 persons. The fourth side remained, after the manner of the ancients' tables, empty and open.

6. And of the fishes.—Reckoned among the relics which filled the twelve baskets. According to the account, these relics are dis tinguished from the κλάσματα, or broken pieces of bread.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

See on the parallel passages in Matthew, Luke, and John.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallel passage of Matthew.—The return of the Apostles, and the first resting-place provided for them by their Lord.—Come into a desert place apart, and rest a while: Christ's call to His overwrought, excited, and restless labourers.—This word of Christ perverted by many of His servants into a toleration of idleness: He says, a while!—Christ's rest, and His disciples' solemnity of prayer, in solitude.—The retreats of the world, the retreats of Christ's disciples.—Into solitude, but with Christ.—How the Lord sacrificed for men both His solitude and His retreats.—How He turned the seeming failure of His plan (touching solitude) into a higher realisation of the same object.—How we should fashion the web of our life—our plans and the conjunctures of circumstances—into higher unity of godly action and suffering.—The miraculous festival which our Lord prepared for His disciples after their labours and journeys in the world.—How He continually comes forth in His mercy: 1. from the bosom of heaven; 2. from the darkness of Nazareth; 3. from the solemn season of prayer in the wilderness; 4. from the glory of the new life in the resurrection; 5. from the throne of heaven.—The school of Christ a free school in the highest sense.—With Christ, all that we have we have freely.—Christ was already King when they wanted to make Him king; but King, 1. in the kingdom of the Spirit; 2. in the kingdom of love; 3. and in the kingdom of divine benediction.—His earthly exaltation would have been the translation of His throne from the realm of the infinite into the realm of the finite and transitory.—Christ was constrained to repel the people with as much earnestness as that with which the mercy of His Shepherd-heart sought them.—Christ the breaker of bread, because He Himself is the Bread of life.—The riches of His kingdom.—Enough with Christ is lavish abundance.

Starcke, Osiander: We should in such manner wait on our ministering as preachers of the Gospel, that we may be able to give in our account to the supreme Shepherd with joy.—It is good to rest after labour.—When we can separate ourselves from the tumult of the world, and send our spirits upwards to God, rest both of body and of soul is the result.—Hedinger: He who is in earnest to go to Christ, will let no trouble, labour, or expense hinder him.—Osiander: Although we may have a certain amount of rest in this world, yet that is soon disturbed again by business. Here all is unrest; yonder is perfect repose.—The Church of God has indeed many shepherds; but since many of them are shamefully given to negligence, and many are busy with vain labour, it is reasonable to lament that the poor sheep have, after all, but few true shepherds.—Quesnel: The love of devout souls is indeed prudent, but God's love is better in this than all.—Poor people cannot do better than hang upon God, etc.—Hedinger: Piety and faith never die of hunger.—What in men's eyes is impossible, may become possible through God's power.—As to the fragments, order and economy are in all things well-pleasing to God.—God is a God of order.—Take your food with prayer and thanksgiving, 1 Tim. iv. 4.—Schleiermacher: Thus they came back with minds excited, and perhaps disturbed, by all these various opinions concerning Christ; and therefore it was very important that they should become composed, and readjust all their views in their original relation to the truth.—We should never find a contradiction between that which is our duty and the internal bias of our hearts.—Christ found between this will (to be alone with His disciples) and the great pressure of the people no contradiction: He knew how to reconcile one with the other, and by the other.—There is nothing more essential in the kingdom of God than what is incumbent upon us as duty; and what is the object of our wishes should coalesce and coincide, the one upholding and preserving the other.—There is one vast and simple wisdom.—To this nothing is so absolutely essential. as simplicity of spirit.—The disciples were to be convinced (by the miraculous feeding), that if they applied themselves to the duties and obligations of the spiritual kingdom, their outward life would take no harm; whilst, on the other hand, everything would be interrupted if He should always act as they might think best.

SEVENTH SECTION.

CONTEST OF JESUS WITH THE ENMITY OF THE PHARISEES AND SCRIBES FROM JERUSALEM; HIS WITHDRAWAL INTO THE GENTILE BORDERS OF TYRE AND SIDON, AND INTO THE DISTRICT OF DECAPOLIS.

CHAPTER VI. 45–VIII. 9.

1. The Return to Gennesaret; the Contrary Wind; Christ's Walking on the Sea; New Miracles on the Western Coast. (VERS. 45–56.)

45 And straightway He constrained His disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida, while He sent away the people. 46 And when He had sent them away, He departed into a mountain to pray. 47 And when even was come, the ship was in the midst of the sea, and He alone on the land. 48 And He saw them toiling in rowing: (for the wind was contrary unto them:) and about the fourth watch of the night He cometh unto them, walking upon the sea, and would have passed by them. 49 But when they saw Him walking upon the sea, they supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out: 50 (For they all saw Him, and were troubled:) and immediately He talked with them, and saith unto them, Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid. 51 And He went up unto them into the ship; and the wind ceased: and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered. 52 For they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened. 53 And when they had passed over, they came into the land of Gennesaret, and drew to the shore. 54 And when they were come out of the ship, straightway they knew Him, 55 And ran through that whole region round about, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard He was. 56 And whithersoever He entered, into villages, or cities, or country, they laid the sick in the streets, and besought Him that they might touch if it were but the border of His garment: and as many as touched Him were made whole.

Ver. 45. Ἀπολύει, after B.D.L.Δ. Tisch., Lachm.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and John.—We owe to Mark the very important record, which sheds light upon the whole narrative, that the disciples were sent forward before the Lord in the direction of Bethsaida;—that Bethsaida, namely, which lay on the eastern side of the sea. (See on Matthew.) Thus it was a passage across. Then his expression, ἀποταξάμενος, is an important parallel to the ἀνεχώρησε in John: it gave Him trouble to release Himself from the excited and enthusiastic people. Also, in the expression, ἤθελε παρελθεῖν, he coincides, in the meaning at least, with John, ver. 21, ἤθελον οὖν λαβεῖν αὐτὸν, κ.τ.λ. But while Mark omits the intervening incident connected with Peter—which that Apostle, whose Evangelist he was, would modestly pass over, as making himself prominent—he lays stress upon the fact that the disciples had not been brought to a true and living faith, even by the miracle of the feeding. But he has painted most copiously and vividly the tumultuous excitement of the people, as it was occasioned by the Lord's landing, and how they immediately knew Him and followed Him with their sick from place to place.

2. Unto, or over against, Bethsaida.—Meyer's notion, that this was the western Bethsaida, and not the eastern, appears entirely groundless.

3. Sent them away, ἀποταξάμενος.—Not merely, "bade them farewell," for which there would have been no necessity to send the disciples away first.

4. Would have passed by them.—They were to follow Him in a westerly direction: no longer fruitlessly rowing eastwards against the wind (see on Matthew). He went before them, as it were, to show the way. They had wished to take Him up on the eastern coast (John); He would go before them to the western coast (Mark): something intermediate was the result in the end.

5. Were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered.—The latter found expression in exclamations; the whole strength of their internal amazement they did not express.

6. They considered not.—They had not yet come to an understanding, οὐ συνῆκαν. They had not attained that living, self-developing apprehension of spirit, which would know how to draw the right consequences. Bengel: debuerant a pane ad mare concludere.

7. The land of Gennesaret.—See on Matthew.

8. Began to carry about.—Not merely in summary: some hither and others thither. Nor is it meant to say that they went with a sick man after Jesus from one place to another, when He had left the former.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and John.

2. The first miraculous feeding marks precisely the crisis when our Lord had most expressly to contend with the people's design to challenge Him as the Messiah, and make Him a king. In contrast with this design of the people, we must here take notice of the expression of Jesus' pity for the wretched multitude: so little can the attempt of a people to exalt Him prematurely, and, in a worldly sense, exert any influence upon Him. In that very circumstance the misery of the people presented itself to His view most plainly. But even this earnest effort of our Lord to withdraw Himself from the people was successful only for a short period. Very soon afterwards He was obliged, in the synagogue at Capernaum (according to John vi.), to declare Himself most emphatically; and from that time onwards, that enthusiastic fanaticism among the people, which had before been prepared to take side with Him, even against Pharisaism, the hierarchy, and Herod, declined. From this time treachery began to germinate in the soul of Judas.

3. The miracle of Christ's walking upon the sea was a manifestation of His divine power, not only over external objective nature, but also over His subjective nature, in the medium of His human equanimity. The mystery of this equanimity is the manifestation of the paradisaical, holy man in the midst of the nature subjected by the fall to vanity. (Meyer does not understand this: see Note on Mark.)

4. It is observable that the Evangelist Mark most expressly, and in the plainest manner, describes the state of the Apostles, down to the revelation of the Risen Lord among them, as a condition of dulness, hardness, and unbelief. He does not thereby deny their fidelity as disciples. But the true and perfect faith did not, in his conception, exist until the new evangelical Spirit of life was given, that life which could approve itself in a personal spontaneous development. And the disciple of Peter approaches John in this, as in many other traits of his evangelical presentation.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallel passages in Matthew and John.—The temptability of the disciples of Jesus as over against the fanatical excitement of the people.—How Christ constrained them to take ship and go over the sea, in order to separate them from the people:

and what significance this has for the Church and the ministers of Christ.—Christ (and Christianity) the guide on the sea.—The walking of Christ upon the waters.—How the phantoms and scarecrows of vain fear vanish before the glory of Christ in sacred reverence of His divine power.—The climax of the enthusiasm of the Galilean people on behalf of Christ was also a turning-point.

Starcke, Quesnel: Man is in the world like a little ship upon the stormy sea in the night; since he can neither counsel nor save himself. He who does not know danger, and does not pray, may soon perish.—Jesus sometimes leaves us alone, that we may know ourselves and our own weakness, and feel how deeply we are in need of Him; but He never leaves us out of His sight.—The wind of persecution is a useful wind; for it brings Christ to us, and us to land.—Christ is Lord also over all nature.—Luther: By such an example (the feeding) they should have been made so strong in faith as not to have been terrified at an apparition.—Schleiermacher: Thus, as the living consciousness of the Redeemer is awakened within us, our temper must be calmed into the true equanimity; and this will smooth and regulate all things external.—All the powers which God has given us we should put in motion to glorify the kingdom of God.—Gossner: We are all still upon the sea of life.—But He never loses us out of His sight.—Bauer: When they have rightly heard the Master's word, phantoms and night and storm are all forgotten.

2. Contest with the Pharisees and Scribes from Jerusalem concerning Traditions of Eating. (Chap. vii. 1–23.)

1 Then came together unto Him the Pharisees, and certain of the scribes, which came from Jerusalem. 2 And when they saw some of His disciples eat bread with defiled (that is to say, with unwashen) hands, they found fault. 3 For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders. 4 And when they come from the market, except they wash, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups, and pots, brasen vessels, and of tables. 5 Then the Pharisees and scribes asked Him, Why walk not Thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashen hands? 6 He answered and said unto them, Well hath Esaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. 7 Howbeit, in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. 8 For, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do. 9 And He said unto them, Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition.

10 For Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother; and, Whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death: 11 But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free. 12 And ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother; 13 Making the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many such like things do ye. 14 And when He had called all the people unto Him, He said unto them, Hearken unto Me every one of you, and understand: 15 There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him, can defile him: but the things which come out of him, those are they that defile the man. 16 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. 17 And when He was entered into the house from the people, His disciples asked Him concerning the parable. 18 And He saith unto them, Are ye so without understanding also? Do ye not perceive, that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him; 19 Because it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out into the draught, purging all meats? 20 And He said, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man. 21 For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, 22 Thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness: 23 All these evil things come from within, and defile the man.

Ver. 1. The addition ἐμέμψαντο has slight support; and the κατέγνωσαν of Cod. D. is equally weak. The former arose from undervaluing the emphatic συνάγονται, which itself suggests an act of the synagogue. Hence we cannot, with Tischendorf, take vers. 3 and 4 as a parenthesis, and ver. 5 as the conclusion.

Ver. 5. The ἔπειτα is a continuation of the former misunderstanding: Codd. B.D.L., etc., read καί.—The κοιναῖς, instead of ἀνίπτοις, is sanctioned by B.D.

Ver. 8. Washing of pots, etc. This is wanting in B.L.Δ., etc. It is bracketed by Lachm., struck out by Tisch. See Meyer.

Ver. 12. The καί is omitted by Lachm., after B.D.

Ver. 14. The reading πάλιν, resumed by Lachm. and Tisch., following B.D.L.Δ., is important. It shows, that is, that the previous incident must be regarded as an examination by the synagogue, in which Christ was separated from the people.

Ver. 15. Τὰ ἐκ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐκπορευόμενα, according to B.D.L.Δ., etc.

Ver. 16. This verse is wanting in B.L. Omitted by Tisch., it is retained by Lachm. and Meyer. An interpolation here is not probable. The connection requires this point.

Ver. 19. Most codd. read καθαρίζων, not καθαρίζον.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the parallel place in Matthew.

2. The occurrence before us took place in the summer of the year 782: in the midst of the year of persecutions. The combination of the Pharisees of Galilee and the Pharisees of Judea in their opposition to Jesus, had already been concerted and entered upon. They had begun to institute against Him ecclesiastical proceedings in Galilee, and to watch His every step. The basis of our history is formed of the preceding Galilean crises, ch. ii. and iii., and the confederacy against Jesus at the Feast of Purim in Jerusalem, 782 (John v.). The progress and the conclusion of that scheme appear in ch. viii. 11. From the time of the Feast of Purim a common action and combination of the Sanhedrim in Jerusalem and the Galilean synagogue was inaugurated. The Sanhedrim were in constant connection and correspondence with the synagogues of the provinces, and even with those of foreign lands (see Acts ix. 2). Some, therefore, appointed by them, diligently visited the provinces; and watched especially those teachers whose doctrines declined from the principles of Pharisaism, at the head of which stood that of tradition (Ammon, Leben Jesu ii. 264). There were two official transactions or interferences. And there were two retreats on the part of Jesus: the first time, so far as the borders of the Gentile territory; the second time, into the solitude of the mountain beyond the sea, and even to the borders of the other world (transfiguration); —and all for the preparation of the new Church. (See Leben Jesu ii. 2, 858.)—Between the narrative of the first feeding, with the walking of Christ upon the sea, and our present narrative, there are many things to be interposed, which Mark has already communicated. Among these are the assault upon Jesus in the cornfield; the healing the man with a withered hand; the allegation of the Galilean Pharisees, that the works of Christ were done in the power of Beelzebub, etc. (See the Table of Contents, Leben Jesu ii. 2, 14.)—Peculiar to Mark is the expression, συνάγονται πρὸς αὐτόν, in which we cannot fail to see reference to an official interference of the Sanhedrim with our Lord. Also the exact account of the religious washings of the Jews; the detailed characterisation of the conflict between the pharisaic traditions and the commandment of God, including the Corban; the striking and profound sentence concerning the purging all meats; and the perfect description of those evil things which proceed out of the heart. Also, in the following section, which we see here already shadowed out, he has the design of Christ to remain hidden, in a house (belonging to a friend) on the borders of Phœnicia, during the time of His sojourn there; and the Lord's return to the Sea of Galilee through the Sidonian territory and that of Decapolis. It is observable that Peter must have communicated the account of these remarkable travels, having faithfully preserved the individual details. On the other hand, the Evangelist omits the intercession of the disciples on behalf of the woman of Canaan, and the declaration of Christ that He was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

3. And when they saw.—Probably on the appearance of the disciples in Jerusalem at the Passover, which He did not attend in the year 782. The spiritual impulse of freedom which actuated the disciples might at that time have led them into the commission of certain acts of thoughtlessness.

4. With common, that is, unwashen hands.—So Mark explains for Roman readers. We must particularly define the idea of unwashen hands by that of unwashen in the sense of a religious ceremony prescribed by tradition; and the idea of common by that of ecclesiastically profane, unclean, and defiling. Those who persisted in this uncleanness, which had for its result excommunication, must at last draw down upon themselves the decisive ban.

5. With the fist; oft. Πυγμῇ.—Among the many explanatory translations which have missed the meaning of the difficult expression are these: Vulgate, crebro; Gothic, ufta (oft); Syriac, diligenter. See in De Wette and Meyer the various exegetical methods adopted. "Probably it was part of the rite, that the washing hand was shut; because it might have been thought that the open hand engaged in washing might make the other unclean, or be made unclean by it, after having itself been washed" (Leben Jesu ii. 2, 858). The expression may, however, have meant only a vigorous and thorough washing.

6. And from the market.—Codex D. has the addition, ἐὰν ἔλθωσιν, when they come; which Meyer, De Wette, and others regard as a sound interpretation. The progression would be this: 1. Before every meal the washing of hands; 2. but, after the return from market, where there was so much danger of coming into contact with unclean men, the bath was used as a washing of the whole man: hence ἐὰν μὴ βαπτ. But that which follows—the βαπτισμοὶ ποτηρίων—requires another degree in the progression, and proves that βαπτισμός here must be understood in the widest sense. Thus we interpret it, with Paulus, Kuinoel, and Olshausen, of that which came from the market. De Wette, on the contrary, observes that this was everywhere customary. But it was not customary as a religious ceremony of washing, or as a kind of baptism, like that of the pots and cups, or the Romish baptism of bells. And the same held good of the washing of hands; for the washing of hands before eating was generally customary amongst the Persians, Greeks, and Romans. Thus there was a triple washing at meals: 1. That of the persons; 2. that of the victuals; 3. that of the vessels.

7. Pots and vessels.—Made of wood, in contrast with those of brass, which follow; or, it may be, considered as earthen. Meyer says, indeed, "Earthen vessels, when they were Levitically unclean, were broken to pieces, according to Lev. xv. 12." But the case supposed there was that of positive desecrations; and it is not to be supposed that the Jews, after or before every meal, broke all the earthen vessels which they used.

8. Full well (ver. 9), καλῶς.—Ironically, as among ourselves.

9. Your tradition, ἵνα.—Very strong and deep. At the bottom of all rigorous enforcement of traditional observances there is an unconscious or half-conscious repugnance to submit perfectly to the law of God. Bengel: Vere accusantur, hanc suam esse intentionem. "Not only unconsciously, but with the fullest purpose, the Rabbis exalted their precepts above the law of Moses." In the Talmud we read: "The words of the scribes are more noble than the words of the law; for the words of the law are both hard and easy, but the words of the scribes are all easy (to be understood)."—"He who deals with Scripture, it is said in the Bava Mezia, does a thing indifferent; he who reads the Mishna has a reward; but he who devotes himself to the Gemara is most meritorious of all." Sepp, Leben Jesu ii. S. 345.

10. Corban.—Comp. on Matthew; as also, for the Aposiopesis in ver. 11. Luther's marginal note: "Corban means an offering, and it was as much as to say, Dear father, I would willingly give it to thee, but it is Corban: I count it better to give it to God than to thee, and it will help thee better."

11. He said again.—The significant πάλιν—the reading we adopt—throws light upon the whole preceding occurrence; and, together with the συνάγονται at the beginning, gives it the appearance of a judicial process of the synagogue.

12. His disciples asked of Him (ver. 17).—Compare Matthew, where Peter is marked out as the questioner; and observe here, as elsewhere, his modest suppression of himself in the Gospel which sprang from himself. And here, again, there is emphatic prominence given to the disciples' want of developed spiritual vigour and insight of faith, and their slow advancement in knowledge.

13. Purging all meats.—Meyer: καθαρίζον might be connected with the ἐκπορεύεσθαι as an appositional expression. The apposition, however, would not be connected with the ἐκπορεύεσθαι, but with its subject, that is, meat; and that could not be tolerated. Καθαρίζον is rather the substantival definition of ἀφεδρών, as being a general means of purification for all the external impurities of meats: the better supported reading καθαρίζων, on the other hand, expresses the same thought adjectivally.—The ἀφεδρών makes all meats clean, not because it simply takes away all impurities, but because the uncleanness or impurity of the object consists in its being out of its place, and therefore defiling something else. It is therefore a place of filth for all the house; a place of cleansing, on the contrary, for the great household of nature. Not without irony does Christ make prominent this ideal significance of the external means of cleansing for meats, addressing as He did the men of traditions, who strove to ensure a prophylactic external purity to their food.

14. Evil thoughts.—In relation to the distribution here, we must notice the change between the plural and the singular forms; or, 1. predominant actions, and 2. dispositions. The acts in the plural are arranged under three categories: a. lust; b. hatred; c. covetousness. They then combine into wickednesses (πονηρίαι), by which the forms of evil dispositions are then introduced: deceit and lasciviousness indicate, in two contrasts, the concealed and the open wickedness of self-gratification; whilst the evil eye and blasphemy indicate concealed and open enmity (blasphemy against God and man). Pride or self-exaltation, and foolishness (נְבָלָה), are the internal and the external side of the one ungodly and wicked nature. "The evil eye" is notorious in the East; here it is the description of an envious look.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the parallel passage in Matthew.

2. The Jews have fallen through their Sabbath or Rest-day traditions into eternal unrest, through their law of purification into moral defilement, through their many baptisms into an abiding lack of baptism, through their service of the letter into Talmudist fables, through their separation into dispersion all over the world, through their millenarian Messiahship into enmity of Christ, through their trifling with the blessing into the power of the curse. The irony of the Spirit, that He punishes extremes by extremes.

3. The prophecy of Isaiah (ch. xxix. 13) pronounces a condemnation, always in force, upon all dead and fanatical zeal, and upon all mere ceremonial worship and work.

4. Zeal for traditional observances in its abiding conflict with the eternal commandments of God and laws of humanity. The conflict between false ecclesiasticism and morality. The contradiction of fanaticism has for its foundation an evil bias towards externalising the inner life. The worm of superstition is unbelief; the worm of fanaticism is religious death or atheism; the worm of hypocritical outside religion is impiety. For the conflict between human fanatical ecclesiasticism and the divine fundamental commandments of morality, see the history of Byzantinism and Romanism.

5. Tradition and human statutes identical. Tradition needs continual reform through the law of God; and human ordinances, through the living development of this law.

6. Contrast between external and internal fellowship: being excommunicated, and being out of the Church.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—Christ in judgment upon human tradition.—Christ the Deliverer of His disciples: 1. The Originator, 2. the Defender, 3. the Guardian, 4. the Leader and Consummator, of their freedom.—Christ and Christianity a hundred times exposed to spiritual censure: 1. The censure of school learning (theology); 2. of the tradition of the elders (clerical office); 3. of the synagogue (popular assembly).—Christ and tradition: 1. He is the foundation or kernel of all true internal tradition; 2. therefore He unites in one and renews all true external tradition; 3. and He is the Judge of all externalised and impious tradition.—The conflict between the law and human ordinances, or between ecclesiasticism and morality. It is, 1. unnatural, for true ecclesiasticism and true morality can never come into collision. 2. It is a light conflict, when false morality contends with true ecclesiasticism. 3. It is critical, when false ecclesiasticism fights against true morality. 4. There is a frightful doom upon both, when false ecclesiasticism and false morality struggle with each other.—The old conflict between fanaticism and humanity. Ecclesiastical systems which bury piety (household relations, filial obligations, etc.) condemn themselves.—The indivisible unity of faith and love, of piety and duty.—The fearful perversion of the conflict between divine revelation and human sin into a contradiction between the divine and the human nature.—The triumph of human ordinance over the ruins of the law of faith.—To enjoy with thankfulness, is the sanctification of enjoyment, 1 Tim. iv. 4.—In the place of the washing of hands before meat, has come in the folding of hands.

Thus we must mind the reality of the symbol, even in this latter.—Isaiah of old and the Reformation, agreeing with Christ's judgment upon what is true or what is false worship of God.—The right process of a true reformation: 1. It distinguishes between spirit and flesh, between the internal and the external. 2. It fights against the false intermixtures of the two, in which the spirit is made subservient to the flesh, and the internal to the external. 3. It seeks to connect the two aright, so that the spirit may make the flesh its own and glorify it. 4. It therefore contends also against a false and unnatural separation between the two.—The purity and the purifying power of the great divine economy of nature.—Christianity has consecrated even natural infirmity; or, a beam of the glorification which shines upon the dark natural ways of men.—The decisive objection against human ordinances, that they vainly attempt to effect symbolically a purity that actual life better provides for: 1. Holy water, God's streams; 2. arbitrary penances, divine burdens; 3. ecclesiastical purgatorial fires, God's salting fires.—The evil things which proceed from the heart and defile the man. See Crit. Notes, No. 14.

Starcke, Majus: As Christ and His disciples were not without their slanderers, so the devout are never without their accusers and rebukers, 1 Pet. ii. 12.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: From Jerusalem hypocrisy went forth into all the land.—Hedinger: What is the dross to the pure gold? what the inventions of men to the truth of God? what superstition to faith?—Quesnel: As man may dishonour God by overmuch caring for beauty and external purity, Isa. iii. 16, so God is honoured by the neglect of these things, when that neglect springs from humiliation of self and true mortification, Jonah iii. 6–10.—We must wash the heart after having been defiled by the world; that is, we must test ourselves and cleanse ourselves of sin, Job i. 5.—Majus: With hypocrites, regard to man and human ordinances has more weight than the commandments of God.—The hypocrisy of hypocrites must be revealed.—Cramer: The enemies of the truth must be confounded by the word of God.—Canstein: The true worship of God is the union of the heart with Him.—Men commonly do willingly and cheerfully all things that do not set them about changing their own hearts.—Self-love, or the selfish mind, is so mad, that it prefers expending its care upon pots and cups rather than upon itself.—Many external ceremonies and human ordinances are not good in the Church of God; for those who are bent upon rigidly observing them, easily come to forget, or postpone to them, the true commandments of God.—Quesnel: The openly impious do not dishonour the truth of the divine law so much by their evil life, as those do who give themselves out to be lovers of the law of God, and yet falsely interpret it.—After God, our parents are most important; and them their children should honour as the channel of the first gifts of God—nature, life, nourishment, and education.—Bibl. Würt.: Christian children should learn well the fourth and fifth commandments.—Quesnel: Man may disguise his godlessness under the fairest show of piety, but God sees it nevertheless; and, as He condemns it now, He will hereafter make it manifest to all the world.—Majus: Vows against the honour of God are sinful, and must not be paid.—Bibl. Würt.: He who departs from God's word in one point, and in that point prefers the ordinances of men, may become so thoroughly entangled as not again to escape, Tit. i. 15.—In the New Testament, the making distinctions of meats is classed among the works of the devil, 1 Tim. iv. 1–3.—Canstein: All depends upon the state of the heart: as that is, we are.—As the heart is the source of all evil, we should carefully watch its issues, Jer. xvii. 9.

Schleiermacher: This was the sense in which the Lord Himself said that His yoke was easy and His burden light; for He contrasted Himself, and the fellowship which He would found upon His own name, with the yoke and the manifold external burdens which the elders were never weary of imposing upon the Jews.—Those who rest wholly on external things have always the same vain labour as the Pharisees; and this has its ground in a lack of confidence. It springs from the fact that man can never have so much firm assurance concerning that which is not the truth as he can concerning that which is the truth; and this unrest manifests itself in looking anxiously at the letter, and in seeking after external uniformity. The greater the number, the greater their hope of internal confidence: of that which is strictly internal they have nothing.—This also He would say, that whosoever contributes to confirm such notions in the minds of men, and make their notions of God's service purely external, leads them thereby away from the true worship of God in spirit and in truth, and seeks to give their ideas of God such a direction and such a form, that they no longer represent to themselves that God who will be worshipped in spirit and in truth, but an imaginary Being, such as the Gentiles frame in their imaginations.—The same feeling which leads to the honour of father and mother leads to the honour of our Father in heaven.—Gossner:

Manifestly, wicked human ordinances do not injure the divine doctrine so much as specious and seemingly holy superstitious inventions and false interpretations, which are received with confidence by the weak devout, and held fast with stubborn pertinacity.

3. The Return of Jesus to the Gentile Borders of Tyre and Sidon, and to the District of Decapolis. The Woman of Canaan. (VERS. 24–31.)

24 And from thence He arose, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into an house, and would have no man know it: but He could not be hid. 25 For a certain woman, whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, heard of Him, and came and fell at His feet; 26 (The woman was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation;) and she besought Him that He would cast forth the devil out of her daughter. 27 But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs. 28 And she answered and said unto Him, Yes, Lord: yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs. 29 And He said unto her, For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter. 30 And when she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed. 31 And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, He came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis.

Ver. 24. And Sidon is wanting in B.L.Δ., etc. Tisch. omits it. From Matt. xv. 21.

Ver. 25. Tisch., after B.L.Δ., etc.: ἀλλ' εὐθὺς ἀκούσασα γυνή.

Ver. 27. Lach. and Tisch.: καὶ ἔλεγεν, after B.L.Δ., etc. And this is more in keeping; for it is not a definitive utterance, like the ὁ δὲ 'Ιησοῦς εἶπεν.

Ver. 30. See Meyer, concerning the inversions of this clause.

Ver. 31. Lach., Tisch., after B.D.L.Δ.: ἦλθεν διὰ Σιδῶνος.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallel passage in Matthew, and the preliminary summary of the foregoing section, Critical Notes, No. 2.

2. And from thence He arose, and went.—That His departure was at the same time a breaking away from the pharisaic party, is emphatically shown both by Matthew and Mark. His travelling towards the borders of Tyre and Sidon was the prophetic and symbolical representation of the future progress of Christianity from the Jews to the Gentiles. So in ancient times Elijah travelled out of his own land into Phœnicia. Elijah was driven away by the ascendency of idolatry in Israel; Christ was driven away by the ascendency of a hierarchy and of a traditionalism which in His eyes was apostasy from the law of God, and therefore idolatry. Yet Jesus did not yet separate from His unbelieving people; He did not actually go into Phœnicia, but only into the adjoining borders of Galilee (εἰς τὰ μεθόρια), that is, into the district of the tribe of Asher. But afterwards, during His travels among the mountains and on His return to the Galilean sea, He actually passed through the Sidonian region. On those travels, see on Matthew, Critical Notes, No. 1.

3. And entered into an house.—Here also He had friends and dependants, as He had in the opposite direction, on the borders of Perea.

4. A Gentile, or Greek.—Ἑλληνίς, according to the Jewish phraseology of the time, indicating a Gentile woman generally. This was not merely the result of the intercourse of the Jews with the Greeks especially; but it sprang from the fact that in the Greeks and in Greece they saw the most finished and predominant exhibition of this world's culture and glory. Syrophenician, as distinguished from the Λιβυφοίνικες, the Phœnicians of Africa, that is, Carthage (Strabo). The Tex. Rec. has Συροφοίνισσα; but the true reading wavers between Συροφοινίκισσα (Codd. A.K., etc., Lachmann) and Συρα-Φοινίκισσα (Tischendorf, after Codd. E.F., etc.). Thus she was a Phœnician-Syrian woman: most generally viewed, a Gentile; more specially, a Syrian; and still more specifically, a Phœnician. Phœnicia belonged to the province of Syria. But the word may also, more precisely still, describe the Syrian of Phœnicia, the Canaanite woman (Matthew).

5. And her daughter laid upon the bed.—A sign of her perfectly tranquil condition: the demon had previously driven her hither and thither. But there is also an intimation of her exhaustion after the last paroxysm; and this is one more instance of that gradual restoration which Mark loves to describe. The arrival of her mother, who was the subject of healing faith, perfected then her new life and vigour.

6. Through Sidon.—Meyer thinks that the analogy of Τύρου requires us to understand the town of Sidon. But the coasts of Tyre do not refer to Tyre as a city, but to Tyre as a country. Thus we agree with Ewald, that only the travelling through the district of Sidon is settled. The direction of the journey was first northward towards Lebanon; thence from the foot of Lebanon north-easterly, and back through the district of Decapolis, that is, back through the region which lay to the east, or the farther side, of the sources of the Jordan, to the eastern bank of the Sea of Galilee. On Decapolis, compare Winer, and the Critical Notes of Matthew.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel passage in Matthew.

2. The circumstance, that Mark passes over the mediation of the disciples on behalf of the Gentile woman, is explained by the critics in various ways, after their favourite fashion of external comparison. Meyer thinks Matthew's the original account. But if we look at internal motives, this whole intervening occurrence, which would be very easily understood by the Jewish-Christian readers of Matthew, would not, without some commentary, be at all intelligible to the Gentile-Christian readers of Mark. Matthew gave prominence to the points which proved to the Jewish-Christian how strictly Christ remained, during His work in the flesh, within the limits of His calling; and that He received the Gentile woman into communion and fellowship of His healing works, only on account of her strong faith, attested by the Israelite witness of the disciples themselves. This motive had no force in Mark's account. Hence he might, in harmony with his own design, paraphrase the repelling word of the Lord, modifying it according to its inner meaning; and we need not, with Meyer, attribute it to the "softening down of later tradition."

3. As Christ, in the former narrative, let a ray of His transfiguring glory fall upon the low region of meats and the "draught," so here He casts one upon the poor dog. Under the light of the kingdom of heaven, everything common and natural obtains a higher meaning; it obtains a value in the economy of God, and as a figure of the relations of His kingdom. The place of daily corruption is a figure of the purifying grave and kingdom of the dead; the dog a figure of the Gentile world. Sin remains more than ever condemned, but only that it may be made subservient to the judgments and honour of God.

4. As the earnest coming of the Syrophenician woman evinced a strong susceptibility among the Phœnicians, humbled by many severe judgments, it was needful that Christ should for the present leave this country, in order that His Jewish people might not be alienated by His premature labours among the Gentiles. But He left the region with the glad anticipation that the prophecy of Ps. ii. 8 would one day be fulfilled.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—A solemn token, when Jesus only seems to go forth.—The travels of Jesus towards west, north, east, south:

also a sign.—Jesus has everywhere His hidden friends.—He could not remain hidden: that is, 1. He hid from Himself, in His humility, the consciousness of the great influence of His majesty; 2. He sacrificed His rest to the restlessness of passionate men; 3. He ever submitted His human will to the ruling will of His Father.—The work of the Son, under His Father's government, free: 1. In Nazareth, His own city, He could not reveal Himself; 2. in the dark boundary of heathenism, He could not be hidden.—The Gentile longing everywhere feels from afar and seeks after salvation, whilst the Jews reject it before their very eyes. (The nobleman at Capernaum; Cornelius, Acts x.; the Canaanitish woman; the symbolical man of Macedonia, Acts xvi. 9.)—The Gentiles likened to the dogs (house dogs, not wild ones), not to awaken, but to humble a fanatical party spirit: 1. Unclean indeed, and without the natural gift to distinguish the pure from the impure; 2. but modest, tractable, docile, thankful table-companions of unthankful children.—Christ present with His fulness of help, wherever there is the slightest germ of faith.—"For this saying." Faith manifest in new and wonderful words: 1. Its source, words unspeakable (Rom. viii. 26); 2. its expression, new words of the Spirit, clear and joyful in confession, preaching, and prayer; 3. its glory, the speaking with new tongues.—The regeneration, sanctification, and glorification of speech.—Christ, the terror of evil spirits, far beyond His own personal manifestation.—The great sign which the Lord gave His disciples, that the door of the Gentile world was open.—Even among a people of Moloch-worshippers, maternal love was not extinct.—Humility the test of faith.—Humility the deep ground into which all the streams of heavenly blessing are poured.—The Lord is high, and yet hath respect unto the lowly, Ps. cxiii. 5–7.—As Mary prophesied in her song of praise, such was Christ's rule.—The tarrying of Jesus in the mountain range of Lebanon, a silent anticipation of His entrance into the heathen world; as the tarrying in the wilderness was an anticipation of His entrance into Israel.

Starcke, Canstein: Christ's travels from one place to another.—Quesnel: A servant of Christ in the Gospel may indeed remain hidden, but it must be so as not to incur the shame of neglecting any duty owing to his neighbour.—Cramer: When we pursue honour in an unreasonable manner, it flies from us; when we fly from it, it pursues us.—Quesnel: Every sin is an unclean spirit which possesses the sinner; from Jesus we must in all humility, every man for himself, seek the only remedy.—Sufferings urge men to seek God: happy those who use them to that end.—Christ is still, and for ever, the Saviour of the Gentiles, Rom. iii. 29.—Parents should feel the utmost anxiety on account of their children, that they be delivered from the power of Satan and led back to God.—Lange: The sharper the test, the more blessing does it bring when believingly endured.—Bibl. Würt.: Faith in the heart permits no displacence against God's rule to arise in the soul. However God disposes, and whatever He says, must be best, 1 Pet. v. 5, 6.—Hedinger: Perseverance presses through, and a good warfare obtains the prize.—Quesnel: It is a great consolation to a Christian mother when God converts, in answer to her prayer, a daughter possessed by a worldly spirit. But how little prayer is urged for that blessing!

Rieger: A very little word, falling into a softened, broken, and humbled heart, works great things.—Faith derives greater advantage and strength from humble submission and willing acknowledgment of its unworthiness than from anything else.

Braune: Let every one limit himself to the field of labour which God has appointed to him: he will soon see whether or not God gives him a commission to go beyond it.—Let no one be offended if he is hemmed in by a narrow limit, according to God's will. Holy charity and heroic love are all in all.

Schleiermacher: For this word, go thy way. It was not merely a word of faith, but such an answer, too, as fell in with our Saviour's design. Without abolishing the distinction between those who belonged to the people of the old covenant and those who were idolaters, it yet threw such a veil over the distinction that many demonstrations of love might seem proper to pass from the one to the other.

Gossner, on ver. 24: Many might remain hidden enough, but they will not.—A seemingly great severity is often a preparation for great benefactions.—Bauer: The first act of salvation in the Gentile world.

Ahlfeld: Persevering faith is sure to win its object. When a heavy cross weighs thee down, seek the light of Christ's countenance; hold on in faith, and doubt not; He will give at last all that thou needest.—Thomasius: How the Lord awakens faith in the hearts of men.—Greiling: The time of suffering is a time of test. —Hartog: The three stages of victorious faith: 1. It looks with longing at the divine Saviour; 2. it waits with all humility for help; 3. it holds fast its hope with firm confidence.—Bödecker: Wherefore doth God delay His help?—C. G. Hoffmann: The mighty word of faith: I will not let Thee go.—Dittmar: Great faith in its three stages: 1. Its stage of distress; 2. its stage of sifting; 3. its stage of confirmation.

4. The Healing of the Deaf and Dumb Man. (VERS. 32-37.)

Parallel: Matt. xv. 29-31.

32 And they bring unto Him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech Him to put His hand upon him. 33 And He took him aside from the multitude, and put His fingers into his ears, and He spit, and touched his tongue; 34 And, looking up to heaven, He sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. 35 And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain. 36 And He charged them that they should tell no man: but the more He charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it; 37 And were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well: He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

Ver. 35. Εὐθέως wanting here in B.D.L.Δ., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on Matthew.—The healing of the deaf and dumb man on the east side of the Jordan, is a narrative peculiar to Mark. In regard to time, it is closely connected with the two foregoing events: falling into the termination of the Lord's travels towards Phœnicia, and through Decapolis back to the eastern border of the Sea of Galilee (Gaulonitis). Mark manifests, in his exhibition of the miraculous histories, a preference for those healings in which the gradual process of the cure, as connected with the instrument and the development of it, is vividly presented. Thus, in his account, the daughter of the Syrophenician woman lies exhausted upon her bed after her deliverance. Thus he represents Jesus as commanding them to give the daughter of Jairus something to eat. And he alone records the healing of the blind man at Bethsaida;—a process which was gradual, and performed in two stages. And here he alone communicates a narrative in which the miraculous act of the Lord is closely connected with the application of the saliva.

2. A deaf man, who could not well speak.—Meyer opposes this translation: "κωφὸν μογιλάλον is wrongly translated, a deaf man difficult of speech (see Beza, Maldonatus, De Wette). Μογιλάλος, although it seems in its formation to be hard of speech, corresponds in the Septuagint to the Hebrew אִלֵּם, dumb. See Isa. xxxv. 5, etc. Hence it is a deaf and dumb man (Vulgate, Luther, Calovius, Ewald), which is also confirmed by ἀλάλους." Since μογιλάλος does literally mean one who speaks with difficulty,—and it is said of this one, that after his cure he spoke ὀρθῶς (not simply he spoke),—the meaning of the words is sufficiently established. With deafness there is connected a disturbance of the organs of speech, or a general perversion of speech.

3. Apart from the multitude.—Wherefore? 1. He would make no display (Theophylact); He would not nourish superstition (Reinhard); He would have an undisturbed relation between Himself and the sick man (Meyer). This last is the weakest reason; for we might for the same reason expect the same thing elsewhere. Rather we may assume that the district of Decapolis was something like the region of Tyre and Sidon: it was not a purely Jewish land. Here it was necessary, especially in this time of crisis, that He should avoid a publicity which might bring together the Gentiles in crowds, excite superstition as much as faith, and create in the minds of the Jews a prejudice against Him. In an analogous manner the Lord acted in the case of the blind man of eastern Bethsaida: He led him altogether out of the village. In both cases, however, we must remember that it was a susceptibility of faith which was to be gradually awakened. See the Doctrinal Reflections.

4. And put His fingers.—A similar circumstantial procedure we have in the healing of the blind man, ch. viii. "But we are not to assume that Jesus desired in any sense to conceal the miraculous element in the cures (Lange, Leben Jesu ii. 1, S. 282), which would amount to untruth." Meyer. But, upon that principle, the disguise thrown over the evangelical truths of the Gospel through the employment of parables, would amount to untruthfulness.

5. And spat.—Spitting, He touched His tongue. Meyer thinks that the touching was the direct spitting upon the tongue. But as the touching (ἅπτεσθαι) is elsewhere an application of the hand, it may be assumed that He moistened His finger and touched therewith the man's tongue. The saliva used in healing: here, ch. viii. 23; John ix. 6. De Wette: Saliva was in antiquity a remedy for the eyes (Plin. H. N. 28, 7; Tacit. Hist. 4, 21; Sueton. Vesp. Cp. 7; Tanchuma f. 10, 2; Sanhed. f. 101, 1; Hieros. Sotah f. 16, 4; Vajikra Rabba f. 175, 2. Comp. Wetstein and Lightfoot, ad Joh. ix. 6). Meyer: "The saliva is, like the oil (ch. vi. 13), to be regarded as a conductor of the miraculous power." Yet it was not applied in the cure of the ear, but only in the healing of the tongue here, as ch. viii. in the healing of the eyes. Wherefore then was this distinction? Probably because the saliva was better suited to be a symbolical medium for the awakening of faith, and it was never wont to be applied to the ear.

6. Looking up to heaven, He sighed.—Manifestly the sighing of prayer. How much more easily He seemed to accomplish His healing on other occasions! Or was deafness, in its spiritual significance, much worse than blindness and possession; and did the Lord intend to signify that? We assume, 1. that in this half-heathen district, more imperfect and disturbed forms of faith presented themselves to Him, which made the healing on His part more of a conflict; and 2. that in this half-heathen district, where they generally believed in demigods and magic, He desired to make more definitely prominent His own dependence on God the Father. For the like reason—that is, because the Pharisees had blasphemed the source of His miraculous power—He accomplished the raising of Lazarus before the Jews from Jerusalem in connection with a loud prayer to the Father; and in healing the man born blind, John ix., He joined with Himself in the work the temple-fountain Siloam, the holy spring of the priests. 3. Since the Lord could not influence the deaf man by word, it was necessary that He should influence Him by a strongly speaking sign.—Mark everywhere sets a special mark on the sighing of the Lord, as also upon His manner of looking: comp. ch. viii. 12. Meyer suggests, and rightly, that this sigh was at the same time a sigh of painful sympathy.

7. Ephphatha.—An Aramæan word, in the Imperative: Be thou opened. Related, though not identical, is the Hebrew פָּתַח, in the Imper. Niphal.

8. And the string of his tongue was loosed.—Thus he did not speak with difficulty, merely on account of his being dumb, as Olshausen supposes.

9. But the more He charged them.—The stronger His prohibition was, the more it enkindled a desire to spread the report of the miracle.

10. He hath done all things well; that is, in the healing.—Thence they draw the conclusion: As well the deaf, He hath, etc.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Nothing is more instructive and full of significance than the prudence of our Lord in respect to the publication of His miracles, as soon as He had entered the borders of the land, where there were closer relations with heathenism, and the people were more infected by heathen views:—the history of the woman of Canaan, the present narrative, and the healing of the blind man in eastern Bethsaida, all illustrate this. The reason was, that Christ would have a monotheistic faith, which traces all up to God the Father as the final source, and that He would not suffer His divine power of healing to be mingled and debased with superstitious and magical notions. This holy prudence will explain many and great restraints upon the full influence of Christianity in the heathen or heathen-Christian world, down to the present day.

2. We may compare the doxology of this people, ver. 37, with the doxologies of ch. i. 27, ii. 12, iii. 11, etc. Matthew explains: They glorified the God of Israel.

3. It must be particularly observed here also, that Jesus could affect this deaf and dumb man only through His glance, His immediate revelation, His signs, and manner of action. So far this instance stands alone; for the youth who was deaf and dumb through possession, ch. ix. 25, suffered not through the sealing up of his organs, but through the perversion and violence done to his soul. So also the possessed who was dumb, Matt. ix. 32; and the demoniac who was blind and dumb, Matt. xii. 22.

4. Our Christian institutions for the deaf and dumb are an abiding monument of that miraculous healing in the mountains: the natural development of the miraculous act of our Lord. The healing of the deaf and dumb by signs, was a type of the instruction of the deaf and dumb.

5. The Romish rite of baptism relies especially on this miraculous history, because it exhibits the use of several symbolical elements: 1. Separation from the multitude; dedication to Christ in baptism. 2. The baptizing priest touches, with an Ephphatha, the ears of the infant; 3. moistens its nostrils with saliva; 4. lays salt in its mouth. The Christian Church should do all this in a real manner, and not in a symbolical. As the symbol for it, and at the same time the reality of it, Christ instituted simple baptism.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Sufferers to be brought to Jesus.—The healing of the deaf and dumb; or, the double disease and the double cure in their reciprocal connection. 1. The connection between deafness and the inability to speak: a. in physical things; b. in spiritual. 2. Right speaking conditioned by right hearing: in natural life, in spiritual things.—He who does not persevere to the end in hearing aright, will surely cease by degrees to speak aright.—The true obedience is eminently quick and sure hearing.—The education of the deaf and dumb man in faith. 1. He must yield himself up to be led by the strange Wonder-worker, who can only speak to him by looks, into the wilderness; 2. he must see His signs, especially the signs of His prayer and His sighing; 3. he must hear His word of power, that he may have his hearing and be able also to speak.—The holy care of the Lord in all His wonderful works, aiming ever at the glory of God's name.—How the wonder-working majesty of Jesus is concealed in His humility.—Christ, as He went on His way, opposed and avoided with the same decided earnestness the heathenism which deified men and the world, and the Judaism which deified the letter and ceremonial observances.—Christ had to struggle as well with superstition as with unbelief, to exalt both into faith.—All Christ's miracles were to the honour of God: 1. All His miracles were miracles of prayer, dependence on God, and strict union with His Father; 2. all His miracles were distinguished, not only in their reason and their end, but also in their form and manner, from the magical works of the heathen world.—Christ ever conceals the thousands of His miracles by the disguise of an unpretending medium.—Christ in His whole being full of saving power.—The sighing of Christ and of His Spirit (Rom. viii. 26) over the sin and the misery of humanity and the creature.—The sympathy of Christ.—Guilt and innocence in the popular proclamation of Christ's works.—The words of His astonished people: He hath done all things well: 1. In its human limitation; 2. in its higher significance.—Concerning redemption as concerning the creation, the word holds good, He hath done all things well (Gen. i. 31): 1. on the whole, 2. in the details.

Starcke: Where Jesus goes in and out, there is nought but blessing.—Canstein: When we look at the deaf and dumb, it should make us reverence all the more the glorious gifts of hearing and speech, and determine to use both prudently to the glory of God.—

Zeisius: Most people can both hear and speak; but how great and how common is spiritual deafness and dumbness!—Luther: Christ begins His cure with the ears, and acts in accordance with nature; since from hearing speaking comes: ἀκοή begets ὑπακοήν.—Lange: Let us seek silence.—A Christian should often sigh over spiritual and bodily misery.—The ears should be open for God, but shut to the devil and the world.—It is a sign that the tongue has been loosened by Christ, when the words become holy, and the new song is sung to His glory out of a new heart.—Quesnel: The humility of the benefactor, and the thankfulness of him who has received the benefit, may contend without damaging peace in the heart.—Wondering at God's works is well; but it should never end there.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: God doeth all things well, not only in healing and binding up, but also in smiting and wounding.—Zeisius: As Satan damages and ruins everything, so, on the contrary, Christ repairs all things.—Braune: The Lord guides all His own in various ways, every one in his own; but the goal for all is the great salvation longed for.—Jesus speaks the right language of signs to the deaf and dumb.—Gerlach: The words, "He hath done all things well," seem to express an anticipation of the new creation.—Jesus finds His glory in the deaf ears of hardened sinners, and in the speechless or restrained tongues of unthankful, earthly-minded unbelievers. Even from among them He takes many into solitude with Him: His creating hand touches the sealed ear and the idle tongue, His high-priestly intercession groans to the Father for them, and often His Ephphatha opens the ear and looses the bonds of their tongue, so that they may speak plainly.—Lisco: The turning of the eyes of Jesus towards heaven should teach us to expect our help from thence, and thither to direct our thanksgivings.—Schleiermacher: That love which could manifest itself so mightily in the Redeemer, is among us in our good institutions. But if we ask what has driven men to think upon this, we can say no more than that it is the selfsame Spirit of love who is for ever striving to meet and overcome all the woes and sufferings of humanity.—What a great and wonderful word is this "Be opened," which the Redeemer was ever speaking throughout His whole manifestation, and the influences of which have never ceased, but will go on until the whole race of mankind have come to the hearing and knowledge of His salvation, and their tongues shall be loosed to the praise of the Most High!—Heubner: The significance of the healing of the deaf and dumb (in its spiritual application): 1. The person of the wretched one; 2. the leading him to Jesus; 3. the action of our Lord; 4. His looking up to heaven and sighing; 5. His work; 6. His prohibition (the conversion of a sinner should not be boastfully trumpeted to the world; it should exert its influence silently).—Christ the only Physician who can repair the mischiefs in God's creation.—How much knowledge of God may come through the senses.—Bauer: How many are still deaf and dumb towards the kingdom of God!

Klefeker: Even in the sufferings of His creature man, God finds His glory.—Reinhard: How we, as Christians, should sanctify to our own good the defects, infirmities, and sicknesses of our bodies.—Hüffell: The Christian's look to heaven.—Reinhard: The quiet unostentatious zeal with which Christians should do good.—Thiess: The deaf and dumb man is a type of us.—Couard: He took him out of the crowd apart.—Bomhard: The Ephphatha of our Redeemer: 1. A word of omnipotence and grace; 2. great and glorious in its effect; 3. it is uttered to all of us; 4. it is vain for many; 5. it proves its virtue on believers, ever more beautifully and abundantly; 6. will one day abolish for ever all our fetters.—Rautenberg: He hath done all things well: 1. Praise of His perfection—wonder; 2. praise of His benevolence—thanksgiving; 3. praise of His glory—adoration.

5. The Miraculous Healing of Four Thousand. (CHAP. viii. 1–9.)

Parallel: Matt. xv. 32–39.

1 In those days the multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Jesus called His disciples unto Him, and saith unto them, 2 I have compassion on the multitude, because they have now been with Me three days, and have nothing to eat; 3 And if I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way: for divers of them came from far. 4 And His disciples answered Him, From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness? 5 And He asked them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven. 6 And He commanded the people to sit down on the ground: and He took the seven loaves, and gave thanks, and brake, and gave to His disciples to set before them; and they did set them before the people. 7 And they had a few small fishes: and He blessed, and commanded to set them also before them. 8 So they did eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets. 9 And they that had eaten were about four thousand: and He sent them away.

Ver. 1. Instead of παμπόλλου, B.D.G.L.M.Δ. read πάλιν πολλοῦ.—The ὁ Ἰησοῦ is probably an explanatory interpolation.

Ver. 2. Μοι is wanting in B.D.

Ver. 6. B.D.L.Δ. : παραγγέλλει.
Ver. 7. Καὶ εὐλογήσας αὐτὰ εἶπεν καὶ ταῦτα παρατιθέναι. B.L.Δ.
Ver. 9. The οἱ φαγόντες wanting in B.L.Δ. ; following ch. vi. 44.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels in Matthew.—Mark's second miraculous feeding, with the following events, stand in the same connection as Matthew's with the mountain travels of our Lord. There is not in the slightest particular a difference between Matthew and Mark. The representations of the second feeding are more than ordinarily alike in both : the beginning and the end, especially, are essentially the same.

2. And He blessed and commanded to set them also.—The Evangelist distinguishes the thanksgiving over the fish as a particular act, with the word εὐλογήσας, while concerning the bread he used εὐχαριστήσας. Both acts of devotion are to be regarded as benedictions of the food. But the prayer of praise (εὐλογεῖν) is related to the prayer of thanksgiving, as praise is related to thanks : it is the same thing carried to its higher pitch. That the thanksgiving becomes here blessing, characterizes the second act of the feeding, the festival anticipatory of the great feast; and it is all the more sublime as being pronounced over the ἰχθύδια ὀλίγα. The following Romanist distinction (Reischl) is without foundation: "Thanksgiving (eucharist) Jesus presents as man (and High Priest) to the Father; but He Himself, as Lord and God, distributes the blessing of omnipotence."

3. Seven baskets.—Compare the explanations on Matthew.

4. About four thousand men.—Matthew adds: besides women and children.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel passage in Matthew.—The divine side of the second miraculous healing is presented all the more expressly and clearly by the circumstance, that in the present instance the multitudes of the people were more alien, the scene of it was a place more desolate and remote from human habitation, the excitement of the people more intense; not to mention that Christ had just returned from an extended and fatiguing journey. As it respects the human side of the miracle, and its relation to the measure of faith, we cannot fail to observe the circumstance that a more abundant provision of food is made for a smaller number of the fed. As it regards the difference between the fragments gathered up in the two miracles respectively, we have to notice the distinction between σπυρίδες and κόφινοι: the former seem to have been vessels of larger capacity.

2. Starcke: Σπλαγχνίζεσθαι means such a feeling of compassion as not only moves the mind, but causes a physical emotion—the rush of blood, yearning of the bowels, etc.—likewise. The word is used several times concerning our Saviour by the three Evangelists. The greater the love of Jesus was, the more susceptible was His sacred humanity of sympathizing in it.

3. The first miraculous healing took place when the malignity of Herod occasioned the Lord's departure from Galilee; the second, after He had retired from Galilee before the hierarchical and pharisaic party. Both times as driven away, and as a refugee, He took upon Himself, forgetting His own sorrow, the needs of all the people.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—Christ's compassion towards the people was a compassion for their want of bread.—The Lord's resting-place after long travelling.—Christ does not let His people depart without food.—Where Christ is in the midst, the multitude never go away unfed.—The rebuke contained in the type: the people, viz., who waited on Christ three days, though they had nothing given them to eat.—The impotence of the disciples, and the Lord's provident care.—Christ's thanksgiving becomes blessing, whilst the provision is lessening.—Christ's royal law for the table.—The second miraculous feeding seemingly less, but in fact more, wonderful than the first. 1. Seemingly less: there was more provision, and a smaller number. 2. Really greater: a. in regard to the Lord (returning from long journey and much labour); b. in regard to the despondency of the disciples; c. in regard to the foreign elements of which the mass of this mountain people was made up (probably in part Gentiles).—Wells are made, as by the Lord, so by the pilgrims of Zion, passing through the valley of banishment, Ps. lxxxiv.—The Lord's heavenly peace in His earthly need: He is Himself as a refugee in great straits, and yet feeds with compassion a host of thousands. 1. The peace of God in the forgetfulness of His own distress. 2. The self-renouncing love of others in this forgetfulness.—To-day He gives the people a feast; to-morrow all sorrows await Him.

Starcke: True brotherly love does not look so much at the worthiness of the person as at his need and misery.—Believers may sometimes fall, even though Jesus be near, into temporal difficulties and need; but they do not and cannot come to harm or perish, Rom. viii. 35–39.—The Lord knows our need earlier and better than our complaints can tell Him.—Osiander: How different from these people are some Christians amongst us, who can scarcely tarry one hour with Christ's servants, hearing the divine word!—Preachers should care not only for the souls, but also for the bodies, of their hearers.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: When we truly love Jesus, we think little of the length or hardship of the way; we care nothing for want and weariness; but wait with Him, and prefer the kingdom of God to all other things.—Our unbelieving heart hangs on the means, and will believe nothing that it does not see, Matt. vi. 25–30.—We should thank God for everything, even for our scanty provision; He is bound to us for nothing.—(The breaking of bread.) When God puts anything into our hands, we should not keep it unbroken for ourselves alone, but break and dispense abundantly to others.—Canstein: Preachers should dispense the food of God's word among the people; but they should give to the multitude nothing which God has not first put in their mouth and in their heart. —The meek shall eat and be satisfied, Ps. xxii. 26.—The gifts of God satisfy the heart.—In every fragment there is God's blessing: therefore it is right to gather up the fragments.—With God it is all the same whether there be little or much.—Schleiermacher: He kept them near Him, and distributed spiritual gifts; nor did He remember their earthly need until He had found that they were filled with desires that extended much further. And this is the divine order in this connection between the spiritual and the temporal.—All earthly things, so far as they go beyond necessity, have value only so far as they are connected with the spiritual.

Heubner: Perseverance in hearing the word of God.—The design of Providence in letting us encounter earthly need.—Have we sought diligently, and first of all, heavenly things?—Trust in God when the season of scarcity comes.—The preventing providence of God, and His anticipating care.—The Christian's anxious observance of his neighbour's need.—God can bring help by small means.—Giving is better than receiving.—Christ's miracle as a figure of the miracle of divine sustentation.—Jesus as Householder.—The Christian householder after the pattern of Jesus: 1. Watchfulness, and attention to all needs; 2. love and sympathy for the distress of each; 3. trust in God when the question is, Whence shall we get? (Do the best: God will do the rest in His own way); 4. spiritual care of all who belong to Him.—How our partaking of food may be sanctified.—Rambach: How may the Christian give God His honour in the enjoyment of his daily food?—Marheineke: The Christian should always see a higher significance in the means of his daily sustentation.—Harms: Instruction concerning table-worship.—Dietsch: The miracle in our nourishment.—Hüffell: The divine blessing on our food.—Mehliss: The glorifying of God in the care of His creatures.—Reinhard: The connection between the necessity of nourishment in order to the sustentation of our bodies, and the growth and nourishment of our souls.—Valerius Herberger: How should the guests at God's table comport themselves?—Heubner: Jesus the holy people's Friend.—Burk: Jesus Christ supplies all our need out of His riches in glory.—Stier: The miraculous blessing of God's power, as shown, 1. in the domain of nature, and 2. in the kingdom of grace. —Ulber: The meal blessed by prayer.—The compassionate heart of Jesus moaning over all our misery.—Couard: Reproof of the prevalent complaint over hard times.—Reinhard: Christian benevolence at a time of general need.—Bauer: When Christ's blessing rests on anything, it becomes infinitely more than it was in the hands of men.

EIGHTH SECTION.

THE DECISIVE CONFLICT WITH THE PHARISEES IN GALILEE. JESUS RETURNS TO THE EASTERN SIDE OF THE SEA. PREPARATIONS FOR THE NEW CHURCH.

CHAPTER VIII. 10–IX. 21.

1. Return to the Galilean Shore. Conflict; Return; the Leaven of the Pharisees and the Leaven of Herod. (VERS. 10–21.)

Parallel: Matt. xvi. 1–12.

10 And straightway He entered into a ship with His disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha. 11 And the Pharisees came forth, and began to question with Him, seeking of Him a sign from heaven, tempting Him. 12 And He sighed deeply in His spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek after a sign? Verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation. 13 And He left them, and entering into the ship again, departed to the other side. 14 Now the disciples had forgotten to take bread, neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf. 15 And He charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod. 16 And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have no bread. 17 And when Jesus knew it, He saith unto them, Why reason ye because ye have no bread? perceive ye not yet, neither understand? have ye your heart yet hardened? 18 Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember, 19 When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? They say unto Him, Twelve. 20 And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And they said, Seven. 21 And He said unto them, How is it that ye do not understand?

Ver. 13. The πάλιν is before ἐμβάς, according to many codd. Εἰς τὸ πλοῖον (Rec.), or εἰς πλοῖον (Lachm., after A.E.F.), wanting in B.C.L.D., and omitted by Tisch.

Ver. 16. The λέγοντες wanting in B.D. and Itala.; and B. Itala read afterwards ἔχουσιν. So Lach. and Tisch.

Ver. 17. Yet. Ἔτι not in B.C.D.L.Δ.

Ver. 21. Lach.: πῶς οὔπω, according to A.D.M. Tisch. merely οὔπω, according to C.L.D. So Meyer.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on Matthew.—What follows is here closely and certainly connected with the preceding; and in this Matthew and Mark concur, as also in the essentials of the whole. Mark passes over the rebuke of Christ in relation to the Pharisees' knowledge of the weather, and also the sign of Jonas. On the other hand, he mentions the Lord's deep sighing. He notices the circumstance that the disciples had with them in the ship one loaf. Instead of the leaven of the Sadducees, he has the leaven of Herod; and he gives most keenly the Lord's rebuke of the unbelief of the disciples.

2. Dalmanutha was a small place, not otherwise known; it lay probably in the district of Magdala, where, according to Matthew, Jesus landed. Robinson (iii. 514) leaves it undecided whether or not the present village of Delhemija is its modern representative. The specifications of locality by the two Evangelists respectively are not to be referred to any relation of earlier and later accounts: Matthew's narrative has a more general cast, and Mark's a more special, in these respects. The landing was manifestly in a desert and unfrequented place; and the reason of this was, that the Galilean party of Pharisees were on the alert to seize Jesus, in order to bring Him under a judicial process; for this purpose having many spies abroad. The first critical illustration of this is found in Mark

ii. 6; the second, ch. iii. 22; the third (in connection with ch. vi. 29–31), ch. vii. 1. That allegation touching neglect of purifyings, which the Pharisees, in connection with the scribes from Jerusalem, made against Him, is carried out here into its last issues.

3. And the Pharisees came forth.—Meyer: "Out of their dwellings in that country." People generally come out of their dwellings; but these men came forth as spies out of a hiding-place; and their coming was proof that the most extreme care as to the circumstances of the landing of Jesus, in a quiet place and in the dead of night, could no longer protect the Lord from their eyes (see on Matthew, and Leben Jesu ii. 875). On the western side of the sea there might be, here and there, rich mansions, belonging to Herodian courtiers, which were well adapted to be loopholes of observance for the political and hierarchical party. According to Matt. xvi. 1, 2, the Sadducees were leagued with them. The act, therefore, was not merely an act of the pharisaic school, but the act of the priests and politicians. Mark merges the Sadducees in the Pharisees; for they hypocritically played the Pharisee, inasmuch as they demanded a sign from heaven, although they believed in no such thing.

4. And began.—They had made their arrangements for a decisive contest, which began with the demand of the sign from heaven. For this sign, see on Matthew, Cr. Note 3.

5. Sighing in His spirit.—Comp. ch. vii. 34. He sighed so deeply, not merely in general sorrow for the hardened unbelief of these men, but also in the feeling that the decisive crisis of severance from the predominant party had come. For the demand of a sign from heaven was a demand that He should, as the Messiah of their expectation, accredit Himself by a great miracle; thus it was fundamentally similar to the temptation in the wilderness, which He had repelled and overcome. But His deep sigh also signifies here the holding in of His judicial power, the silent resolution to enter upon the path of tribulation. Hence the denial of the sign is immediate, and in the form of an affirmation most strongly uttered. It is to be observed that the Article being wanting, the nature of the sign from heaven is left free to Him: He was to perform a sign from heaven, which should be acknowledged as the sign from heaven.

6. And the leaven of Herod.—See on Matthew; and for the combination of Pharisees and Herodians, compare the notes on Mark iii. 6. The one passage depends on the other; and it is ob-servable how Mark both times gives marked prominence to this hypocritical and malignant combination of extreme parties. Meyer concludes from Matt. xiv. 2, that Herod was no Sadducee. But that passage must not be pressed too far. Herod certainly coincided with the antiscriptural, anti-Messianic, Hellenizing universalism of the Sadducees, although he did not adhere to their party in its dogmatic views and colouring. Thus we have here only two aspects of the same idea. The Jewish dependence of traditions and human ordinances, and the Jewish freethinking, form in their respective principles the two kinds of leaven which the disciples were to guard against. Compare on Matthew.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel of Matthew.—The debasing effects of party spirit. The Sadducees must here submit to the Pharisees, and be merged in them.

2. As it regards the desired sign from heaven, it is to be observed further: 1. As they asked for a sign from heaven, they demanded the decisively attesting sign expected from heaven. 2. The consequence of this authentication would have been, that Christ must have come forward as a Messiah in their sense. Hence it is said that they tempted Him. The demand of a sign from heaven was like the temptation in the wilderness. The Lord had hitherto, since that time, escaped any such demand. If He now refused it, His death was certain. 3. The demand was so far not absolutely hostile, as they were still disposed to accept Christ, if He would adapt Himself to their views, and become a party instrument for their purposes. (See on Matthew.) 4. The sign from heaven which Christ denied to the Pharisees, stood in close relation with the sign of Jonas. The denial of the one was the announcement of the other. 5. What He denied to the Pharisees, He provided soon afterwards for the three chosen disciples on the Mount: the heavenly sign of His transfiguration.

3. The sighs of Jesus.—The Lord's sigh (ch. vii. 34) was the sigh of self-devoting mercy to the world; His deep sigh (ch. viii. 12) was the restraint and holding back of His judicial power over the world, under the holy resolution to suffer for it. The sigh of the Lion of Judah over the hardening of His enemies: the prophecy of His path of suffering, but also the prophecy of the world's judgment. The groaning of His spirit was, 1. a sighing from the ground of His being, 2. in the all-embracing glance of His consciousness over the path of His own suffering, and the path of the world's wretchedness.

4. The return of Jesus.—Not without a plan, but as the result of His last experience, Jesus now returns back to the eastern bank. It is clear to His consciousness that He must now go up to confront His death. He therefore needed solitude, that He might regulate the process of His departure. And to this there was necessary, 1. the confirmation of the disciples in faith for the establishment of the new Church, and 2. the provision that His death should take place at the right time and in the right way.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—The Pharisees perfect spies on all our Lord's ways.—The Lord cannot escape the Pharisees, nor can the Pharisees escape the Lord.—The demand of a sign from heaven: the tempting crisis that our Lord foresaw in the wilderness.—The confusion of the disciples, occasioned by this decisive conflict (and shown in the forgetting of bread, and anxiety about it), as opposed to the divine repose of the Lord: a prelude of their confusion on the eve of the Passion.—The great decisive No of the Lord.—The Lord's deep sigh in its great significance: 1. A silent and yet decisive sign of His conflict and of His victory; 2. an unuttered word, which contains a world of divine words; 3. a fulfilment of the primitive prophecy concerning the breach between the external and the spiritual Israel; 4. a prophecy which stretches forward to the cross and the final judgment.—The infinite meaning of this sigh of Christ: 1. As a breathing forth of the divine patience over the visible world (Omnipotence restraining itself in love and wisdom, when dealing with the enmity of the free will of the world); 2. a collective expression of all the sufferings and of all the patience of Christ; 3. a declaration of all the incarnate sorrow and endurance of the Lord in His Church.—The significance of sighs: 1. In the creature (Rom. viii. 22); 2. in humanity, and in the kingdom of God (Rom. viii. 23; 2 Cor. v. 2; Rev. vi. 10).—The return of Christ to the other bank: a sign of His return back to the other world.—How little the disciples understood that crisis.—The last loaf in the ship; the last loaf in the house (the last meal, the last piece of money, the last sheet-anchor).—In this matter, mark, 1. the disciples' spirit: they misinterpret the most sublime and the most spiritual things through their own over-anxiety; 2. the Lord's spirit: He makes provision for the testing of His disciples, especially now.—The displeasure of Christ at the lack of spiritual development among His own disciples.—True remembering, in its full import: 1. Christian wakefulness; 2. Christian life; 3. Christian progress.—The influence of the Holy Spirit, and life in the Spirit: bringing to remembrance (John xiv. 26, xvi. 13).—The retreat of Jesus in order to arrange His death.

Starcke: Many desire new wonders; and when they have thought they have seen them, have not yet turned to God.—It is not becoming to prescribe to God the means by which we are to arrive at divine knowledge and blessedness.—Hedinger: Ingratitude drives Christ away.—Quesnel: It is a fearful judgment when the truth altogether forsakes men, and they are left to themselves.—Their forgetfulness gave an opportunity for new instruction; and thus even their failings are turned to the account of believers.—Cramer: Faithful teachers should, after the example of the Great Shepherd, diligently warn their sheep against false doctrine and false teachers (against every evil leaven to the right or left).—Out of one error many others gradually arise, so that the whole system of religion may become perverted.—Quesnel: Concerning the tendency to Sadduceism among courtiers.—The weaker our faith is, the more anxious and troubled we are about bodily need, and the more likely to make spiritual possessions of less account.—Osiander: Ministers must be always ready to exhort their hearers with severity, and to rouse them out of the sleep of security.

Braune: When, after a joyful event, or the attainment of a great success, one is suddenly opposed by an obstinate contradiction, the result is often great disquietude or blank despondency. The Lord, whose case this was on the present occasion, knew very well what He would do, and did it without any restraint. Let all men learn this. They need the lesson in their family circles, and in their civil and political relations, whether more or less exalted.—Scarcely had Jesus ended with His enemies, when He must begin again with His friends.—Before His spirit rose the whole wickedness of His enemies' spirit, so perverse in itself, pervading with evil the whole of the people, and invading even His disciples. It had already seized and possessed the mind of Judas, 1 Cor. v. 7, 8.

Schleiermacher: The Redeemer often uses the idea of leaven, as something of which only a little is needed in order to make the whole like itself.—In truth, He was the leaven, in the form of a servant indeed, destined to penetrate the whole mass of mankind and all human life by the divine power dwelling in Him.—If ye use only a little of the leaven of the Pharisees, ye will very soon be pervaded throughout with its influence.—The leaven of Herod: the family of Herod was a foreign one; they held to the law, and affected much devotion to ceremonial ordinances, in order to attach the people more firmly to themselves. The disciples must not use Christianity as something that might exert a good influence upon their external condition.—We must be pure disciples of the Master, and desire nothing but the pure kingdom of God.—Gossner (on ver. 19): This is a test. They had the whole history in their head and memory, but they did not understand how to apply it.

2. The Blind Man in Eastern Bethsaida. (Vers. 22–26.)

22 And He cometh to Bethsaida; and they bring a blind man unto Him, and besought Him to touch him. 23 And He took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town; and when He had spit on his eyes, and put His hands upon him, He asked him if he saw ought. 24 And he looked up, and said, I see men as trees, walking. 25 After that He put His hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up; and he was restored, and saw every man clearly. 26 And He sent him away to his house, saying, Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town.

Ver. 22. The Plur. ἔρχονται, after B.C.D. Lach., Tisch.

Ver. 24. The beautiful reading: βλέπω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, ὅτι ὡς δένδρα ὁρῶ περιπατοῦντας. Griesb., Lach., Tisch., following the preponderance of authorities.

Ver. 25. Tisch., διέβλεψεν, after B.C*.L.Δ., etc.

Ver. 26. Following Cod. A., Rec., Lach. Tisch. omits the clause about telling no man, after B.L., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Mark alone records this history of Christ's healing works during the time of His final mountain travels along the Gaulonite range, on the eastern side of the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee. The remembrances of Peter preserved for us these special treasures, belonging to a time so pre-eminently memorable to him and his spiritual development. But we have too often observed the peculiar feeling of Mark for the gradual, natural, progressive development of the kingdom of God (see his parables, and the final record of miracles), not to feel sure this period of the ministry and work of Jesus would strongly rivet his attention.

2. To Bethsaida.—It is evident that the Bethsaida of the western coast, in Galilee (John xii. 21), is not here meant, as Theophylact and others have supposed; but, as Grotius rightly perceived, it was Bethsaida Julias, which lay upon the north-eastern coast of the Sea of Tiberias. Reland was the first to indicate that there were two Bethsaidas. Josephus tells us (Antiq. 18, 2, 1), that the tetrarch Philip, who ruled only in the eastern part of Galilee, made the village of Bethsaida into a town, and named it Julias, after the daughter of Augustus. (See also De Bell. Jud. 11, 9, 1; and Jerome on Matt. xvi.) According to Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 15), Julias was situated on the farther coast of the Sea of Galilee; according to Josephus, on the Jordan, 120 stadia above its junction with the sea. Pococke thought the ruins of Taluy, on the east side of the Jordan, marked the ancient Julias; Seetzen thought the same of a little village, Tellanihje; and Robinson, the ruins of Et-Tell. According to Luke ix. 10, the first miraculous feeding also took place in a desert place near this same Bethsaida. See von Raumer, Palæstina, S. 109. Bethsaida lay in the way from the sea towards Cæsarea Philippi, in the higher mountain range, a district to which Jesus subsequently returned.

3. A blind man.—What follows shows that he was not born blind, but had become so. He had evidently seen men and trees aforetime.

4. And led him out of the town.—Here the separation from all others is still more effectual than in the case of the healing of the deaf and dumb man, ch. vii. 33. In addition to the motive already mentioned for performing His works as much as possible in retirement, viz., that He might insure His own decease in Jerusalem, we may assume that there was also a pædagogic element that influenced Him on the present occasion. The deaf and dumb man could not hear His voice, but only see His signs; this blind man could not see Him, he could only hear Him speak and feel His hand. Thus it was a test and a discipline of his faith, when he was led into solitude: a test and exercise which probably was still much needed by him.

5. And when He had spit on his eyes.—See the notes on ch. vii. 33, and John ix.

6. I see men.—Expression of joy.—As trees; that is, I see men walking, large and unformed as trees. A distinct figure of an indistinct, twilight beholding. It was the first stage of healing. According to Euthymius Zigabenus, He healed the man by degrees, because his faith was weak, and the gradual experience of recovered sight would lead him to a higher degree of faith. In relation to this, we may observe the strikingly passive bearing of this blind man, as of the deaf and dumb man before: with this we may compare the passiveness of the impotent man at Bethesda, John v. According to Olshausen, a too rapid process of recovery might have been injurious, and the gradual cure had regard to the eyes themselves. But this and the preceding notion we leave to the reader's consideration; they may have a certain degree of force. But if we combine all the traits of this and the foregoing history, we see that Jesus designedly repressed the fame of His miraculous works in a district where He was seeking an asylum of perfect retirement, in order to settle everything with His disciples; at a time, too, when for their sake and His own absolute solitude was essentially necessary with reference to the decision of the future. But the symbolical significance of these miraculous dealings—as bringing the divine power into gradual contact and contest with human nature—was more expressly brought out for the instruction of His disciples than in most of His miracles of healing.—The persons who appeared to the half-seeing man were probably his companions, and other sympathizing people, who looked on in restless movement.

7. To his house.—He did not belong to Bethsaida, and he must go immediately from the place to his own home—not even to the village to which he had already come. Indeed, he was not to mention it to any one dwelling in that village, and whom he might meet in the way. This explanation of the last expression is not, as Meyer terms it, an invention to meet a difficulty; it is the obvious and only natural meaning of the expression. Even the man's companions should find him recovered and seeing, only when they reached home; that is, if they were not permitted to be present at the healing.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Christ sought with His disciples the deepest solitude among the mountains. His feeling was that of an anticipation of His death, and all things in the signs of the times said, Set Thine house, Thy Church, in order! In this journey the people who brought the blind man interrupted Him, and there seemed danger of His way being embarrassed. It is true that this did not hinder His healing the man, but He healed him in the most undemonstrative and hidden manner. The secrecy of the performance was paralleled by the extraordinary care with which He sent the blind man to his own house, under a prohibition to speak to any man in the neighbourhood concerning the miracle. The blind man, however, was not merely means to an end; his own spiritual edification was in question also. Since his faith was weak, his spiritual state required the protection of solitude: only in the profoundest silence could the blessing of his experience ripen into perfection. But, thirdly, we must not forget the Lord's reference to those who surrounded the blind man. They asked that He would touch him. To this demand of an instant act, followed by an instant influence, the Lord opposed His own slow and circumstantial method of procedure. So also in the case of the deaf and dumb man of the same country: they asked Him that He would lay His hand upon the man. And if in this district of indistinct, half-heathen notions there was any idea arising of a magical influence on the part of Christ, His wisdom dispersed these foolish imaginations. He made prominent, 1. the religious aspect of the act; and 2. the struggle in His own spirit connected with its performance.

2. This present narrative illustrates how Christ performed His miracles in the most absolute relf-renunciation (at the most unseasonable time); with the most profound humility (without any desire for honour among men); and with the most supreme wisdom and confidence.

3. The healing of the blind man at Bethsaida, like some other similar miracles, was especially fitted and intended to exhibit the harmony of miracle with nature, the natural momenta of the miracle, the gradual entrance of the divine power into the old nature, and its issues in the new nature.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Lord, deeply occupied with thoughts of His cross and of His death, does not repel as an interruption the cry of the wretched. —The festal season of the Prophet's miracles is passing away, because the season of the high-priestly miraculous sufferings is drawing near.—The healing of the blind man at Bethsaida a testimony of the heavenly wisdom of the Lord: 1. In respect to Himself; 2. in respect to the blind man: he should not first see the multitudes of starers in the street, but the Lord in His solitary glory, and thus would he be taught more fully the lesson of faith; 3. in respect to the people around; 4. in respect to the disciples.—Abundant as the essence of the life of Christ was, His actions are equally abundant in their forms.—Christ, in performing His miracles, avoided a fixed and uniform manner, in order to obviate all the idle superstitious notions of a magical influence.—How the mind, contemplating the same unchanging fundamental forms, has a tendency to become mechanical in its views.—As the wonder-working power of Christ's hand of blessing wrought in many fleeting forms of action, so also the fundamental forms of the ministerial work of the Church, in teaching, worship, and life, should be moulded, moved, and inspired by the life of the Divine Spirit.—The education of the blind man into faith.—The gradual return of the blind man's sight, a type of the gradual illumination of the soul.—Even the spiritually awakened see at first men as trees, indistinctly, unformed, without definite distinctions.—I see men as trees. This represents, as it may be viewed, different conditions of the spiritual life: 1. It is a happy state, if it is the first stage towards clearly seeing in perfect knowledge; 2. it is a gloomy and uncertain state, if the Christian should remain in it; 3. worst of all, if through his own guilt he should return to this stage, falling into the new blindness of despair.—The blessed experience of the first believing look: a strengthening of faith, which becomes the transition to perfect sight.—Go not into the town: a solemn word concerning Bethsaida.—Bethsaida the modern city of the world, with an imperial name; and Bethsaida the town of the fishermen: the dark and the bright side.—How Jesus avoids the fame of His works, in order that He may seek in the shame of His sufferings His highest honour and glory.

Starcke: Christ's gifts within us change with times.—Canstein: A weak and slight beginning is yet a beginning; and in God's methods a little is intended to become gradually greater.—Quesnel: The cure of spiritual blindness is only begun on earth; it will be fully accomplished only in heaven.—Osiander: God often turns away our misfortune, and mends our unhappiness, by slow degrees: have patience!—Solitude and stillness after conversion is much safer than much talk and running about.—We should let the truth take firm root in us, before we speak much about it.—The converted man must take care not to turn round again to the world.—Canstein: Fearful judgment, when God reckons a man, or a city, or a land, no longer worthy of the knowledge of His word and works.

Gerlach: The gradualness of the operation is often our first inward assurance of the certainty of the change.—Rieger: Do not despise slight means [with application to the spittle].—Braune: Men must be ever known, not as trees, as perishable plants, but as rational creatures, called to eternal glory.—Before all, however, he came to know Jesus aright: to know Him clearly is eternal life.

Schleiermacher: the cure of the blind man in its resemblance to the next section: 1. The withdrawing to a place apart (special reasons for this in both cases respectively); 2. the gradual work (men as trees: obscure views concerning Christ); 3. the Redeemer's care as to what men say of Him; 4. the sight restored, and the confession of Peter.

3. The Opinions of the People, and Peter's Confession. Fore-announcement of Sufferings. Concerning the Following of Jesus. (Chap. viii. 27–ix. 1.)

Parallels: Matt. xvi. 13–28; Luke ix. 18–27.

27 And Jesus went out and His disciples into the towns of Cæsarea Philippi: and by the way He asked His disciples, saying unto them, Whom do men say that I am? 28 And they answered, John the Baptist: but some say, Elias; and others, One of the prophets. 29 And He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Peter answereth and saith unto Him, Thou art the Christ. 30 And He charged them that they should tell no man of Him. 31 And He began to teach them, that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again. 32 And He spake that saying openly. And Peter took Him, and began to rebuke Him. 33 But when He had turned about, and looked on His disciples, He rebuked Peter, saying, Get thee behind Me, Satan: for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men. 34 And when He had called the people unto Him, with His disciples also, He said unto them, Whosoever will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. 35 For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for My sake and the Gospel's, the same shall save it. 36 For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? 37 Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? 38 Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of Me, and of My words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of His Father, with the holy angels.

1 And He said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power.

Ver. 28. See Tischendorf. According to B.C*.D.L.Δ., Lachmann and Tisch. add αὐτῷ λέγοντες.

Ver. 29. Ἐπηρώτα αὐτοὺς, after B.C.D., is the reading of Lach. and Tisch.

Ver. 34. B.C*.D.L.Δ. read εἴ τις instead of ὅστις. A.B. have ἐλθεῖν instead of ἀκολουθεῖν.

Ver. 35. Τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, Codd. A.D., etc.

Ver. 37. Tisch., τί γὰρ, after B.L.Δ.; he also omits δώσει ἄνθρωπος.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on Matthew and Luke.—In respect to time, this is another section which stands in strict internal connection with the preceding crises. There are some important peculiarities in Mark. Matthew mentions the district of Cæsarea Philippi, Mark the villages which surrounded it, as the first goal to which our Lord aimed; and the latter transfers the question to the way thither. Among the people's thoughts and verdicts concerning Jesus, he omits the mention of Jeremiah. It is observable that he leaves out the benediction of Peter, and the special prerogative assigned to him after his confession. Luke also omits these, while Matthew details them all in full. Here, as elsewhere, Peter, his informant and voucher, omitted or kept in reserve points which tended to his own honour. On the other hand, Mark states prominently that the Lord's prediction of His passion was part of the instruction which He openly gave; he also quotes the Saviour's rebuking word to Peter, "Satan," without any of the definite explanatory particulars which Matthew gives, and without His "Thou art to Me a σκάνδαλον." Mark speaks of the people as also called by Jesus to hear the statement of the universal law of the passion and His people's suffering. He alone has the emphatic word, that he who is ashamed of the Lord is ashamed of Him (in a disgraceful manner) in an adulterous and sinful generation. In conclusion, Mark represents the coming of Christ more expressly than the other two Evangelists as a coming in power (majesty); while Luke speaks of His kingdom, and Matthew of His appearing in that kingdom.

2. After three days.—General and popular way of speaking, instead of "on the third day," which afterwards is used as the more definite statement.

3. And when He had called the people unto Him.—This scarcely requires us to understand great multitudes. But Christ makes the people who were present sharers in this part of His instruction, in order to impress it the more upon His disciples that the way of the passion was absolutely imperative, and in order to lay down the fundamental laws of self-denial and sacred suffering in all their universality of application.

4. In exchange for: ransom-price.—The ἀντάλλαγμα of the counter-price over against the price, ἄλλαγμα. The price which the earthly-minded man gives for the world, the ἄλλαγμα, is his soul. But, after having laid that down as the price, what has he for an ἀντάλλαγμα, to buy the soul back again?

5. There be some standing among you.—See on Matthew.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.

2. According to Mark, Jesus first called and collected the Twelve in the villages outside Nazareth (ch. vi. 6, 7); then, in the villages of Cæsarea Philippi, again gathering them together and confirming them. Solitude and sequestered probation, a condition of establishment and confirmation in the spiritual office.

3. It is of great significance that Peter does not, in his own Gospel, once mention the word of Christ concerning his own personal priority among the Apostles, least of all as the institution of an official primacy.

4. So it is to be observed how strictly, according to Mark, the confession of Christ is conjoined with the announcement of His passion, and with the requirement of following Him in the way of the Cross.

5. Let him take up his cross.—An obscure intimation of His own approaching suffering upon the cross, which, even in its general terms, gave a definite meaning. Let him hold himself ready to follow Me, regarded as the vilest malefactor, and exposed to the deepest shame and the most cruel death. The cross of Christ, as such, is not a kind of suffering which is the natural consequence of sin, but which crosses the views of an ideal or newly awakened higher life.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew; and compare Luke's parallel.—The question of Christ: "Whom say the people that I am?" a means of exciting a definite Christian consciousness, in opposition to the uncertain notions of the world.—The answer of the disciples in all its significance: 1. No man says, and no man could say without madness, that Christ was nothing, or a person of no importance. 2. The scorners and slanderers of Christ are not regarded or alluded to. 3. The testimonies or opinions: a. John the Baptist (according to Herod, back from the dead): thus Christianity was something ghostly and preternatural. b. Elias (in the sense of Malachi): thus they were not able to distinguish Elias from Christ. Christianity seemed to them as a power exerted after the manner of Elias; thus in a spiritual sense as something legal. c. One of the prophets: something indefinite, a spiritual power, which none could clearly understand.—The question was not, what the people said concerning Christ, but what the Apostles said concerning Him.—Christ could be preached as the Christ of all the world, only after the fulfilment of His passion as the Crucified and the Risen.—The confession of His people was to the Lord no sign that He would escape free from suffering, but a certain sign that He would suffer.—What it means, that the Lord announces His sufferings to the disciples without any restraint: 1. In reference to Himself, 2. to the disciples, 3. to the world.—Only after we have known the person of our Lord in His word and work, can we understand and bear the knowledge of Christ's work in His passion.—The true confession of Christ must be confirmed by a readiness to follow Him.—The suffering of Christ is a divine sympathy: 1. As suffering through and for the world, it sprang from His sympathy with the world; 2. it establishes a divine sympathy in the world, as suffering on its own account and with Christ.—Self-renunciation of the believer is the soul of the confession of Christ.—The fundamentals of the Christian fellowship: I. Its fundamental laws: 1. The true denier (of himself) is the true confessor; 2. the true cross-bearer is the true knight of the cross; 3. the true follower (of Christ in obedience) is the true conqueror. II. Its grounds: 1. He who will save his life in self-seeking, shall lose it; he who loses it in devotion to Christ, shall gain it. 2. He who lays down his soul to win the world, loses with his soul the world also; he who has gained his soul, has with his soul gained the world also. 3. To seek honour in the world while ashamed of Christ, leads to infamy before the throne of Christ; but shame in the world leads to honour with Him. 4. Readiness to die with Christ leads through death to the day of eternal glory.—It is in self-denial that we first find our true selves, recovering our personality again.—True self-denial is the raising our buried personality out of the grave of self-deceptions.—The false and the true self.—How shameful to be ashamed of Christ in an adulterous and sinful generation: 1. As the deification of a vanishing honour, which is eternal shame; 2. as the refusal of a vanishing shame, which is eternal honour.—How Christ detects the thoughts of men in His communion.

Starcke, Canstein: We may lawfully ask what others hold us for, if the question does not spring from pride, but from a desire to do ourselves or others good.—Hedinger: It is not wrong to be jealous of one's public repute. But Christ remains ever what He is, despite all the various opinions concerning Him.—Quesnel: The true knowledge of the secret mysteries of Christ is attained only by scholars of truth and light.—Here is a catechetical lesson given by Christ Himself.—All truths have a set time for their full revelation: we should be always careful that we do not prematurely speak, or anticipate that time, Eccles. iii. 7; Rom. vi. 6, 8.—The ungodly can do nothing against us but what the wise decree of God has already determined.—Bibl. Würt.: Flesh and blood always look rather at external danger and damage, than at the solemnity and claims of the vocation.—You must not watch Christ, but follow Him; you must not boast about Him, but act like Him.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: World gained, nothing gained; soul lost, all lost.—The greatest good is not to be met with in the transitory world, nor in the debauchery of the flesh: he whose soul is united with God has found it.—If thou art ashamed of Christ in His humble and lowly state, thou wilt have no part in His exalted and glorified state.—To die before one has seen the kingdom of God, is a wretched end.

Braune: The kingdom of God is, in a certain sense, near at all times: there is no season when its commencements are not manifest.—Gerlach: (Peter), rash and impetuous, spoke only, as he was wont to do, in the name of all the rest.

Gossner: He who opposes himself to the cross of Christ and its doctrine, is a Satan, even though his name were Peter.—In the kingdom of God is all the world inverted.—Losing is there called gaining, and gaining is there called losing.—Bauer, on ver. 35: The beginnings towards eternal life.

4. The Transfiguration. (VERS. 2–13.)

Parallels: Matt. xvii. 1–13; Luke ix. 28–36.

2 And after six days Jesus taketh with Him Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into an high mountain apart by themselves: and He was transfigured before them. 3 And His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them. 4 And there appeared unto them Elias with Moses: and they were talking with Jesus. 5 And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. 6 For he wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid. 7 And there was a cloud that overshadowed them: and a voice came out of the cloud, saying, This is My beloved Son; hear Him. 8 And suddenly, when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only with themselves. 9 And as they came down from the mountain, He charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of man were risen from the dead. 10 And they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean. 11 And they asked Him, saying, Why say the scribes that Elias must first come? 12 And He answered and told them, Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man, that He must suffer many things, and be set at nought. 13 But I say unto you, That Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed, as it is written of him.

Ver. 3. The ὡς χιών is omitted by B.C.L.Δ., probably on account of the strange comparison.

Ver. 7. Most codd., λαλήσει: other readings, λαλήσῃ, ἀποκριθῇ.—B.C.D.L.Δ. have ἐγένοντο instead of ἦσαν.—B.C.L.Δ. read ἐγένετο, with Luke ix. 35.

Ver. 8. B.D. read εἰ μή, with Matt. xvii. 8.

Ver. 12. Tisch.: ὁ δὲ ἔφη, after B.C.L.Δ. and several versions.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke.—This narrative stands in a definite historical connection with what precedes (ver. 1); as it does also in the accounts of Matthew and Luke. In regard to the locality, we may refer to our notes upon the scene in Matthew. The Tabor tradition is sufficiently accounted for by the manifestation of Christ upon the mountain in Galilee, Matt. xxviii. In describing the effect of the transfiguration, Mark uses the strongest illustrations ("white as snow," etc., "as no fuller," etc.). He, in common with Luke, records that Peter knew not what he was saying, or what he wanted to say. But he alone has the sudden vanishing of the heavenly visitors, and the inquiring look around on the part of the disciples. He joins Matthew in communicating the Lord's dealing with the disciples on coming down from the mountain. But he alone observes that the disciples questioned among themselves what the rising from the dead should mean. On the other hand, he omits, what Luke mentions, that Moses and Elias (ὀφθέντες ἐν δόξῃ) conversed with Jesus concerning His decease in Jerusalem. So only Luke has the delicate notices of the slumbrous and yet wakeful condition of the beholding disciples; while Matthew, on his part, alone applies the Lord's word concerning the Elias who had already appeared to John the Baptist. Mark narrates the history of the transfiguration in his own characteristic manner, exhibiting its main traits in vivid and living touches.

2. After six days.—See on Matthew.

3. No fuller on earth.—The white glitter was supernatural. Gerlach: "In ancient times they wore but few coloured garments. The fuller's business was to wash what was soiled, and to make it clean and glistening." Starcke: "They used in the East to make linen garments so beautiful that they glittered with whiteness; but such as these the Lord's garments now outshone. The white colour was that which the Romans called candorem, and which was so clear and so deep as to glisten gloriously. Materials prepared of such linen or other materials were, among the Jews, appropriated to priests and kings. Such garments also were in high estimation among other people, especially among the Romans. They were worn only by the highest personages, who were by such garments distinguished from those below them; hence, when they were seeking high offices of state, they distinguished themselves by such clothing, and were called candidati. And since among the Romans the glittering white upon their garments was refined to the highest lustre by art, and the Jews had been long in the habit of endeavouring to imitate it, we can understand the phrase, That no fuller on earth could so whiten them. That Solomon's magnificence was white, has been gathered from the fact that his array was likened to the lilies of the field (Matt. vi. 28, 29). What kind of glory was that of Herod's royal apparel, spoken of in Acts xii. 21, is shown in Josephus, Antiq. xix. 7.

4. Not knowing what he would say.—His words were an utterance of immediate feeling, expressing a state of perfect complacency after the manner of dreams, ecstasies, and visions, in figure—in figurative language which came to him he knew not whence.

5. They were sore afraid.—Matthew observes that, after the sound heard, they fell on their faces and were sore afraid. But there is no real difference. For their trepidation began naturally at the beginning, and continued increasing throughout. Matthew describes its climax; whilst Mark mentions the disciples' fear only for the sake of explaining the words of Peter.

6. And they kept that saying with themselves.—Luke ix. 36. They concealed the fact after that word. Fritzsche: They held fast the prohibition of Jesus. Meyer, on the contrary: They kept the words concerning the resurrection, and pondered them. The second, indeed, followed from the first. While they religiously kept their silence down to the day of His resurrection, they must have often asked when and how the bond of secrecy would be relaxed. Starcke: "It requires much effort to overcome the tendency in beginners to prate. The word κρατεῖν shows it was not without trouble, and without putting much restraint upon themselves, that the disciples kept this secret so long. The other disciples probably put questions, etc."

7. The resurrection from the dead.—That is, this express and particular resurrection from the dead which the Lord had predicted for Himself.

8. And doth restore all things.—The way and manner in which Elias should do this (the idea is still indefinite, in the Present) is explained by what follows: And how is it written concerning the Son of man? What holds good of Him, that He must suffer many things, holds good also of His forerunner. This introduces the subsequent thought: Elias is come already. The punctuation given above, according to which the note of interrogation stands after "Son of man" (Lachmann, Meyer), gives a clearer and more emphatic idea than the customary position of the note of interrogation after "be rejected." Instead of καί, one would in the latter case expect a particle of opposition; and the construction of ver. 13 should then have been different. Another construction is this: Elias cometh and restoreth all things. And how? It is written, etc.

9. How is it written concerning the Son of man?—That is, his restoring all things proceeds, like the work of the Son of man, through sufferings and death.

10. That He must suffer many things.—The ἵνα is here especially striking. Meyer says, that it sets before us the design of the γέγραπται. We take the sentence as a breviloquence, referring to what precedes—"Elias cometh first." And how is it written of the Son of man, sc. that He cometh? In order that (ἵνα) He may suffer, etc.

11. As it is written of him.—That is, in the persecution of this real Elias. See 1 Kings i. 19. (Grotius, Meyer.) That the unworthy treatment of the prophets is included, is proved by the previous verse, where from the impending sufferings of the Messiah the conclusion is drawn that Elias-John must also suffer.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew.

2. The transitory transformation of Christ a prelude of His abiding transformation. The transfiguration, as a transition into the second higher condition of human nature, was like the glorification. The transfiguration has the glorification for its result: the glorification is conditioned by the transfiguration. Into this condition the glorified Christ will raise His people also, 1 Cor. xv. But the glorification is the consummated, internal, spiritual power and glory, exalted above the changed, creaturely life, and manifested as the perfected light of life.

3. According to the privately communicated opinion of a respected Romanist theologian—personally unknown to me—the transfiguration upon the mountain was a night-scene. This was Schleiermacher's opinion also (in his Sermons on the Gospel of Mark). In favour of this supposition we may observe, 1. that the transfiguration of Jesus followed a solemn season of prayer; and we know that He commonly held these solemn seasons of prayer in the night; 2. that Luke mentions their having gone down from the mountain on the day after that event. The transfiguration has, by being considered as a night-scene, a peculiarly mysterious light shed upon it.

4. As on the baptism of Christ His personal divine-human consciousness came to full maturity, so was here consummated the consciousness of His perfected prophetic work of word and deed. The goal of His prophetic work in the narrower sense was already reached. As Jesus, regarded in Himself, apart from His connection with sinful humanity, as the personally perfected God-man, might at His baptism have ascended into heaven, if He had willed to sever His destiny from that of mankind—so He might, as Prophet of deed and Prophet of the New Testament word of revelation, with the consummated consciousness of having done His prophetic work, have made the Mount of Transfiguration the Mount of Ascension. The authority already referred to brings this out very excellently; and we also have alluded to it, with less distinctness, in the Leben Jesu ii. 908. "In fact, this was the moment (when the cloud received Jesus, and separated Him from the disciples) to teach them that He had power to retain His life, and that it was only free love that made Him leave the fellowship of the heavenly beings, and go down with His disciples into the valley of death."

5. Moses and Elias conversed with the Lord, according to Luke, concerning His departure in Jerusalem. The unknown expositor just alluded to thinks that these men appeared to the Lord as representatives from the kingdom of the dead, that they might add their argument to ensure His voluntary determination to encounter the sufferings of death, and thus redeem those who were held in the realm of death, or generally complete His work of redemption. The gratuitous and unwarranted idea of the intercession of the saints for the dead will not prevent our doing justice to the penetration of this view. But there are two things to be noticed: 1. According to Luke, Moses and Elias appear to the Lord in glory (ver. 31), not as supplicating intercessors; 2. Christ had already much earlier foreannounced His passion: His baptism itself was, in this relation, decisive in its force as a preintimation. But that the kingdom of the dead had some interest in the voluntary determination of Christ to go on His way of suffering, Ebrard has well shown, and remarks: "In the transfiguration, Jesus had given the fathers of the ancient covenant the blessed intelligence of His perfect readiness to redeem them by His own death." Comp. Leben Jesu ii. 909.

6. Let us make here three tabernacles.—A significant Future is added: for he knew not what he would say (λαλήσει). The man in ecstasy (as in a dream) brings the feeling or the thought; but the figure or form of the thought is imparted to him according to the secret laws that rule the figurate perception and language of the visionary condition. Thus came the form of the figure to Peter: "build three tabernacles, one for Thee," etc., as an expression for his blessed feelings which he would utter.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew. So also Luke.—Between the confession and the transfiguration lies the week of temporal trials.—The mountain of prayer is the mountain of transfiguration.—The revelation of the life of Christ in His glorification here, a promise and sign for His people, 2 Cor. v.—The Lord's heavenly beauty.—Christ at the turning-point of His deeds and sufferings: by festal remembrance and sacrificial consecration glorified.—Consecration to the Lord changes man: 1. Internally: he is elevated into the spiritual world, and surrounded by blessed spirits. 2. Externally: he is renewed, adorned, transfigured.—The only true adornment of men: divine life of the Spirit.—Man upon the mountain: the first Sunday festival of the youthful Church of the confession.—The transfiguration a sign and symbol of the Sunday, of the ascension, of the new paradise.—The wish of Peter; or, the ideals of young Christians and the Lord's training: 1. Ideals of young Christians: that of retaining their early experiences, that of entire separation from the world, life of contemplation. 2. The Lord's guidance: further onward, deeper, higher.—All else comes and goes: Jesus alone abides.—Moses and Elias vanish from the disciples at His glory, and in the end they see Him alone.—The law and the prophets are merged in the glory of the Gospel.—The transfiguration of Christ upon the mountain: for Him, as for the three blest disciples, a preparation for Gethsemane.—The transfiguration of Jesus: 1. As a single central point in His life; 2. in its earlier types and symbols (Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Elijah, earlier crises in the life of Jesus Himself); 3. in its significance for the future, pointing to the resurrection, the ascension, the great manifestation of Christ, the glorification of believers.—The transfiguration of Christ the sure pledge of the renewing of the world, Rev. xx. 21, and of that new state of glory wherein the word is fulfilled, Behold, I make all things new!—The prophetic history of Christ's life and suffering, the history of the life and suffering of His people.—The Lord gives unasked to His disciples that sign from heaven which He had denied to the asking world.

Starcke, Osiander: God strengthens the faith of His people before trials come, that they may be able to endure them.—Bibl. Würt.: He who would be conversant with heavenly things must tear away his soul from earth, and soar towards God.—The heavenly glory is incomparable; greater and more excellent than all beauty and grace upon earth.—Nova Bibl. Tüb.: Moses and Elias still live: witnesses of eternity.—Bibl. Würt.: In Christ the law and the prophets attained their goal and fulfilment.—Jesus is Lord of the dead and living; He has the keys of hell and of death, Rev. iii. 7; Ps. lxxxiv. 2, 3, 5.—Lange: God lets His people have, even in this world, extraordinary glances and views; but they are only of short duration, because their longer enjoyment would not be tolerable and profitable.—Osiander: Human nature cannot bear the glory of eternal life; therefore our bodies will be glorified.—We must depend only and absolutely upon Jesus Christ.—Quesnel: Jesus Christ had His Elias, who announced Him in the world; He will have more of them yet in times to come and before His last appearance.—One place of Scripture must not be opposed to another, but Scripture must be compared with Scripture.—The ungodly accomplish, against their own will, the holy will of God: they by their persecution not only create happiness for the saints, but make their own misery.—Marvel not that faithful ministers of Christ are cast out as evil, for it was clearly enough predicted in the Scripture.

Rieger: Probably the disciples would desire, on going down, that they might communicate this vision to others; but the prohibition of Jesus forbade. The same holds good of us in many instances now.

Schleiermacher: And that also was a spiritual glorification of the Lord when the disciples were taught that they had nothing more to do either with the one or the other (Moses and Elias), neither with the letter of the law nor with revolutionizing zeal. (Yet Moses and Elias were not set aside by Christ; but they were lifted up and lost in Him as their fulfilment.)—This spirit, which can only from within outwards renew our holy relation to God, and will spread abroad, only through the energies of love, the living knowledge of God among the children of men, will be to the end of time His glorification.

Brieger: To glorify and transfigure, means to make perfectly clear and transparent (but of men, and especially of Christ, it means to exhibit the creaturely life in its spiritual glory). The eternal destiny of man was glorification.—He went on now to meet His sufferings. In order to obtain strength for the endurance of the extremest sorrows, He must have a foretaste of the glory which awaited Him.—But on account of His disciples too, it was needful that Christ should be glorified.—Bauer: Peter would build tabernacles: for the heavenly beings who dwell above, skins and huts.

5. The Healing of the possessed Child after the Transfiguration. (VERS. 14–29.)

Parallels: Matt. xvii. 14–21; Luke ix. 37–43.

14 And when He came to His disciples, He saw a great multitude about them, and the scribes questioning with them. 15 And straightway all the people, when they beheld Him, were greatly amazed, and, running to Him, saluted Him. 16 And He asked the scribes, What question ye with them? 17 And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, I have brought unto Thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit: 18 And wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him; and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away: and I spake to Thy disciples that they should cast him out; and they could not. 19 He answereth him, and saith, O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him unto Me. 20 And they brought him unto Him: and when he saw Him, straightway the spirit tare him; and he fell on the ground, and wallowed, foaming. 21 And He asked his father, How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child. 22 And oft-times it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him: but if Thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us. 23 Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. 24 And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief. 25 When Jesus saw that the people came running together, He rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him. 26 And the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him: and he was as one dead; insomuch that many said, He is dead. 27 But Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up; and he arose. 28 And when He was come into the house, His disciples asked Him privately, Why could not we cast him out? 29 And He said unto them, This kind can come forth by nothing, but by prayer and fasting.

Ver. 16. Αὐτούς, B.D.L.Δ., instead of τοὺς γραμματεῖς.

Ver. 17. Αὐτῷ must be inserted, according to many codd.

Ver. 19. Instead of αὐτῷ, it is preferable to read αὐτοῖς.

Ver. 22. Instead of δύνασαι here and ver. 23, Tisch. and Lach. read δύνῃ, according to B.D.L.Δ. This form, in itself the conj., was used later even in the Indic. instead of δύνασαι; but it lays stronger stress upon the question.

Ver. 23. The τὸ was omitted by many codd. on account of its difficulty. Tisch. omits the πιστεῦσαι, following B.C*.L.D., and many versions. Meyer: It was an exegetical addition to the mere εἰ δυνῇ, not understood. But the clause, If thou canst believe, may have been found still harder; and therefore corrected into "as it regards, If thou canst? All things are possible, etc."

Ver. 24. The μετὰ δακρύων is wanting in A*.B.C*.L.Δ. The κύριε is very doubtful.

Ver. 27. Lach. reads τῆς χειρὸς αὐτοῦ, after B.D.L.Δ.; compare Meyer.

Ver. 29. The omission of νηστείᾳ by B. is not decisive.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.—The immediate connection between this event and the transfiguration is affirmed by all three Evangelists. The time and the place are established, therefore, by the narrative of that event. In the communication of the incidents here before us, Mark is rich in individual traits, which place the scene in a much more vivid light. Jesus finds His nine other disciples at the foot of the mountain, not only surrounded by a multitude of people, but involved in controversy with the scribes, who have surprised them in a condition of entire impotence. The people are amazed, or are very much excited, when they see Jesus coming. They were probably in a profane and mocking state of mind, in consequence of the disciples' failure to work the miracle, and of the attack of the scribes; and were disposed to indulge this inclination, when the sudden and overpowering appearance of Christ smote their consciences. To this may have concurred better motives, which induced the multitude to run to Jesus as the real arbiter and the only helper in this strange case. Thus we find that our Saviour at the very outset reduced the scribes to silence by His question, Wherefore do ye contend with them? While Mark passes over Matthew's notice, that the demoniac youth was lunatic, and that of Luke, that he was the only son of his father, he gives the most vivid representation of his state of wretchedness: his dumb behaviour (he had a speechless spirit), his frightful sufferings (in his paroxysms foaming and grinding his teeth, and swooning away). In the Lord's rebuke he is content with the description, γενεὰ ἄπιστος: the explanatory διεστραμμένη he omits; on the other hand, he paints more livingly than Luke the scene in which the youth at once, on seeing Jesus, was overcome by the demoniac influence, fell down to the ground, and wallowed, foaming. But of priceless value is the passage between Jesus and the father of the youth, from ver. 21 to ver. 25. We see how the Lord, by His question since when the youth had thus suffered, pacified the excited feelings of all, especially of the father, and encouraged their faith. We hear the never-to-be-forgotten words, "If thou canst believe," and the cry, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief." The words which expelled the demon Mark recites in all their solemn emphasis; and in them the addition is remarkable, Enter no more into him. Mark alone describes the paroxysm under which the demon departed, and the important circumstance that the youth lay as one dead; that Jesus took him by the hand, and raised him to conscious life. Moreover, he makes prominent (as he often does the like) the entrance of Christ into the house, where the disciples put their confidential question to Him as to the reason why they could not cast out the demon. And he gives the answer of Jesus without Matthew's additional clause concerning the unbelief of the disciples, and without the words that liken faith to the grain of mustard-seed. Nor does he mention the circumstance, recorded by Luke, of the people's renewed astonishment and increasing excitement.

2. All the people were amazed.—At what? Euth. Zigabenus: "Either on account of the singularly seasonable and sudden coming of Jesus, or at His glorious appearance." Of this latter we read nothing, and Meyer therefore thinks the former the sounder view: it was an astonishment of joyful surprise. But θάμβος betokens an astonishment which is related to fear, which sometimes passes over into amazement, and is sometimes called terror. Hence we explain the astonishment as the amazement of a crowd somewhat profanely disposed at the sudden interposition of a punitive event like this (see Leben Jesu ii. 2, 317). "They sought to repair their error by running to Him with eager denials." And it is obvious to connect with that the supposition, that the reflection of the transfiguration glory still lingered on the Lord's countenance. See Ex. xxxiv. 29, 30.

3. And He asked them.—Bengel refers this to the disciples, Griesbach, to the disciples and scribes; Fritzsche, with most others, to the scribes alone; Meyer, to the people, because the people were just before spoken of. But the context points simply to the scribes as the contending party; not excluding, however, the people, so far as they sympathized.

4. What question ye with them?—Concerning what? The scribes were dumb. But the father of the possessed child gave the answer as to what they were contending about, ver. 17. Evidently they had attacked the power of the disciples to work miracles, and the authority of Christ; therefore they were now silent, because they expected that the Lord would by His act convict them.

5. Brought my son unto Thee.—That was his purpose. He was seeking the Lord in the place where the disciples were. But as Jesus was absent, His disciples and the man became engaged together.

6. Wheresoever he taketh him.—This does not hint at an intermitting possession, in favour of which Meyer, without reason, adduces Matt. xii. 44, but to the antithesis between a latent action (in which, however, the youth by his dumbness betrayed his possession) and frenzied paroxysms, in which the spirit seized the youth, in order, as it appeared, to destroy him; and, according to Matthew, these crises had a connection with the changes of the moon. The following μηκέτι εἰσέλθῃς, Meyer acknowledges that the demon had continuous possession.

7. He teareth him.—Probably this manifested itself in convulsions, St Vitus' dance, or the like. The fundamental form was epilepsy, or something of the kind. These circumstances depended partly on the change of the moon, partly on demoniac influences.

8. To destroy him.—The father regarded the demon as a malicious enemy, who was bent upon the murder of his only son.

9. If Thou canst do anything.—Expression of doubt or infirm faith, which, having been at the beginning too weak, had become more and more weak in consequence of the failure of the disciples' attempt.

10. If thou canst believe.—The difficulty of the Text. Rec., and the critical authorities, constrain us to hold this reading fast. The easiest solution takes the τό as a sign of quotation preceding the direct address (De Wette). For other explanations, see Meyer. We take the sentence as a breviloquence: "the if thou canst means, if thou canst believe." Τὸ εἰ δύνασαι = εἰ δύνασαι πιστεῦσαι. To be able, and to be able to believe, are with the Lord one and the same,—especially throughout Mark's Gospel. Hence the clause, "All things are possible to him that believeth," is an illustration of this fundamental law, of this mathematical formula, so to speak, of the kingdom of God. The explanation of the passage on the other reading is indeed simpler: "As it respects if thou canst, all things are possible," etc. (Meyer); or, the first clause is a question: Dost thou ask, If thou canst? all things, etc. (Ewald).

11. Help Thou mine unbelief.—Bengel: Help away mine unbelief. Meyer thinks to improve it: Do not deny me on account of my unbelief. Certainly the βοήθει, ver. 24, refers to the help of healing itself; but the man knew very well by this time that his son would be healed, if his unbelief was healed. And that was the more spiritual which now sprang up in the man, that Jesus could strengthen the faulty faith into the ability perfectly to believe, and so by that means remove also his external distress.

12. When Jesus saw that the people came running together.—His desire to preserve the secrecy of His journey tended now to hasten the performance of the miracle.

13. I command thee.—"Emphatically, as in contrast with the disciples." Meyer.

14. The spirit cried.—The crying out of the demoniac youth, seeming to be a work of the demon, though a shriek in inarticulate tones, was the first sign of cure: the youth had previously been dumb, whilst foaming and gnashing his teeth. See ver. 18.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel of Matthew and Luke.

2. We have here not only the grand contrast between the heavenly glorification upon the mountain, and the demoniac degradation reminding of hell at the foot of it, but also the contrast between the sound spiritual ecstasy of the disciples, and the diseased physical possession of the youth. So also between the supreme festival and the severe toil of the Lord.

3. As the contemplation of the disciples upon the mountain had to contend with infirmity and sleep, so the premature activity of the disciples in the valley had to contend with impotence and the vain endeavours of activity. Christ is the Master upon the mountain and in the valley, in contemplation and in activity.

4. The heaviest burden which oppressed the Lord in His course upon earth, even amongst His disciples, was the burden of unbelief.

5. The colloquy of Jesus with the father of the child a school of faith.

6. Christ in this narrative may be compared to a general, who retrieves by his own presence a battle well-nigh lost by his army.

7. Through the faith of the father the son is healed (as in the history of the nobleman, and of the Canaanitish woman). These facts tell against the Baptists. Even the blessing upon the faith of sponsors is represented by the history of the centurion.

8. Reischle: "Over the life of the child the demon, despite his malignity, had no power: comp. John ii. 6. Later examples also show that possessed persons, falling from great heights, or into fire or water, are not easily killed or grievously hurt, while in their condition of unnatural paroxysms.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.—How the entrance of the living Christ into the community of the disciples changes its whole character: 1. The profane disposition of the people gives place to reverence; 2. the supremacy of the divine word takes the place of school controversy; 3. excitement is allayed by the spirit of His peace; 4. faith conquers unbelief; 5. His miraculous help and salvation follow their impotence and bewilderment.—The Lord comes at the right time for the help of His people.—Not only the demons of the abyss, but also the scribes, embarrass the company of the disciples, not firmly standing in the power of faith.—The poor youth, and the world of poor, afflicted children (deaf and dumb, cretins, possessed, orphans, etc.).—The anguish of the father's heart could lead to faith, even as the anguish of the mother's heart (of the Canaanitish woman: but the mother's heart was the more brave).—The colloquy of the Lord with the father of the youth, a type of the way in which He guides the soul to faith. 1. The preparation: allaying of excitement, and clear view of the affliction. 2. Help: reference to the power of faith. 3. Support and consummation of faith.—The communication between Christ and the needy soul: 1. What is thy grief? 2. If Thou canst, help? 3. Thou canst, if thou canst believe. 4. I believe; help, etc.—Thou canst; that is, if thou canst believe.—The measure of faith, the measure of our ability.—Weak faith must, with the prayer, "Lord, help mine unbelief," stretch forward to its perfection.—The faith of parents is to the advantage of their children.—

Prayer and tears the element of faith: 1. The expression of its ground, humility (prayer, the spiritual expression; tears, the bodily expression); 2. the voice of its need; 3. the nourishment of its strength.—The father's concurrence with the Lord in faith, severs the connection of the child with the evil spirit.—What are we taught by the final throes of the hateful spirit? 1. Redemption is attained by a decisive conflict, in which all the powers of evil are excited; 2. we must distinguish between the external manifestation and the internal strength of the evil one; 3. when the distress is greatest, the help is nearest.—The miracle of the Lord twofold in one: 1. Casting out demons with peril of life; 2. restoration of life, seemingly gone.—Unclean spirits must be cast out, even though life seems endangered.—If the soul is freed, the life is saved.—Many kinds of impotence, and the one divine power: 1. Inability: a. of the child—a miserable possession; b. of the people—a stupid prejudice; c. of the scribes—impotence of malice, disguised by wise phrases; d. of the disciples—occasioned by want of self-government and collectedness of spirit; e. of those who sought help—enabled to believe. 2. The almighty power of the Lord: condemning all the impotence of malignity, and confirming all the impotence of sincere infirmity.—The power of demons having its root in the weakness of men (like the vampire sucking the blood of the living, and nourished thereby), but sinking into nothing before the awaking power of faith, under the omnipotence of the grace of Christ.—The unclean spirit a murderer of man, and Christ the Saviour of man's life, here as everywhere.—Jesus puts violence upon the wicked spirit of envious, dumb, and muttering misery.—He constrains him to cry out in his loudest utterance, and so expels him.

Starcke; When a man has refreshed and strengthened himself in God, through prayer in secret, he must up and betake himself again to his calling.—Canstein: When the world thinks that Christ has departed from His people, it deems that a good opportunity for tempting them, and misleading them into evil.—Quesnel: The Lord Jesus sometimes suffers His people to be driven into a corner, that they may know how needful He is to them.—In their presence, the world shows itself respectful enough towards God's servants; but what passes behind their backs, He knows best who knows all things.—Hedinger: Children a precious gift of God.—Children may be a great joy, and also a great bitterness, to their parents.—Quesnel: The devil is as angry as ever when he sees that Christ will rob him of a soul.—We must not hold ourselves safe when we are disinclined to any particular sin. Satan knows how to vary his temptations; and to turn our thoughts now in one, and now in another, direction of evil.—Cramer: Unbelief is the greatest sin, restrains the greatest works of God, and plunges the soul in condemnation.—Hedinger: Faith is omnipotent (able for everything).—Canstein: He who implores faith with tears, has it already in his heart.—Majus: Weak faith is nevertheless faith.—Amidst tears and prayers, we shall be delivered from unbelief, and attain unto true faith.—The humble Christian prays incessantly for the increase of his faith.—The devil must be rebuked, which he cannot bear; but he who would do it, must be armed with the power of the Holy Ghost.—Quesnel: Those who do not like to speak of God, or hear God spoken of, are possessed by a dumb spirit, from which Christ alone can free them.—Osiander: Let those who are once delivered from Satan's power, take good heed that they be not entangled again in his snares.—Even if Satan, by God's permission, might inflict bodily death upon men, he cannot put their souls to death.—Canstein: When the Gospel has little fruit, its ministers should examine themselves how far they are the cause.—Fasting, prayer.—Osiander: Preachers should, beyond all others, be moderate and watchful.

Rieger: The future coming of Christ will inspire such terror as this into very many.—Men are not very willing to join cause with the poor disciples when they are in conflict, and at disadvantages. But when they see the Lord approaching, and have reason to think that He will utter His favourable and victorious voice concerning them, there is a great reaction in their favour.

Braune: The sharp rebuke of Jesus is general; but it touches the disciples most keenly.—Thou sayest to Me, "Canst Thou do anything?" but I must say unto thee, "Canst thou do anything, that is, canst thou believe? for then thou canst do all: faith can do everything."—There exists certainly between parents and children a deep, internal relation and sympathy.—This passage is most important in relation to the nature of faith.—It does not depend so much upon the theoretical consciousness of a truth, as upon the existence of a real and actual fellowship with God.—It was noble in the disciples so frankly and openly to test themselves in their Master's presence.—We should always act as they acted, when we fail of attaining what is the due of our office, and what our hearts are set upon.—Reischle: Here also we find representative faith, as in Matt. viii. 5. (But here connected with profound, living affinity between parent and child.)

Lisco: (The people were amazed, and ran to greet Jesus.) Have you never found that, on occasion of special and mysterious interpositions of God, your neighbour's heart was more than ordinarily inclined towards you?

Schleiermacher: (The disciples excited by disputation with the Jews.) There are only a few men who are able to contend peacefully, and without losing their calm and peaceful temper, even about such matters as do not affect their external prerogatives,—matters, for instance, of faith, which engender difference of opinion.—There can be no doubt that they were the scribes who, in consequence of the estimation in which they were held, moved and swayed the minds of the people on the present occasion; and these scribes were mainly and primarily the persons whom the Lord described as an unbelieving generation.—Ye were not able, because your minds were in so excited a state: ye could have accomplished it only in a tranquil, collected temper, in which alone can reside such spiritual power.—The kingdom of God is never advanced in a passionate temper of mind, even if the zeal is a zeal for good.—They must return into silence, and stillness, and rest (this, however, being attainable only on the condition of prayer and fasting; that is, devotion towards God, and self-denial towards the world).—Gossner: If we do not abide in faith, we can do nothing.

NINTH SECTION.

THE RETIREMENT OF JESUS IN GALILEE. PREPARATION OF THE NEW CHURCH.

CHAPTER IX. 30–50.

1. Christ's Prediction of His Death. (VERS. 30–32.)

Parallels: Matt. xvii. 22, 23; Luke ix. 43–45.

30 And they departed thence, and passed through Galilee; and He would not that any man should know it. 31 For He taught His disciples, and said unto them, The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill Him; and after that He is killed, He shall rise the third day. 32 And they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask Him.

Ver. 30. Lach., ἐπορεύοντο, after B*.D. Meyer: "The compound was given up as misunderstood."

Ver. 31. A. and B. Lach. and Tisch. read, following B.C.D., μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, as in ch. viii. 31. But it is quite natural that the more definite expression should occur here.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on Matthew and Luke.—It is plain that the return of Jesus to Galilee from Cæsarea Philippi is here described. As it regards the chronological relation to what follows, it is questionable whether this was the last residence of Jesus in Galilee before His departure to Jerusalem in the year of His death, or the last but one. The former is the opinion of Lücke, Wieseler, Hofmann, and Ebrard. But on the other side is the fact, that Jesus now went through Galilee quite in secret; while His last journey from Galilee, through Samaria, was a very public one. (See Luke ix. 52, xv. 1.) This secret abode of Christ in Galilee coincides with the Lord's refusal, on occasion of His brethren's challenge to Him to go up with them to the Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem, John vii. 1; and that took place before the penultimate and certainly concealed journey of Jesus to Jerusalem (see Leben Jesu ii. 2, S. 28).—The Feast of Tabernacles fell in the autumn (on the fifteenth day of the seventh Jewish month, called Tisri). It began this year—the year of persecutions before the year of His death, 782 A.U.C.—according to Wieseler, on the twelfth of October. The present history, therefore, places us in the autumn of that year. (See on Matthew.) The proper and special characteristics of the present journey of Jesus through Galilee are found in the παρεπορεύοντο, ver. 30 (on which below), in the words, "He would not that any man should know," and in the particulars of the prediction concerning the passion. Mark is here distinguished from Matthew by being more precise in his characterization of the crisis. On the other hand, Luke gives prominence to a specific trait, Luke ix. 44—the Lord's reference to the contrast furnished by the praises which He received after the healing of the demoniac youth at Cæsarea Philippi. He also gives special emphasis, ver. 45, to the expression οἱ δὲ ἠγνόουν τὸ ῥῆμα.

2. And departed through Galilee.—The παραπορεύομαι means a going aside or passing by. Meyer explains, "They were required to go rapidly through Galilee; that is, they so travelled as nowhere to tarry long." In Deut. ii. 4 the passing through the territory of the Edomites was a passing through their borders (not touching their central places). In Mark ii. 23 it means a passing through the corn fields, leaving the overhanging ears of corn. Hence Grotius (Annott. in Marc. p. 638: compare Leben Jesu ii. 924; Sepp. ii. 418): they journeyed in byeways and field-roads. But of a voyage by sea we read nothing. They travelled round the sea, through desert mountain-ways and woody paths; for Jesus desired uninterruptedly to prepare His disciples in Galilee for His approaching sufferings.

3. For He taught His disciples.—We must understand by these only His disciples dispersed through Galilee; that discipleship out of which He at a later period, before His last journey, selected the Seventy, and from among whom a nucleus of more than five hundred brethren outlived the trial of the cross: 1 Cor. xv. 6; Matt. xxviii. 16. For the Lord had previously led the twelve Apostles to Gaulonitis, over the sea, in order to make them acquainted with the same great mystery. See ch. viii. 31.

4. Is delivered, παραδίδοται.—The future vividly exhibited as present.

5. But they understood not that saying.—Compare especially the parallel passage in Luke. According to Matthew, they were exceedingly troubled. The saying concerning His violent death so contradicted their expectations, that they could not and would not think of it. Hence they would not ask for fuller explanation.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew and Luke.

2. The whole passage is a psychological example that teaches us how difficult it is to enter into views which are opposed to our former views, and the tendency of our wills; how hard it is for the world, with its view of Christianity, and for Christians themselves, with their worldly views, to take a self-renouncing view of the mystery and doctrine of the cross. So every individual man of the world, and even the individual disciple of Christ, finds it ever.

3. Schleiermacher: "We see that the disciples had then as yet no conviction of the necessity of the death of Christ for the accomplishment of the work of redemption. They thought all was to be done without the intervention of the death of their Lord and Master, although not without many conflicts to befall both Him and them." We see, however, that for that stage their faith satisfied the Lord; but we see also how often He had again to rebuke their unbelief, until, after His crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension, they came to a perfect faith through the anointing of the Holy Ghost.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew and Luke.—The departure of Jesus from His asylum in the mountains on the other side of the sea.—The silent paths of the Lord in the dreary time of persecution (the ancient Christians in the Catacombs, the Waldenses, the Huguenots, Luther in the Wartburg, etc.).—The byepaths of Christ in contrast with the byepaths of the world.—The Lord's calm autumnal travelling: 1. It was autumn in the year; 2. autumn in His life; 3. autumn in the ancient world.—The Son of man delivered into the hands of men; or, the difference and contrast between the Man and the men: 1. Between the Son of man and the hands of men; 2. between the new humanity and the old humanity.—The betrayal into the hands of men, the bitterest sting in the anticipation of His sufferings.—The displacency with which man hears the first solemn and fearful words concerning the cross.—Lack of the insight of faith, and lack of the obedience of faith, in their reciprocal influence.—The pains taken by our Lord with His people, before He brought them to believe in the great salvation wrought out in the great judgment.—We learn the meaning of Christ's death by the light of His life and suffering.

Starcke, Hedinger: Christ suffering was certain and prearranged, but to the natural reason incomprehensible: the flesh for ever hears of it with displacency.—Majus: When the Church is in a prosperous condition, that is the time to remember.—What has been predicted in Holy Writ concerning the cross and sufferings of the faithful.

2. The Greatest among the Disciples and the little Child. Zeal of John. Offences. (VERS. 33–50.)

Parallels: Matt. xviii. 1–9; Luke ix. 46–50.

33 And He came to Capernaum: and, being in the house, He asked them, What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way? 34 But they held their peace: for by the way they had disputed among themselves who should be the greatest. 35 And He sat down, and called the twelve, and saith unto them, If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all. 36 And He took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when He had taken him in His arms, He said unto them, 37 Whosoever shall receive one of such children in My name, receiveth Me; and whosoever shall receive Me, receiveth not Me, but Him that sent Me. 38 And John answered Him, saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbade him, because he followeth not us. 39 But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in My name, that can lightly speak evil of Me. 40 For he that is not against us is on our part. 41 For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in My name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. 42 And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in Me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea. 43 And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched; 44 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 45 And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched; 46 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 47 And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire; 48 Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 49 For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. 50 Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another.

Ver. 33. Lach., Tisch.: ἦλθον. Πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς is wanting in many MSS.

Ver. 34. The omission of ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ in many codd. is not important.

Ver. 38. Tisch. reads ἔφη αὐτῷ, after B.L.Δ. and versions. Probably an explanation of the more difficult "John answered."—A. and others omit ἐν; B.D. retain it. The former seems more unusual and more correct.—See Meyer on the omissions of ὃς οὐκ and ὅτι οὐκ.

Ver. 39. A.D.E.F., etc., read ὑμῶν.

Ver. 41. Μοῦ is omitted in A.B.C.

Ver. 42. Τούτων is added by Tisch. and Lach., after A.B.C.; Meyer derives it from Matt. xviii. 6.—Lach.: μύλος ὀνικός, after B.C.D. Meyer derives this also from Matthew.

Ver. 43. Lach., Tisch.: καλόν ἐστίν σε, after B.C.L.

Ver. 46. The omissions of εἰς τὸ πῦρ ἄσβεστον are to be explained by the fact of the repetitions of the words concerning the worm; which only in ver. 48 is found in all the codd.

Ver. 48. Τοῦ πυρός is wanting in many codd.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke.—As it respects the chronology, this residence of Jesus in Capernaum does not follow immediately on the former section; but His appearance in Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles must be interposed. According to John, our Lord did not only go up to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles, but also at the Feast of Dedication. The former feast fell in the middle of the month of October; that of Dedication in the second half of December (the 27th). The question arises, whether Jesus remained in Judæa during the interval between these two feasts, and then returned to Galilee and Capernaum for the last time; or whether this last journey homewards and the departure from Galilee fell within the interval of the two feasts. We assume that the latter is the true hypothesis, and for the following reasons:—1. The last journey of Jesus to Jerusalem led, according to the Synoptists, over Peræa. 2. According to John x. 40, Jesus went back, after the Feast of Dedication, to Peræa. Thus He must already have been once in Peræa; and this could have occurred only between the Feast of Tabernacles and the Feast of Dedication, that is, between October and December 782. Into this season falls His last abode in Capernaum, and His departure from Galilee (see Notes on Matthew). That between the secret travels of Jesus in the former section, and the position of things in the present, much must have intervened, is proved by the discussion going on among the disciples, which issued now in words, as to who should be the greatest among them. The glorious demonstration of Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles, the healing of the blind man, the favourable feelings of the many, must have again enkindled within them the hopes of His speedy manifestation of the glory of His kingdom. This made them ever more desirous to give His prophecy of His death a figurative meaning as referring to the sufferings of Messiah, the temporary obscuration of His name and of His cause. Thus they might come to the question as to who would have a fair prospect of the highest place under Him in His kingdom. Mark is more precise in his narrative here than either Matthew or Luke: first, in regard to the occasion of the act and the special circumstances; secondly, in the scene with the little child. The Lord had already spoken the decisive word, before He placed the child in the midst. Mark records that Jesus embraced the child. In the word that follows he is more copious than Matthew, somewhat less copious than Luke. Mark, on the contrary, communicates in the fullest manner the transaction between Jesus and John, which Luke has in brief; and, in the discourse touching the offending hand, etc., he is more solemnly copious than the other Evângelists. The narrative about the stater Mark seems to have passed over, as being a narrative which Peter omitted because it made himself prominent.

2. In the way.—The fleeting journey through Galilee cannot here be meant, but the last return of Jesus from Jerusalem, when the disciples had recovered their tone of mind and their hopes.

3. Who should be the greatest.—Obviously, only with reference to the Messiah's kingdom, their hopes of the speedy establishment of which were now rekindled.

4. If any man desire to be first.—Comp. Matt. xxiii. 12, xx. 27, xviii. 4. Our clause seems in one formula to include two rules: whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; whosoever humbleth himself shall be exalted. Despotism makes man a slave; spiritual despotism makes him the lowest and most abject of all slaves, who must serve the most external and legal behests of a police for the internal kingdom of God. But voluntary serving in the kingdom of love, and in the power of humility and self-denial, makes a man a spiritual power, and gives him an unconscious and blessed greatness in the kingdom of God, which does not look at its own reflection in itself. In this sense Christ came to minister unto all (symbol, the feet-washing), and has become Lord over all, Phil. ii. 5–11. But the emphasis falls here obviously upon the second rule.

5. When He had taken him in His arms.—Peculiar to the vivid and pathetic style of Mark. Comp. ch. x. 16.

6. Whosoever shall receive one of such children.—The natural child in the arms of Jesus is not only a symbol, but also identical in its susceptibility with the spiritual child; and it signifies, not a Christian mature in humility, but a beginner in faith. The child baptized or blessed is in the catechumen state, like the thirty years' proselyte before baptism, or the beginner in faith. See on Matthew, No. 6.

7. Not Me, but Him that.—Meyer: "Not non tam-quam; but, with rhetorical emphasis, the ἐμὲ δέχεται is absolutely denied." In which the rhetorical element must be strongly emphasized. It signifies a "much more," or "infinitely more:" with the child we receive Christ, with Christ we receive God, if the receiving is of the right kind.

8. But John answered Him.—The ἀποκρίνεσθαι here, as often, in the wider sense: on a special occasion to take up the word. John had a fact in his mind which he must bring into the light of this act of Jesus. Meyer, following Schleiermacher: "The disciples had, to one who uttered the name of Jesus, done the opposite of receive." Or, rather, they had hindered one who in the name of Jesus was receiving the miserable, and doing works of mercy. John now hears that precisely to such an one the greatest promises are given.

9. In Thy name.—The τῷ ὀνόματί σου says less than ἐν τῷ, κ.τ.λ. Compare Matt. vii. 22; Acts ix. 13. By means of uttering the name of Jesus. Meyer: "But our exorcist was not an impostor, he was a believer; yet not one belonging to the permanent company of Jesus." Had he been a deceiver, he would not have been able to cast out demons by the name of Jesus; for the name of Jesus wrought no magical effects: see Acts xix. 13. But if he had been a decided believer, John would have known him as such; for the ἀκολουθεῖν must be understood of actual and real following, and not necessarily of merely external discipleship. The passage therefore means, that there was in him a measure of trust in the name of Jesus, a germ of true faith. But we must not forget that the words are, "he followeth not with us," not, "he followeth not Thee:" this is certainly the utterance of an excited human party feeling. Gerlach and others suppose that the caster out of demons might have been a disciple of John the Baptist; but it is to be remembered that John himself did no miracle. All were indeed disciples of John in the wider sense who were hoping for the approaching kingdom, and had been baptized of John.

10. We forbade him, because.—We must regard John as the main agent in all this matter, though in perfect understanding and concert with the rest of the disciples. The "because he followeth not with us," etc., signifies that they desired of the man a decided following with them, or an abandonment or postponement of all working in the name of Jesus. Thus they did not deny that even an unregenerate man might do something in the name of Jesus; but they regarded him as not justified in so doing. Their watchword was: first a full conversion, and then the right and ability to work. It is strictly, "We interdicted him from that," or "hindered him." Easily might the prohibition of the disciples disturb his miracle-working confidence.

11. Forbid him not, for.—Augustin: "Distinguit inter neutralitatem epicuream et neutralitatem ex infirmitate." Such a man, the Lord tells them, would not lightly dishonour His name. His experience would prevent him from so soon turning round and going over to His enemies. And in this there was expressed, at the same time, the hope that he would earlier or later become an actual follower. Jesus, therefore, would impress it upon His disciples that they must honour and protect the isolated beginnings or germs of faith to be found in the world, without the circle of actual believers. We are not violently to constrain the men in whom such beginnings are seen, to adopt prematurely their party in matters of the faith: such a course might have a tendency to repel them, and drive them into the camp of the enemy. Moreover, it is contrary to the demands of a germ, and of gradual development; it is contrary to the rights of conscience, and the nature of the kingdom of God, whose kindled sparks of life fall far beyond the central hearth of the Church. But we must carefully distinguish here between forbidding and commanding. It is not permitted the disciples to forbid: they should pay all respect to the unrestrained influence of Christ, and its results, even beyond the fold of the disciples. But it does not follow from this, that the Lord commands, without the circle of discipleship also, a premature activity of the beginners in faith. It is wholesome and natural that every energy of faith, in every young Christian, should act and move, according to the measure of its development; under the condition of truth, sincerity, and the supreme regard for its own internal growth and well-being. Meyer: "We gather, moreover, from this passage, how mightily the words and influence of Christ had wrought outside the sphere of His permanent dependants, exciting in individuals a degree of spiritual energy that performed miracles on others."

12. For he who is not against you.—The reading ὑμῶν is better supported than the reading ἡμῶν, which the Text. Rec., Fritzsche, and Tischendorf follow; and thus the clause constitutes a formal antithesis to the word in Matt. xi. 42. (See the Critical Notes on that passage.) "And in order that they might not, in this sacred domain of tender beginnings, hurt any the least sapling, He converts His royal word, He who is not for Me is against Me, into a disciple-word for them to fill up and use, He who is not against us is on our part." (Leben·Jesu ii. 10, 12; compare Stier on the passage.)

13. Whosoever shall give you a cup of water (see Matt. x. 42). —The third γάρ, for: a threefold significant establishment of the rule laid down by our Lord,—not to hinder beginnings. First reason: Such a man will not soon become mine enemy. Second reason: If any one were against you, he would give assurance of the fact; if he is not against you, it is to be assumed at the outset that he is for you. Third reason: The respect and love which is even outwardly shown you in the very slightest degree by men in the world, for Christ's sake, or in His name, proves that they stand in a certain spiritual connection with Him, which under His blessing may increase and become more strict. The smallest token of friendship you receive as disciples of Christ, is a token of friendship to your Master, which is rewarded by Him with the blessing of greater friendship.

Thus: 1. The beginning of friendly feeling excludes the thought of a speedy enmity; 2. so much so, that the cessation of every enmity is to be regarded as friendship; 3. because the slightest token of friendliness, which is understood by that absence of enmity, is blessed and furthered until it has become decided love and friendship. From the external friendship which is manifested in external proofs of love, men go on to internal friendship: from the disciples of Christ, whom they acknowledge as such, they come to Christ Himself. Thus we must esteem holy all the roots, relations, and tendencies of good which Christianity finds in the world, and in that Christendom, too, which does not deny itself and the Lord (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου). We assume that the three fors all directly refer to the "forbid him not," without disparaging the connection in which they stand to each other.

14. And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones.—What follows is, down towards the end, a strong utterance of our Lord against that fanatical ecclesiastical zealotry which is so much disposed to throw stumblingblocks in the way of beginners in the faith by imposing traditional dogmatic articles of faith. Saunier, De Wette, and others have lost the connection here. But it is evident enough when we bear in mind that the words of Christ, vers. 43–47, have here a reference altogether different from that which the related words of Matt. v. 29, 30 have. (Comp. Leben Jesu ii. 2.)—Our passage forms a parallel with Matt. xviii. 6, 49. Matthew, however, did not adhere strictly to the place where the words were spoken; Mark places the locality and circumstances very clearly before us. The sons of thunder had a series of their own particular crises to pass through, just as Peter had; a series of crises for their fanatical and enthusiastic party zeal. The first is found here; the second soon follows, on their departure from Galilee (Luke ix. 54); the third falls into a later period, before the final going up to Jerusalem, ch. x. 35.

15. And if thine hand offend thee.—For the meaning of these words in this connection, see the notes on the parallel in Matthew. Offences of the hand, of the eye, and of the foot; or, stumblingblocks of fanatical hierarchism, of heretical Gnosticism, and of political proselytism. In the formal shape which the word of our Lord assumes in Mark, "it may be regarded as an ideal formulary, which is designed to suggest to His Church the pious gentleness of the hand, the sacred spiritual clearness of the eye, and the peaceful and amiable apostolical movement of the feet." (Leben Jesu ii. 2, 1016.)

16. Where their worm.—Three times solemnly repeated. The reference to Isa. lxvi. 24 is manifest. It is a concrete expression for suffering in the fire of hell, Gehenna.

17. It is better for thee.—Comp. on Matthew.

18. For every one shall be salted with fire.—On this clause, which has no parallel (and which De Wette, Bauer, and others, have so much doubted about), see Meyer, and the treatises referred to by him. Meyer, however, is wrong in interpreting this of the fire of hell mentioned previously. He explains: "πᾶς cannot mean every one generally; but must, in harmony with the context, be restricted to those who in ver. 48 are described by αὐτῶν; since afterwards another class is distinguished by πᾶσα θυσία from that which is meant by πᾶς, and its predicate is opposed to the predicate of the latter: πυρί and ἁλί are antitheses." They are indeed distinct points, but yet related to each other; for otherwise we should not read "Every one must be salted with fire." We therefore thus understand the passage: Every (sinful) man must, according to the typical meaning of the burnt-offering, enter into the suffering of fire: either into the fire of Gehenna, which then in his case represents the salt which was wanting to him; or as the burnt-offering of God into the fiery suffering of tribulation, those renunciations, namely and especially, which had just been mentioned—the sacrifice of the eye, the hand, and the foot—after he had been previously consecrated with the salt of the Spirit. This rule holds irreversibly good: those offending members which were not, as God's sacrifices, previously salted with salt, pass immediately into the fiery sufferings of punishment, which then represent and take the place of the salting. The καί in the clause, "and every sacrifice," does not therefere mean ὡς, καθώς; but it marks the specific case in which the being salted precedes the suffering of fire, in which it may even (as in John's own later history) more or less supply the place of, and involve in itself the fiery suffering of, external tribulations (1 Cor. iii. 13). Meyer's separation of the salt and fire, and his antithesis between them, with his exclusive reference of the fire to the punishment of the ungodly, are found in Grotius, Lightfoot, and others. On the other hand, both are referred to the good by Euthym. Zigabenus ("the fire of faith in God, the salt of love to man"), by Luther (the Gospel is a fire and a salt: the old man is crucified, renewed, salted), Calovius, Kuinoel, Schott.—Olshausen thus represents our interpretation: "On account of the universal sinfulness of the race, every one must be salted with fire; whether by his voluntarily entering upon a course of self-denial and earnest renunciation of his sins, or by his being involuntarily cast into the place of punishment." Similarly Ewald. The γάρ gives the reason of the exhortation which preceded. Sacrifice the hand, the foot, etc., in the self-renunciation of godliness, rather than fall with your whole being into the fire of judgment as a sacrifice of death. For this is a fundamental law for sinful humanity: all must enter the fire. But if the fire becomes to man a sacrificial fire, his sacrifice must be voluntarily prepared and seasoned with salt (made savoury, like food); otherwise, the fire of Gehenna supplies the place of the salt and the sacrifice.

19. Salt is good.—The καλόν is not exhausted by the word good. Something pre-eminently good in its kind and effect is intended. The better any product of nature is in itself, the worse it is in its corruption. Therein the salt is an image of man. Saltless salt is not to be saved; and so with the spiritless disciple, or Christian, or minister (without chrisma: without salt). See on Matt. v. 13.

20. Have salt in yourselves, and have peace.—The salt is figurative, not merely signifying wisdom, but the Spirit as the Spirit of discipline; and on that account it is the symbol of the covenant,—a blessing the preservation and assurance of which has peace for its result. The "have peace one with another" is therefore a consecutive exhortation. Have peace amongst yourselves, such peace as you must have if you have that salt. From this last application it follows that the Lord regarded the contention of the disciples, and their zeal against a beginner in faith not walking in their circle, under the same point of view. All undevout and unholy zealotry, whether towards those within or those without, He explains as resulting from one fundamental offence and fault,—the lack of salt and self-resignation, the want of the Spirit's discipline and of consecration to God.

21. Here, again, it is Mark who has given most prominence to words of the Lord which most strongly corrected and admonished His disciples.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel places in Matthew and Luke.

2. Between a hierarchy and the true catechumen's nurture of the little ones in the Church there is an essential repugnance. The latter seeks to train up the babes in faith to the full maturity of faith; the former would not only keep the babes in infancy, but train up the adult to be dumb babes. The extreme adherents of hierarchy and the Baptist principle unite: the former ascribe no prerogative to baptism, but make the baptized laity a subordinate class of imperfect Christians; and the latter, with hierarchical exclusiveness, deal like a clerus with the little ones in faith.—The sign which Jesus gave to the Church by His repeated embracing (according to Mark) of the children, was directed the first time rather against the fanatical church-spirit of the hierarchy, and the latter time (ch. x. 16) rather against the theological school-spirit of the Baptists. Whosoever of you: compare the history of the Papacy. Gregory the Great called himself the servus servorum, that he might be the first. The hierarchy has taken the ironical word of Christ's Spirit with unthinking and unintelligent literality; like the word of our Lord, on another occasion, concerning the two swords, Luke xxii. 38 (see Leben Jesu ii. 3, 1345), and other similar expressions.

3. But John answered Him.—This history teaches us, in connection with ch. x. 35 and Luke ix. 54, how Christ dealt with and purified the zeal, noble but not yet free from fanatical excitement, of the disciples, and especially what may be called the idealistic fanatical zeal of the sons of thunder, as it formed a contrast to the realistic fanatical zeal of Peter. With every development of true faith there is interwoven, especially in its first stages, a certain measure of that other quality which stains its purity, and requires to be eliminated. But when its heart is sound, the flame is soon cleared of its bedimming smoke; the life of faith becomes ever more christianly human, wise, and gentle (see Jas. iii. 17, 18). But where the heart is evil, or becomes so through the influence of external things, the life of faith declines into fanaticism and perishes, as the history of Pharisaism and Judaism everywhere proves. Such a fanaticism lived indeed in the soul of Judas; he went on through enthusiasm and excitement to apostasy. The answer of John was a frank avowal, and revelation of himself or confession, before the Lord (see Leben Jesu ii. 2).

4. The connection of the beginnings of faith: pious work, ver. 38; its root in the devout mind, ver. 39; its nourishment in devout habits, humanity, ver. 41. Hence loving care for the disciples, leading to quiet recognition of their interests, and thence to active usefulness in the name of Jesus.

5. The bigoted conduct of the disciples towards these beginnings of faith.—In its issue and result an offence or injury to the little ones, and in a twofold sense: either as they are dishonoured, wronged, or as they are offended and tempted to resistance and enmity. In its origin, it is an internal offence; offending self through the hand, or the foot, or the eye (see Crit. Notes 15, and on Matthew). In the Church, and for the Church, or in relation to the bride of Christ, that law of self-renunciation and self-sacrifice holds good, which is the basis of the relations of marriage, Matt. v. 27 seq. We must be subject to the Church, if we would edify it, Rom. xii. 3 seq.

6. That a millstone were hanged.—See on Matthew.

7. Into hell, where the fire is not quenched.—Concerning the difference between hell and Gehenna, and the kingdom of the dead or Sheol, see on Matthew. The additional clause, "where their worm dieth not," etc., points back, as it has been remarked, to the passage Isa. lxvi. 24, where the valley of Hinnom is expressly made a symbol of the punishment of the reprobate, and the Old Testament germ of the doctrine of future eternal punishments; as also in the earlier Cherem or death-sentence of the law and later passages, such as Ezek. xlvii. 11, Dan. xii. 2, and others. According to the passage in Isaiah, the bodies of those who were apostate from Jehovah lay without before the holy city, an abomination to all flesh. The worm of corruption, which devoured them from within, died not; and the fire of judgment, which destroyed them from without, was not extinguished. And this manifestly presented a symbolical idea of eternal suffering; for, literally taken, the fire would be extinguished and consumed with the bodies and the worms. Eternal destruction within, eternal judgment without, and these in eternal reciprocal influence. On the doctrine of hell, compare dogmatic treatises.

8. For every one must be salted with fire, and every sacrifice.—Fire is the symbol of life in its renewing power, and especially of the judicial power and working of God, renewing by a divine energy: thus it is the presence and action of God in the full energy of His holy, penetrating nature: Gen. i. 14, 17; Ex. iii. 2; Mal. iii. 3, iv. 1. Hence it is for the sinful man generally a judicial visitation of God, the mercifully rebuking and correcting manifestation of His nature (Mal. iii. 3, iv. 1); for the penitent, believing man, it is the saving judgment of grace, the purifying fire, the fire of new quickening, transforming, glorification (Acts ii. 3); for the reprobate it is a fire of condemning judgment, Heb. x. 27, xii. 29.

9. This gives us the true meaning and significance of the sacrificial fire, of the fire of the altar. It forms a counterpart and contrast to the fire of hell. It is the fire of God, into which man voluntarily enters with his offering, in order that he may escape falling into the terror of the eternal fire. Thus, if we strictly judge ourselves, we shall not be judged. This absolute and inviolable law of the fire-alternative was symbolically exhibited by the Old Testament sacrifice: the Christian must have the reality of it accomplished in himself, whilst he makes himself, as it respects those members and their actions (hand, foot, eye) which might hurt his Christian life, a sacrifice upon the altar. This self-sacrifice is a burnt-offering, inasmuch as the Christian places himself daily at the Lord's disposal in pure self-dedication (Rom. xii.); it is a sin-offering, inasmuch as he actually renounces and rids himself of all those impulses and acts which are a hindrance. This applies, however, not only to sensual tendencies (Matt. v.), but also to those spiritual and ecclesiastical impulses of the self which are coloured and disguised by religion (as it respects place and prerogative). Yet the sacrifice must not proceed from fear, but from loving obedience; it must not be an act of constrained dread, but voluntary,—an act of the spirit, of self-discipline. And that is signified by the salt (see the article Salz in Winer, Büchner, and the Stuttgart Bibelwörterb.). The salt is the symbol of the Spirit, as the Spirit of purifying and conserving discipline; even as oil is the symbol of the Spirit, as the Spirit of religious life and the living flame of devotion. Salt is the preserving, cleansing virtue of life: the Spirit who checks and kills sin germinating within. Fire is the transforming power of life: the Spirit who punishes the sin that is present, separating the sinner from sin as the judgment of grace, or destroying the sinner with his sin as the judgment of condemnation. Salt is discipline and conservation; fire is punishment, judgment, purification. Out of the fiery condemnation of Sodom a sea of salt flowed forth. The punishment of the doomed is a source of discipline and healing for those who still live. As fire and light are related to each other, and yet form a direct contrast, so it is with salt and light, Matt. v. 13, 14. Because the salt signified the spirit of discipline, it was needful (according to Ezek. xliii. 24, and the testimony of this passage and Jewish tradition) to every offering, and not only to the meat-offering (Lev. ii. 13); hence it was the proper symbol of the establishment and renewal of the covenant in the sacrifice. Hence, on the one hand, the salt is salt of the covenant (Lev. ii. 13), and, on the other, the covenant with Jehovah is a covenant of salt (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron. xiii. 5); while, in the common life of the Orientals, it was a sign of sacred covenant engagements and obligations. (See Winer, and Bähr Symbolik.) To eat salt together, meant to make peace, and enter into covenant with each other (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. ii. 150). But as salt, or the spirit of discipline, was the fundamental condition of peace with God, so it was also the fundamental condition of peace in the Church, of the mutual peace of Christian people. Hence the word of our Lord: Have salt in yourselves, and peace one with another. The disciples were amongst themselves to have salt, but for the earth to be salt. In reference to the symbolism of the sacrifices, see the works on the subject by Bähr, Kurtz, and Hengstenberg.

10. In connection with the contrast, wide as heaven, between the salt and sacrificial fire on the one hand, and the unquenchable fire of Gehenna on the other, there must also be observed a certain relation, so far as, first, the salt is regarded as a symbol of the sacrificial fire; and, secondly, as the fire is regarded as a kind of salt: the Lord says that all must be salted with fire. The contrast between the two is this: the salt sustains and conserves; the fire, on the contrary, destroys and annihilates. But there is something more than a contrast; there is a strict relation. The salt preserves and sustains by an influence resembling that of fire: it is keen, biting, and pervasive; like a subtle flame, it penetrates all that is corruptible, separates that which is most corruptible and foul, whilst it fixes and quickens that which is sound. Thus it affects a kind of transformation or metamorphosis. So, on the other hand, the fire is a salt of higher potency: it destroys that which is perishable, and thereby establishes the imperishable in its purest perfection; it leads to new and more beautiful forms of being. Salt seems to petrify the object, fire seems to volatilize it; but the salt fixes it in its healthy normal condition, whilst the fire bears it upwards in its pure constituent elements to heaven. Thus the believer is first purified by the salt; but then by the fire of internal and external tribulation he is carried up to God. So it is with the whole world of mankind and the earth itself. First, it is purified and preserved by the salt of the apostolical Church (Matt. v. 13); then by the final fire at the end of the world it will be delivered from its condition of curse, and glorified: 2 Thess. i. 8; 2 Pet. iii. 10.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke.—Despotism over fellow-disciples, and proselytizing those not disciples, spring from the same source: from the self-exaltation of a proud and un-purified zeal.—Spiritual pride is the common source of all hierarchical and fanatical movements.—The silence of the other disciples compared with John's answering: 1. In reference to the persons:—the more noble the disciple, the more free he is to make honest and open confession. 2. In reference to the matter:—fanatical zeal in the Church is more readily confessed than the impulses of proud ambition and the lust of ecclesiastical dominion, because it is in its first motives much more noble and less guilty.—The question concerning the greater in the Church, is a question in the way to the judgment-seat of Christ. 1. It will not be resolved before: the primacy waits till then. 2. It will be resolved in the end by the Lord, as He resolved it at the beginning (the first, the last).—The simple image of the pure Church of Christ: 1. Christ sits upon His throne; 2. the preaching sounds out, Whosoever will be first, etc.; 3. the only image in the Church is a little child; 4. the prospect: revelation of the great God through the humble care of the little ones.—The Church of apostolical humility. It marks Christ's word, "Whosoever will be first, etc.," 1. in its literal significance, a threatening word against all despotism in the external, legal Church; 2. in its spiritual meaning, a word of promise for humble, ministering love in the congregation of His Spirit.—The child and the Apostles: 1. The child their master; 2. the child their scholar; 3. the child their fellow.—How we may receive with the little child the highest life in the name of Jesus: 1. The Lord Christ Himself; 2. God Himself.—How we may receive with the little child the great God: 1. If the child is received in the name of Jesus; 2. if Jesus is received in the name of God.—The beautiful confession of Christ.—Christ the holy Master of all the sons of thunder in His Church: 1. How He suppresses the sons of thunder (or reduces to silence the thunder of carnal zeal); 2. how He arouses the sons of thunder (or lets the thunder of the Spirit resound, Rev. x. 4).—The prohibition of John, and the commandment of the Lord, in relation to free labour in the Church, and for the cause of Christ.—The law of fanatical zeal, and the law of the spirit of freedom in the Church.—Ecclesiastical party zeal in the light of the word and Spirit of Christ.—Christ the defender and guardian of all beginnings of faith, and of all germs of spiritual life: 1. Through His Scripture word; 2. through His apostolical infant baptism; 3. through the evangelical rights of personal conscience.—The water-pots of soft, human customs, in their connection with the sacramental cup of the God-man.—The connection between false fire of zeal in the Church and the fire of hell.—The three great dangers of ecclesiastical zeal: 1. Dangers of the hand; 2. dangers of the foot; 3. dangers of the eye.—The law of sacred gentleness in the service of Christ.—The true sacrificial fire of self-denial and self-mortification, in relation to the fiery flame of hell: 1. The relation: all must be salted with fire. 2. The contrast: to be prepared for the fire by salt, or to be salted with fire.—We cannot escape the fire; but we have the choice between the fire of life and the fire of death.—Description of the Spirit: the fundamental condition of healthy life in the Church: 1. Of the right warfare, 2. of the right peace.—The zeal of Christ the purifying fire for the zeal of His people.—The thundering of men, and the Lord's thunder; or, the exaggeration of little strength, and the mildness of great strength: 1. In their origin: a. want of love, want of self-government; b. the zeal of love and divine moderation. 2. In their manifestation: a. thundering of the canons, of the bulls, of the curses, scattering sudden and swift destruction; b. trumpets of penitence, words of correcting love, alarming and yet not destroying. 3. In their effects: a. lost and ended in time; b. dispensing blessings for a time, and bringing salvation for eternity.—How Christ, with the anticipating grief of holy love, was inflamed with zeal against all covetous and party frenzy of zeal in His Church.—The alternative of the two fires of history: indifference must be burnt away, either, 1. in the fires of salvation, or, 2. in the fires of judgment.

Starcke: Doubtless it is our duty to wrest from others their hurtful errors; but we are also bound to bear with them for a while, and give them time to come to a better apprehension.—Quesnel: Pride reigns in almost all conditions. Few are content to be placed beneath others; most people are intent only upon getting above their fellows, and mount aloft.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Alas, how many will stand before Him with shame and fear, when Christ shall demand an account of all the useless and sinful contentions which they have mutually indulged in!—Hedinger: Pride, conceit, ambition, are all utterly out of harmony with the spirit of true Christianity.—Luther: That man has a true nobility who is profoundly humble in heart.—True greatness consists in perfect lowliness.—Quesnel: Blessed is it to rest in the arms of the love of Jesus.—It is an honour to receive the great into our house; greater still to receive those who are lacking in all things but the spirit of Christ.—It is a holv work to do good to children, especially to poor and orphan children.—Osiander: The most pious, devoted, and faithful ministers in the Church have their failings.—Hedinger: God has a marvellous method in the dispensation of His graces and gifts, and we must not be too ready to reject what is not as yet perfectly pure and flawless, Phil. i. 16.—Quesnel: We too often blend our own selves, our prejudices and notions, with the things of God; and our pride uses the honour of His name as a mere cloak.—Osiander: Instead of envying and grudging, we should praise God for the wonderful variety of gifts which He bestows for the common good. —Bibl. Würt.: God's gifts are not bound to any particular person, or to any particular condition; but He distributes them Himself freely, if He will, to whom He will, and when He will.—Cramer: To deal with little children is a delicate matter; we may soon plant either what is good or what is evil in them.—That young people have offence so often thrown in their way, is one reason why there is so much wickedness among the adult.—Bibl. Würt: To give offence is, in those who hold the office of correction, a threefold sin: 1. They sin themselves; 2. they make others sin: 3. they cannot use their office.—To enter into life halt or lame: his fleshly lusts are as dear to man as one of his members.—Cramer: Who can doubt about hell, and the damnation of hell, when Christ has so often repeated and confirmed the truth?—Our foot offends us in two ways: 1. If it goes in evil ways; 2. if it stands still.—Quesnel: To be salted with the fire of hell, as an offering to the divine righteousness.—Bibl. Würt.: If God's word is falsified, or not with all solemnity and earnestness dealt with, there is no other salt for the sinful flesh: it breeds all kinds of corruption, and all kinds of sins have dominion.—Canstein: Faithful teachers must give all diligence to maintain the integrity of the sound doctrine of the Gospel; yet they must avoid all contention, and approve themselves not only true, but also full of love and peace.

Lisco: In earthly empires power rules; in the kingdom of heaven rules the power of devoted, self-sacrificing, and self-humbling love (ver. 38).—Secret pride was the reason why the disciples so acted. But Jesus is displeased with their conduct; for He would have a love in them that should be ready to love heartily everything in others, wherever seen, that presented anything spiritually congenial.—Jesus rejects and condemns all casting off, shutting out, and repulsion, as unchildlike. The gnawing worm of the evil conscience, and the burning smart of divine wrath, are figures of the eternal destruction which will befall the seducers.—All things, that is, the whole of humanity, must be salted with fire.—Gerlach: He who is not against you, is with you. Only in things merely external does Jesus include Himself with the disciples in the we: We go up to Jerusalem.—But, when internal relations are in question, He does not say we and us, any more than He says Our Father.—He who is not with Me, etc. Both words must for ever be united; so that Christ's disciples must take equal care to instruct the ignorant and to bear with the weak, 1 Thess. v. 14.—Braune: They had indeed the feeling that this thought was not right in the sight of Christ. Therefore He asks them about it; He gives them opportunity to utter it aloud. And thus their Master makes them sensible how exceedingly improper that thought was.—Earthly, temporal relations, they carried over into their notions of the eternal kingdom of God.—There are indeed distinctions even in the kingdom of God (Peter, John, James); but that He termed Peter the Rock could not at that time have been misunderstood by the Apostles, as it was misunderstood by Catholic Christendom, especially by the whole of the Middle Ages.—At first they kept silence; and when they spoke, it was only through shame. And so it was right. It is not well to be put to shame at death; better is it to come forward and be exposed before God, and the Saviour and His people.—With the unpretending act of receiving a little child, He connects the greatest of all, the receiving God.—With perfect right the disciples of Jesus held their vocation high and precious. But that they supposed their vocation the only channel through which God could reveal His Son in men's hearts, was a great error.—We should be willing to trace and follow out all the threads in others which lead to Christ.—There is such a thing as an internal, though it may be weak, inclination towards Christ, without any external and full fellowship.—The Redeemer undoubtedly had in view those offences which are connected with the teaching office in the Church, when contentions arise, and love, humility, and regard for the little ones are discountenanced. We do not always believe, or at least sufficiently consider, what great offence and damage may ensue from the forgetfulness of heartfelt humility, of poverty of heart and lowliness of spirit.—All that gives offence, and all that takes offence, must alike in the end be abolished and vanish away.—Jesus took no offence, and gave no offence; for God was in Him.—Happy are we, and without offence either given or received, if His Spirit dwelleth in us.

Schleiermacher: (With reference to Matt. xx. 28, and the ministering of Christ.)—He must in spirit descend into the unsaved depths of the human heart: it was needful that He should see how, and in what variety of ways, the most various tempers and spirits might be aided and saved—brought to sink into their own absolute nothingness, in order that they might attain to the new birth in Him.—That was His ministering; and in this sense He says that He—who is the first in the kingdom of heaven, who is all in all, He who is the One supreme over all and in all, He in whom all have all things—is at the same time the servant of all.—The greater the power of Christ in the disciple, and the more that power works through him for the well-being of others, the greater he is in the kingdom of heaven.—To receive God—what greater thing can be conceived!—(The transaction with John.) There is a condition under which the gradual influences of the Spirit best effect their work, and that is undisturbed self-concentration. The more men are excited in reference to external things, the more are their minds closed against higher influences; but when they are in perfect repose, the gentle inspirations of the Divine Spirit have their better effect.

Brieger: Are we to understand the words to mean, that he who burns with desire to be the first should be the last, in order to compass that end? Would any such humility as that possess a value? The Lord could not possibly have intended to say that the being little was a means to becoming great. The "If any man will" is intended rather to show the way in which a man becomes great in the kingdom of God, without willing to be so.—This is the way of self-denial.—Because the Lord from heaven entered into the condition, or assumed the form, of servitude, His Church also must take the same form.—To receive here is indeed a high thing: to take up to Himself.—In reference to ourselves, we have "He who is not with Me," etc.; in reference to others, the word "He that is not against you," etc., that we may judge them in the spirit of Jesus.

Gossner: In the kingdom of humility there is no contention.—The more humble and simple we are, the nearer we are to the Saviour.—The holiest words, without anointing and salt, are good for nothing.—Bauer: By their ruling we know the great ones of this world; by their serving we know the great ones of the kingdom of heaven.—Where love, the sacred regard for faith however little, is wounded, the retribution of the kingdom of heaven is severe.

PART THIRD.

THE LORD'S CONFLICTS AND VICTORIES IN PERÆA. TRANSITION FROM THE OLD CHURCH TO THE NEW. THE DISCIPLES GATHERED TOGETHER FOR THE PASSION.

FIRST SECTION.

CARNAL MARRIAGE LEGISLATION OF THE PHARISEES, AND THE SPIRITUAL MARRIAGE LEGISLATION OF THE LORD.

CHAPTER X. 1–12.

1 And He arose from thence, and cometh into the coasts of Judea, by the farther side of Jordan: and the people resort unto Him again; and, as He was wont, He taught them again. 2 And the Pharisees came to Him, and asked Him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting Him. 3 And He answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you? 4 And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away. 5 And Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept: 6 But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female. 7 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; 8 And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh. 9 What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. 10 And in the house His disciples asked Him again of the same matter. 11 And He saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. 12 And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery.

Ver. 1. The reading (A.) concerning the Jordan must not be given up, with Lach. and Tisch., on account of B.C*.L. These probably misunderstood the former reading, and so preferred καὶ πέραν.

Ver. 2. The Pharisees. The Article is not supported.

Ver. 6. The ὁ Θεός is wanting in B.C.L.Δ., etc., and omitted by Tischendorf.

Ver. 10. Περὶ τούτου. Lach., Tisch., following A.B.C.

Ver. 12. Lach. and Tisch. read γαμήσῃ instead of γαμηθῇ, following B.C.D.L.Δ.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the notes on the parallel in Matthew xix.—Christ's abode in Peræa embraces three things: the treatment of the subject of divorce, the bringing of the little children to Jesus, and the rich young man. These transactions all belong, doubtless, to the second abode of Christ in Peræa. We must, according to the connection of the evangelical narratives, assume two residences in Peræa; for we know that Jesus, after the Feast of Tabernacles in the year of persecution 782, returning into Galilee, assembled His disciples there; that with them He journeyed through the boundaries of Galilee and Samaria to Peræa (see Luke ix. 51–52, xvii. 11–19; comp. Leben Jesu ii. 2, 1053), appeared then in Jerusalem at the Feast of the Dedication, and afterwards returned back to Peræa, John x. 42. That the circumstances related by the Evangelists Matthew and Mark belong to the end of the second abode in Peræa, is manifest from the intimation that the rich young man came to Him as He was on the point of journeying; and the same applies to Matthew's account of the mothers bringing their children. But with this last transaction that concerning divorce was closely connected.—Concerning Peræa, see the Critical Notes on Matthew, as also concerning the double residence in Peræa, and the significance of the Peræan narrative in relation to the founding and preparation of the new congregation, the Christian Church.—Christian ecclesiastical regulations begin with regulations for the house: with the Christian legislation, 1. for marriage; 2. for children; 3. for property.

2. As to the relation of Mark to the Synoptists in the Peræan sections, he and Matthew alone record the matter concerning divorce. Mark states more precisely than Matthew that Jesus penetrated through Peræa to the borders of the land, ver. 1. In Matthew, on the other hand, there is a more definite account given of the first journey of Jesus to Peræa, accompanied by a great train. Matthew says that great multitudes followed Him, and He healed them there. Mark says that the people resorted to Him again (πάλιν, again in Peræa), and that, as He was wont, He taught them again. In the Lord's answer to the tempting question concerning divorce, Mark places first the reference to the Mosaic law of marriage, and brings in the paradisaical law afterwards: Matthew inverts that order. But it is in harmony with the character of Mark, that he introduces all by the piercing word of decision. The rebuke of the Pharisees is, moreover, made more keen by the fact that he assigns the saying concerning the Christian marriage law (vers. 10–12, compare Matthew ver. 9, ch. v. 32) to the house in which Jesus continued His discourse with the disciples on this question. Here also, as often elsewhere, Mark shows that the Lord, after His intercourse with the people, retreated to the house, that is, the inn, where He had been received, for the sake of confidentially continuing His words to the disciples. These are the lesser reflections of the Lord's greater retreats.—The words that follow were not for the Pharisees. Mark gives the addition, "If a woman shall put away her husband;" but then he omits the conversation between the disciples and the Lord concerning marriage, "If the case of a man," etc., Matt. vers. 10–12. In the section about the children (which Luke also has), he alone makes it prominent that Jesus was displeased with the disciples. He records, in common with Luke, the saying about not receiving the kingdom of God as a little child. That Jesus here again took the children in His arms and embraced them, as He had done the child in Capernaum, Mark alone mentions. He also makes it more distinctly prominent than Matthew does, ver. 15, that the rich young man came to the Lord on occasion of His leaving Peræa. Luke alone tells us that the young man was a ruler, probably a ruler of the synagogue. But Mark alone records that, after the declaration, "All these have I kept from my youth up," Jesus looked upon him and loved him; as he also later inserts the Lord's approbation of the questioning scribe, ch. xii. 28 seq. To him also we owe the striking and vivid trait, that the rich young man put on a gloomy and fallen countenance (στυγνάσας) after the Lord's answer. The amazement of the disciples at the word, "How hardly shall the rich," etc., he exhibits as continued and increased, even after the Lord's explanation, "How hard is it for them that trust in riches." In the transaction that followed, between Peter and the Lord, Mark is more express than Luke in recording that Peter only began in his confusion to inquire about the reward, and that he did not give full expression to his words. He omits the clause, "What shall we have therefore?" which Matthew inserts. It is very remarkable that he omits here again the saying of Jesus concerning the twelve thrones of the Apostles (Matt. ver. 28), even as he had omitted the special prerogatives of Peter. It is obvious to suggest on this point, that the saying about "judging the twelve tribes of Israel" was not so easily intelligible to Gentile Christians (although Luke also has it, ch. xxii. 30). On the other hand, he gives the broad and comprehensive promise of the Lord to the disciples who renounce all, and in the most full expansion: ver. 30, there is the hundred-fold compensation, houses, and brethren, etc., already in the present life, although amidst persecutions.

3. And He arose from thence.—In the wider sense, from Galilee; in the narrower sense, from Capernaum, where He gathered together His disciples.

4. By the farther side of Jordan.—That Jesus did not merely come to Peræa, but travelled through Peræa to the borders of Judæa, that is, to the most eastern limits of Peræa, is plain even from the words of Matthew; but is still more plainly declared in the expression here used by Mark. For the whole of Peræa could hardly be described as the borders of Judæa in the wider sense. A whole province of a land can never be merely regarded as its limit. On the immediate occasion of this journey to Peræa, see on Matthew, Critical Notes.

5. Again.—The repeated πάλιν seems to have been employed in consequence of the distinct remembrance of a double abode of Jesus in Peræa. At any rate, the events that follow belong to the second residence.

6. Asked Him.—Meyer: "Mark omits, what Matthew gives, the properly tempting element in the question, κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν." But, according to the explanation of Ewald (see Critical Notes on Matthew), the question was a critical and tempting one, even without that addition, because it was dangerous in the territory of Herod Antipas to say anything against divorce. De Wette supposes that the Pharisees may have been aware of the Saviour's earlier declaration concerning divorce. That may be true; in any case they might very well guess that, on this question, His utterance would perfectly coincide with that of the Baptist. Either, thought they, He must in His answer touch Herod too closely, or the Baptist; that is, He must fall under the condemnation either of worldly power, or of the pious.

7. What did Moses command you?—The order of the main points is not the same in Mark as in Matthew. Matthew comes down from the paradisaical institute to the Mosaic; Mark, on the contrary, rises from the latter to the former, and moreover makes Jesus Himself put the question concerning the law of Moses, and the tempter give the reply. This seems to have been the natural order. Elsewhere we have it as the first counter question of Jesus: What is written in the law? (See ver. 19, and Luke x. 26.)

8. Moses suffered to write (see Deut. xxiv. 1).—In Matthew we read, Why then did Moses command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? and the answer of Jesus: Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives. And in Mark's account of the Pharisees' words, they give, as in Matthew, a distorted view of the Mosaic law. Moses had suffered to divorce, and restrictingly commanded that a letter of divorce be given in addition. In Matthew, it is true, the opposition between the design of the Pharisees and the mind of Moses is made more expressly prominent. But here the opposition is found in the emphatic statement, that Moses wrote this commandment on account of the hardness of their hearts; that is, not to divorce, but, with the divorce, to give a bill of divorce therewith. These two, in fact, are, as to their results, one and the same. The bill of divorce found divorce existing; it was intended to limit and restrain it, and make it more moral. The man who put away required the services of a learned scribe in order to construct the bill of divorce; it was necessary that he should give the grounds of the separation, and the ordinance of the lawgiver required those grounds never to be light or trivial. Moreover, there were two cases in which the marriage was indissoluble,—viz., when a man dishonoured a virgin, and when he slanderously denied the virginity of his young wife (Deut. xxii. 19, 29). And in Mark more weight is attached to the other point of opposition which our Lord brings out: His appealing to the paradisaical ordinance. We must also notice the expression, wrote this commandment. It refers to a written, restricting law for hardness of heart, in contradistinction to the everlasting and original commandments of paradise: hence the written word is to be interpreted in harmony with these last.

9. For this cause shall a man.—The words of Adam (Gen. ii. 24) are in Matthew words of God; in Mark, words of Christ. It is all the same; for Adam uttered those words prophetically as a paradisaical, divine, fundamental ordinance. They are words of God, as being eternally valid; and words of Christ, as rules for life to be re-established and sanctified. The Futures indicate the necessary realization of the original relation and condition of the sexes in marriage. As it is in reality and principle, it must be in development. See Critical Notes on Matthew.

10. And in the house His disciples asked Him.—Here, as often elsewhere, our Lord, according to Mark's account, retreated, after a public transaction with the people, into the house, where He followed up His public teaching by more confidential instruction. Meyer: "The two Evangelists here differ, as it respects the place, the persons to whom our Lord speaks, and the substance of what He says." He then gives the account of Matthew the preference. But the thought of ver. 11 is already found in the words of ver. 9: What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. Divorce was by that word forbidden. And it is wrong to speak of any difference here; all we can say is, that Mark gave a more specific account. And that is strictly in harmony with the circumstances of the case; it was fit that Christ should give His fullest utterance concerning the New Testament law of marriage within the more confidential circle of His disciples.

11. Committeth adultery.—The marriage contracted with the one is adultery towards the other. Meyer supposes that ἐπ' αὐτήν must mean, "in reference to her," that is, the forsaken woman. But, literally, ἐπ' αὐτήν refers back to the last mentioned. The great point is, that the adultery against the first woman is consummated by marriage with the second, and thus the second marriage is made into adultery. "The μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ (Matthew) is omitted by Mark. But it makes no difference, as this reason for divorce is self-understood."

12. And if a woman.—Meyer denies the genuineness of this added clause. Among the Greeks and Romans it certainly was customary for the woman to be the abandoned party; but not among the Jews, since the examples they furnish—Michal (1 Sam. xxv. 44), Herodias (Matt. xiv. 4), Salome (Joseph. Antiq. 15, 7, 10)—were pre-eminent enormities. But he overlooks that Jesus, according to Mark, here gives His disciples a confidential decree for His new Church, and appoints a new custom which, as the primitive paradisaical ordinance, goes far beyond the good and ill customs of the Greeks and Romans. It is to be observed that the Herodians introduced amongst the Jewish people laxer customs as it respects woman.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew.

2. For the hardness of your heart.—This word is in sharp contrast with the sentimental excuses made for breaches of the marriage vow—such as rest upon the softness of the heart, the overpowering emotions of love, etc.

3. And in the house.—Confidential household words of Jesus to His disciples, according to Mark: concerning the power of casting out demons, ch. ix. 28; the great in the kingdom of heaven, ch. ix. 33; and here concerning New Testament marriage. In other passages it is solitude generally, or solitude on a mountain, in which Jesus imparts to His disciples the confidential utterances that belong to the future of His new Church, ch. iv. 10, etc. On the other hand, the house of Jesus is often the centre of great assemblages of the people, ch. ii. 1, iii. 20: even the house which Jesus chose for His rest and retirement cannot continue hidden, ch. vii. 24. In the most important crises of His conflict Jesus turns from official encounters with His opponents to a free exposition of His doctrine to the whole people. So in ch. vii. 14, xii. 36 seq. Thus the house of the Redeemer is, on the one hand, the most private, and on the other, the most public, place; always, however, in its most hidden privacy opened and disclosed. And as the Lord, in His method of teaching, passes over from the general announcement of the word into confidential communications to His chosen disciples, so also we perceive that He passes over from dealing with the priests and the officials to a freer application of His words to all the people. In the former case He regulates His teaching according to their being able to hear His words; in the latter, according to their being willing. The doctrine of Christ is the most secret and the most public: the great and utterable mystery.

4. Not only does monogamy generally lie at the foundation of this passage, but also the idea of the true ideal monogamy, which is constituted not so much by the union of two human "exemplars" as rather by the blending of two human personalities (ἄρσεν καὶ θῆλυ), which are to each other like what (we do not say the same that) Adam and Eve were created to be to each other.

5. 1 Cor. vii.: The Pauline development of the Christian marriage law with reference to mixed marriages.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—Jesus pressed on all sides to the limits of His land; or, Jesus within the limitations of His earthly vocation: 1. Sacredly observing the legal restrictions; 2. extending to them, touching them; 3. going beyond them in His spiritual life and work (endlessly towards north, east, south, west).—The Lord in Peræa provides beforehand for His Church: 1. He confirms and establishes that which is the fundamental condition of its establishment (the Christian household); 2. in this place He prepares a refuge and hiding-place for the future of His persecuted people.—Peræa the last refuge of the Redeemer; the first refuge of His Church.—The pilgrimages of Christians to Christ: 1. As they spring from impulse of heart, not human traditions; 2. the life of the Spirit, and not spiritual chains; 3. movements towards the true rest, and the true rest in movement (that is, on the one hand, not the running without an object, and, on the other hand, not frigid form).—How the Lord for ever refers the tempters to the word of God.—How He glorifies Moses: 1. As an expositor of the creation; 2. as a prophet of redemption.—How Christ confirms the unison between the old and the new covenants. —Moses wrote his law for sinners; or, the finite side of the written law of God in its changeableness, explained by the finite nature of the fallen child of God.—God, even in the external changeableness of His revelations, confirms His own unchangeable character.—The dignity of marriage measured by the dignity of filial piety (of the relation to father and mother).—In order to true marriage according to the mind of Christ, more than a man and a woman is wanting.—From the right of the husband follows necessarily the right of the wife; as from the obligation of the one follows the obligation of the other.—Concerning the contrast and the reconciliation between the laws of the State and the eternal, fundamental laws of the Church of Christ.—The reciprocal influence of the punishment of death and the divorce appointed in the Jewish law: 1. Ecclesiastically: an actual adultery is spiritual death, and death as to moral fellowship; 2. an inexorable prohibition of all divorce, on civil or ecclesiastical grounds, leads to death in many ways, even to the death of the higher moral family life (see the South American and other Catholic states); 3. the reference to spiritual death in adulterous sin must remove and heal the deadly influences of lax and over-severe marriage ordinances.

The three sections together.—The Christian household (1) in relation to marriage, (2) the children, (3) the property, (4) the vocation of the members to walk according to God's will, and to deny themselves.

Starcke, Nova Bibl. Tub.: Envy is soon found in the track of a teacher who has a large body of dependants.—Quesnel: A true preacher is not soon weary.—Every age has its Pharisees, whom the devil often uses for the temptation of pastors, and whom God permits to test His people.—Osiander: We must take care what answers we make when questions are put to us on doubtful matters; for many ask questions, not that they may learn, but that they may have something to blaspheme or except against.—Quesnel: The bond of marriage is a figure of the union of Christ with His bride, the Church; which He will never renounce, even as she will never be separated from Christ, Eph. v. 32.

Schleiermacher: And thus we have here an example of the manner in which the Lord administered discipline in relation to the high and mighty ones of the earth. He was not moved by the fact that Herod was an example of the sin; nor did He present the matter in the slightest degree otherwise than it was, because a person was affected in whose land and in whose power He Himself then stood.—It was of the essence of the old covenant, if we go back to the legislation and lawgiver of the Jewish Church, that the divine law and the civil law were one and the same. The civil and political ordinances must be regulated by the condition of men at the time. —The civil law in relation to the actions of men, and the divine law, which utters the laws of conscience (in Christendom), distinguished.—The lightness and impure motives which too often enter into marriage contracts.—Therefore we should regard it as a public evil, that such marriages are often contracted as should never be contracted.—Marriages are matters of public concernment.

Brieger: Man must take his right place in the sight of God before he can take his right place in respect to his fellow-men, whether as husband, father, etc.—Gossner: Alas! when we look round upon the condition of Christendom, and observe all the laws, usages, and customs which prevail, touching how many things must we say, In the beginning it was not so!—Bauer: We may here again see how surely the man who stands firm to God's word shall escape the most cunning snares that his most cunning enemies may lay for him.

SECOND SECTION.

THE RABBINICAL (BAPTIST) HOUSEHOLD DISCIPLINE OF THE DISCIPLES; AND THE THEOCRATIC AND NEW TESTAMENT HOUSEHOLD DISCIPLINE OF THE LORD.

CHAPTER X. 13–16.

13 And they brought young children to Him, that He should touch them; and His disciples rebuked those that brought them. 14 But when Jesus saw it, He was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. 15 Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. 16 And He took them up in His arms, and put His hands upon them, and blessed them.

Ver. 14. And forbid them not. The καὶ is wanting in many documents.
Ver. 16. Κατευλόγει, Tisch., after B.C.L.Δ., and before τιθείς.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.

2. That He should touch them.—The modest form of request, as in Luke; not necessarily the expression of a superstitious notion of magical influence resulting from it. Matthew tells us that imposition of hands was what was meant.

3. He was displeased.—This feature is peculiar to Mark. Displeasure against displeasure: the displeasure of the Master against the displeasure of the disciples; or, indeed, the displeasure of the Church, which believes in the blessing of children in Abraham and in Christ, against Separatism.

4. Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God.—The same intenser expression in Luke: compare Matt. xviii. 3. A man must first have received the kingdom of God into his heart if he would gain admission into the kingdom of God. See Matt. v. 3, 10; John iii. 3.—The kingdom of God, which a man may receive, is Christ as the personal kingdom of God, with His salvation in His word (hence Theophylact is right, in a certain qualified sense, when he explains it of the preaching of the Gospel); the kingdom of God, into which a man is received, is the heavenly society and Church of Christ's kingdom. The kingdom, as a principle in the heart, is unfolded and developed into the fellowship of the kingdom of Christ's manifestation.

5. As a little child.—In that spiritual condition which the child, in unconscious symbolism, then represented by its disposition. And yet the Lord accepts and welcomes the little children, merely as not figures of the poor in spirit and of simple believers. The symbol is inseparably connected with the reality: the child and the believer are one. In the childlikeness there is present the typical condition of faith; that is, a germ of susceptibility which the word of God will fructify.

6. He embraced them.—Abundant answer to the prayers of pious mothers. He was expected only to touch them; He took them up in His arms, laid His hands upon them, and blessed them. Moreover, He made them a type of adults and disciples.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke, as also the previous notes.

2. The blessings which Christ has brought into the world of little children. Jesus Himself is the proper Protector (patron and saint) of children: not the archangel Michael, not St Nicolas, not St Martin; although, as under the Lord, all angels and saints are appointed to love, guard, and minister to children.—We read twice of our Lord's taking to His arms or embracing: in both instances children were the objects.

3. The disciples, infected with the rabbinical zeal for inquiry concerning the laws of marriage, will not see the Lord interrupted by their coming. Jesus, on the other hand, regards the children themselves as the final word concerning the question of marriage.

4. We have no definite account of any ordination of the Apostles by the laying on of Christ's hands; but we do read of a laying on of hands upon children, and consequently of their ordination to the kingdom of heaven.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—How pious women here understood the Lord better than His apostolical disciples did; and why? 1. The fact. Similar examples: Mary in Bethany; the believing announcers of the Risen Lord. 2. Why? Because themselves nearer to children, and better acquainted with childhood and the childlike nature.—The disciples on the byeway of rabbinical repulsion called back by the Lord to true simplicity.—The signs of rising pedantry: offence at sound life in its most innocent and beautiful forms and expressions.—How often the high school in its pride has oppressed the true schools of life; especially, 1. the school of children, and 2. the school of childlikeness, or of simple faith.—What it signifies, that the Lord demanded childlikeness, almost as often as repentance and faith, in order to entrance into the kingdom of heaven: 1. Repentance and faith must have the stamp of childlikeness; 2. true childlikeness is penitent and full of faith.—The cry of the Lord through all ages, Suffer the children to come unto Me, etc.—Jesus the Friend of children.—The great Friend of the little ones: the Founder of infant baptism, infant schools, infant catechising, and of all good institutions that care for children.—The Son of man among the children of men: 1. As the heavenly new and pure related to the earthly new and pure; 2. as the humble One to the artless; 3. as the Prince of faith to the confiding ones; 4. as the great Warrior to the little strivers; 5. as the great Hope to the hoping; 6. as the Blessed with the pure.—Christ embraced the children: 1. The fact: a. an act of God, b. an act of Christ, c. an act of holy humanity. 2. A sign of judgment: a. for the childhood-hating kingdom of darkness, b. the children-despising proud world, c. Christendom still too little childlike.

Starcke, Nova Bibl. Tüb.: Alas! how many Christians are there who bring their children, not to Christ, but to the devil! who hinder them from entering the kingdom of heaven by their bad example, etc.!—Quesnel: Nothing is so precious to God as true simplicity.—All blessings come from the hand of the Lord Jesus.

Braune: The Lord, who is so gracious to the fruits (the children), is not less so to the tree (marriage).—Klopstock, in the "Messiah," brings many souls of children, before they were led by angels into human bodies, to the cross of Christ, in order that they might receive a deep impression of it, such as would fit them afterwards to receive the doctrine of the Crucified.—The source of our life lies beyond any investigation of ours.—Be only a child, that thou mayest be able to become a child of God.—Christ's embracing and laying on of His hands, and blessing, is a gracious figure of the love of God, which works upon us and for us long before we know anything about it.—Gerlach: Children, to whom the feeling of helplessness and simplicity is rendered easier by their natural weakness and inexperience, enter most easily into the kingdom of God.—Lisco: To us all, a regeneration for the kingdom of God is necessary.

Schleiermacher: We should know that a future is coming after us, when the light of the Gospel will shine more clearly.—It is the proper nature of a child to live altogether and absolutely in the present; it is entirely in the time that is passing. What the present moment brings, it receives with simplicity and joy; the past vanishes from its vision, of the future it knows nothing, and every present instant suffices for the happiness of its innocent nature.—(Here simplicity rather is painted.)—Gossner: The greatest condescends to the least. O how dear to Christ is man!

THIRD SECTION.

THE WORLD'S RICHES, AND THE HOLY POVERTY OF BELIEVERS.

Chapter x. 17–31. (Parallels: Matt. xix. 16–xx. 16; Luke xviii. 18–30.)

17 And when He was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to Him, and asked Him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? 18 And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou Me good? there is none good but one, that is, God. 19 Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Defraud not, Honour thy father and mother. 20 And he answered and said unto Him, Master, all these have I observed from my youth. 21 Then Jesus, beholding him, loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest: go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, and take up the cross, and follow Me. 22 And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved: for he had great possessions. 23 And Jesus looked round about, and saith unto His disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! 24 And the disciples were astonished at His words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! 25 It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 26 And they were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves, Who then can be saved? 27 And Jesus, looking upon them, saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God: for with God all things are possible. 28 Then Peter began to say unto Him, Lo, we have left all, and have followed Thee. 29 And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for My sake, and the gospel's, 30 But he shall receive an hundred-fold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life. 31 But many that are first shall be last; and the last first.

Ver. 21. The omission of the words ἄρας τὸν σταυρόν in B.C.D.Δ. is not decisive.

Ver. 29. According to B.C.Δ. the mother comes first. The inversion is explained by the fact of the more usual order. See Meyer.

Ver. 30. The Sing. μητέρα is a correction. Fritzsche places first καὶ πατέρα, which is not sufficiently supported, and, like the καὶ γυναῖκα afterwards, came from ver. 23.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallels on Matthew and Luke.

2. And when He was gone forth into the way.—This can mean no other than the final departure from Peræa to Jerusalem; and therefore, primarily, the journey to Bethany for the raising of Lazarus. It was the time between the last Feast of Dedication in the winter, when the Jews would have stoned Jesus, and the Passover in the spring (783). See John xi.

3. There came one running, and kneeled to Him.—The two words are the more emphatic, inasmuch as he who thus hastened and knelt was a distinguished man, and a head of the synagogue. These clear and realizing traits are peculiar to Mark.

4. Why callest thou Me good?—As to the various acceptations of this expression, see on Matthew, Critical Note 2. According to the strongly supported reading of Matthew, Jesus leads the young man up to God, the source of all good, from the question, "What good thing shall I do?" but, according to Mark and Luke, from the appeal, "Good Master!" Both agree very well together. "Good Master, what good thing must I do?" runs the question; the answer is, "How divided and isolated seems to thee what is good! One is the good Being, and in this One is good." Jesus does not decline the appellation "good;" He repels it only in the superficial sense of the questioner. The young man deals with good in its relative meaning; and in this sense he says "Good," that is, "Excellent" Master. Jesus teaches him to apprehend good in its absoluteness; and to that end he must understand the being good, which he ascribes to Christ, as being founded in God. Thus the answer is not to be explained deistically, but christologically: If thou wouldst call Me good, thou must apprehend My unity with God, and My divine nature. Meyer insists that it is the contrast between the divine perfection, and the human necessary development in Jesus (which he confounds with limitation), that is meant, and he terms the explanation that has been current since Augustine, a dogmatic misinterpretation. That term may better be applied to his own notion of Christ's relative sinlessness, and his own confusion between development and limitation.

5. Defraud not, μὴ ἀποστερήσῃς.—The ἀποστερεῖν may mean rob or defraud, and also withhold. De Wette translates it as the former, Meyer as the latter; but in both cases half the meaning is lost. We have only to choose between several expressions: take advantage, withhold, defraud, do wrong. We prefer the last, because of its comprehensive and strong meaning; and hold that the ἀποστερεῖν comprises or comprehends all the preceding ten commandments (Beza), and at the same time explains the tenth (Bengel, Wetstein, Olshausen). Meyer thinks, on the contrary, that the specific commandment of Deut. xxiv. 14, οὐκ ἀποστερήσεις μισθὸν πένητος, is meant. But it is impossible that the Lord's summing up of the precepts should have issued in such a speciality, which moreover falls under the commandment, Thou shalt not steal. When taken in its comprehensive meaning, the words present a more concrete expression of the final sentence of Matthew, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Or, in other words, it signifies, Thou shalt not feel and act selfishly or egoistically (giving is better than receiving). In this case, the entire quotation of the commandments concurs with that of Matthew, only that in Mark the words, "Honour thy father and mother," are placed at the end. The last expression in Mark is keen, and comes at the end, because its pungent point was best adapted to touch the conscience of a rich man. Luke has omitted the parallel sayings—both "Defraud not" and "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself"—probably on account of the uncertainty of the tradition.

6. Master.—This time not "Good Master."

7. Beholding him, loved him; for He penetrated his inmost being and nature: exhibiting an honest striving, notwithstanding the self-righteousness in which he is involved. The ἠγάπησεν does not refer to His speaking to the young man in an affectionate manner, as Grotius and others thought.

8. One thing thou lackest, ἕν σοι ὑστερεῖ.—It is observable that in Matthew we find the word in a question of the man himself: τί ἔτι ὑστερῶ;—evidence that the Apostles drew freely from an abundant and never-ceasing fountain of objective original remembrances of their own, and traditions handed down to them.

9. And he was sad.—He stood confounded, ὁ δὲ στυγνάσας. The verb occurs again only in the Septuagint of Ezekiel. In Ezek. xxvii. 35, it is the translation of שָׁמֵם, to be astonished and confounded: properly, to stand in silent, amazed confusion. The expression at the same time denotes the being or appearing to be bewildered. Thus it is certainly an expression of a sad and downcast state; and this is contained in the word στυγνάζειν.

10. And Jesus looked round about.—The "looking upon" of Jesus, vers. 21 and 27, and His "looking round," ver. 23,—both observable. Comp. ch. iii. 5, ver. 34, ch. viii. 33; Luke vi. 10, xxii. 61.

11. They that have riches: οἱ τὰ χρήματα ἔχοντες.

12. Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches.—Tranquillizing and explanatory. The whole discourse is of trusting in riches. But a severer word follows: It is easier for a camel, etc.; meaning, that it is infinitely hard to separate the trusting in riches from the possession of riches. The decisive explanation of the whole hard doctrine is found in ver. 27. A miracle of the grace of God can alone solve this dread mystery.

13. Then Peter began.—It is evident that the beginning signifies a venturesome interruption, or taking up the word (comp. ch. viii. 31, 32), followed by embarrassment. According to Mark, Peter himself seems here to have broken off in inward confusion, or at the suggestion of modesty.

14. There is no man that hath left.—Hath forsaken, ἀφῆκεν. Meyer, correctly: "In case he shall not have received; that is, if the latter is not found the case, it was through the absence of the former. The hundred-fold compensation is so certain, that its not being received presupposes the not having forsaken. Precisely similar is the force and connection of the thought in Luke iv. 22." But it is at the same time positively declared that the ideal receiving of the new possessions in the kingdom of heaven is simultaneous with the renunciation of the old possessions; or even that it is the preparatory condition on which that forsaking depends.

15. Now in this time, and in the world to come.—The compensating retribution in this world and the other definitely distinguished. So also in Luke. The number in hundred-fold is manifestly symbolical, as the expression of an immeasurable advantage. The spiritual nature of the new connections is evident from this, that they do not include the father or the wife. The hospitable houses of friends, Christian brethren and sisters, spiritual mothers, spiritual children,—lands, and fields, and ecclesiastical possessions.—With persecutions. That is, not merely in the midst of persecutions and in spite of them: the persecutions are rather part of our best possessions. See Matt. v. 12; Rom. v. 3; Jas. i. 2, 4; 1 Pet. i. 6; Heb. xii. 6.

16. Eternal life.—The everlasting, all-embracing unity, consummation, fulness, and depth of all-compensating retribution.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel of Matthew.

2. Jesus looked upon him and loved him.—Even after so self-righteous a declaration. Evidently our Lord sees through the features of the self-righteous his inmost nature; and distinguishes that which is a mistaken effort of the soul from that which is a corrupt self-deception, that which is based upon ignorance from that which is based upon hypocrisy. But this man was not thoroughly self-righteous; for he had a lively conviction that something important was wanting to him; and he did not hesitate, disdaining all Jewish conventional notions of propriety and dignity, to cast himself at the Lord's feet, and utter the anxious question of his heart.

3. Those who trust in riches.—The explanatory word is peculiar to Mark. Because it is so hard to have riches without coming to regard them as the one thing; to possess much without being altogether possessed by the possession: therefore, with man it is, generally speaking, a thing impossible that the rich should be saved; but the grace of God makes it possible through the miracle of the new birth. Clemens Alexandrinus: τίς ὁ σωζόμενος πλούσιος;

4. It is very observable that Mark, and therefore also Peter, in quoting the words concerning spiritual compensation, speaks indeed of the substitution of spiritual mothers for an earthly mother, but does not set a spiritual father or spiritual fathers over against the earthly father. The reading which places the word father here before the word mother, has but little support, and is manifestly exegetical. The Singular mother, in opposition to the Plural mothers, is strongly authenticated, and should be preferred.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—The unsatisfactory encounter of the rich young man in its contrasts: 1. He runs to Jesus enthusiastically, he leaves Him in sorrow; 2. without reflecting, he throws himself at the Lord's feet, but he scorns reflectingly His advice; 3. he comes with the consciousness of his lack, but goes away with a consciousness of slavery and guilt.—How much depends upon the right use of words!—Christ heals our greetings.—Truth is the salt of courtesy, which makes the difference between it and false compliment.—All commandments converge to the one saying: Thou shalt not covet (that is, thou shalt not deal selfishly or egotistically).—How the Lord entered into the legal notion of the rich young man, in order to lead him in the way of perfect knowledge of the law over into the way of evangelical repentance.—Jesus looked upon him and loved him: 1. A somewhat surprising fact (after he had made such a revelation of himself); 2. a very significant one (Jesus looks through the error and the confusion into the secret better impulse, the drawing of the Spirit); 3. a warning fact also (that we should not regard as the final judgment those humbling tests which the Lord applies to beginners).—The poverty of the rich, and the riches of the poor.—Trust in perishable possessions, the fundamental evil of the carnally minded: 1. The foolish reflection of a false blessedness; 2. the decisive hindrance to the attainment of true blessedness.—Only by a miracle of God can man be saved.—The hundred-fold gain of a man who renounces for the sake of God this world's gain.—The persecution of a believer one of his best possessions in this life.—The simple gain of eternal life is infinitely greater than the hundred-fold gain of the blessings of the kingdom of heaven.—Persecutions are among the possessions of the kingdom of heaven: 1. A lessening of them; 2. an increase of them; 3. a consummating of them.—Christ the perfect example of the promise which He gave to the disciples: His people sacrificed, hundreds of peoples won; His life sacrificed, infinite life won; earth, etc., renounced, heaven with all its worlds won.—Paul also a very illustrious example.

Starcke, Quesnel: Christ alone can show us the way to heaven because He Himself is the way.—Osiander: Men do not thoroughly know their own wicked and perverted nature; hence they fall into the folly of seeking to be saved by their works.—Quesnel: If we would pray aright, we must be perfectly convinced of our misery, and know that, because God is the perfect fulness of all that is good, we can only by Him be made good ourselves.—The law of God is the rule of our conduct.—Hedinger: The external in the law is the least matter: an honest heathen may make his boast on that point.—Osiander: There are few to be found who really prefer heavenly to earthly treasures.—Quesnel: That we possess with undue satisfaction, which we cannot without smarting renounce. Let every one apply to himself this test.—Who can regard riches as an advantage, when they stand in the way of salvation?—To how many are these riches their greatest misfortune!—Canstein: Riches may be possessed without the possessor's trusting in them; and then they are neither sinful nor hurtful. Rich men, who rightly use their riches, may become very rich towards God.—The rules of Christianity make many things superfluous, but we must not qualify or alter them.—Salvation we must not regard as a matter so very simple and easy. Strive to enter in at the strait gate, etc.—To a sinner who experiences all his impotence, there is nothing more comforting than to know that God is greater than his heart, 1 John iii. 20.—Thou forsakest much, when thou not only forsakest all things in thy mind and spirit, but also forsakest the thought of any merit, and the hope of any reward.—Quesnel: It is a small thing to leave earthly possessions; for they are another's, and, strictly speaking, not our own. But we must forsake our own will and our own flesh, and sacrifice them unto God by crucifixion or mortification, Gal. v. 24.—Cramer: Hast thou at once done much and suffered much? Then do not exalt thyself, on that account, above others, for thou art bound to do and to suffer all this and more.—What they lost in Judaism as friends, they would find again among the converted Gentiles.—Canstein: Let go for Christ's sake what is taken from thee in persecution; and be fully assured that all will be abundantly given back to thee again. And at length thou hast the treasure of all treasures for thine own—eternal life.—Cramer: It is among true Christians as among racers for a prize; where one now goes in advance, then falls back, and then again goes forward. Let every one so run as to obtain, 1 Cor. ix. 24.

Gerlach: The perpetual recurrence of wavering in the carnally-minded between the kingdom of heaven and the world. He feels himself, a. attracted by both, b. by both repelled.—He thinks, in his folly, that there must be some profound utterance beyond the commandments of God, which shall reconcile God and the world without. (Does not this last idea hold good, in a sacred sense, of the Gospel?) Nothing can be done without decision.—Braune: "What is good? That which makes itself common, communicates itself (or devotes itself to the life of others). Him we call a good man, who is common and sinful. God is the most common and self-communicating of all: He gives Himself to all things. Nothing created gives itself. The sun gives only its rays, but keeps back itself; but God gives Himself in all His gifts. His Godhead hangs upon this, that He communicates Himself to all things that are capable of receiving His goodness."—Master Eckhart: In Christ, who is entirely for the use and benefit of all, God's Spirit is without measure.—Why does not Jesus suggest to the questioner the commandments of the first table? These all were contained in the words, God is good. And the duties to our neighbour were best fitted to aid the blinded mind in looking into his heart and life, Jer. xii. 33, xiv. 33.—(Trusting in riches): There are poor people also, who with difficulty enter into the kingdom of heaven, because they put too much trust in money. Thus it is the spirit and temper—relying too much upon this world's goods for happiness, whether possessing or not possessing much, whether rich or poor—that makes that entrance hard, Rom. viii. 17.—For Christ's sake, and the Gospel's, that must be given up which is given up; else it is not seed, and the promised harvest can therefore never be reaped.

Schleiermacher: When thou askest what is really good, and what thou must do as being good, thou shouldst reflect that thou canst do absolutely nothing of thyself (and knowest nothing of thyself), and that God alone can give the power to do or think anything good.—Why did the Redeemer love the young man? On account of his unprejudiced and simple words, his earnest aim, and the fidelity with which he followed his conviction and views, albeit these were limited.—And if at this crisis he did not sustain the test, yet we see that the sympathy which the Lord manifested was so entirely without displeasure, that the young man must have been filled with hope, etc.—The heart should never hang upon worldly possessions, as sufficing to impart earthly satisfaction; but we should always regard them as one part of those gifts, for the use of which we must give a strict account.—It was a laudable purpose of the Apostle to clear up for himself and for others, by an express declaration of the Redeemer, the important matter of a reward for the good, and punishment for the evil:—it was not therefore the common desire for reward.—The nature of Christian love consists in this, that the spiritual bond assumes altogether the form of the natural (brothers, sisters).—So long as we find ourselves entangled in the endeavour to prove that there is any value in ourselves, we are liable to be put to the shame of experiencing that those who would be first become the last; and inversely we shall find that the Spirit of God often prepares for Himself His instruments in pro found secrecy.—Brieger: All the impediments must be removed, but following was the great thing.—Gossner: When self-love breathes upon the mirror of the law, that mirror becomes obscured or falsified: instead of detecting his own ugliness there, a man finds himself beautiful.—The answer of Jesus was designed to reveal to him the depths of his own heart.—Bauer: A man must give up, not only his riches, but also himself.

FOURTH SECTION.

THE ASSEMBLING OF THE DISCIPLES ON THE WAY TO THE CROSS.

Chapter x. 32–34. (Parallels: Matt. xx. 17–19; Luke xviii. 31–34; John xi. 53–57.)

32 And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them: and they were amazed; and as they followed, they were afraid. And He took again the twelve, and began to tell them what things should happen unto Him, 33 Saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn Him to death, and shall deliver Him to the Gentiles: 34 And they shall mock Him, and shall scourge Him, and shall spit upon Him, and shall kill Him; and the third day He shall rise again.

Ver. 32. Meyer adopts the reading οἱ δὲ ἀκολουθοῦντες, after B. and others. So Ewald. Cod. C. reads καὶ οἱ, which identifies the words as the disciples'.

Ver. 34. The spitting connected with the mocking in B.C.L.Δ. may be explained by exegetical motives. B.C.L.Δ. read μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, Lach., Tisch. Probably this was introduced to conform it with ch. viii. 31, ix. 31.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke. Compare also the observations in the Introduction to Mark.—Our Evangelist here brings into clear prominence a critical period in the history of our Lord, concerning which John has given us the most exact account. For, there can be no doubt that the narrative has to do with the last retreat of the Redeemer into the town and desert of Ephraim, where He fortified Himself, and collected His disciples for the last journey to Jerusalem (see John xi. 53; Leben Jesu ii. 2). We hear their tone of mind expressed on occasion of the departure of Jesus from Peræa in order to raise Lazarus. In the spring of the year 783 (P.U.C.), Jesus went from Peræa to Bethany, and Lazarus arose from the dead; He then, because the Sanhedrim had laid Him under excommunication, and decreed that He should die, retreated back into the desert of Ephraim. That desert, eastwards from Bethel, extends towards the desert of Quarantania, between Jerusalem and Jericho. (See for particulars, Robinson ii. 353.) The last abode of Jesus in the wilderness, His last retreat in this world, forms a counterpart and contrast to His abode in the wilderness after His baptism. In the former, it was necessary for Him to decide on going amongst the people as it were without a name, in order that He might avoid the Messiahship, as it had become an idea grossly perverted into a mere watchword of deception; but now He must decide to yield Himself up to the people, according to the true and purified idea of the Messiah, which He had in the whole tenor of His holy life re-established amongst them. This was the great task that He now contemplated; and Matthew himself points to it also. He took His disciples κατ' ἰδίαν ἐν τῷ ὁδῷ, and gave them the last and most express foreannouncement of His passion. Luke gives the faintest record of the crisis: παραλαβὼν—ἰδοὺ, ἀναβαίνομεν. But Mark describes, first, the great confusion and terror with which the disciples regarded the final time of decision, and how they followed their Master not without much fear. This expression, ἀκολουθοῦντες ἐφοβοῦντο, is stronger, in consequence of the seeming inversion of the participle and the Past tense. It indicates a wavering, and a danger of being scattered abroad, which Jesus prevented by the παραλαβὼν πάλιν. We therefore understand it thus, that this morbid depression, which the Lord contended against, was followed by a new and more mighty impulse of excitement, that found its expression in the immediately following appeal of the two sons of Zebedee. Mark is most copious in the prediction of the passion, and presents it to us in simple active propositions in the Future. Matthew lays the main stress on Jesus' being delivered over to the Gentiles: He is delivered up, betrayed to mockery, to scourging, and to crucifixion. Luke makes Christ's person the central-point, and records what He would suffer and encounter. Mark depicts the double betrayal in its actively apprehended consequences; and the word of Matthew he divides into two parts: they will spit upon Him, and they will kill Him. Luke gives prominence, moreover, to the fact, that Jesus said at the beginning how the Scriptures must be fulfilled; and lays stress at the end on the circumstance, that the disciples could not and would not understand His prediction.

2. And as they followed, they were afraid.—Meyer prefers the reading, οἱ δὲ ἀκολ. ἐφοβοῦντο, which would give this meaning: The greater number of the disciples held back in astonishment and confusion; those who followed Jesus, who advanced before them, followed Him only with great fear. We agree with Meyer so far as this, that the crisis was a very special one; but his reading makes it too emphatic. It is a reading not sufficiently supported; and, moreover, we have no sign in John that at that time many of the disciples left the Lord. If any are disposed to think that about this time the thought of betraying the Lord entered the soul of Judas as a germ, yet it must be remembered that there was no development of it until the late feast in Bethany, and that it was not a fixed decision until the Passover. An express contrast between those who now left the Lord, and those who followed Him in fear, would have been expressed in stronger terms: as, for instance, at that earlier crisis, after the declaration of Jesus in the synagogue of Capernaum, John vi. 66. The fact that the sentence of death was now uttered against our Lord (John xi. 45), might indeed make some of those who reverenced Jesus waver and apostatize. But how decidedly His proper disciples still put faith in Him and His cause, is proved by the subsequent palm entry into Jerusalem, as well as by the circumstance, which Luke prominently mentions, that the disciples did not thoroughly lay to heart and believe the announcement which Jesus had made concerning His own death.

3. And He took again the Twelve.—See on John's statement, ch. xi. 7 seq.

4. And began.—The expression intimates that a series of new and decisive explanations took place (comp. ch. viii. 31, ix. 22). These consisted in, 1. The decision of the time. He had first declared that He must suffer death generally (ὅτι δεῖ), and that it was near at hand (μέλλει in Matthew and Luke; in Mark expressed by the Present παραδίδοται): He now declares more expressly that all this would take place at the coming journey to the feast (ἀναβαίνομεν, etc., καὶ ὁ υἱός). 2. In the more precise statement of the form of suffering: a. the being rejected generally (ch. viii. 31); b. the betrayal, and the delivering up by the Jews to the Gentiles (ch. ix. 22); c. the great double betrayal,—the first betrayal, or the delivering up to the high priests, coming in our passage into marked prominence. 3. In the more precise definition of the critical elements of the passion, especially His execution by the hands of the Gentiles, Matthew expressly mentions the crucifixion, while in Mark and Luke it is plainly hinted at. Compare the Critical Notes on the parallel place in Matthew.

5. And they shall mock Him.—The text does not require us, with Meyer, to limit this verb and that which follows to the Gentiles. Why should they be omitted who were the original movers of the whole, and who gave it their continual aid? Compare Matthew and Luke.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel of Matthew.

2. Here again, as in many other passages, Mark goes beyond the other Synoptists, and decidedly approximates to John; and the account of the last Evangelist concerning the final abode of Jesus in the wilderness of Ephraim is made more plain by the circumstances given here by Mark. The amazement and hesitation of the Lord's disciples was occasioned especially by His heroic and decisive bearing as He went before them. They saw in His majestic, resolute, solemn, and fixed deportment, that a most important crisis was impending. Since the astonishment and wavering of His disciples precedes the definite prediction of Christ concerning His now approaching passion and death, it can only refer to the obscure and anxious foreboding with which the thought of something unknown, but critical and decisive and fearful, filled their minds (De Wette). For all this they were as yet but little prepared;

hence the Lord collected them together, and strengthened them in solitude. He foretold to them His whole passion, so far as He could do so (that is, without a premature disclosure of the traitor, who had not yet decided on his treachery); He repeated to them all the comforting promises of His resurrection, and thus prepared them for all, while waiting for the Galilæan-Peræan festival companies.

3. The abode of Jesus in the wilderness of Ephraim, in its connection with His abode in the wilderness of Quarantania, and in its contrast with that abode.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—Jesus as going before His disciples in the way of sufferings: 1. His heroic spirit; 2. their despondency; 3. their invigoration in His strength.—Follow Me, saith Christ our Leader and Champion.—Jesus, go before us!—Christ, the Captain of our salvation, Heb. ii. 10.—The Lord in the midst of His disciples, before the coming of the hours (or days) of great and solemn crisis and decision.—The shuddering presentiment of the disciples, contemplating the unknown future; excited by, 1. beholding the holy and joyful solemnity of the Lord; 2. the journey to Jerusalem; 3. the consideration of the people's disposition; 4. the consideration of their own frame of mind.—How the Lord seeks to deliver the disciples from an indefinite fear, by setting before them the clear idea of a fearful, but salutary and saving, certainty.—The trembling and wavering discipleship.—We must not tremble and be amazed in the uncertainty of the way of suffering, but be bold and dare in the certainty of it.—Morbid feelings must become cheerful; and feebleness must be invigorated by the thought of the glorious and final end.—The Lord's assembly in solitude for His great and decisive encounter with the world. (See Introduction.)—The importance of stillness for the kingdom of God: 1. Into stillness; 2. in stillness; 3. out of stillness.—How the Lord collects His disciples for the conflict of suffering: 1. Every one to Him (with Christ); 2. every one into himself (in the inner life); 3. every one singly (to his companions).—The source of the suffering of Christ; or, the enmity of the world against Him.—The ever-recurring cry from heaven, in the prospect of all Christ's sufferings and His people's: And on the third day.—The Lord deals with His disciples in the spirit of heavenly simplicity and fidelity.—The plain disparity between the temper of the disciples and the feeling of our Lord: 1. Its meaning; 2. its signs; 3. itself a sign of the betrayal, the denial, and the forsaking Him in the night of His passion.

Starcke: Conversations in travelling should further us in the heavenly pilgrimage.—All the steps which are taken in suffering with Christ, are steps taken to glory, 2 Thess. iii. 5; 1 Pet. iv. 1; Heb. xii. 2, 3.—We should often remind ourselves of the cross.—Christ summons us to fellowship with Him, as often as we hear of His sufferings and death.—We should be of good heart (Luke xxiv. 26), remembering in our sufferings the resurrection, and expecting our redemption in patient hope.—Lisco: They were amazed and affrighted at the way which Jesus so boldly took into the very presence and power of His enemies.—Braune: On account of their Master, they were amazed; for themselves, they feared.—Jesus going before them attracted them to follow.—A secret presentiment and longing of the spirit points to fellowship with Christ upon the cross; but the flesh grievously recoils.—We must train ourselves to endure sufferings.—Gossner: All nature trembles when God leads man on the way of the cross.—Bauer: The Master going before them, what remained but that they should follow?

PART FOURTH.

THE CONFLICTS AND TRIUMPHS OF THE LORD IN JUDÆA. CHRIST THE FOUNDER OF THE NEW CHURCH.

FIRST SECTION.

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM.

CHAPTER X. 35–XI. 26.

1. The Request of the Sons of Zebedee. (VERS. 35–45.)

Parallel: Matt. xx. 20–28.

35 And James and John, the sons of Zebedee, come unto Him, saying, Master, we would that Thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire. 36 And He said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you? 37 They said unto Him, Grant unto us that we may sit, one on Thy right hand, and the other on Thy left hand, in Thy glory. 38 But Jesus said unto them, Ye know not what ye ask: can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? 39 And they say unto Him, We can. And Jesus said unto them, Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized: 40 But to sit on My right hand and on My left hand is not Mine to give; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared. 41 And when the ten heard it, they began to be much displeased with James and John. 42 But Jesus called them to Him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. 43 But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: 44 And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. 45 For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many.

Ver. 35. Lach., Tisch., read a σε after αἰτή.

Ver. 39. According to B.C*.D.L.Δ., instead of καὶ, read ἢ.

Ver. 40. Instead of the καὶ here, also ἢ.

Ver. 42. See the order in Tisch. and Lach.

Ver. 43. Instead of ἔσται here, ἔστιν is the reading of B.C*.D.L.Δ. So Lach., Tisch.

Ver. 44. Lachmann, after B.C., ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι, instead of ὑμῶν γενέσθαι.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallel of Matthew, especially Critical Note No. 1.—Christ prepared the Twelve for His final festival journey, and its significance as a time of crisis. He has come forth from the wilderness of Ephraim; the first band of the Galilæan pilgrims to the feast—consisting probably of the most intimate friends and dependants of Jesus, who had come from Galilee through Samaria to Ephraim—had joined Him, purposing to go on with Him through Jericho to Jerusalem. This seems to be confirmed by the fact of the presence of Salome, and her participation in the request of her two sons. This request itself shows us how mighty had once more grown the joyful excitement of the disciples' hopes: in this respect, it makes the present section a perfect contrast to the previous one. Matthew alone accompanies Mark here; and he makes Salome prominent, putting the request into her lips. According to Mark, her sons present the petition to the Lord; but the records are evidently complementary to each other. Matthew's account makes Salome only the intercessor, and with marked accommodation to the spirit of Oriental court ceremony. Hence, even according to Matthew, Christ speaks immediately,—after the mother had proffered that request, which, according to Mark, is the supplication of the sons,—to these sons themselves. Mark adds to the word concerning drinking of the cup, the word concerning the baptismal bath. Matthew says, "The sitting on My right hand and on My left is not Mine—not My matter, but to them for whom it is prepared of My Father;" Mark says briefly, "To those for whom it is prepared." He also says, in his manner, "The ten began to be displeased." The princes of the earth also he describes in his own peculiar way. For the rest, he agrees here with Matthew very closely; and down to trifling variations, such as between Matthew's "your servant," and Mark's "servant of all."

2. We would that Thou shouldst do for us.—Strong importunity, θέλομεν, ἵνα.

3. In Thy glory. According to Matthew, in Thy kingdom.—These are essentially the same. But we must reject the explanation, "in that glory which will surround us when we sit by Thee."

4. And with the baptism.—Peculiar to Mark. On the double meaning of the expression, see Matthew.

5. For whom it is prepared.—Matthew adds, "of My Father." In Mark the emphasis lies upon the fact that the matter of the honour was already decided.

6. They began.—Here again follows at once a counter feeling: the appeasing word of our Lord.

7. Which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles, οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν.—Meyer: The essence of Gentile government, the ruling ambition, is signified; not simply οἱ ἄρχοντες (Gataker and others) but qui censentur imperare; i.e., quos gentes habent et agnoscunt, quorum imperio pareant (Beza). He justly sets aside Fritzsche's exposition: "those who think they rule." But in Wetstein's interpretation,—qui sibi regnare videntur, revera autem affectuum suorum servi sunt,—there is an element worth noticing.

8. Whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister.—Properly the "he will be" has the meaning of ἔστω, he should be, let him be; yet also with a hint of the thought that he will be such, either in the most internal sense or in the most external. Christ is the servant of all in the centre of the Church; the Pope, in the periphery of the Church, is the involuntary result of, and protest against, a too hasty development of the kingdom of God.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew, especially the Critical Notes.

2. The last known instance of the Lord's apostolical training of the sons of Zebedee. The two preceding periods were Luke ix. 54, and Mark ix. 38. Thus there is an analogy and a contrast with the apostolical education of Peter. Our history throws light upon many points: 1. As the beginning of that enthusiastic Hosanna, which found its climax in the acclamations of the palm entry into Jerusalem. Christ had predicted His sufferings on the cross. The sons of Zebedee declare, with glowing heroism, that they are willing to connect their fates with His in the strictest manner, and that they are fully resolved to go forward: they rather, however, hope for glory with Him, than fear the shame of His cross. 2. As the last outbreak of the high-toned, noble, natural pride of the sons of Zebedee. The mother and the sons are one. But John seems to interpose especially in favour of his brother James: he might, according to antecedents, have had some sort of claim to the right-hand place; but he now (as the younger) will take his place on the left hand. 3. As an unconscious request for martyrdom with Christ. 4. As a keen test of the heroism of Peter. 5. As an illustration of the stage of transition, through which the disciples were then passing. 6. As giving the Lord occasion to characterize the nature of earthly government, and to utter His protest against all ideas of a Christian hierarchy; as well as to distinguish expressly the economy of the Father, and the creation and preordination, from the economy of the Son and redemption; and still more expressly to mark out the royal road of humility as the appointed and only way to true and abiding Christian exaltation. Phil. ii. 6 seq.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—What was noble and what was evil in the request of the sons of Zebedee.—The bold petition of these disciples: 1. As a fault: with regard to the error and the sin in it,—a. they prayed for something which, in the sense in which they prayed for it, did not exist in the kingdom of Christ; b. for something which was not yet existing (not before the cross); c. for something about which decision had already been made: possibly in their favour, so that their request was superfluous; possibly not, and then their request was vain. 2. As a pious impulse of the Spirit, which was sanctified and abundantly gratified: it was an impulse, a. to remain always near Him; b. to share His lot and serve Him; 3. to work with self-devotement for His kingdom. One was the friend of Jesus, the other the first martyr.—The cup of Christ and His baptism: a. A tasting of all the bitternesses of the Messianic suffering; b. the experience of all the external trials, or the being baptized into the shame of the cross, the death, the sepulchre, the underworld. Or,

a. His drinking (Gethsemane); b. His sinking (Calvary).—Cup and baptism in the kingdom of Christ: 1. The cup and the baptism; 2. the baptism and the cup.—As the Lord corrected Peter by rebuking lessons, so He corrects the sons of Zebedee by humbling lessons: 1. By making an express distinction between the suffering of Christ and His glory; 2. between martyr-fidelity with its reward, and the divine gift and its blessedness; 3. between the economy and work of the Father, and the economy and work of the Son; 4. between the eternal fundamental determinations of the kingdom of God, and their realization in the work of man's free will; 5. between the earthly State and the spiritual Church.—The displeasure of the disciples at the error of the sons of Zebedee: 1. Probably a feeling on behalf of Peter's rights; 2. not free from envy and strife; 3. but at the same time springing from a presentiment of a higher order of things.—Above and below in the Church of Christ: 1. An above which is below; 2. a below which is above (as oft-times the first is the last, and the last first).—Contrast between the appointments of State and those of the Church: 1. Those are legal; these rest upon the fundamental principles of pure and free love. 2. Those are symbolical; these are actual powers in life. —The repeated testimonies of Christ against a primacy.—Christ servant of all and Lord of all, Phil. ii. 6 seq. Real and essential dignities in the kingdom of heaven: 1. Its names or titles are powers of life; 2. its powers of life are divine fruits; 3. its divine fruits are God's gifts.—Christ the Prince of peace among His people.

Starcke, Osiander: Ministers in the Church have their own failings.—Take good heed how thou prayest.—We should never look at anything high for ourselves.—Quesnel: Ambition is blind, and often knows not what it wants.—Osiander: The cup of affliction is bitter enough to the flesh, but it is exceeding salutary. Take it in full confidence, and it will serve to the healing of the soul.—Christ does not say that He could not give the heavenly glory, but that He could not give it to any but those for whom it was prepared, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.—We must not trouble ourselves as to the place which we shall occupy in heaven, but see to it that we get there.—Hedinger: Christ does not disparage or overturn dignities, but their pride and vanity.—Variety of gifts in the Church: these should not exalt themselves, those should not envy, Rom. xii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 15; Jas. i. 10.—In the kingdoms of the world, a man is called great when he rules; in the kingdom of grace, when he serves many.—Luther: There is nothing which more adorns and dignifies the office of a true servant of Christ than genuine humility and simplicity.—Braune: There is ever a widening interval between pleasing others and minding the cause itself (at first, he remarks, they coalesce, or are much more concurrent).—In the result, the ambitious man forgets the cause itself, and displays his own gifts and powers; from one false step he then proceeds to another.—If in their (Zebedee's sons') love to the Lord there was an admixture of ambition, that would tend to make their love impure: the kingdom of love could not and must not tolerate such a blending.—The displeasure of the ten was a proof that they were affected by the same fault.—The promises of Christ, Rev. ii. 10, 28, iii. 21.

Schleiermacher: Love to Christ is the measure for all the dealings of men in His Church.—Brieger: The kingdom of Christ is a kingdom of the cross.—Love teaches us to serve.—His serving should endear our service.—Bauer: The whole life of the Son of man was humble service.

2. The passing through Jericho. (VERS. 46–52.)

Parallels: Matt. xx. 29–34; Luke xviii. 35–43, xix. 1–28.

46 And they came to Jericho: and as He went out of Jericho with His disciples, and a great number of people, blind Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, sat by the highway-side begging. 47 And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. 48 And many charged him that he should hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. 49 And Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise; He calleth thee. 50 And he, casting away his garment, rose, and came to Jesus. 51 And Jesus answered and said unto him, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? The blind man said unto Him, Lord, that I might receive my sight. 52 And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way.

Ver. 46. We read, with A. and Rec., υἱός without the Article, and ὁ τυφλός with the Article. So also προσαιτῶν, although important codd., including B.D., read otherwise. See the Notes.

Ver. 47. Ναζαρηνός, Lach., Tisch.

Ver. 49. Εἶπεν· φωνήσατε αὐτόν.

Ver. 50. Instead of ἀναστάς, Lach. and Tisch. read ἀναπηδήσας, after B.L.D.Δ., etc.

Ver. 52. Αὐτῷ instead of τῷ Ἰησοῦ.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels in Matthew and Luke.—From Ephraim and the desert, Jesus, with the Twelve and His trusted Galilæan dependants—who had joined Him at this point or before—turned to Jericho, where He united His company with that of the great Galilæan-Peræan band going up to the feast, which had come from Peræa over the Jordan. Upon the question of time, and Jericho itself, and the difference among the Synoptists in regard to the healing of the blind, consult the notes upon Matthew. Like that Evangelist, Mark passes over the narrative of Zacchæus, and gives instead all the more exact account of the healing of the blind men. The fundamental idea of Luke's Gospel demanded that the favour shown to the rich publican should not be omitted. Matthew and Mark are so intent upon depicting the great procession to the feast in its unity, that they cannot linger upon another episode, such as that of Zacchæus, in addition to the healing of the blind men. Matthew, indeed, might hesitate through modesty to record prominently so many instances of favour shown to the publicans; and Mark would probably prefer to omit a new remembrancer of the embittered hatred which subsisted between the Jews and the Romans—writing as he did so much for Roman Christians. Moreover, the occurrence with Zacchæus was not properly a miraculous history, such as both these Evangelists mainly record at this time.—Now, while Matthew gives an account merely of the departure from Jericho, Mark mentions also the entrance. In his account of the departure, he describes the great numbers that accompanied Jesus, and records the full name of the blind man, Bartimæus, the son of Timæus. Luke joins him in saying that this man was a beggar Mark, again, has the specific note that he, Bartimæus, began tc cry aloud. The words of the people to the blind man, "Be of good courage, rise; He calleth thee"—the conduct of Bartimæus generally, and his casting away his garment, and standing up, and coming—are all characteristic touches of painting which Mark alone gives. Only Matthew records the compassion of Jesus, and the fixing His eyes upon the man. Mark also omits "Receive thy sight." The word of healing is condensed, and the conclusion is briefer than Luke's, touching only the main points.

2. Bartimæus.—The patronymic בַּר טִמְאַי is made into a proper name (after the analogy of Bartholomew and others); as it is explained by the additional clause, "son of Timæus." This last seems to place Timæus among the number of well-known Christians. Meyer: Probably a Christian who afterwards attained distinction. And this might be true, notwithstanding the fact that he had allowed his son, a blind man, to beg on the highway. But, if we read with Codex A. and the Text. Rec., "a son of Timæus, Bartimæus the blind man, and begged," it is plain that this is an account of him more precise and consistently carried out, which however seemed too full and specific to most copyists. According to it, Bartimæus, the blind man, was himself a personage well known to Christians as a monument of the Lord's miracle, as was probably also Simon the Leper; and the designation "a son of Timæus" would distinguish him, not merely from the father, but also from other sons.

3. And when he heard.—He therefore believed that Jesus of Nazareth was the son of David, that is, the expected Messiah. He thus bore testimony to the widely-scattered seed of faith, and especially to the renewed stimulus given to the Redeemer's cause, since the beginning of the festal journey, amongst the masses. But the blind man might also have heard on his hill-top of the recent resurrection of Lazarus, which took place in his own neighbourhood; and this might have been matter of many still night-ponderings in his blindness.

4. And Jesus stood still.—We now have reached the great crisis. He now hears, and all hear, the loud cry—Messiah! See on the parallel of Matthew.

5. Be of good comfort.—Meyer: θάρσει, ἔγειρε, φωνεῖ σε: most affecting asyndeton.

6. Rabboni, רַבּוֹנִי, my Master.—If the Yod is taken paragogically, it means merely "master" (see Meyer); but even then it has so emphatic a sense as to be almost equal in personal reverence. Bartimæus adhered from that time to the Lord. He followed Him, praising God, Luke says; he followed Him in the way, in the procession, says Mark. He immediately joined the festal company of Jesus' triumph. It was, indeed, the triumphal procession of the Prophet, and not yet that of the High Priest: this is formed by the living Church, even as the risen saints will be the triumphal procession of the King.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew and the previous notes.

2. The contrast in the sentiments of the people round Christ: type of the contrast between the hierarchical and the evangelical Church. In the former, the poor and wretched are threatened, and bidden to keep silence, when they cry directly to Christ; in the latter it is, "Be of good comfort, rise; He calleth thee." It was natural that those who surrounded Christ should be led by the thought of the beginning of His kingdom into conventional notions as to the value of courtly customs and hierarchical order; but it was also natural that the mercy of our Lord towards the wretched should scatter all such mists.

3. The casting his garment away was an expression of joyous boldness and zealous haste, and a removal of all impediment.

4. Mark intimates the dignity of the crisis in which the Lord now stands, by the circumstance that He heals the blind man simply by words: "Go thy way, thy faith," etc. We know from Matthew how they are to be unfolded; nevertheless, it is observable that Mark, who earlier records the sighing, the anointing with spittle, etc., introduces here so few intervening circumstances.

5. The Lord declared, by act and deed, that He would have no courtly state in His kingdom, no intermediate personages between Him and His dependants; that He was come, not to rule, but to minister. And, so far as this goes, our history is an acted illustration of the former section.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—The beginning of the procession of Christ was the opening of blind eyes.—Light must be diffused in the world.—The fame of Bartimæus the best fame for all men; the best reputation for all Christians. (He was a blind man, a beggar; he believed and importuned; the Lord took pity upon him, and healed him.)—With the name of Christ the names of those whom He saved are immortalized.—The most beautiful homage with which Christ was publicly hailed as Messiah: Have mercy on me!—It is a pitiable thing when the cry, "Lord, have pity on me" (the κύριε ἐλέησον, to wit), becomes a dead formula in our poor Christendom. —How Jesus can translate the hard threateners of the wretched into compassionate comforters and helpers.—The three words of true Christian sympathy and help for the wretched: Be of good comfort, rise; He calleth thee.—Through the compassion of Jesus, and nearness to Him who exercises it, one is taught to preach the Gospel even unconsciously.—How the helping "Go thy way" of the Lord to Bartimæus and others becomes a glorious and encouraging announcement, "Come unto Him."—All the uncalled ceremonialists in the royal procession of Christ are unable to suppress the cry of faith sent forth to Him.—The ear of the King detects the lamenting cry of the blind beggar through all the tumult of the crowd.—Thus the royal procession is magnified by the cries of misery.—A blind beggar can arrest the course of it; a blind beggar, turned into a seeing disciple, can advance it and add to its dignity.—The true worshippers and petitioners of God throw away for ever the beggar's array.—Mendicancy appears or vanishes as men are guided: 1. It appears in the ancient priestly and royal states of this world; 2. it vanishes in the kingdom of Christ. Compare with this passage John ix. 8; Acts iii. 2, iv. 34.—Men may at first hinder the beginnings of Christianity, and then agree afterwards to further it prematurely and rashly. (The first three centuries; the three following.)

Starcke, Luther: Blindness and poverty make a double distress: so it is in spiritual matters, when both are rightly felt and mourned over.—Canstein: The preaching of the Gospel is a perpetual announcement that Jesus is near; and we should, knowing our misery, incessantly and confidently cry aloud to Him for His mercy.—Luther: Sufferers oftentimes meet with scanty sympathy and poor intercession.—Cramer: It would be a sore thing if the good God were as easily wearied as men are with our praying and beseeching. —Quesnel: We should let no opportunity pass of getting good either to body or soul, for such opportunities do not always return. —Hedinger: In prayer we should let nothing interrupt or divert us.—The simplicity of faith in prayer holds fast and holds out.—Luther: God's call is even in spiritual things the beginning of actual cure.—He who truly wants salvation must disencumber himself of all embarrassments and come to Christ.—Hedinger: He who would see, must acknowledge his blindness.—Luther: Faith is counted of such high dignity that salvation is ascribed to it, although the work of God.—Hedinger: Christ is our Physician and our Light.—Faith is the best of all medicine.—Canstein: Those who receive gifts follow their benefactors. Ought we not then to follow Christ? He is indeed our greatest Benefactor.—Rieger (with reference to those who murmured): Those who are around are often unaware how much harm they may do by light words, and how easily a tender germ is trodden down and ruined. —The inward earnestness of the blind man broke through everything. Happy he who lets himself be restrained from faith and the cry of faith by nothing under the sun.—Things are continually occurring which might have a tendency to turn us in part or wholly away from Christ. What then? So much the more does the blind cry out, and faith believe; and the more it is hindered, the more it is helped.—The Lord was not always so ready to be followed by those who were healed; but in this last journey to Jerusalem an exception was admitted. Envy was not now to be excited; it had reached its highest point. Praise, on the other hand, was now, by all the wonderful works of God, to demonstrate its power against "the enemy and the avenger."—Gossner: The blind man runs to Jesus without seeing him; so must we hasten to Him in faith, though we see Him not.

3. The Triumphal Entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem. (CHAP. XI. 1–11.)

Parallels: Matt. xxi. 1–17; Luke xix. 29–46; John xii. 12–29.

1 And when they came nigh to Jerusalem, unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives, He sendeth forth two of His disciples, 2 And saith unto them, Go your way into the village over against you: and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon never man sat; loose him, and bring him. 3 And if any man say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye that the Lord hath need of him; and straightway he will send him hither. 4 And they went their way, and found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met; and they loose him. 5 And certain of them that stood there said unto them, What do ye, loosing the colt? 6 And they said unto them even as Jesus had commanded: and they let them go. 7 And they brought the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him; and He sat upon him. 8 And many spread their garments in the way; and others cut down branches off the trees, and strawed them in the way. 9 And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna; Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord: 10 Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest. 11 And Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple: and when He had looked round about upon all things, and now the even-tide was come, He went out unto Bethany with the twelve.

Ver. 2. Lach., οὐδεὶς οὔπω, after B., Origen, and others. Tisch. (B.C.L.Δ.): λύσατε αὐτὸν καὶ φέρετε.

Ver. 4. In many codd., B.C., etc., stands πάλιν. Thus the clause is made part of the answer of the disciples: The Lord will use the colt and send it back again.—Probably this was designed to soften the seeming violence of the transaction.

Ver. 6. Καθὼς εἶπεν corresponds to the preceding εἶπον, according to B.C.L.Δ., Lach., Tisch.

Ver. 7. B.L.Δ. Origen: φέρουσιν. ᾿Επιβάλλουσιν, emphatic Present.

Ver. 8. Tischendorf's reading (recommended by Meyer), ἄλλοι δὲ στιβάδας, κόψαντες ἐκ τῶν ἀγρῶν, is not thoroughly well supported.

Ver. 9. The λέγοντες is wanting in B.C.L.Δ.

Ver. 10. The reading, ἐν ὀνόματι κυρίου, has some important codd. against it, but A. and others sustain it. It was probably corrected as being difficult; but the difficulty is obviated if we regard the expression "kingdom" (poetically brief, without the Article) as repeated in thought.

Ver. 11. Ὁ Ἰησοῦς is an explanatory addition.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels to Matthew, and on Luke.—The Evangelist translates us at once into Palm Sunday, as to time; and, as to place, into the region between Bethany and the Mount of Olives. The departure from Jericho took place on the Friday before the Passion Week: it was the custom to spend the night in the district of the Mount of Olives, and spend the rest of the Sabbath there. In Bethany, on the evening of Saturday, the meal took place in the house of Simon the Leper. On Sunday morning the journey from Bethany was continued. Now, in the accounts of the Synoptists, the beginning and the continuation of the festal journey are combined in one, because it is their object to describe the important palm procession at once as a whole. Luke, indeed, informs us of the delay of the journey on Friday in Jericho, that is, through the Lord's entrance into the house of Zacchæus; and he adds the delivery of a parable which is connected with that entrance, and with the expectation of the people that He would at once found the Messianic kingdom in Jerusalem. But it is John alone who tells us that the tarrying in Bethany occupied an interval; and to him also we owe the most express and real explanation of the procession, in the passage, ch. xii. 12–29. What is peculiar to Mark is this, that he places us by his minute specialities in the very midst of the scene. He writes in the Present tense: They come nigh; He sendeth. The sending of the two he relates somewhat more circumstantially; while, with Luke, he omits the mention of the older ass, and does not join Matthew and John in their allusion to Zech. ix. 9. He alone marks the fact, that the colt stood tied by the door of a house in a place where two ways met; and he also gives most vividly the particulars connected with the loosing of the ass. Then he again gives his record in the Present tense: They bring the foal; they lay their garments thereon. In his description of the strewing of branches and garments in the way, as well as of the Hosanna, he agrees now with Matthew and now with Luke; yet he alone has the στοιβάδες, and the greeting to the kingdom of the Messiah, as well as to the King. Several traits which are found in Matthew, Luke, and John, he omits. Earnest and powerful is the final narrative. Jesus comes into the city, into the temple; takes all into His eye with silent, searching glance, and returns back to Bethany in the evening with the Twelve. For this distinction between the day of the entrance and the day of the cleansing of the temple, we are indebted to Mark alone.

2. Unto Bethphage and Bethany.—They are approaching Jerusalem; and the approach is so ordered, that they arrive at Bethphage and Bethany. The intermediate stations are measured from Jerusalem, the goal; consequently, Bethphage comes first, and then Bethany, for they proceed from Bethany over Bethphage to the city. But how is it we read towards Bethany, when the departure was from that place? First, we must bear in mind that the Sunday procession from Bethany is blended into unity with the Friday procession from Jericho. Thus our passage will say, that Jesus sent His disciples forth at once from Bethany. Moreover, it may be assumed that the Bethany of that time stretched wide into the country around, and that Jesus had found a lodgment in its eastern outskirts. The district of Bethany reached as far as to join the district of Bethphage. But Bethany they had not yet arrived at: the colt was sent for from thence. Concerning Jerusalem, Bethany, Bethphage, see on Matthew. Concerning the Mount of Olives, compare Winer and the travellers.

3. Whereon never man sat.—So also Luke. This circumstance is wanting in Matthew, but perfectly agrees with his account of the mother-ass. The foal had up to this time run with its mother. Meyer discerns in this notice "an appendage of reflective tradition, based on the sacred characteristic of the animal (for unused animals were put to sacred purposes, Num. xix. 2; Deut. xxi. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 7).—Matthew did not note the circumstance, because it was self-understood that the foal was not yet used, so long as it was a foal running with the mother." See the notes on Matthew.

4. And if any man say unto you.—That this significant interchange of sayings has the character of mysterious watchwords, is proved by the use of the εἰπεῖν in Mark, and in Luke of the emphatic οὕτως ἐρεῖτε. So is it with the ordering of the Passover feast by such an one: εἴπατε αὐτῷ. Luke has the equivalent ἐρεῖτε, with the addition, λέγει σοι ὁ διδάσκαλος.

5. Without, in a place where two ways met.—The ἄμφοδον means primarily a way encompassing a block of houses; then the street, and even a quarter of the town. The animal being fastened to the door, points to the open space before the house.

6. Branches.—The word στοιβάδες is an error of the transcriber; the Codd. B.D., and many others, read στιβάδες. The στιβάς is a scattering of straw, reed, branches, or twigs. The Plural and the cutting down point to branches of trees. According to John xii. 13, palm-leaves were strawed (as the symbol of peace).

7. The kingdom of our father David.—Meyer insists on it that there is here a discrepancy with Matthew. Now it is a discrepancy when the definite stands against the definite; but not where the definite is opposed to the indefinite. This well-founded canon of hermeneutics would demolish many of the discrepancies pointed out by school criticism. Matthew and Luke wrote no diaries. There is no difference here, any more than the blending of the parts of the palm procession into the journey of one day makes the Synoptists and John disagree. Matthew and Luke connect the cleansing of the temple with the meaning of the palm entry; but this Mark does not. Christ, according to his account, takes a general survey, which in its silent observation betokened the cleansing which would take place on the morrow.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on Matthew and Luke.

2. The expectation of the Messiah was the expectation of His kingdom; hence the salutation of the Messiah was the salutation of His kingdom. Christ and His kingdom are not to be separated; but the kingdom of His cross and the kingdom of His glory are to be distinguished, even as the glorified Christ is distinguished from the Christ in the form of a servant. Of this gulf between the kingdom here and the kingdom there, most of the jubilants had no idea; many rose not beyond it, but plunged below.

3. The Mount of Olives a symbol.

4. The palm procession in Mark is brief, earnest, sublime. A swift progress to the city, and to the temple; ending in a wide and silent inspection of the temple until evening.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew, and the preceding reflections.—Christ's goal in His royal procession: to the temple.—The significance of Christ's coming to the temple: 1. Its types and promises, Exod. xl. 34;

1 Kings viii.; 2 Chron. v.; Isa. ii., lxvi. 20; Ezek. xliii.; Hagg. ii. 3, 9; Zech. xiv. 20; Mal. iii. 1. 2. The historical visits paid to it: the child Jesus in the temple, the visit when twelve years old, the feasts, Jesus as the public Messiah in the temple, the Pentecost, the burning of the temple in A.D. 70. 3. The spiritual visitations of the temple.—The fates of the temple the history of the world; the fates of the temple the history of the kingdom of God.—The palm entry into the temple, according to its external and its internal form: 1. The great procession to the great cathedral; 2. Christ the judged, and Christ the Judge, conducted by a wretched people to the deserted house of God.—Christ comes to the temple, 1. from Galilee with the ecclesiastical devout, 2. from Jericho with the enthusiasts, 3. from Bethany with His friends and servants, 4. from the Mount of Olives alone with His Holy Spirit.—Christ in the temple as the Jesus of twelve years, and as the openly-proclaimed Messiah.—Christ in the beautiful new-built temple; or, the difference between an æsthetic and a spiritual inspection of the temple.—The fearfully silent glance of Christ in the temple until evening.—The Lord's visitation of His churches: 1. He knows and sees all; 2. He sees and looks through all; 3. He looks through all, and keeps silence; 4. He keeps silence, thinking upon judgment and mercy.—Christ's entrance and exit at His temple visitation: 1. The entrance: through the city straight to the temple; 2. the exit: from the temple to Bethany.—The procession of the people with Christ to the temple.

Starcke: Thus Jesus comes as the Lamb of God, and places Himself on the altar of sacrifice. Certainly this was not the act of a mere man, thus joyfully to come, to give Himself up to His enemies, and go to confront His death.—Compare the foal, 1 Sam. vi. 7.—Canstein: The Lord needs not that we should give Him anything, for all is always His; yet He may require it for certain purposes.—Quesnel: All things must be cast under the feet of Jesus. —Nova Bibl. Tub.: Where Jesus is, there is life, movement, praise, and joy.—How necessary is the visitation of the churches!—Hedinger: The eye and the heart may well take pleasure, as in nature, so also in art, her copy. (But all in its measure and in its time.)—Gerlach: (The foal never yet used.) This trait points to the fact that Jesus as Priest-King made His entrance.—Braune: Believers gladly place their substance at the feet and disposal of Jesus, their Master.—In the way of obedience (which the disciples followed), light always arises upon light.—The Lord now came upon the animal of peace, not as one day upon the great white horse to judgment.—Thus they received with peaceful joy the Prince of peace.—Every festal pilgrim was received with the "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord;" but the greeting befitted Him in a peculiar and higher sense.

Schleiermacher: We must confess that, though they may not have been the same men (who first cried Hosanna! then Crucify Him), yet that it was the same people.—The oneness and interdependence of the people makes the difference of the individuals disappear.—We cannot help regarding this gross changeableness and instability as the proper characteristic of the great mass.—(Christ keeping silence in the temple till even-tide.) The boundary between the old and the new covenant came nearer and nearer: the one was to find its end, and the other was to be erected on the ruins of the former.—What thoughts touching the past must have arisen, and how deep must His emotions have been, in the consciousness of what He came to do, when He compared the magnificence and glory of the old covenant with the spiritual life of the new covenant, which, far removed from all outward demonstration, unseen and unpretending, was creating for itself its own form in sweet and gentle silence; when He compared the magnificence and glory of the external temple with the spiritual temple built of living stones, in which His Spirit should dwell, and where should be established for ever the worship of His heavenly Father in spirit and in truth!

Brieger: The devotion of the garments to His service intimates something extraordinary. When Jehu in the camp was to be proclaimed as king, a throne of garments was erected for him. This, with the sound of trumpets, and the cry, "Jehu is king," made up the homage (2 Kings ix. 13). Here we have something similar, and homage is done to Jesus.—As a light before its final extinction blazes up once more, so Israel before their final fall lifted themselves up to Jehovah once more. But as at Sinai they were put to shame after professing obedience (Exod. xx. 19), through making the golden calf, so here they are put to more wretched shame, by so soon crying, Crucify Him! crucify Him!—Now does the Father set His Son as a King upon His holy hill of Zion, Ps. ii. 6.—Christ was a King from this hour. In all the parables from this point, His own Person is the centre. He speaks and acts as a king. (But we must distinguish between the time when the people heralded Him as king, and when God lifted Him up to His throne: between Palm Sunday and the Resurrection and Ascension.)

4. The Withered Fig-tree, and the House of Prayer made a Den of Thieves. The Cleansing of the Temple. (VERS. 12–26.)

12 And on the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, He was hungry: 13 And seeing a fig-tree afar off, having leaves, He came, if haply He might find anything thereon: and when He came to it, He found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet. 14 And Jesus answered and said unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. And His disciples heard it. 15 And they come to Jerusalem: and Jesus went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves; 16 And would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple. 17 And He taught, saying unto them, Is it not written, My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves. 18 And the scribes and chief priests heard it, and sought how they might destroy Him: for they feared Him, because all the people was astonished at His doctrine. 19 And when even was come, He went out of the city. 20 And in the morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig-tree dried up from the roots. 21 And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto Him, Master, behold, the fig-tree which Thou cursedst is withered away. 22 And Jesus answering, saith unto them, Have faith in God. 23 For verily I say unto you, That whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith. 24 Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them. 25 And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses. 26 But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses.

Ver. 14. Lachmann reads ὁ καιρός with the Article, following Origen and many codd.; and thus the true meaning of the passage becomes more definite. He (Jesus): ὁ Ἰησοῦς interpolated.

Ver. 17. Καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς, according to C.L.Δ., etc.

Ver. 18. Πεποιήκατε, B.L.Δ. Orig., instead of ἐποιήσατε.

Ver. 20. See the order of B.C.L.Δ. in Lach. and Tisch.

Ver. 23. The γάρ (for) is wanting in B.D. and others. The additional clause, ὃ ἐὰν εἴπῃ, is wanting in B.C.D.L.Δ. Lach., Tisch., προσεύχεσθε καὶ αἰτεῖσθε, after B.C.L.Δ.: a more comprehensive promise.

Ver. 24. Codd. B.C.L.Δ., ἐλάβετε, instead of λαμβάνετε, accepted by Lach. and Tisch.

Ver. 25. This verse is wanting in B.L.S.Δ. and some others. Tischendorf gives it up. Lach. retains it, after C. and others. But it is another interpolation in some MSS. after ver. 26, from Matt. vii. 7, 8.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels in Matthew and Luke.—Notwithstanding Mark's conciseness in his record, we can yet distinguish three days of Jesus' abode in the temple; that is, of the Messianic residence there of the King. The Sunday was the day of entrance and looking round, ch. xi. 1–11. Monday was the day on which the fig-tree was cursed, the temple was cleansed, and those festal works were done by Jesus in the temple which filled up the exasperation of His enemies, vers. 12–19. Then Tuesday was the day of His contest in the temple with all the assaults of His enemies' power in their several divisions, and of His departure from the temple, ch. xi. 20, xiii. 37. On Wednesday Jesus remained in concealment, as we are positively assured by John (ch. xii. 37); and probably it was then that He completed His discourse of the last things by adding those eschatological parables which Matthew communicates: unless we may assume rather that they were uttered on the night between Tuesday and Wednesday within the circle of His most confidential disciples. The allusions to night might suit such a view, Matt. xxiv. 42, 43, xxv. 6, 30. The silent Wednesday of His concealment was then devoted to the preparation of His larger body of disciples, and to purposes of retired devotion.

The unity of this section lies in the narrative of the fig-tree cursed. Mark makes it the starting-point of his account of Jesus' wonderful works in the temple during the Monday. The individual particulars of these festal wonders are singled out prominently by Matthew, ch. xxi. 12–15. Therefore he presses into this second day the cursing of the fig-tree, with its withering up. Luke also indicates the festal hours, ch. xix. 47, 48. But for the peculiar significance of the critical points of the Greeks earnestly desiring to see Jesus, and the discourse which that occasioned (John xii. 20–36), see the Bibel-werk on John. But the Evangelist Mark takes the whole day into his view under its severe aspect. Hence he connects all this with the narrative of the fig-tree; and our section embraces the time from Monday morning to Tuesday morning. Thus, according to his account, the cursing of the fig-tree preceded the cleansing of the temple on Monday morning. With Matthew, who retains the narrative indeed, it follows it; because Matthew purposed more strongly to stamp the contrast of the two temple-days—the day of peace and the day of contest. Concerning the fig-tree, Mark preliminary remarks that it had leaves (which from afar might seem to be inviting). But in connection with the circumstance that Jesus found no figs upon it, he has the remarkable clause οὐ γὰρ ἦν, etc., the time was not yet (concerning which below). Matthew's word, "Let no fruit grow henceforth," he gives concretely: "Let no man eat, etc." He adds, that the disciples heard it. The cleansing of the temple he relates again with an ἤρξατο: He began. And he adds to the picture, that Jesus would not suffer any vessel to be carried through the temple. The explanatory word of Christ he introduces as instruction (ἐδίδασκε), and in vigorous interrogative form (οὐ γέγραπται). To the "house of prayer" he adds, "for all nations;" which Luke has not, and which reminds us of "every creature," ch. xvi. 15. The confusion of the Sanhedrim on this day, and their projects as to the manner in which they should kill Jesus—seeing that they feared the people, who did earnest homage to Jesus—he connects rightly with this day; while Luke more indefinitely records it (ch. xix. 47, 48), as also Matthew something similar (ch. xxi. 15, 16), and John in another aspect of it (ch. xii. 17–19). Then follows, according to Mark, the departure of Jesus from the city. Matthew tells us that the fig-tree had straightway withered. Mark relates that it was early in the morning, as they passed by. Thus the withering had proceeded in the course of a day and a night; and that, as he remarks, from the root. Matthew makes the disciples see, wonder, and speak; Mark records more precisely how Peter remembered the circumstance and spoke. The words themselves are more vivid here: Rabbi, behold, etc. Thereupon Jesus utters the word concerning the removing of mountains by faith: more concretely apprehended in Mark; more generally in Matthew. But Mark connects with this promise of Jesus the very important word concerning the hearing of prayer (ver. 24), and the condition of being reconciled with our brother (Matt. vi. 14).

2. The next day.—Thus, on the Monday morning after the Sunday of the palms.

3. He was an hungered.—Early departure, haste to enter the work of the day, and much else, lay at the foundation of this fact.

4. If haply, εἰ ἄρα: that is, because it had leaves; since the leaves of the fig-tree appear after the fruit. Matt. xxi. 19.

5. The time of figs was not yet.—See the note on Matthew. As the tree had leaves, it promised fruit; for the harvest-time of figs, when it might have been stripped of its fruit, was not yet come. For the various explanations of this, see De Wette and Meyer. As καιρός signifies the full and perfect time, the meaning is clear enough. Between the period of leaf-formation and the time of fig-harvest, one might seek for figs from a tree standing exposed. But not till the καιρός had come could the tree be stripped. Thus the οὐ γὰρ is not an explanation of the circumstance that it had no figs, but of the Lord's coming and seeking, by which it appeared that the tree had only produced its leaves. The expression, "He found nothing but leaves only," signifies that He saw with displeasure that, as a worthless tree, it had nothing but leaves upon it. This He might conclude from the fact that the time of harvest had not come, and therefore that it was not already stripped of its fruit. According to Meyer, the meaning is, that the tree could not yet have borne fruit. "If it had been the time of figs, He would have found fruit besides the leaves." But then a premature doom would have been pronounced on the tree. The early display of leaves was certainly irregular; but if it had been a certain sign of its dying, the Lord would not have sought fruit upon it. If it could put forth leaves, it must have been able previously to set its fruit.

6. And Jesus said unto it.—Properly, answered and said. Bengel: arbori fructum neganti.

7. Concerning the temple, see on Matthew.—And would not suffer that any man should: ἵνα; the toleration of evil is the procurement of it.

8. Any vessel.—No man durst carry tools and implements through the sacred precincts of the temple, that is, through the fore-court. Was it intended to avoid a circuitous route, as in a great city profane passages may be made through holy places? But the temple space was not in the way of such passing. Many, however, might bring their implements of toil with them at their devotions, in order to have them conveniently at hand. The carrying them through was, therefore, not literally a passing through with them, but rather the having them at hand; and it is opposed to the business of money-changing and selling doves which was carried on within the temple itself. According to Lightfoot and Wetstein, the Rabbins afterwards forbade the same thing.

9. For all nations.—The prediction of the prophets, that the temple should be a house of prayer for all nations, had a higher meaning (see Isa. ii. and other passages). There must be a distinction, however, between the Israelite bondsmen who brought their offerings (Lev. xvii. 8, xxii. 19; Ezra ii. 43, vii. 7), and the later proselytes of the gate; the relative recognition of these latter had given occasion to the symbol of the Court of the Gentiles. Therein lay the germ of the universality of the religion of promise. See on Matthew. That the additional clause occurs only in Mark, is not to be accounted for only on Gentile-Christian grounds; for it is wanting in Luke. It is peculiar to Mark that he everywhere lays stress upon the universality of the Gospel.[1] 10. Sought how they might destroy Him.—This was their counsel on the Monday: that Jesus should die, had been already previously decreed (John v. 16, vii. 32, x. 31, xi. 45). They now confusedly took counsel about the how; since it seemed almost an impossibility, on account of the people, on this day of His wonderful ascendancy in the temple. Then again on Wednesday: "not on the feast-day," although Judas had preliminarily dealt with them on the Sunday concerning the matter. The Palm Sunday may have made Judas suspicious again, or brought his promise into doubt. Then he came on Thursday evening, after a new crisis had come (the departure of Jesus from the temple), and his exasperation had become complete.

11. They saw the fig-tree dried up from the roots.—See on Matthew. Meyer naturally finds here another discrepancy with Matthew. Matthew is inexact in his record, only on account of a higher end that he contemplated in his narrative. Nor does Mark say that the withering had just then taken place, or been finished. The tree was now in a marvellous manner dried up; and that, as he adds, from the roots—from its diseased root upwards, throughout.

12. Faith in God.—Trust towards God, πίστις Θεοῦ (Genitive of the object). More general view of faith, with reference to the personal source of miraculous power, the almighty God of the covenant: ch. ix. 23. Compare Matt. xvii. 20; Luke xvii. 6.

13. That ye receive it.—That is, in the divine confidence of faith that is already received which in external reality has yet to come: Heb. xi. 1. The prayer of faith is heard, and as prayer in the name of Jesus: John xiv. 13, 14; xvi. 23, 24, 26; or, as the prayer of a holy combination, the Church, Matt. xviii. 19; or, as the prayer of the Holy Ghost, Rom. viii. 26–28.

14. When ye stand praying.—Comp. Matt. v. 23, 24, and vi. 14, 15. As the word concerning the faith which moves mountains might have originally been uttered in more than one connection, so also that concerning the forgiveness of others, as the condition of all true offering of prayer, and its answer. But in this place, where Jesus connected this strongest assurance of the marvellous power of faith with the cursing of the fig-tree, it seems inevitable that

[1] On the harmony here, Starcke says: This was the third time that He thus cleansed the temple. The first time in John ii.; the second time on the day before this, immediately after His entrance.

He should declare how such a faith could not be sundered from a placable love; that it should never be used in the service of hate and fanaticism.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallel in Matthew, and also the previous notes.

2. The so-called cursing of the fig-tree is the rather to be regarded as a grand prophetic act, because Christ, as Christ, now stood at the climax of the palm festivity, and it was obvious that all Israel might now do Him homage. This symbolical act at such a crisis was a sure sign that He was perfectly conscious of the situation of things; as also was the weeping over the city during the festal procession, according to Luke.

3. The cleansing of the temple at the beginning and at the end of Christ's pilgrimage, the earnest of a manifold cleansing of the Church from Gentile and Jewish perversions.

4. The declaration of the curse in its sacred form, a revelation to explain its real nature; as contrasted with man's curse of evil wishing.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See on Matthew.—The fig-tree a figure of Israel, and a warning sign to the Church: 1. As the fruitful fig-tree, which sets forth fruit sooner than leaves. So Israel. It had faith, and the works of faith, before it had the ceremonies of faith. So the early Church. 2. As the unfruitful fig-tree, which had an adornment of leaves, promising fruit deceitfully. So the Israel of the time of Jesus, and so the external Church of later times and the last.—The cursing of the fig-tree in its relation to the cleansing of the temple: 1. An indication of the morning thoughts of the Lord concerning Israel; 2. a prelude to the coming expurgation of the temple; 3. a prophetic token (for the hopeful disciples, concerning the coming solemn issue of things).—The judgment of Jesus on the fig-tree, and His judgment upon the temple with its service.—Christ hungering on the morn of His greatest day of honour; or, the great sign of the spiritual purity and freedom of the kingdom of Christ.—The Lord's hunger on the temple-mountain, and His thirsting on Calvary.—How zeal for the Lord should keep itself pure from hatred against men.—Only in the spirit of reconciliation can the Christian execute the judicial office.—The flames of Christ's wrath a loving zeal, which is always one with the spirit of reconciliation.—We cannot help others in the way to heaven by the hateful and tormenting fury of fanaticism.

Starcke: Christ knows what the feeling of the hungry is.—If we endure hunger, we should not murmur, remembering Him.—Canstein: Christ demands nothing of man, if he has not had time; nor does He come to seek till the time is up.—Osiander: Hypocrites have a semblance of godliness, but no true fruits of faith; and so, if they repent not, they must perish.—Hedinger: We must rid the Church of every abuse, and spare no man.—Quesnel: Every believer is a temple of God, and must entertain the same zeal for his own soul's purity as Jesus displayed for the purity of the visible sanctuary.—Osiander: The churches which celebrate a false worship of God are dens of thieves; they wrest for themselves the goods of simple people, and slay their souls.—Those who devote themselves to the correction of ecclesiastical abuses have commonly to encounter great opposition, their lives being sometimes laid in wait for.—An evil conscience must always tremble at itself, and is never bold in its work.—Quesnel: The truth everywhere makes a division among the people; some think to oppress it, while others hear it with wonder and faith.

Gerlach: If you do not find that your believing prayer is granted, ask yourself what lies within that hinders your being heard.

Braune: Benevolent and like a Creator were all His miracles.—This is the only one which punishes and hurts, but it is performed on an inanimate object. It was designed to set luminously before us the reality of the divine punishments.—He pronounced here upon the tree that which, in the parable of the barren fig-tree, the vine-dresser had spoken of as in store for it.—Enmity to man suffers not the philanthropy of God to reach us.—Faith and reconcilableness go together.

Schleiermacher: All that pertains to the community of Christian life and fellowship should be so ordered as to be free from all reference to the outward commerce of this world (on the cleansing of the temple).—Gossner: Words, oral prayers, formularies, external exercises without the spirit, good wishes and mere resolutions, are mere leaves, if the Spirit of God does not invigorate them, and they bring no fruit.

SECOND SECTION.

THE DECISIVE CONFLICT OF JESUS WITH HIS ENEMIES IN JERUSALEM, AND HIS WITHDRAWAL TO THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

CHAPTER XI. 27–XIII. 37.

1. The Attack of the Sanhedrim; or, the Question concerning Christ's Authority, and His Counter-question concerning the Baptist's. (VERS. 27–33.)

Parallels: Matt. xxi. 23–27; Luke xx. 1–8.

27 And they come again to Jerusalem: and as He was walking in the temple, there came to Him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, 28 And say unto Him, By what authority doest Thou these things, and who gave Thee this authority to do these things? 29 And Jesus answered and said unto them, I will also ask of you one question, and answer Me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. 30 The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men? answer Me. 31 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; He will say, Why then did ye not believe him? 32 But if we shall say, Of men; they feared the people: for all men counted John, that he was a prophet indeed. 33 And they answered and said unto Jesus, We cannot tell. And Jesus answering, saith unto them, Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things.

Ver. 28. Tischendorf reads, with B.C.L.Δ., ἔλεγον, and ἤ with B.L.D.
Ver. 31. The οὖν is wanting in A.C.* and many others.
Ver. 32. The ἐάν is wanting in the best codd.; omitting it, the sentence takes a very characteristic interrogatory form.
Ver. 33. The ἀποκριθείς is wanting in B.C., and elsewhere wavers in its position.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See on the parallels of Matthew and Luke.—According to Mark's representation, this day of Christ's conflict falls on Tuesday of the Passion Week. But the conflict is subdivided into three parts: 1. The official demand as to Jesus' abode and supremacy in the temple, exhibited in the question of the Sanhedrim touching His authority; with its reply, as in our present section. 2. The ironical acknowledgment, on the side of the enemies' parties, of Christ's Messianic dignity, exhibited in a series of tempting questions and answers; with the great counter-question of Jesus. 3. The Lord's words to the people, and departure from the temple. Mark's account has in our text no prominent peculiarities; he agrees rather with Luke than with Matthew. His vivid style of delineation is seen in the trait that Jesus went round about the temple, while according to Matthew He was in the act of teaching (though these are not inconsistent with each other); as also the second clause of the Sanhedrim's pondering—But if we say. The Evangelist's choice of the expression λέγει αὐτοῖς, ver. 33, seems appropriate; while Matthew says ἔφη, and Luke εἶπεν. As the Sanhedrim refused Him a decisive declaration concerning John, who had prophetically authenticated Him as the Messiah, He also refused to them the decisive declaration they sought. This was, however, in itself decisive; but not in the form of an express revelation.

2. Doest Thou these things?—See Matthew. This meant, doubtless, the public appearance and work of Jesus in the temple under the Messiah-name which the people gave Him; amongst the rest, certainly, as an individual act, the cleansing of the temple also. The law ordained that prophets were to be tried, Deut. xiii. 1. The most essential requisite was agreement with the faith of the God of Israel; the accidental requirement was the performance of miracles. The latter was not valid without the former; but it was not said that the former without the latter was not valid. (Compare Deut. xviii. 20; Ezek. xiii. 1.) The Sanhedrim could hold themselves justified only in asking for the authority of Jesus. They could not deny that He had approved Himself by miracles. They were disposed, however, to make it a reproach, that He taught other gods, and a new religion. Hence they ask Him, 1. After the divine source of His power, prophetic inspiration; 2. after His theocratic authentication. By the latter the former also was approved, and therefore Jesus appealed to John. John was the most recent monument of the truth and validity of the prophetic order in Israel. And this John had marked Him out as the Messiah. They had been compelled to allow his validity, although they did not afterwards acknowledge him. They would entangle Jesus, by making Him appeal to His divine dignity; but the word of Jesus entangled them and smote them at the same time. It was a reference to His theocratic legitimation, the bearer of which they durst not openly impeach; and at the same time a remembrancer that they themselves had, since the days of John, been falling deep into apostasy.

3. If we say.—The abrupt form is expressive, and more significant than the full unfolding of it in Matthew and Luke, "We fear," which certainly declares the motive of their silence.

4. Of a truth.—According to the reading ὄντως ὅτι, which Tisch.

adopts from B.C.L. Meyer: "They were inwardly sure that John was a prophet." But A.D. and others form a counterpoise; as well as the consideration that this would attribute to the people altogether, and as a whole, the full and believing acceptance of John.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See on the parallels.

2. The counter-question of Jesus arose as the simple consequence of the question addressed to Him. That question was addressed to His theocratic authority. This was already involved in the authentication by John. If they acknowledged John, they must acknowledge also his witness to Jesus as the Messiah. If they did not acknowledge him, they were in a theocratic sense rebels; and Christ could, in the consciousness of His real, divine-human authority, transcending all theocratic authorisation, refuse to give them an answer.

3. From heaven or of men.—Divine mission or human enthusiasm. The antithesis is here laid down, with reference to the contrast between the divine and the human in the human sphere, and does not prejudice the union of the divine and human in the Christological sphere.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew.—Christ in His temple assaulted by the official rulers of the place.—Vainly would hierarchical official authority oppress the divine mission of Jesus.—The misuse of spiritual prerogative against the rights of the Spirit of Christ; guilt which brings after it the severest punishments: 1. Misuse of dignity calls down the judgment of disgrace; 2. misuse of office calls down displacement and rejection from office.—The Spirit of Christ triumphs over the false spirituality of His enemies: 1. With His counter-question opposing their question; 2. with His counter-declarations against their declarations.—The authority of Christ to assume His temple, as opposed to the impotence of His foes: 1. The authority: a. His theocratic authority; b. His personal divine-human authority; c. the authority which rose out of His actual passion-conflict. 2. The impotence of His foes: a. as rejecters of the God-sent Baptist, forsaken of human justice; b. as rejecters of Christ, forsaken of the Spirit; c. as enemies and murderers of Christ, forsaken of God in His government of the world.—The obedience of Christ as confronting the Jewish priesthood, an emblem of Christian faith confronting churchly office: 1. The Lord regards the office as under the condition of obedience to the revelation of God, because it issues from that revelation. 2. He regards Himself as under the obligation to obey the revelation of God, because He is the consummation of it. Or, 1. In His suffering question; 2. in His declining answer; 3. in His willingness to submit to officials, so long as their rejection is not complete.—The heavenly prudence of the Lord in its triumph over the human wisdom of His enemies.—How the spirit of the new covenant confronts the false representatives of the old covenant in God's temple: 1. With the clear word of knowledge; 2. with the firm word of assurance; 3. with the sharp word of judgment; 4. with the abundant word of life, of freedom.

Starcke, Nov. Bib. Tüb.: Zeal for God's house and for its purity is sure to awaken enemies.—Conscience bears witness against the worst: they are their own accusers, judges, condemners.—Osiander: They who will not suffer the Church's amendment in rule and discipline must fall.—Canstein: When those in the teaching and ruling office are unfaithful to their calling, and God raises up others extraordinarily, the former take all pains to deny to the latter the power that God Himself has given them.—Hedinger: The good need prudence in their intercourse with cunning and wicked people, lest their simplicity and openness bring harm to them and their cause.—Quesnel: Miserable case when the men of light use their knowledge of the truth to oppose that truth.—How many will not in religious matters be sincere, and reveal the truth, lest they be assaulted and tried!—Bibl. Würt.: The scorners of the truth God will in the end count not worthy of the truth they scorn; but, instead of it, will send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie, 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12.

Braune: He might have appealed to many prophets (yet not in the same sense as to John). They would then have said: But that was in a former age. He takes the latest example (of a prophetic vocation).

2. The Parable concerning the Counsel of the Sanhedrim against the Messiah. (CHAP. XII. 1–12.)

Parallels: Matt. xxi. 33–46; Luke xx. 9–17.

1 And He began to speak unto them by parables. A certain man planted a vineyard, and set an hedge about it, and digged a place for the wine-fat, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country. 2 And at tne season he sent to the husbandmen a servant, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard. 3 And they caught him, and beat him, and sent him away empty. 4 And again he sent unto them another servant; and at him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head, and sent him away shamefully handled. 5 And again he sent another; and him they killed, and many others; beating some, and killing some. 6 Having yet therefore one son, his well-beloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son. 7 But those husbandmen said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. 8 And they took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard. 9 What shall therefore the lord of the vineyard do? He will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others. 10 And have ye not read this scripture, The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner: 11 This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? 12 And they sought to lay hold on Him, but feared the people; for they knew that He had spoken the parable against them: and they left Him, and went their way.

Ver. 1. Lach., Tisch. read λαλεῖν instead of λέγειν, following B.G.L.Δ.

Ver. 3. Lach., Tisch. read καί, after B.D.L.Δ. Meyer: from Matt. xxi. 35.

Ver. 4. The reading of D.L., κἀκεῖνον ἐκεφαλαίωσαν καὶ ἠτίμησαν, does not seem thorough enough, as opposed to the climax supported by Cod. A. and others: beating and sending empty—wounding in the head and sending home shamefully handled.

5. Against the πάλιν (again) we have the reading of Codd. B.C.L.Δ.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke.—Mark relates only the second of the three parables, which Christ, according to Matthew, connected with His rejection of the commission of the Sanhedrim, for the purpose of indicating to them what He awaited at their hands, and how they, as the murderers of the Messiah, should be subjected to the punishment of losing the Messianic kingdom. It is the very parable in which they are made to appear as the murderers of the Messiah in connection with the persecutors of the prophets. In the first verse, we obtain a hint from Mark that Jesus delivered several parables before His opponents. Mark is, further, more exact than Matthew in the climax of the messages sent by the lord of the vineyard. According to him, the first servant is beaten upon the back, and sent empty away; the second is wounded in the head, insulted, and sent away covered with disgrace; the third is killed. This triple fate is met by many others. In consequence of this conduct the lord of the vineyard despatches his son; and of him Mark observes that he was the only son. From Matthew we learn that servants were twice sent,—on the first occasion in smaller, on the second, in greater numbers; and their fate is to be beaten, killed, stoned. Luke records only an increased abuse of the several servants despatched. The actual ground-thought is in each case the same: repeated messages, increased injuries, and, as a consequence, augmented hardening of heart and rebellion. Then we have the opposition between the sending of the servants and the sending of the son,—between the generous hope of the lord, that pious dread and remorse would be manifested, and the flagitious design regarding the inheritance on the part of the vine-dressers. Christ, according to Matthew, makes His enemies pronounce judgment, and declare what would be the dealing of that lord with his servants; according to Mark, the condemnation is expressed by Christ Himself. The passage quoted from the Psalms shows that Mark coincides in the conclusion with Luke; the citation from Isaiah, introduced by Matthew, is not here given. And further, the μὴ γένοιτο, spoken by the opponents in Luke xx. 16, is wanting. Graphic narrative and a freshness of delineation are the characteristics of Mark in this passage, as in others.

2. Of the fruit.—The stipulated product-tax. For the agreement of Matthew with Mark in this passage, consult Note 18, on Matthew.

3. And again he sent.—We admit, there is undoubtedly a kind of periodic succession in the missions hinted at; but this is not to be settled in an external, petty way, of which an example is presented in Meyer.

4. At him they cast stones.—The author translates: They stoned him from them [on the head]. Ἐκεφελαίωσαν is to be explained in accordance with the difference between it and the simple ἔδειραν. Beating with sticks upon the back, casting stones at the head, marked the first gradation, to which the second pair corresponded,—being sent away empty, shamefully disfigured. As this word, in other collocations, indicates simply to comprehend, to relate summarily, we must interpret here according to the context. Meyer says, Mark has confounded κεφαλαιόω with κεφαλίζω. But the latter would, I think, have been too strong; and it is possible that the verb before us might have recommended itself to him as capable of bearing two senses, and this double-force we have endeavoured to indicate. Wakefield's interpretation, "They made short work of him," is too one-sided.

5. Killed him and cast him out.—The order is reversed in Matthew and Luke. Grotius and De Wette make it a hysteron-proteron. Meyer says, it is only another description.

6. He will come and will.—Kuinoel, following Vatablus, makes this the reply of the Pharisees in Matt. xxi. 24. It is plain that Mark gives a more brief account of the matter. As regards the meaning, the Lord spoke the sentence which His parable forced from the lips of His enemies. See Note 23, on Matt.

7. For they knew that He had spoken against them.—Meyer would make these words, as well as in Luke, apply to the people and not to the members of the Sanhedrim. He intends this explanation to account for the apparent want of the proper succession in words. According to some commentators, these words should follow κρατῆσαι. But the order presents no difficulty at all. They would have seized Christ at once very willingly, and yet they ventured not, etc. This is only a reflection; and our words present the key, the concluding explanation. Their common purpose, to put the Messiah, upon the first favourable occasion, to death, rose in these and similar moments of exasperation to such a pitch, that they would have gladly seized Him on the spot, and killed Him, if they had only dared to do so.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Upon the import of the parable, see Note 22 and the Reflections upon the passage in Matt. The planting of the vineyard, it seems, is to be looked upon as the promise and the law, or generally as the covenant-word in its identity with believing hearts. The hedge is not the law in itself, but is to be interpreted as being that external institution by which Israel was separated from the other nations (Eph. ii. 14); the wine-press, or tank, considered in connection with the altar of sacrifice and the martyrdom of the prophets, indicates the inner side of the congregation; and hence we are led to consider the tower, typifying civil order, law, and protection, as the opposite of the wine-press. The wine-fat is sunk into the earth and hidden; the tower rises on high, apparent to every eye, the sign of the vineyard.

2. We must remark, further, that we have here pictured the gradual augmentation of selfishness, of hostility to, and revolt from, the Lord, on the part of the theocratic servants and vassals of God. This representation presents at the same time a type of the climax of injuries inflicted upon the prophets, and above all, of the climax of the Lord's magnanimity, as opposed to the disgraceful conduct of the servants. The struggle of divine grace with the obdurate unbelief of the administrators of His plan of mercy divides into two periods: 1. The period of long-suffering; and 2. the period of judgment. The first era has two chief periods: a. The Establishment, b. the Missions; which we may divide into, 1. The missions of servants, rising by a threefold climax; 2. the mission of the Son, in which, again, three points present themselves: A. The wicked proposal; B. the murder of the Son; and C. the casting of his corpse forth out of the vineyard. But, in the same manner, are three points to be observed in the Judgment: 1. The destruction of the evil-doers; 2. the bestowal of the vineyards to others; and 3. a donation of the vineyard to others, instead of a relation of vassalage.

3. The nature of the theocracy.—On the one side, it had a political, national end; on the other, a religious: and therefore the lord demands not all the fruit, but only a portion. The transformation of the theocracy into hierarchy: 1. The servants of God begin by converting His vineyard, which He had under the condition of feudal service let out to them, into a private possession. 2. They treat the prophets and reformers, who desire to call their condition of dependence back to their recollection, as enemies, and so treat mediately the Lord as an enemy. 3. They killed the son and heir, not in ignorance, but knowing him to be the heir, and actually because he was the heir: so evil-disposed were they.

4. The prospect, which the Lord presented, of the vineyard being handed over to strangers, to the Gentiles, must have exasperated the Sanhedrim almost more than the proclamation of their own downfall.

5. The parable before us is illustrated and expanded by the parables which Matthew makes precede and follow. If we examine the idea of this parable, we shall find that the germs of the two other parables are contained in the one before us.

6. Christ the beloved, the only Son, that is, the only-begotten Son of God; Christ, the last sent, is a mark of the revelation being perfected; Christ, the corner-stone, indicates the perfected Redeemer and Head of the Church.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See the foregoing Reflections, and the commentary on Matthew. —The mournful, historical fact, that the administrators of the sacred things of God fail so often to attain salvation; or, the night side of the priesthood.—The history of the priestly office under the old economy, a perpetual symbol of warning to the priestly (ministerial) office under the new.—The contest which the Lord, from the remotest ages, has been engaged in with the unfaithful servants of His word and His grace.—The immemorial contrast between unfaithful officers of God and faithful messengers from God.—How the gracious generosity of God strives with the obdurate unbelief of men up to the moment of final decision.—The final purpose of God (They will reverence My Son), and the last purpose of the rebellious servants (That is the heir; come, let us kill him, etc.).—The Lord in heaven is willing rather to have the appearance of folly in sending His Son, than that His grace should not be revealed to the uttermost.—Grace in highest glory appearing alone, to the apparent neglect of wisdom, justice, and omnipotence, and yet, at that very moment, uniting in itself all the attributes of wisdom, justice, and omnipotence.—How all the perfections of God are comprehended in the glory of His grace: 1. By seeming to vanish in it; 2. by again appearing, glorified in it.—The last point by which God's grace seeks to obtain a hold, is pious fear in men.—Finally: Christ the last mission of God's grace to mankind, John iii. 16; Heb. x. 26, 27, xii. 18.—The contradiction in the words, That is the heir, let us kill him; or, the remnant of faith in unbelief, making unbelief damning.—To the exercise of long-suffering succeeds that of judgment.—The heir and the inheritance cannot be separated.—The murder of the heir converted into the manifestation of the inheritance.—The parabolical statement of Christ's glorification, a supplement to the parable of His rejection.—The determination of God as to the wicked counsel of the opponents of Christ: 1. Their counsel allowed; 2. defeated; 3. turned to the service of God's design. —The theocracy as a building of God: 1. A completed building; 2. a preparation for a second building.—Christ, the great miracle of God.—The enmity manifested towards the Lord's word, enmity shown to the dazzling brightness with which the picture of His enemies was drawn.—The wicked shudder before the picture of their own life.—The impotency of Jesus' foes.—Jesus' address before the people; or, the fault of the priests, and the fault of the laity: 1. Difference; 2. connection.

Hedinger: God spares neither labour nor expense in sustaining and extending His Church.—Be fruitful in good works.—The fate of the servants sent into God's vineyard.—Osiander: The more frequently the obdurate are called to repent, the more insane and senseless is the position assumed by them.—The riches of the goodness and long-suffering of God in sending faithful servants, who are zealous to the very death for His house.—The witnesses of the truth.—O that the pious would stir one another up to goodness with the same industry that the godless excite one another to wickedness!—Canstein: Sin is very frightful: it ceases not where it has begun; one sin springs from another.—Quesnel: So many deadly sins, so many murderous acts against Jesus Christ.—Canstein: The enemies of the truth can, no doubt, in some manner say such in itself is truth; yet their answer proceeds not from truth, because their hearts are not temples of truth.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: God and His grace are bound to no people.—What the proud generation of Satan rejects, laughs to scorn, tramples under foot, that God raises in defiance of it, to the glory of Himself.—The world, despite its efforts, cannot accomplish its malice and wickedness sooner than God, from hidden reasons, permits.

Lisco: That the only Son is sent, and sent the last, augments both the love of the Lord and the offence of the servants.—Braune: Official sins: The wine-press is the ministerial office, which should express the letters, the peel, covering the divine word, which should expound the divine word, the fruit of the vine, and make wine from it to refresh the heart. (Let it be remarked this interpretation is not sufficient; compare Reflection 1: Author.) Isa. v. 1, 2. Fates of prophets: Micaiah was scourged (1 Kings xxii. 24), and also Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvii. 15); Isaiah, Amos, and others were killed (1 Kings xviii. 13); Zechariah was stoned (2 Chron. xxiv. 21); and we find in Nehemiah (ix. 26) that the prophets of God had been slain: Acts vii. 52; Heb. xi. 36-38.—The judgment of Jesus in the Pharisees' mouths (The Lord will come, etc.), the first tone of the fearful cry, His blood be on us, and on our children (Matt. xxvii. 25).—The world's salvation is, nevertheless, triumphant. From the Jews it passed to the Gentiles, from the benighted east to the clear west, from the enervated south to mighty north; and when yet farther? —Still God's kingdom remains.—They raged, but a hook had been put into their nose, and a bridle into their lips (Isa. xxxvii. 29).

Schleiermacher: Truth we owe to men, yet we are bound by it according to our ability.—In every circumstance we must let love point out how we can render the best service to the truth in dealing with each individual.—Brieger: Let us go forth, therefore, unto Him, etc: Heb. xiii. 13 (referring to the heir being cast out of the vineyard); Isa. xxviii. 16.

3. The Cunning Attack of the Pharisees and Herodians, and their Defeat. (Vers. 13–17.)

Parallels: Matt. xxii. 15–22; Luke xx. 20–24.

13 And they send unto Him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, to catch Him in His words. 14 And when they were come, they say unto Him, Master, we know that Thou art true, and carest for no man; for Thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth: Is it lawful to give tribute to Cesar, or not? 15 Shall we give, or shall we not give? But He, knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye Me? bring Me a penny, that I may see it. 16 And they brought it. And He saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? And they said unto Him, Cesar's. 17 And Jesus answering, said unto them, Render to Cesar the things that are Cesar's, and to God the things that are God's. And they marvelled at Him.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the parallels in Matthew and Luke.—The turning-point, which here enters, is the ironical acknowledgment of Jesus' Messianic dignity on the part of the Jewish rulers, after that they, in their attempt to overcome Jesus by the assertion of their authority in the presence of the people, had been covered with shame. It forms, consequently, the second section of our Lord's strife in the temple on the Tuesday of the Passion Week. In this history of the temptation, the object of which was to entangle the Lord, two chief attacks are specialized by Mark: the attack made by the Pharisees in connection with the Herodians, or the history of the tribute-penny; and the attack of the Sadducees. In the latter, however, the question of the scribes leaves no more an impression of malicious temptation, but draws the transactions to a close with an example of the triumphs of Christ over many spirits among the scribes and Pharisees. It is, nevertheless, the same history, written more from the bright side, while Matthew pictures it from the darker side. This individual was better than his party who had despatched him to tempt Christ: he made no concealment of the effect which the wisdom of Christ made upon him. This history is allowed by Luke to pass unnoticed. The cunning shown in the temptation now under consideration, is distinctly emphasized by each of the three Evangelists, Matthew and Mark giving the additional fact of the union between the Pharisees and Herodians to effect their ends. Matthew states that those who were sent were disciples of the Pharisees, and consequently young persons; from Luke it appears they were worldlings, who could only feign scruples of conscience.

At the outset, the lively addition characterizes Mark, Give, or not give? The rest of the narrative is quickly sketched, and remarkably graphic. In the conclusion he is shorter than Matthew and Luke.

2. And they said unto Him.—Those mentioned in the preceding section, the Sanhedrim, are intended. But Matthew represents with propriety the Pharisees as the most active in the transaction.

3. To catch Him.—'Αγρεύειν refers primarily to the chase.

4. Shall we give?—Important application of the question to their conduct. They appear, moreover, anxious to place the negation in His mouth.

5. What is Cæsar's.—The order of the words in Mark is peculiar; the construction is more cautious, and yet more lively.

6. And they marvelled at Him.—The young aristocratic portion of the population of the capital had not, in its pride, expected such a blow from the Galilæan Rabbi. Matthew informs us that they felt themselves overcome; in Mark, this is supposed.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Matthew.

2. The feigned alliances of hostile parties against Christ, a measure of the greatness of their hatred to Christ. Mark has already (ch. iii. 6) recorded the decision of the alliance. Compare the friendship of Pilate and Herod, as recorded in Luke.

3. Students and young nobles are often caught in the dangerous currents of their day. They are often, through their warm, generous feelings, misled and deceived.

4. Christ remains unmoved by the excitement; and what was confused, becomes, by a reference to manifest right, disentangled.

5. The word of Christ undermined, further, the alliance between the two allied hostile parties. The Pharisees were not willing to give to the Emperor what belonged to him; the Herodians gave not to God what was God's, not even in appearance.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See the notes on Matthew.—Perfect rest and calmness is the perfect action and quickness of the spirit.—The spiritual presence of Christ fills the present with the might of eternity.—How a stream of light from Christ can become a piercing lightning-flash.—Hypocrisy, the original sin of an impure patriotism and feeling of freedom.—The majesty with which Christ investigates the rights of Cæsar: 1. The free examination; 2. the just recognition; 3. the holy reservation.—Christ and the young nobility of Jerusalem: 1. How little they knew; 2. how royally He revealed Himself to them. —Students and earnest youths often the unconscious and deceived tools of impure endeavours.—Divine simplicity and integrity always triumphant over human and devilish cunning.—Speak the truth without seeking to please or to injure any one.—Amazement may, particularly with youthful and deceived spirits, form the beginning of wisdom.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The meanest kind of persecutors betake themselves to the worldly authority.—Truth must frequently experience that hypocritical professors unite with worldlings against her.—Hedinger: Every station has its rights. Fear God. Honour the king: 1 Pet. ii. 17.—Canstein: The Pharisees flattered the Lord to destroy Him: He, however, put them to shame to bring them to salvation.

Braune: Those who, from their knowledge, should have been the friends of truth, are the first in enmity against the King of truth. (Pharisees and Herodians.) No one should allow himself to be employed to vex others: this is especially the duty of young persons towards noble, venerable men.—They thought He had within Him the spark of vanity, and that He would destroy Himself in His zeal for God's honour and His own personal dignity, which they presented. So do men strive to entangle one another by praise.—See Braune's Epitome from Asmus Claudius, p. 316.

Schleiermacher: It were a different case if ye had never received the money, if ye had perilled blood and life for independence; but if ye have suffered the halter to be bound round your neck, and have not made any opposition, then bear the yoke.—Ye are giving your approval to the external regulations under which ye are living, as is sufficiently evident from your use of the money.—(God, what is God's.) He would remind them that they had other wealth, and were in undisturbed possession of the same.—They should distinguish between the tributary condition and the spiritual.—Gossner: Out of hypocrisy they state the truth, in order to overthrow the truth.

4. The Attack of the Sadducees, and their Overthrow. (VERS. 18–27.)

Parallels: Matt. xxii. 23–33; Luke xx. 27–40.

18 Then come unto Him the Sadducees, which say there is no resurrection; and they asked Him, saying, 19 Master, Moses wrote unto us, If a man's brother die, and leave his wife behind him, and leave no children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. 20 Now there were seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and dying left no seed. 21 And the second took her, and died, neither left he any seed: and the third likewise. 22 And the seven had her, and left no seed: last of all the woman died also. 23 In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her to wife. 24 And Jesus answering, said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, neither the power of God? 25 For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven. 26 And as touching the dead, that they rise; have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? 27 He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.

Ver. 22. The reading, καὶ οἱ ἑπτὰ οὐκ ἀφῆκαν σπέρμα, is strongly supported by B.C.L.Δ.; but the demands of the context go to strengthen the codd. which give the other reading. That no seed was left, is in and for itself of no importance; that is merely the occasion of the seven taking the woman to wife.

Ver. 25. Ὅταν ἀναστῶσι is omitted by B.C.L.Δ. Lachmann puts in parenthesis; Cod. A., etc., support it; and the consideration, that its omission is easier to account for than its insertion, is an additional argument in favour of this reading.

Ver. 27. Θεός is wanting with ζώντων in A.B.C.D.; Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tischendorf.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew, and the parallel in Luke.—In this section, Mark's individuality appears only in the more pictorial description of the seven successive marriages; in special supplemental strokes; in the more positive tracing of the error of the Sadducees up to a want of knowledge of the Scriptures and to unbelief; and in the final statement, Ye therefore do greatly err. While the immediate effect of Christ's word is not presented till the Evangelist comes to relate the next history.

2. When they shall rise.—The immediate, special reference is to the seven. Perhaps doubt is also expressed.

3. How in the bush; that is to say, in the appropriate passage, where the address was from a thorn-bush. What ye will find somewhat of a thorn-bush!

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare Matthew, and the conclusion of the Apostles' Creed, Resurrection of the body, etc. John v.; 1 Cor. xv.; 2 Cor. v.; Dan. xii., etc. Compare the doctrine of the Scripture on the Resurrection, as unfolded in the works upon Biblical Theology, and the teaching of the Church as given in works on Dogmatics; the hopes of immortality cherished by the nations, recorded in histories of religion. Compare the proofs of an immortality. The writings bearing on the topic from Plato's Phædo down.

2. Unbelief has always two springs: 1. The want of historic faith (Ye know not the Scriptures); 2. the want of personal faith (Ye know not the power of God).

3. Belief in immortality and belief in angels, or a world of spirits, are most intimately united: so also the respectively opposed elements of unbelief.

4. Unbelief is, on the one hand, united with rude sensuality ("marrying" in that world too); and, on the other, with a wild phantasy (indulging in phantasies upon the future state), and a carnal view of the uniformity obtaining throughout God's universe (tout comme chez nous).

5. Unbelief, which attacks one part of the truth, understands nothing of that part, upon which it intends to support itself, in attacking the department to be assailed.

6. They tempted the Lord to the abandonment of the doctrine of the resurrection, or to the retaining of it, coupled with polygamy in the future as its consequence. They supposed, He must either state an absurdity, or be struck dumb by their supposed deductio ad absurdum. But they had political designs in addition. Compare Matthew. They intended that, by a denial of the resurrection, He should deny His work, or should present Himself as an enthusiast, and give up the secret of His hope to the profane world. Christ sent the especially "wise" home as the especially "foolish."

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Compare Matthew.—The Sadducees constitute the historical counter-picture to the Pharisees.—The Sadducees, the deniers of immortality, are immortal.—They invented an improbable, indecent myth to deny a most trustworthy and glorious reality.—They find in the Bible a thorny bush indeed, but not the burning bush.—The sentimental expectations of a bodily reunion and repossession are not tenable: 1. Too great for the reason; 2. for faith too little; 3. for both preposterous.—The objectively-revealed faith is not in itself weak through over-strong faith, but through credulity springing from little faith, which believes, 1. Much, but not many; 2. the extraordinary, but not the miraculous; 3. the spectral, but not the spiritual; 4. the earthly in heavenly hue and dress, but not the heavenly as the glorification of the earthly.—The Sadducees and their faith: I. How they attack faith (while they propound the most improbable views), either, 1. with an improper explanation of Scripture and of laws, 2. with an improper picture of life, and 3. with an improper view of the world; or, 1. with improper reasoning, 2. with improper wit. II. How faith replies: with, 1. a deeper exposition of Scripture, 2. higher pictures of life, 3. a holier contemplation of the world in the light of God.—They say, our unbelief comes from our knowing: He says, it comes from your not knowing.—The belief in the angels makes the belief in the resurrection a necessity.—One truth of faith explains and strengthens another.—Unbelief in immortality a radical error: 1. A positive confusion; 2. a positive mistake.

Quesnel: The devil gives the Christian no rest. If one temptation does not entangle, another is tried; hence watchfulness is essential.—Hedinger: Preformed opinions form a hindrance to the truth.—O that there were none among Christians who doubt the resurrection! If they venture not to acknowledge their doubt, they manifest nevertheless by their deeds that they believe in no other life.—The thoughts of carnal men regarding the heavenly life are carnal and disreputable.—Canstein: Christians must stir themselves up, in thinking of the eternal life, to separate themselves ever more and more from the lusts of the body and fleshly-mindedness.

Braune: It was the extreme fleshly-minded (the Sadducees) who could not comprehend the reality and truth of the spiritual world. —The Gospel of the Risen One has brought forward more clearly for the spirit of man the kingdom of God and the hope of resurrection, of which we have frequent relations in the Acts of the Apostles, where the Sadducees repeatedly appear as foes.—The Saviour unites the Scriptures and the power of God. Hence comes Augustine's statement, The more we see of the Word, the more we die to the world; the more we live to the world, the less we see.—"Reason digs beside, Frivolity stalks by, and Pride flies away over" (Zinzendorf). Many of the Rabbis dreamed of marriages according to passages in the prophets, as Isa. lxv. 20, 23, where we read of a new heaven and a new earth; and this was not once deemed base by the Pharisees.—Of marriage, accordingly, that alone remains which was spiritual, just as sex in regard to physical distinctions is lost, and that alone remains which had spiritually been developed; for the distinction between sexes, consisting in the development of what relates to spirit, and in that which lays hold of the mind's most inner nature, continues undoubtedly for ever.—Death breaks all bands, but destroys not existence.

Brieger: He who has not in various ways experienced that God is the Living One, cannot from the heart believe in any resurrection. Is God called the God of Abraham? much more must He be called the God of Jesus Christ, John v. 29; 1 Cor. xv. 19; Rom. xiv. 8.

Gossner: One description of evil men after another come to Jesus to trouble Him, to tempt Him, instead of seeking their salvation from Him.

5. The Scribe, first tempting, then half won. (VERS. 28–34.)

Parallels: Matt. xxii. 34–40; Luke xx. 39.

28 And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that He had answered them well, asked Him, Which is the first commandment of all? 29 And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord: 30 And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment. 31 And the second is like, namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these. 32 And the scribe said unto Him, Well, Master, Thou hast said the truth: for there is one God; and there is none other but He: 33 And to love Him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices. 34 And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, He said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durst ask Him any question.

Ver. 29. Many variations. Tischendorf, adopting B.L.Δ., reads, ὅτι πρώτη ἐστίν; Griesbach, ὅτι πρώτη πάντων ἐντολή, A. and Minusc.

Ver. 30. Αὕτη πρώτη ἐντολή omitted by Tischendorf, following B.E.L.Δ.; retained by A.D., etc.

Ver. 31. Tischendorf reads simply δευτέρα αὕτη, and so B.L.Δ.; this means, "this is the second in importance." Lachmann, and the majority of the MSS., retain ὁμοία αὐτῇ.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare Matthew.—The peculiarities of Mark: Matthew causes the tempting Pharisees, who were for the moment influenced by friendly feelings towards the Lord because He had put the Sadducees to silence, to advance; while Mark brings forward into the light their representative, a well-meaning scribe, whom Matthew describes with more accuracy as being a lawyer. Matthew emphasizes the temptation, Mark the questioning; and, in addition, the transaction is clothed in a much richer form than in the Gospel by Matthew. The statement of Jesus is first introduced, that the greatest commandment is to hear that God is one, as therefrom proceeds the unity of the commandment of love out of the unity, or absolute simplicity, of the entire inner life. To this succeeds the joyful assent of the scribe, and his well-nigh literal repetition of the Lord's words. And, lastly, the recognition by Christ that he had answered discreetly; to which the declaration is appended, that he was not far from the kingdom of God. The observation that the Jews dared not question further, forms the conclusion of this section in Mark. Luke appends this remark to the question of the Sadducees, Matthew to the counter-question of Christ. Considering the meaning, these three narratives form but one whole. For, after the Sadducees had been defeated, the hope to overcome Him was already destroyed. The temptation here narrated was only an ambiguous after-game, probably half devoted to the attempt of inducing Christ to allow Himself, in spite of all, to be won over as a partisan to the party of the Pharisees. But when Jesus had put His counter-question, to which no reply could be given, the mouths of His opponents were finally closed. Upon the allegation of Meyer, that a difference exists between Mark and Matthew, compare Note 1 to Matthew's account.

2. The first of all.—The first, and that in the sense of the chief importance. See Note 5 upon Matt. "The Jews enumerated six hundred and thirteen ordinances; three hundred and sixty-five prohibitions, according to the days of the year; two hundred and twenty-eight commandments, according to the parts of the body. The Pharisees distinguished between lesser and greater command ments." Braune.

3. Hear, O Israel, The Lord: Deut. vi. 4, 5.—Jesus gives the introduction to the ten commandments as the first command of the same, not in so far as it forms one of the commandments, but in so far as it is the principle of the commandments,—meeting its full exposition in the ten succeeding statements: And thou shalt love, etc. This inner idea of the introduction has been explained already in Deut., from which the citation is drawn. Directly in opposition to this qualitive conception, the modern Jews reckon, according to their introduction, Hear, O Israel, I am, etc., quantitive, as the first commandment. Upon this division, as well as generally upon the various divisions of the decalogue, compare Geffken, "Ueber die verschiedene Eintheilung des Dekalogus," Hamburgh 1838, p. 9, et fol. "This principle of all duties was termed specially, קריאה, or sometimes, after the initial word, שמע; and the words were usually recited daily, night and morning; see Vitringa, Synagoga Judaica 2, 3, 15; Buxtorf, Syn. 9." Meyer.

4. With all thy heart.—The Hebrew text has the three following rules: with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength (מְאֹד, a might which is at once the manifesting of strength, and employing of strength; Gesenius, robur, vehementia). Instead of the first word, heart, the Septuagint reads, διάνοια; the second bears the same signification; and the third is properly rendered by δύναμις. Christ's quotation, as given by Matthew, follows the original text in the first and second word, heart, soul; but substitutes, with a fulness of meaning, for the third, διάνοια, the moral might of consciousness, of will. In Mark, one word is divided into two forces, διάνοια and ἰσχύς (= מְאֹד). Here, on the contrary, the scribe divides the first conception into two, καρδία and σύνεσις. The lawyer, in the narrative in Luke x. 27, where we have a similar, though not identical, interview, speaks as Jesus here does. Only ἰσχύς precedes διάνοια. From all this there arose in the apostolic age a freer method of handling the Old Testament text; however, it is worthy of being noted that no Gospel contains the δύναμις of the Septuagint. Whether the differences are only "variations of the Greek tradition," occasioned by the habit of quoting from memory, or different points of view, is dubious. In any case, it is noteworthy that the philosophizing Septuagint has explained καρδία by διάνοια; while, according to Matthew, Christ spiritualizing ἰσχύς, gives its force as διάνοια, which is preceded by the heart and soul. Mark and Luke exegetically unite διάνοια and ἰσχύς. The lawyer, to indicate his legal stand-point, adds to καρδία, which the Septuagint had converted into διάνοια, the σύνεσις. Upon biblical psychology (upon which Roos, Beck, and Delitzsch have written), compare Note 7 to Matthew.

5. With all thy understanding.—Signification of the intelligence, as it develops into understanding.

6. Burnt-offerings and sacrifices.—Ps. li.; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Hos. vi. 6. This very comparison proved that the lawyer was overcome by an emotion of courageous faith, the giving utterance to which might have easily caused offence to his companions. It was in this situation a testimony.

7. Discreetly, νουνεχῶς: with knowledge and understanding. —Attic, νουνεχόντως; the opposite, ἀφρόνως.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See remarks upon Matthew.—From the unity of God, and the divine spiritual harmony, proceeds the essential unity of His law in one principle—love. This principle has been already in Deuteronomy brought into view. The true covenant-God, as the one God and the one Lord over the hearts and in them,—that makes one life-experience, one life-motive, love. So appears the royal law as given by James (ch. ii. 18) and Paul (Rom. xiii. 10). Upon the element of temptation in this question, compare Matt., Note 2. In the passage before us, religiousness is declared to be the central, concentrated direction of the whole man, especially of his soul's powers, to the one God.

2. The man, in whose inward parts the law of God has been by love inscribed, loves at first from the heart, in the very centre-core of his being; next, notwithstanding the varying frames of his soul, in his soul likewise, in the dispositions of his soul-life; and then in his practical intelligence or mode of mind (power and mode of thought), in the practical resolutions and purposes of his life, with which all the powers of his life (as members and instruments of righteousness) enter into, and are spent in, the service of love.

3. Braune: These two commandments point to the two tables of the law. Upon the first are five laws, concerning God's glory, God's likeness, God's name, God's day, God's representatives; upon the second, five concerning person and life, marriage and household peace, goods and chattels, honour and right, and the heart of man. The two tables are one; they bear the commandments of one, inseparable, heavenly law of love.

4. To be discreet, the Lord here calls, not to be far from the kingdom of God. The reason, ideally conceived, is the faculty of understanding or perceiving the divine in its ideas. This faculty perceives the idea of love in the law. Discretion and subtlety mark the contrast between the true and false use of reason.

5. Thou art not far from the kingdom of God.—He who recognises the law in its spiritual meaning, and in opposition to external forms and ceremonies (more than burnt-offerings and sacrifices), is on the road of the Spirit (rational in a moral sense), and on the way of return from self-righteousness, of turning back to self-knowledge, which conditions the entrance into the enjoyment of salvation, founded by Christ. Not far from, that is, near. What was still wanting was, the full surrender to his conviction, the following Jesus. This transaction is, accordingly, a sign and presage of Christ's victory in the centre of His enemy's camp.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew.—The three unities in religion, a type of the Trinity of the one God: 1. The one God; 2. the one faith (giving heed to Christ's word); 3. the one commandment.—The unity of God is not individuality, nor identity, but above all, His being alone, and His unity, to which the unity of man in the simplicity of the faith must correspond.—Man is really a unity in obedience, when his inner life, in the trinity of heart (feeling), of soul (the will), and of reason or intelligence, is at one with itself and with God's word.—Unity and trinity, the secret of all spiritual life: 1. Of the highest life above us; 2. of the deepest life within us; 3. of the richest life around us.—In the true love of God and his neighbour, man would re-obtain his true self-love, and recover from his diseased self-love.—Thou art not far from the kingdom of God; or, the tempter transformed into the disciple. Or a meaning-fraught word,—1. of recognition, 2. of warning, 3. of encouragement.—Christ explained in the temple-court, in the circle of those who hated Him, the great law of love, as He upon the night of betrayal instituted the meal of love, and upon Golgotha overcame the curse of the entire world-hate, by His act, by His suffering, and by His sacrifice of love.

Canstein: Good men may be often so misled as to permit themselves to be employed against Christ: with such we must have compassion, pray for them, and endeavour to deliver them.—Quesnel: True religion consists in hearing, believing, and loving.—As thou lovest thyself, so act with thy neighbour.—Hedinger: Who can withstand the truth? Where but a little good-will is found, it pierces through. But ah! how hard the hearts that strive against her!—Osiander: External ceremonies are no doubt good; but where they are found without love, they are only a mantle covering secret sin, and will be rejected by God.—Bibl. Würt.: Courage, ye teachers and preachers! God moves the heart of many a one, who has not known the fact, in a sermon, so that he goes forth better than he came in.—He who recognises the worth of love, and what she is, is near the kingdom of God; but he who has experienced love, is in it.—Hedinger: Whosoever is, in the beginning, obedient and true to the divine leadings of grace, of him is there hope, that he is won.—He who is near, is not therefore in, the kingdom, Matt. vii. 13.—Canstein: Truth conquers.—Quesnel: A silence of contentedness and obedience is a wholesome silence; but that of rude ignorance and obstinacy is a damning silence.

Rieger: Upon the commandment of love to God and to our neighbour is all dependent; and yet God, on account of man's lost state, could not leave all to be dependent on this alone, but had to reveal, and make us conscious of our captivity to sin by many other, special, explicit commandments. Not till that institution (these laws) has fulfilled its part, can we be brought by the grace of Christ under the law of the Spirit.

Lisco: All external sacrifices are only weak types of the one perfect sacrifice, the perfect surrender of the heart to God.—With thy earnest moral striving, thou art upon the way by which the kingdom of God may be reached; for thou recognisest the existence of true piety, and deceivest thyself not with an external righteousness by works. The entrance is by faith alone upon the Saviour, who is the Way, John xiv. 6.—Through a living acquaintance with God's law, through heartfelt affection for its chief commandment, love, man comes near to the kingdom; but to come into the kingdom, he needs the knowledge of God, by which alone the conflict between pleasure in the law, and its constant transgression, can be stopped.—God is one, says Paul, Gal. iii. 20, to prove that law and promise are eternally one. So, too, says the Lord here, in that He calls to His support the fundamental doctrine of the law: Hear, Israel, etc. It is always the heart upon which God first looks.—The second command is the proof of the first. So some one says, I love God, etc., 1 John iv. 20.—God says, No God beside Me; but man must say, Other men beside me.—On God's account we are bound to love our neighbour as ourselves.—Thou shalt: It is accordingly no merit if thou do so; but it is sin if thou neglect. Thou shalt perfectly: It is not a portion which suffices. That must drive us to Him who fulfilled this law, and helps us to fulfil. —The Master gives measured praise: of beautiful views and fine declarations He never makes too much, but recognises these in all relations in such a way as to encourage to progress.—Let each take heed, that in his case the separation between knowing and doing, between the acknowledgment of the faith and the work of faith, become not fixed, and ever grow more terrible.

Schleiermacher: See his Sermons, vol. iii. p. 765 ff.—Brieger: To love God, who is the Love and the Life, is to live godly. But he who lives in and with God, or godly, loves also what God loves.

—Love is the only self-sacrifice, and it is the only sacrifice that God wishes.—Gossner: One God, one heart, one love.

6. The decisive Counter-question put by the Lord to the Scribes (Vers. 35–37.)

Parallels: Matt. xxii. 41–46; Luke xx. 41–44.

35 And Jesus answered and said, while He taught in the temple, How say the scribes that Christ is the son of David? 36 For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, The Lord said to my Lord, Sit Thou on My right hand, till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. 37 David therefore himself calleth Him Lord; and whence is He then his son? And the common people heard Him gladly.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew, and the parallels in Luke.—The great counter-question which Jesus, after all the tempting questions of His enemies, addressed to the Pharisees, is brought forward by Matthew in all its historic importance as the decisive, concluding interrogation put to the Pharisees. In Matthew, accordingly, this question has the form of a discussion or rabbinical disputation; and without doubt this is the original, historical form of the matter. Much of this external form has been rubbed away by Mark; yet he points out by the words, "Jesus answered," that the statement contained a reply to some question already put, with a view to try the Lord. Consequently the last is referred to. In this way, the preceding discussion also gains a new illustration; for which, consult the explanation of this last temptation. Mark, in allowing the form of the disputation to pass unnoticed, causes Christ's spiritual triumph to stand out all the more strongly to the view; just as he presented the preceding narrative likewise from its bright side.

2. While He taught in the temple.—The last address Christ made to the Pharisees was a word intended for the whole people; and this is in Mark's mind the most weighty point: and from this view, we see that His triumph, and the humbling of His enemies in the presence of the multitude, are implied as matters decided from the very outset.

3. And whence is He then his son?—This question was intended to say to the Pharisees especially, that the son of David, or the Messiah as David's Lord, must, according to the Scriptures, be of divine dignity; while to the people especially it was intended to say, that He was not to be David's son in the sense that He had been appointed, as they expected, to found an external Messianic kingdom, after the nature of David's kingdom. But the one conception will not suffer itself to be severed from the other. He who brings in a divine kingdom must introduce one of a different nature: he who introduces one of another, higher nature, must introduce a divine.

4. Heard Him gladly.—Not merely in the common sense, but with special reference to His divine dignity as the Messiah, was it that they listened to Him. The people were in the best mood for doing, and were on the point of doing, homage to Him.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Matthew and the foregoing remarks.

2. In their last question, the Pharisees have given the Lord to know, if God be only One, He (Jesus) could not be God's Son, and wished in this way to force Him either to offend against monotheism, or to deny His own dignity. Christ, by His counter-question, lays down this proposition: Christ as David's son, and at the same time David's Lord, could not be man simply, though He is a real man. For David calls Him, not in a general way, his Lord; but Lord, the Lord directly, and positively. At the same time, Jesus reveals to them mediately, by means of Ps. cx., that His kingdom is not of the same nature as David's, of a worldly character; that He should triumph over all His foes, and sit down upon the right hand of Majesty on high,—a declaration which comes distinctly and triumphantly forward in His trial before Caiaphas, ch. xiv. 62. See Hamann's "Golgotha, and Scheblimini."

3. Matthew marks chiefly the conviction which the last counter-question of Christ produced, made apparent by the silence of His opponents: Mark brings into prominence this presage of His victory over the rulers of the people, and the perfect spiritual might by which Jesus subdued His enemies. Hence, Mark notes this was a moment when Christ needed but to move His finger, and the whole hierarchy was overthrown, the people lay at His feet. And this was indeed no mere Galilæan triumphal entry, in which a few individual friends from Bethany and Jerusalem were mingled; but it was the Jewish people, who were assembled for the paschal feast. It was the intensified repetition of the scene in Galilee, of which John gives the account, ch. vi. But Jesus wished to rule over the spirit, and through this rule establish a kingdom. The Israelitish authorities denied Him homage, in suppressed rage, in demoniacal silence. He retired, accordingly, now, in His full, decisive spirit-conquest over them, into secrecy, after He had finished His spiritual judgment in denunciations of woe, and in His decision regarding the gifts cast into the temple-treasury.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The people heard Him gladly. One of the many beautiful, solemn moments which the people lost, deceived principally on this matter by its priesthood. (Similarly upon the days of palms. The general repentance after the Feast of Pentecost, Acts v. The great moment in the life of Paul, Acts xxii. 22. A similar one in the life of James, according to Hegesippus, in Euseb. ii. 23.)—The mystery of the life of Jesus induces and allures the unprejudiced spirits to sink themselves into its depths.

Starcke: The Holy Scriptures contain very deep mysteries.—If a true Christian is to be formed out of a Pharisee, the knowledge of Christ in His humanity and divinity must spring up within that man.—Quesnel: It is only faith which is able to unloose these knots (i.e., unite divinity and humanity).

Braune: What think ye of Christ? This question is the sum of the law and the Gospel. First had He been questioned as to the tribute, from political motives; then regarding marriage and the resurrection, because of philosophical views; then concerning different commandments, on ethical grounds. He now asks the life-question of centuries (which springs from the centre of religion): Rom. ix. 5; 1 Cor. xv. 25; Acts ii. 34; Heb. i. 13.—Had Moses been superior to Christ, then had the chief question been, What is the chief command of the law? Because this is not the case, the question regarding the Saviour remains the chief and life-question. According to Christ's view of the case, however, that first query, conceived not according to the law, but according to the Gospel, belongs to this second.

Schleiermacher: He does not say, If He is his son, how is He then his Lord? but reversed, If he himself names Him his Lord, how is He then his son? He consequently represents the first as the greater (and yet it is the latter which forms the concluding point, inasmuch as He wishes to call upon them to give up their conception of the Messiah for the Old Testament conception of Him, which His life had exemplified).

Brieger: The Pharisees having interrogated Him as to His power, He interrogates them as to His person (for they knew, it is properly remarked, that the people considered Him the Messiah).—It was now recognition or rejection. By this question Jesus wishes to lead them to decide.—The throne of God, at the right hand of which the Anointed is to seat Himself, is the throne "high and lifted up," spoken of by Isaiah, ch. vi.,—the heavenly, Ps. ix. 8, lxviii. 19, xxix. 10. It is the symbol of His rule over heaven and earth, Ps. ciii. 19; Rev. iii. 11; 2 Tim. ii. 12.

7. The Lord's Public Admonition to beware of the Scribes. (VERS. 38–40.)

Parallels: Matt. xxiii.; Luke xx. 45–47.

38 And He said unto them in His doctrine, Beware of the scribes, which love to go in long clothing, and love salutations in the market-places, 39 And the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts; 40 Which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: these shall receive greater damnation.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew, and the parallels in Luke.—Mark, like Luke, gives us of the great denunciatory speech against the Pharisees and scribes, which Matthew records, but a very brief warning against the scribes. And how exactly accordant with the intention of his Gospel! It was only the Jewish Christians, for whom Matthew wrote, who could at once, and at that time, be summoned to gaze upon the pharisaic Judaism in all the blackness of its sunken state; for young Gentile Christians, the great woe-speech was to a certain extent unintelligible, and was besides too strong food. Hence the picture of the scribes is shortly given in their three principal features: ambition, avarice, hypocritical, external piety. The address is made up of the introductory word of warning by the Lord against the Pharisees, and of the first woe denounced by Him against them. The expression in Matthew, "Do not ye after their works," is here, "Beware of them." The religious enlarging of the garments, as Matthew relates it, is here briefly given in the going about in long clothing. The seeking of greetings precedes the desire for the chief seats in the synagogue, and the civic seats of honour; while the anxious listening for the salutation of Rabbi is passed over. With these chief seats at festivals is admirably united the devouring of widows' houses, under pretence of long prayers, after the first woe of Matthew. The address to the Pharisees, which we find in Matthew gradually passing into a direct, pointed attack, is here everywhere changed to the representation in the third person. Mark agrees almost verbally with Luke.

2. Who love.—Meyer: "Demand, look for." But they did not first require to look for the walking about in long robes: they actually did that; and this, too, with pleasure, consciousness, and deliberation. They loved that, had pleasure in that.

3. In long clothing.—Gerlach: "Because they imitated the priests, who were the nobles of the Jewish people." The question, however, is, Are not the priests themselves intended? Braune: "Because they imitated the venerable matrons." Jewish Rabbis imitate women! The reference is undoubtedly to their wandering about the streets and public places with marks of distinction, significant of religiousness, in long robes of office and rank; hence also in gowns and robes of various orders.

4. Who devour.—Grotius, Bengel, and others, make a new sentence begin with οἱ κατεσθίοντες. As administrators, guardians, representatives of unprotected widows (Theophylact); or also by embezzling the funds of the temple-foundations.

5. For the more lengthened denunciation, see Matthew, Note 9.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Matthew.—We have here three points of contrast: 1. Public appearance,—the proud walk in long trailing garments (devotion), the love of greetings (absence of mind). 2. Demeanour in society,—love of the chief ecclesiastical seat, and at the same time of the places of honour at banquets and festive entertainments. 3. Personal and secret conduct,—the appropriation of the goods of the poor, under the veil and pretence of long prayers, and of supplications for the poor.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Compare Matthew.—The scribes distinguished as the worst of the Pharisees.—The false scribes are considered in three different ways, apart from the Scripture: 1. Upon the streets; 2. in business and at banquets; 3. as the appropriators of inheritances in families, and by secret means.—The veil of hypocrisy is a transparent covering: 1. The covering: a. the long robes; b. the long prayers. 2. The transparency of the covering: a. the walking about to be seen; b. the lust for the seats of honour, festive banquets, and unrighteous gain.—The hypocrite's terrible picture: 1. His public appearance contradicts his secret conduct; 2. his external importance, and desire to be important, is contradictory of his internal emptiness and unworthiness.—The extent to which a hypocritical profession is carried, is the measure of approaching punishment.—Satan, who clothes himself as an angel of light, and plays the part of man's friend, is the archetype of all hypocrisy.

Starcke: As sinners are distinguished, so are their punishments.—The confession of sin, makes the judgment less; to hide sin, under the pretence of God's service, makes the judgment heavier and more terrible, Prov. xxviii. 13.

Braune (upon the long clothing): Somewhat as formerly many clergymen were wont to seek especial dignity from the size of their wigs, and the monks from their cowls and rosaries.—Stier: Satan was the first who exalted himself to be brought low (the opposite of Christ).

Schleiermacher: They used their piety only for external profit.—Brieger: It is to be remarked, that Jesus pictures forth not individual scribes, but the whole sect. There were not wanting a few in whom better tendencies were to be found; see vers. 28–34.—The warning has a twofold intention: first, we are not to allow ourselves to be deceived by them; second, we are not to imitate their conduct.

8. The Widow's Mite, and our Lord's view of the Piety and Good Works of the Jews. (VERS. 41–44.)

Parallel: Luke xxi. 1–4.

41 And Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much. 42 And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. 43 And He called unto Him His disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury: 44 For all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallel passages in Luke.—This apparently trifling history is of inestimable importance. It shows how the Lord, in perfect quiet of spirit, can still seat Himself in the temple, after He had ended His great day's work in it, namely, after the silence of the Sanhedrim regarding His person, in which its rejection of Him lay,—after He had opened His mouth, and pronounced the great woe-denunciations, and with these had, as theocratic King, whom the authorities of Israel rejected, taken His departure from the temple. In this He seems like a deposed king, who seats himself, as he leaves, on the lowest step of his palace, not to weep on account of his fall, but to bless the poor child of a palace-domestic; or like one excommunicated, who is able, under the new burden of its fanatical ban, to judge with the greatest mildness, and freedom from prejudice, that religious society which cast him out. It is the divine manifestation of His purity from all fanatic disposition and exasperation, with which He had fought through the great decisive moments, made His denunciatory speech, and presented His great judgment-picture. In this sunlike clearness and purity the old Catholic Christians did not in general leave the heathen temples, and but few of the old Protestants the temples of Roman Catholicism. This eternally figurative import is won by our passage in consequence of its position. In itself, however, it shows us, in a most instructive narrative and act of our Lord, how His eye—and how consequently God's view, and the Spirit's—rests upon the treasury of the Lord, and marks the act and manner in which we give. Luke has recorded this circumstance likewise; but Mark presents it more picturesquely and more fully. The Lord's seating Himself opposite to the treasury, the statement of the worth of the mite, the summoning of the disciples to Himself, and the sublime elevation of tone characterizing the decision,—in all this we see plainly how important Mark deemed the history. It stands there to show that the Lord has His eye upon the offerings in His temple, and that, amid all the chaff of seeming religion, He finds out the noble grain of spirituality and truth.

2. The treasury, γαζοφυλάκιον.—The sacrifice-fund is meant, which was distinguished from the proper temple-treasury, but yet, as belonging to it, was denoted by its name (Josephus, Ant. xix. 6, 1). The Rabbis tell us that this treasury consisted of thirteen brazen chests (שׁוֹפָרוֹת, "trumpets;" certainly not because the chests themselves were trumpet-shaped, but because the mouths through which the money was cast into the chests were wide at the top and narrow below). They stood in the outer court of the women. This offering-fund received also the voluntary gifts for the temple. Lightfoot, Hor.: "Nine chests were for the appointed temple-tribute, and for the sacrifice-tribute (that is, money-gifts, instead of the sacrifices); four chests for freewill-offerings, for wood, incense, temple-decoration, and burnt-offerings." Before the Passover, freewill-offerings, in addition to the temple-tax, were generally presented. No one, we may easily suppose, entered the temple without putting something in. This is also the custom in the synagogue. The Church has taken an example from this habit.

3. Many that were rich cast in much.—They were not content to give only copper, which was the general offering, but presented silver. Or, perhaps, gave in copper, because a large gift in that metal was of greater bulk, and made more noise.

4. A poor widow.—She is singled out from the whole crowd of donors.

5. Two mites, λεκτόν.—The very smallest copper coin. Two made one Roman quadrans, which was the fourth of an as: ten or sixteen of this latter piece were equal to a denarius, which is equivalent to five groschen, four pfennings Prussian money (6½ pence nearly). An as in Cicero's time was worth nearly four pfennings (or nearly a halfpenny); hence the quadrans would be one pfenning (one-tenth of a penny), and the mite half a pfenning. She gave two; and Bengel remarks, she could have kept one. "The rabbinic injunction, 'Non ponat homo λεκτόν in cistam eleemosynarum,' is of no force here, because alms were not under consideration." Meyer. Nevertheless the inference drawn by Schöttgen is by no means foreign; only it is probable this rabbinic habit became, at a later period, the matter of rabbinic legislation.

6. More than they all.—That is, in proportion to her means, as the Lord Himself immediately explains.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Note 1.

2. Jesus, to a certain degree as stranger, or observer of a religion now become foreign to Him, presents us with an ever-enduring example of the way in which one should, in the spirit of Christianity, look upon and judge all religious systems and associations. Such was the conduct of Paul at Athens, Acts xvii. He found out the altar of the Unknown God.

3. The last object on which our Lord's eyes rested in the temple.—The widow's mite. It is not said that the gifts of the others were worthless. Many possessed, no doubt, no worth (Matt. vi. 1); others, a greater or a lesser. The greatest value, however, attached itself to the widow's mite.

4. And how much interest may that mite, in the course of the entire history of the Church, have carried?

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Reflections.—The Lord's sublime peace of soul in leaving the temple, where He had met no recognition.—The humble resting-place of the Lord at the temple-gate, after He had been refused the throne.—The backward glance of mildness which the Banished cast upon the Church system by which He had been banished.—Christ's example teaches us the heaven-wide distinction between godly zeal and ungodly fanaticism.—The Lord's eyes are upon all offerings.—The mite of the widow as a gift: 1. The smallest gift; 2. the largest gift.—The freewill-offering of the heart, the real inner existence and life of the temple.—Christ observes with emotion the dying embers of the expiring fire of God in the temple.—The distinction between the treasury of the Lord in the law-church and Gospel-church (there, chiefly intended for symbolic temple necessities; here, chiefly for the poor. See the lame beggar at the Beautiful gate of the temple, whom Peter heals).—The ancient, estimable institution of Church alms.—Christo in pauperibus.

Canstein: The Lord Jesus pays attention, without doubt, to men's alms; hence they should be willing to give, and take earnest heed how they give.—Bibl. Würt.: Christians must willingly deposit in God's treasury, and contribute to the support of God's service—churches, schools, the poor, 2 Cor. ix. 7.—J. Hall: Where distribution is made to the poor, there Jesus pays attention, and takes pleasure therein.—Canstein: Christ remarks a compassionate and believing heart, when alms are being given.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: God's opinion regarding good works is infinitely different from that of men. Those who give the most, give often the least; and those who give the least, the most.—Servants must not exclude themselves.

Braune: He says, Verily I say unto you, because He wishes to make His judgment abide, as though it were a dogma and fundamental principle in His divine kingdom.—How she must have fixed her trust upon God, and not have cared for the morrow; that she did to-day, what to-day brought with it, Mal. i. 8, ver. 14.

Schleiermacher: If there had only been many such to give as this poor widow, who was ready to contribute all, that she could claim as her own, to the support of God's service, then might a purer zeal have developed itself, which had been far removed from degenerating in that tempest which destroyed the temple, had contributed rather to keep away the downfall. This most extreme condemnation of many was the first germ of destruction to that people.

9. Jesus' Departure from the Temple. His Retirement to the Mount of Olives; and His Address concerning the Last Things. (CHAP. XIII. 1–37.)

Parallels: Matt. xxiv. and xxv.; Luke xxi. 5–38. Revelation.

1 And as He went out of the temple, one of His disciples saith unto Him, Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here! 2 And Jesus answering, said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 3 And as He sat upon the Mount of Olives, over against the temple, Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, asked Him privately, 4 Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled? 5 And Jesus answering them, began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you: 6 For many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. 7 And when ye shall hear of wars, and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled: for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet. 8 For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and troubles: these are the beginnings of sorrows. 9 But take heed to yourselves: for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten: and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings for My sake, for a testimony against them. 10 And the Gospel must first be published among all nations. 11 But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate; but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost. 12 Now, the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son; and children shall rise up against their parents, and shall cause them to be put to death. 13 And ye shall be hated of all men for My name's sake: but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved. 14 But when ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not, (let him that readeth understand,) then let them that be in Judea flee to the mountains: 15 And let him that is on the house-top not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take anything out of his house: 16 And let him that is in the field not turn back again for to take up his garment. 17 But woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck, in those days! 18 And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter. 19 For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation, which God created, unto this time, neither shall be. 20 And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved: but for the elect's sake, whom He hath chosen, He hath shortened the days. 21 And then, if any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ; or, lo, he is there; believe him not: 22 For false Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall show signs and wonders, to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect. 23 But take ye heed: behold, I have foretold you all things. 24 But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. 25 And the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. 26 And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with great power and glory. 27 And then shall He send His angels, and shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven. 28 Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near: 29 So ye, in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors. 30 Verily I say unto you, That this generation shall not pass, till all these things be done. 31 Heaven and earth shall pass away: but My words shall not pass away. 32 But of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. 33 Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is. 34 For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. 35 Watch ye therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning: 36 Lest, coming suddenly, He find you sleeping. 37 And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.

Ver. 8. Lachmann and Tischendorf, on the authority of B.D.L., have omitted καὶ ταραχαί. Meyer would retain the words, and says, they have been left out by mistake; the scribe's eye running forward to the ἀρχαί following.

Ver. 11. Μηδὲ μελετᾶτε, omitted by B.D.L., Tischendorf; but we would retain them, as Meyer.

Ver. 14. Τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ Δανιὴλ τοῦ προφήτου, wanting in B.D.L. Copt., etc. It is easy to see how they might be interpolated; but their omission would be difficult to explain.

Ver. 22. Tischendorf omits, improperly, ψευδόχριστοι καί. So D.

Ver. 25. A.B.C., etc., read, ἔσονται ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ πίπτοντες. Lachmann, Tischendorf.

Ver. 28. A.B.D.L.Δ.: γινώσκεται.

Ver. 33. B.D. omit καὶ προσεύχεσθε; and Lachmann and Tischendorf follow.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew.—In our Gospel, the time and situation in which Christ delivered His great eschatological address present themselves, as is the case with Matthew. Upon Tuesday evening, immediately after His departure from the temple, the first introductory words were exchanged between Jesus and His disciples. Jesus declared Jerusalem's destruction. Thereupon He seats Himself in the circle of His most trusted followers upon the Mount of Olives, and reveals the eschatological import of Jerusalem's being destroyed. Hence it is exceedingly probable that this revelation by Jesus is a night-speech, or rather midnight address, succeeding the night-conversation which He had held, upon His evening walk to Bethany, on the summit of Olivet, sitting opposite to the temple.

2. The three chief divisions of the address are, by all the Evangelists, distinctly enough marked: 1. The common, eschatological world-course to the end; 2. the destruction of Jerusalem, with its succeeding days of trouble and contest, or with the succeeding period of the Church of the Cross (the Christian Church), which period may be regarded also as a distinct division; 3. the indication and commencement of the world-end. The beginning of the first part is marked by Jesus' warning against being seduced by the pseudo-Christs (Mark ver. 5); the end by the promise, "He who endureth," etc. (ver. 13). The beginning of the second part is indicated in Mark and Matthew by the reference to the abomination of desolation; in Luke, by the investing of the city (ver. 20): the close is here shown by the words, "For in those days shall be," etc. (Mark ver. 19); in Luke, ver. 23, the statement is—a period of wrath upon Israel. The interval between the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world, distinguished as the period of mitigated judgment, is brought forward in the words, Except the Lord had shortened those days (Mark ver. 20): the close, according to Mark, is given in the exclamation, Behold, I have foretold you all things; according to Matthew, in the words, Where the body is, etc. The chief point in this statement regarding the interval, in Mark and Matthew, is the warning against the false Christs; in Luke, the sufferings of the Jews, the treading under foot of Jerusalem, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. The beginning of the section upon the world-end is brought most prominently forward by Mark—"In those days" (ver. 24); Matthew similarly; Luke, with a short καὶ ἔσται, a Future, which is connected with the Preterite of the fulfilment of the times of the Gentiles. All the three Evangelists mark the end of this period as the deliverance of the faithful. The Son of man, according to Matthew and Mark, appears and sends forth His angels to gather in His chosen. Luke makes this known in the words, Lift up your heads, for your salvation draweth nigh. To this succeeds the practical application of the speech in the parable of the fig-tree. The eschatological speech of Mark's Gospel agrees most with Matthew; yet it is on the whole shorter, in particular points more circumstantial, and picturesque. Particularly strong is the call in Mark to foresight, to attention, and watchfulness: vers. 5, 9, 23, 33, 35, 37. The comparative characterization, however, will be most appropriately added to the consideration of the various sections. For the literature upon this portion, see Matthew. I may just add Ebrard's remark: adversus erroneam nonnullorum opinionem, qua Christi discipuli existimasse perhiben-tur, fore, ut universale judicium ipsorum ætate superveniret. Erlangen, 1842.

A. The Occasion. (Vers. 1–4.) Parallels: Matt. vers. 1–3; Luke xxi. 5–7.

1. Mark brings before us a single speaker, who pointed out to the Lord the splendour of the temple; while Luke speaks of several, Matthew of the disciples in general. One could imagine it was Andrew who gave in this manner the occasion, entering as he did this time into the circle of the trusted. Overlooking this, the thought lies closest to Peter. What the disciples bring before the Lord—interceding, so to speak, for the temple—is, according to Matthew, the building itself (the structure being perhaps, in some part, in process of reconstruction); according to Luke, the beautiful stones and the gifts; according to Mark, the greatness of the building-stones and buildings. Braune: According to Josephus, the building-stones were, in part, twenty-five ells long, twelve broad, eight high. (An ell is twenty-four inches.) The thought that such a building should be destroyed, was too sad for them; and the precious stones alluded to by Luke, the consecration-presents of piety, upon the walls and in the courts, testified to a continued respect for the temple. The reply of the Lord is here very lively, Dost thou see these buildings? The seat upon the Mount of Olives is marked as a position over against the temple. Of the circle of the disciples who interrogate the Lord, we learn this only, that they are His trusted friends, and that Andrew was on this occasion present, in addition to Peter, James, and John. The two questions, regarding the destruction of Jerusalem, and the sign of the end of the world, given by Matthew, are likewise given by Mark, yet in a different form.

2. One stone upon the other.—Meyer: "There would not be one stone left upon another, which should escape, in the further prosecution of the work of destruction, being torn down;"—the depicting of a regular breaking down of a house, in which the chief thing is to separate one stone from another, down to the very last. Here, on the contrary, we have the picture of a violent destruction, in which many stones, as all know, remain lying upon one another, yet is each torn from his place and broken. In other words, καταλύεσθαι refers not merely to the mass of the temple, but also to the single stones: the temple should be so thoroughly destroyed, that each stone should be destroyed. Of course this expression is not to be pressed literally.

3. Over against the temple.—The summit of Olivet made a vis-à-vis to the temple's pinnacle. See books of travel.

4. And Andrew.—See Matthew.

5. When will this be, and what, etc.—The subject of the two distinct questions is here indicated in a twofold manner: ταῦτα and ταῦτα πάντα; ἔσται and μέλλῃ συντελεῖσθαι. That all.—Not once more the destruction of Jerusalem (Meyer). By Grotius and Bengel, πάντα ταῦτα is referred to the whole world. We understand it of all things which formed part of the Jewish regime, and which, according to the view of the disciples, were connected with the destruction of Jerusalem.

B. The World's Course to the World's End in general. The Last Things of the Christian, or the Christian Signature of the End of the World. (Vers. 5–13.) Parallels: Matt. vers. 4–14; Luke vers. 8–19.

1. Mark begins again with an ἤρξατο λέγειν. The warning against the pseudo-Christs is common to all the Synoptics. Luke alone has the addition, And the time draweth near: the monument of the chiliastic (millenarian) system. The representation of the wars of the nations is in Mark the shortest. The signs of the world's development are given by Luke most complete: earthquakes, famines, pestilences, terrors, and signs in the heavens. Mark, with Matthew, omits the terrific things and signs in heaven, also the pestilences, and has instead ταραχαί, pointing out (from the Roman stand-point) chiefly the political conditions of the world. After Mark has with Matthew denoted this as the beginning of sorrows, we have a second Take heed unto yourselves introduced. And now he depicts more fully than Matthew the persecutions of the Christians, giving, as does Luke, a view of these which had been already given by Matthew in the instructions to the Apostles, ch. x. 17, 18. These were very weighty words for the Roman Christians, at a time when the martyrdom of Peter and Paul, in Rome, was about to take place. Then, as early as the 10th verse, he gives the concluding statement of Matthew regarding the preaching of the Gospel in all the world; and appends the rules of conduct for the persecuted, which we find in Matt. x. 19. To this succeeds the presaging of fraternal hatred, and the detestation of the Christians, occurring Matt. x. 21. None the less does the concluding portion of that statement form here the conclusion: He who endureth, etc. Matthew has this final word once again in this passage; and this circumstance, as well as the connection between Mark and Luke, speaks for Mark's accuracy, and proves that all the various portions recorded by him have their proper place in this address. The words, Matt. ver. 10–12, are omitted by Mark, probably because they are implied in the statements already made.

2. Take heed unto yourselves; for many shall come.—This warning against pseudo-Christs, pseudo-Christianities, false prophets, and false prophecies, being placed at the head, denotes that it is an essential point of view of Christian eschatology.

3. Yet is the end not.—Meyer: "The end of the calamities, not of the world." But the end of the calamities is really the end of the world, in a common sense.

4. And it shall come to pass.—The word of prophecy is solemnly repeated a second time.

5. Troubles (terrifying confusions), ταραχαί.—Mark alone gives this. The word denotes primarily a shock, or commotion (John v. 4); then a commotion of mind, overwhelming, a fright: and hence, with respect to political circumstances, public terrifying confusion, anarchical conditions of states, tumults, etc.

6. Ye shall be beaten.—The question is, whether the construction be, Ye shall be delivered up to councils and synagogues, shall be beaten, etc. (Luther, Meyer), or as above, ver. 9: so Bengel and others. Against this latter construction, Meyer says, the idea of motion lies not in δαρήσεσθε, but it does in εἰς. Meyer says, further, the scourging took place regularly in the synagogues. Then it is certainly a striking picture of fanatic maltreatment, if it had been already inflicted upon the way to the synagogues (Acts vi. 12, xxi. 30, 31). According to Meyer's construction, we have a tautology. The view, however, is this: The trial and condemnation took place in the councils or ecclesiastical courts, which were annexed to the synagogues; and the condemned were then led into the synagogues, or congregations, to be beaten: fanaticism could not, however, restrain itself: they were scourged even on their way thither.

7. For a testimony against them.—See Matthew.

8. Among all nations.—A result of the above-mentioned martyrdom. Through sufferings the Gospel was to be spread among all peoples. This is, accordingly, the end of their trials. Not till this be fulfilled does the end of the woes come (opposed to ἀρχαι).

9. When they shall lead you.—Rules for conduct. Above, it was Take heed; here, Take no thought. Be on your guard against the seductions of the pseudo-Christs; be not distressed because of the threats of open foes. "Μελετᾶτε, the regular word for the committing to memory of a speech; see Wetstein; the opposite of extempore." Meyer. Compare Matthew. Take no thought, how or what, as the more objective mode of Matthew puts it. Here equally a double prohibition in a more subjective form: Take no thought beforehand; do not distress yourselves on account of it.

10. For it is not ye that speak.—See Matthew.

11. He that shall endure.—Meyer explains by the context: In confessing My name. Compare before διὰ τὸ ὄνομά μου. Nevertheless, the endurance refers to the entire state of trial, which they should pass through faithfully; of course, confessing Christ. It is from sufferings that confession receives its name, as the Confession.

C. D. The Destruction of Jerusalem, and the interval between this and the End of the World; or, the World's Course to the End from the predominating point of view of the Jewish Theocracy. (Vers. 14–20; vers. 21–23.) Parallels: Matt. vers. 15–21, 22–28; Luke vers. 20–23, ver. 24.

1. The presage of the destruction of Jerusalem is given more briefly than by Matthew, still in biblical form; not as in Luke, who declares plainly the besieging and destruction of the city. The direction to flee is the same as in Matthew, only more exact. From the command, Pray that your flight be not in winter, he leaves out the additional statement of Matthew, Nor yet upon the Sabbath, as it was less easy to be comprehended by the Roman Christians. The description of this one great trouble is expressed in a richer dress than by Matthew. In describing the appearance of the false Christs and prophets, he omits the accomplishment: If they shall say, Lo, he is in the wilderness, etc.; also the picture of the last judgment, the lightning, and the eagles. On the other hand, his conclusion is in the highest degree impressive: ὑμεῖς δὲ βλέπετε, ver. 23.

2. Where it ought not.—See Matthew, Note 4.

3. Shall be affliction.—The days themselves. Stronger expression: It will be the characteristic of those days that they are trouble.

4. From beginning of the creation, which God created.—This not a merely stronger emphasizing of the conception, Creation. The κτίσις which God created, forms an opposition to the κτίσις of men, of the city Jerusalem and her hierarchy, which was now falling, while the former should endure. Similar is the expression regarding the chosen, whom God hath chosen:—who are, and shall remain, chosen. And just so we have a twofold reference to the shortening of the days: Although they are the days of vengeance, He has shortened them as such, and made them endurable. See Matt. x.

5. But take ye heed.—Ever-repeated emphasizing of the greatness of the temptation.

E. The End of the Cosmos. (Vers. 24–27.) Parallels: Matt. xxiv. 29–31; Luke vers. 25–28.

1. Mark, as well as Matthew, draws a very sharply defined distinction between the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the time when the sign of the end of the world should appear. Mark: After that tribulation (the destruction of Jerusalem), in the period of the shortened days. Here he has omitted the εὐθέως of Matthew. The fall of the stars he expresses differently from Matthew. He passes over the picture of men's consternation at the appearance of the Son of man, which Matthew gives; also the summons of the great trumpets. And the expression, From one end of heaven to the other, runs in his narrative—From the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven.

2. After that tribulation.—Meyer holds that, according to Mark, the appearing should occur immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem. According to the text, however, after the destruction, enter only,—those days, and these endurable. Between those days and that day is a great difference, which Meyer's exegesis has not noticed.

F. The Parable of the Catastrophe's sudden irruption, and the Exhortation to Watchfulness. (Vers. 28–37.) Parallels: Matt. vers. 33–50; Luke vers. 29–36.

1. To the end of ver. 32, Mark writes to quite the same import as Matthew; then, however, a different statement comes in: Of that day and that hour know not the angels, neither the Son. At this point the three Synoptics separate and take different ways. Matthew represents the Lord as here pointing back to the days of Noah, as being symbols of the days of the world's end. The surprise of that day is depicted by him in a particular way. The parable of the midnight has its characteristic points in the coming thief; and, succeeding this, is another parable of the lord who, in coming home, surprises his servants. Mark has the exhortation, Watch, for ye know not, etc., which is found in Matthew. But then he adds a parable, peculiar to himself, of the lord going away upon a journey, appointing special duties to his trusted servants: and in this parable the chief person is the lowest servant, the porter, who must keep watch; while Matthew makes him the steward, who had charge of the house. It is evident that the parables are distinct. Matthew selected the steward, because watchful honesty seemed to him the chief thing; Mark selected the porter, because honest watchfulness seemed to him the chief thing. Matthew may have had before him, in his selection, the picture of the Jewish high priest; and Mark, the picture of a porter attached to some noble Roman house. Mark notices the different hours in which the master may return, marking them out sharply by the statement of the divisions of the night. Luke brings prominently forward the common danger to man—the heart must not be overcharged, etc.; the momentous day is compared by him to a snare. Mark concludes with the word, Watch!

2. That the summer.—"Τὸ θέρος, also in Test. xii. Patr., is the symbol of the Messianic time." Meyer.

3. This generation.—According to Meyer, the (then) present generation. See Matthew, No. 14. The generation which has these signs under observation. Had the generation of that time been meant, then the end of the time at least could have been given; while Christ says, on the contrary, the day and the hour knoweth no man.

4. Neither the Son.—An admission, which Meyer, in considering the human limitations in which the Son of man moved on the earth, places in its due position. Athanasius says, Jesus did not know as a human being; Augustine, He did not know it to impart to His disciples. For other interpretations, consult Meyer. Regarding Lange, Meyer judges falsely or inaccurately. We admit that the Son, as God-man, knew not that day in His present daily consciousness, because He willed not to pass beyond the horizon of His daily task to reflect upon that day (see Leben Jesu ii. 3, page 1280); because He preferred, accordingly, the encircling horizon of His holy, energic observation and knowledge, which widened from day to day, to a discursive pedantic polyhistory, or supernatural pretension of knowing everything, the sombre opposite of dynamic omniscience. Self-limitation in the knowledge of all chronological, geographical, and similar matters, is quite different from "limitation" of Jesus' omniscience, arising from the union of His divine and human natures. See Matthew, No. 16.

5. As a man taking a far journey.—According to Meyer, a part of a speech, "made up of the different parts which formed the links between the several heads of the speech." Why not a special parable? Or, is a porter or a guard of a house formed by uniting the statements concerning a house-proprietor and a house-steward? and out of a thief and a lord of a house do we get, again, a house-owner? We assume simply a distinct, though connected, parable. In Matthew, the householder himself is first, then the steward, summoned to watch; in Mark, the house-watch or porter, to guard the house.

6. As a man taking, etc.—The anantapodoton is found simply in the omitted ἐστί. It is with this, as with a man who took a journey. The whole weight falls upon the verbum finitum, if we may argue from the following participles,—upon the injunction which the Lord gave to the porter to watch. Matthew, Note 2.

7. Authority to his servants.—A proof that we have here to do with another parable. The parable of the servant, to whom the highest authority was entrusted, is recorded by Matthew.

8. And commanded the porter to watch.—After he had given all the orders concerning the internal affairs, he gives finally, at the door, to the porter, the additional command to watch: this is the point of the parable. Considered from this side, the porters are, of course, the Apostles of Christ, with the body of Christians, under a different aspect from that in which the servant of Christ may be pre-eminently considered a steward.

9 At even, or at midnight.—The four night-watches. See Winer, Nachtwache (Night-watch); the author's commentary on Matthew; Wieseler, Chronol. Synopse, p. 406. The uniform thought is, The Lord comes in the night-season, in a dark, sad time; and it is not known in what stadium or moment of this time. He comes quite unexpected. From different stand-points, these periods (ὀψέ = 9 o'clock; μεσονύκτιον = 12; ἀλεκτοροφωνία = 3; πρωΐ = 6) may denote the same:—the evening, the evening of the old world (Matt. xx. 8); the midnight, the frame of mind of the slumbering Church (Matt. xxv. 6); the cock-crow, the voice of the watchers (Isa. xxi. 11); the morning, the dawn of Christ's appearing, the breaking into day of the new world (Mal. iv. 2).

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare the parallels in Matthew.—It is significant that Mark gives prominence to the size and strength, Luke the beauty, Matthew the restoration and apparent theocratic rebuilding, of the temple. All this could not save it.

2. The eschatological speech of the Lord, the germ of John's Apocalypse; the New Testament exposition and form of the Old Testament ideas and symbols; the opposite and corrective of all apocryphal apocalyptic (compare Lücke, Versuch einer vollständiger Einleitung in die Offenbarung des Johannes und in die apokalyptische Literatur überhaupt, Bonn 1848; Auberlen, der Prophet Daniel und die Offenbarung Johannes, 2 Aufl., Basel 1857[1]). The eschatological Songs. Eschatology in dogmatic theology.

3. Neither the Son.—Compare Agnoetism in the Dogmatic. Dogmatic theology has not reached the point of being able to do perfect justice to the œconomic and dynamic import of the Son's not knowing. In order to succeed in this, we must not drag the old human finiteness into the Logos, which men have deemed to be an expansion of the sphere of dogmatic theology; but we must do justice to the fact, that His divine nature transforms His human finiteness into the certainty of the God-man. Leo the Great says, "Humana augens, divina non minuens." No safety can lie in the "minuere divina." At least, not to know, and ignorance, are two entirely distinct things.

4. The strong emphasizing of Christ's exhortation, Watch!—According to this Petrine Gospel, Christ's servants, above all Peter, should be the doorkeepers not so much of heaven as of the Church on earth, and should keep her awake, watching for the day of judgment.

5. Three is the number of the Spirit, four the number of the world. At the revelations of His personal spirit, Christ was attended by three trusted friends; at the unveiling of the world's fate He has four.

6. Josephus, De Bello Jud., should be used with this passage; particularly the history of the destruction of Jerusalem. See Von Raumer's Palästina; also Braune, p. 353.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew.—General thoughts upon the entire passage:—

[1] Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation of St John, viewed in their mutual relationships. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

Homily upon the Lord's speech concerning the end of the world, according to the preceding division.—The Judge has already announced Himself.—The last judgment in its presages: 1. That one great presage: the destruction of Jerusalem. 2. The continuous presages: the days of less terror in the New Testament seasons of trial. 3. The last presage, as signal.—The world's state and course between two great judgments, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the real (end of the world) in a place of judgment: 1. The picture of the state. 2. The ignoring of the state. The world does not observe the forbearance, the rule, the approach of justice-dispensing righteousness.—The coming of Christ in our time with the baptism of the Spirit and of fire: 1. A true coming; 2. reminds us of His first coming; 3. an indication of His last coming.—The final words of Christ in His speech upon the end of the world: 1. Take heed unto yourselves; 2. Beware; 3. Watch.—The last day, a day which makes all things clear.—The day of the great revelation and the great appearance: 1. The great revelation of the old appearance (the phenomenal and visionary world); 2. the great appearance of the old revelation.

Upon A. Vers. 1–4.

See Matthew.—The exit of Jesus from the temple of His people: 1. A decisive step; 2. a melancholy farewell; 3. a decisive token; 4. the certain pledge of the rebuilding.—The prospect from the Mount of Olives of the temple and the city; or, the great difference between the sensuous (æsthetic) and a spiritual prospect.—The Lord's repeated survey of the city from the Mount of Olives: 1. A look of a compassionate heart, during which the tears fall, Luke xix. 41; 2. a look of the solemnly earnest spirit in which the tears must disappear (here).—Jesus sitting in the circle of His four disciples upon the Mount of Olives; or, the night-conversation on the end of the world and the judgment, ever sad, yet solemnly joyous, because of its anticipations.—The great public mystery of the last time: 1. Much forgotten, 2. much falsified, 3. ever of force, 4. ever efficacious; or, 1. in the world ever falsified and darkened, 2. in the Church continually illuminated and deepened.

Starcke, Bibl. Würt.: Men's degeneracy, to be bewitched with the seeming reality of this world, and to forget, what they should necessarily consider, the statements of God's word.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: If the wind of God's judgments storm round it, there is nothing so firm, nothing so magnificent, as not to be torn down and destroyed. How many thousands of the fairest cities, of the most gorgeous palaces, of the most impregnable castles, have experienced this, lying now, because of their sins, in heaps!—Is that the city of which men say, Is it the all-beauteous, on account of which the whole land rejoices, etc.? Lam. ii. 15 and 17.—Canstein: When we gaze upon great and glorious buildings of this world, let us ever think a time will come when these shall be no more, and that nought is abiding but that which is not seen: 2 Cor. iv. 18.—At the house of God judgment must take its beginning, 1 Pet. iv. 17.—It is edifying to speak of the divine judgments, of the destruction of all that is splendid, yea, of the end even of this present world.

Rieger: In the minds of the disciples these two things (much more, destruction of the temple, Christ's future, the world's end) must have become confused, or they must at least not have been able to distinguish between them accurately (still in some measure. See above). Just as now, in our belief of the future coming of the Lord to judge the quick and dead, many things also are united into one, which, nevertheless, the result itself might separate into distinguishable impartations and periods (very good).—The Lord Jesus, in His answer, has not explained it so fully, etc., because Jerusalem's judgment was such a famous symbol and earnest of the end of the world.

Braune: Compare, regarding the coming of the Lord, Isa. xiii. 6; Ezek. xxx. 3; Joel ii. 1; Matt. xvi. 27; Phil. iv. 5; 1 Pet. iv. 7; 1 John ii. 18; Rev. i. 3, iii. 11. Quotation from Hamann's writings: "The death of every man is the same, when the revelation of the Lord's coming is partly fulfilled to the soul. In this sense, it is literally true that the time of fulfilment is near." In the fragments of Jerusalem the last judgment is reflected.

Schleiermacher: It was His object to represent all the institutions of the old covenant as something dedicated to destruction, in order to direct their attention by so much the more to the spiritual.—Hence we have to mark, that everything external in the Christian community is nothing else, and can and dare be nothing else, than a shell, a covering in which the spiritual presents itself and works.—We find that the striving after externalism was soon renewed in the Christian Church.

Brieger: The temple was the pride of the blinded people.—The destruction of Jerusalem is in certain measure to be understood as a world-judgment. It seizes that people, namely, who for two thousand years had represented the human race. In the downfall of Jerusalem is depicted the downfall of the whole world (as in the exit of the Christians from Jerusalem is depicted the great deliverance of the believers in the last time).

Upon B. Vers. 5–13.

The foresight and fearlessness which the Lord enjoins upon His own in looking for His coming (or the end of the world): 1. Foresight in respect to the deceptive delusions of false Christs (spiritual delusions); fearlessness as to the threatening terrors of war and all the world-plagues (temporal terrors). 2. Foresight as to the enemies of the Gospel, and as to their treachery; fearlessness as to the gift of tongues, and the power to reply. 3. Foresight as to temptations thrown in our way by our nearest relatives and the world; fearlessness as to the certain deliverance of the enduring Christians.—Take heed that no man deceive you; or, Antichrist comes before Christ comes, 2 Thess. ii.—The succession of signs: 1. False signs, and yet signs [false Christs, ver. 6]. 2. Feeble signs, and yet earnest signs [the wars; the end not yet, ver. 7]. 3. Greater signs: national, political, terrestrial, physiological revolutions [the beginning of the woes, ver. 8]. 4. Striking signs [persecutions of Christians, ver. 9]. 5. The decisive sign [the Gospel is preached among all people throughout the world].—The contradictory nature of the signs: 1. Signs which do not appear terrible, but enticing, and yet are to the utmost terrible; signs which appear to the utmost terrible, and yet are not so. 2. Saddening signs. 3. The great, joyful signs, ver. 10.—The great rules for our conduct, in looking forward to the last time, and in the midst of its signs: 1. Foresight; 2. fearlessness; 3. simplicity and spiritual walk; 4. stedfastness.—The Lord's faithful admonitions.—There is an overcoming of these troubles.

Starcke: In His teaching, Christ looks not so much on what He knows as on what is useful to, and necessary for, His hearers.—It by no means behoves us, it is certain, to know time and hour, but to observe the signs antecedent to the judgments of God.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Alas! how many good men have the pretence of Christ's name,—false hopes, outward show, seeming representations, fleshly accessories, etc.,—already misled, that they have fallen away into sad byepaths, and have been ruined!—Instruction upon the Last Things is no useless instruction.—Quesnel: He who properly understands this present world, how it is disposed and what end it shall meet, is always self-possessed regarding it, and is terrified by nothing.—

Wilt thou save thyself from the awful judgments of God, then be anxious regarding the judgments and wrath of man.—The Gospel-trumpet must be blown before the archangel's trumpet is heard.—Cramer: God will not forsake His own in the time of persecution.—In the defence of the truth, we must not look at our own weakness, nor the foes' might and strength, but we must consider the power of the truth and God's promise.—Osiander: Imagine not thou art not bound to learn aught, etc.—Quesnel: Faith gives so many fathers, brothers, and sisters, as there are Christians; unbelief changes those whom nature has given into enemies, betrayers, and executioners.—The most dangerous temptation is that which comes from parents.

Osiander: It is a mark of false religion that it is bloodthirsty.—The end crowns.

Gerlach: No man can reckon more certainly upon the assistance of the Holy Spirit than those who confess Jesus' name in the time of their utmost peril.—Stier: The end is patience, the saints' weapon (Rev. xiii. 10, xiv. 12), as the beginning is foresight.

Braune: 2 Tim. iv. 16, 17.—The end comes not before the Gospel has finished its course. The nearer this completion approaches, the more certainly is the Lord's coming near.

Schleiermacher: We must expect nothing else.—All may perish; we are sure He and His kingdom will remain.

Brieger: The Lord's communication includes in itself the nearest and the most remote; hence He speaks to those nearest, and to those farthest from Him.—As the hate of the world witnessed for Him, so does He witness for His own.—The end of matters is to be introduced by means of the Gospel.—The being saved is the same import as being received to glory.—Gossner: He who possesses the rights of a citizen of heaven, can remain unterrified though it should storm beneath heaven.

Upon C. D. Vers. 14–20, 21–23.

See Matthew.—Even in His great judgments is God's mercy revealed: 1. It warns of the judgments, and indicates the signs of their coming; 2. it opens a way of escape, and exhorts to use that way in flight; 3. it points to prayer as the means to mitigate that judgment; 4. it has its eye fixed upon innocent sufferers; 5. it breaks the judgment off, and puts bounds to it, for the sake of the elect; 6. it warns against falling away to Antichrist, as the falling beneath the heaviest, the most frightful judgment.—The abomination of desolation, or the judgment inflicted on the holy place, a great admonitory sign: 1. The indication of the end of a now hoary period (and form of belief; or of a long array of judgments, which point forward to the last judgment); 2. the sign of a decisive separation between an old and new period; 3. the prognostic of a new period. —The prophet Daniel; or, the Lord's eternal Spirit in the old covenant has foretold the end of the old covenant. (See Isa. lxvi. 3; Jer. xxxi. 31; Ezek. xxxvi. 26; compare 2 Cor. iii. 13; Heb. viii. 7, 8).—The Spirit of the abiding in the Church, the prophet of the downfall of her passing forms (especially in the Middle Ages).—Who readeth, etc. The old Scripture-word shows to all time the signs of the present and the future.—The flight to the mountains. The entire life of the Christians is a fleeing to the mountains.—In a season of distress, the saving of the trifling and the unessential (the clothes) has as its result the loss of the great and the essential (the life and soul): 1. The fact (in conflagrations, in times of war, in political convulsions, in seasons of religious crises). 2. The reason. Because the trifling is the net which keeps men entangled in the old system and its judgment (Lot's wife, the Jews, the Middle Ages).—Woe to those with child, etc. The Lord's compassion towards the chief sufferers among mankind in the judgments inflicted on the especially sinful part of mankind.—The alleviations of the divine judgments which God has given to men: 1. Compassion (ver. 17); 2. prayer (ver. 18); 3. the stedfastness of the elect (ver. 20).—For the sake of the elect, whom God has chosen, God supports the world in sparing patience (see Rom. ix. 22).—The most certain signs of the judgment, which continues during the New Testament time of grace: the false Christs, and the signs of the false Christs, and the hopes placed in them: 1. Among the Jews; 2. among Christians themselves.—The tendency to believe in false Christs the most awful result of the rejection of Christ to be seen in the life of Israel, John v. 43.—The great temptations of the period, which hastens to its end, 1. perceived before, 2. declared before, 3. overcome before.—Foresight regarding the lying pseudo-Christian system, the salvation of Christianity in the last days.—Foresight the first and last means in preserving faithfulness during the last days. —Caution, 1. regarding excited preachers who pretend to make Christ visible in themselves or in others, in this or that person or thing (See here or there); 2. regarding persons who will attest themselves as new saviours by means of deceptive signs and wonders, 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11; Rev. xiii. 13.—The end of the world's history: unceasing self-confusion, self-blinding, and self-separation of the great majority from Christianity, and self-abandonment to pseudo-Christian systems.

Starcke, Cramer: If we see even the greatest distress awaiting us, we should not allow ourselves by this to be turned aside from God and His love.—In public, national calamities, the majority think only of saving their goods and lives; few are anxious to make sure of their souls and their salvation.—Quesnel: By far the most useful flight in the day of divine wrath, is to flee the fleeting pleasures of the world, and escape from conformity to it, Ps. xc. 11.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: God spares even this wicked world for the sake of His elect.

Rieger: Sad periods in the world's course are turned to their own benefit by false prophets.—Lisco: Take heed unto yourselves;—an exhortation applicable to much more than the external danger of temptation, seduction, and falling away.—Braune: Luke vers. 22, 23; Deut. xxviii. 15; Mal. iv. 1. See, here is Christ,—a voice which charms to itself; or there,—a voice which, unpartisan-like, points to others, and is accordingly still more dangerous. These voices are not to lead disciples astray.—Signs and troubles are no certain marks of Christ and His prophets: they are only indications of the individual's connection with the spiritual world; they may be indications either of light and truth, or of darkness and lies.—Prove the spirits, whether they be of God.

Schleiermacher: When we see how many imperfections have appeared in the Christian Church, one might be easily tempted to say, The light is not yet the right light. The true believer is, however, assured that the Christian faith has no share in all these imperfections; that it is the natural ruin of mankind alone which is the fountain of these, and this cannot all at once be removed.—God's kingdom is the spiritual temple of God, which needs not the external, and is raised above all external accidents, and which, where it has been once built, must endure to the end of days.

Brieger: Not in the winter. It is well known that Jerusalem was destroyed in August.—The same sin, rejection of the Holy One, which brought Israel to its downfall, will cause the world's overthrow, so soon as its measure is filled.—This pressing of precaution appears so much the less needful, inasmuch as He Himself says, it is impossible to deceive them. We may explain this in the following manner: God's acts do not exclude men's action, but include (and that, too, not in the form of natural compulsion, but by the bond of love).—Gossner: How must we ever fear to give our adherence to a false Christ!

Upon E. Vers. 24–27.

See Matthew.—The last day according to the Lord's announcement: 1. The great day of death, when the lights of heaven grow pale; 2. the judgment-day, when the Crucified appears in the glory of the world's Judge; 3. the great feast-day, when the Lord gathers His chosen by His angels from all ends of this and the other world. —Man's calamity completes itself at the end in the world's calamity. —As the sun was darkened at Christ's death, so will the entire starry world belonging to this earth grow dark in the death-hour of aged humanity.—The stars will fall from heaven. With mankind, not merely the earth, but also the planetary system which belongs to earth according to its old form, shall be dissolved, and assume a new shape.—When sun, moon, and stars shine no more, will Christ appear, and illuminate with His brightness the last day.—The last day the grand day of festival for perfected Christianity: 1. The creature-lights pale; the Lord appears as the festive light of His own day. 2. The impersonal being of the world disappears; the glorified personality of Christ appears, and manifests His personal kingdom. 3. The wicked are shut out, and, as it were, have vanished; all pure spirits are united. 4. Heaven's angels are the servants at the feast: all the elect shall be assembled who are upon the earth and in heaven.—The last day is, for the chosen of the Lord, the dawn of their blessed immortality, Job xix. 25.

Starcke, Quesnel: O wished-for day of the elect! O long longed-for purification, through which they shall be gathered by Jesus into union with His body, His Spirit, and glory!—Osiander: Should we die in a strange land, etc., yet shall we be assuredly gathered to Christ, our Head, at the last day, 2 Cor. v. 10.

Braune: Rev. i. 1, ch. xxii. 6 ["Shortly, quickly"]; Hagg. ii. 6–8 ["Yet once, it is a little while"]; Eccles. xii. 2; Isa. xiv. 12 ["How art thou fallen"]; Isa. xxxiv. 4 ["All the host of heaven shall be dissolved"].—The destruction of the creature will be an exodus into eternity.—Stier: To the end of heaven. "Because earth and heaven now incline wonderfully to one another."

Brieger: Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8; Joel ii. 3, 4; Dan. vii. 13; Acts i. 11; Heb. i. 14; Matt. xiii. 41, 42.—Bauer: These violent things are only the heralds in the Lord's service.

Upon F. Vers. 28–37.

See Matthew.—The fig-tree with its late leaves is also a picture of the inward-hurrying judgment, as of the judgment-worthy Church (ch. xi. 12), as of the unrepentant Church (Luke xiii. 6), as of the quickly-changed Israel (Hosea ix. 10).—The fig-tree according to its varied signification: 1. The early figs; above all, the formation of fruit before the leaves shot forth: the early conversion of Israel and the chosen. 2. The fig-tree unfruitful in the rich vineyard: a dying professing Church (and this is true of individuals) in the midst of the ever-living kingdom of God. 3. The fig-tree unfruitful, and yet gaudy with its leaves on the roadside; or, a church (congregation) without spiritual fruit, in the hypocritical covering of pious forms, fallen under judgment. 4. The blooming fig-tree, a prognostic of the summer's harvest; or, the theocratic, ecclesiastical, and cosmical indications of judgment: presages of the approach of the final judgment.—The holy certainty of believers regarding the day of the Lord, strengthened and elevated through their ignorance concerning the time and hour: 1. The certainty: a. as to signs; b. as to His speedy coming; c. as to His unexpected coming; d. His coming during the life of a living Christian generation; e. as to the destruction of the world; f. they are led to obey Christ's command—Watch! 2. Strengthened and increased through their ignorance: a. an ignorance regarding the day and the hour, —an ignorance to which He had subjected Himself for their sakes; b. an ignorance regarding the period which He had imposed on them for His own sake.—Christ's not knowing rests upon His knowing rightly, or upon the holy extension of His range of vision.—What Christ may not know, what angels cannot know, Christians should not wish to know.—The last day, the deep secret of the Father: 1. Of the Father in His Creator-fulness, and in His gracious design; 2. of the Father in His preparing grace, and in His commands to the Son; 3. of the Father in the greatness of His patience, and the majesty of wrath.—The knowledge of Christ, raised above the knowledge of men and of angels, is, on our behalf, a circle of holy self-limitation within the Father's omniscience.—Because He cannot deny anything to His own, He has denied Himself a knowledge of this.—The holy and useful uncertainty of the Church regarding the last day, is to be compared with the holy useful uncertainty of individual men regarding the day of their death.—Through this holy uncertainty, we should be certain of our salvation. Every day should for the Christian bear something like the appearance of the last day.—Christianity is a doorkeeper's office, as regards the future coming of the Lord.—Christ's alarm-call, or summons to all Christians for all time to watch!—Slumbering, in respect to the Lord's coming, is a danger fraught with death; while watchfulness is a fundamental condition of life.—Christianity is an endless life of experience, in judgment and salvation: 1. Judgment: a. coming from judgment (Lange alludes apparently to the rise of Christianity at the time Judaism was subjected to judgment: Translator); b. proceeding subject to judgment; c. preparing for judgment. 2. Salvation: a. from the time of salvation's work was ended; b. proceeding under the cheering hopes of salvation; c. looking forward to salvation.

Starcke: Spring presents a beautiful picture: in the shrubs bursting into life we are reminded of the coming of Christ, of the precious last day, and the joyful resurrection from the dead.—Quesnel: Who is assured that he is not sooner to appear before God, his Judge, than summer is to come? If he meet not God to be condemned, the joyful everlasting summer will follow.—We have seen many things in our lives pass away: is that not a proof that all things fade away?—God has concealed from all creatures the time of His judgments; hence is many a one ruined in his calculation.—Beware of security! watch and pray!

Braune: Heaven and earth pass as leaves upon the world-stem in the harvest of the world-season: God's people are the sap, and God's word the power, which carries new life to all.—Jas. v. 7, 8: "I know not." Will it be too hard for thee to say that? If so, Christ is not thy Lord.—The watching of the Christian must be also prayer (and active watchfulness will be at the same time prayer).—Brieger: The kingdom of God, which will at last appear in power and glory, is to be compared with the joy-fraught summer.

THIRD SECTION.

THE PASSION OF CHRIST, AND HIS REST IN THE GRAVE. THE DESCENT INTO THE STATE OF THE DEAD. THE LION OF THE TRIBE OF JUDAH AS THE PASCHAL LAMB.

CHAPTER XIV. 1–XV. 47.

1. The Preparation for the great Passover. The Supper.—The helpless impotency of wickedness in the old Church of God. The active genius of wickedness in the new Christian Church. The Anointing of the Lord at the Feast preparatory to His Death; and the sale of the Anointed, or the Treachery, matured at the Feast-table. (CHAP. XIV. 1–11.)

Parallels: Matt. xxvi. 1–16; Luke xxii. 1–6; John xii. 1–8.

A. The weak Indecision of the Enemies. (VERS. 1, 2.)

1 After two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread: and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take Him by craft, and put Him to death. 2 But they said, Not on the feast-day, lest there be an uproar of the people.

B. The holy Presentiment of the Female Disciple. (VERS. 3–5.)

3 And being in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, as He sat at meat, there came a woman, having an alabaster-box of ointment of spikenard, very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on His head. 4 And there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, Why was this waste of the ointment made? 5 For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor. And they murmured against her.

C. The Lord's holy Decision. (VERS. 6–9.)

6 And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on Me. 7 For ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: but Me ye have not always. 8 She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint My body to the burying. 9 Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her.

D. The Disciple's wicked Decision. (VERS. 10, 11.)

10 And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray Him unto them. 11 And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money. And he sought how he might conveniently betray Him.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the notes to Matthew.—The peculiarities of Mark in the history of the Passion generally are life-like pictures, the truth of which may be intuitively perceived, sharply-defined traits, original statements of particulars. Peculiarities in our section:—The two indications of Jesus' approaching death, namely, the indecisive deliberations of the Sanhedrim, and the anointing in Bethany, are found united in Mark, as in Matthew; yet he expresses himself regarding the decision of the lords of the council much more briefly than Matthew,—more decidedly, however, than Luke. In the history of the anointing, he has, with John, a remark preceding the statement as given by Matthew, that Jesus sat at the table. Moreover, he describes the ointment more exactly. And, besides, to him we owe the fresh trait, that the woman broke an alabaster-box; according to several codices, the additional remark is given, that the ointment ran down from His head (see John, "a pound"). In introducing the opposition, he assumes an intermediate situation between John and Matthew. John names Judas as the murmurer; Matthew, the disciples; Mark says, some. With John, he declares the value to be three hundred denarii, and yet adds the strong word ἐνεβριμῶντο. To the words, The poor have ye always with you, he appends,—And if ye will, etc. To him again is it peculiar to give, What she could, that hath she done. The idea that this disciple anticipates the anointing of Jesus for burial, is here more clearly expressed. Peculiarly fresh is the expression in regard to the preaching of the Gospel εἰς ὅλον τὸν κόσμον (Matthew, ἐν ὅλῳ κ.τ.λ.). The treacherous visit of Judas to the high priest is more shortly given than in Matthew. He may not name the traitor's question, neither the thirty pieces of silver; but if not, he emphasizes the joy of the chief priests.

2. The Passover and the feast, etc.—A double feast-season. See Matthew, Note 3. Compare Luke's expression.

3. After two days.—Probably on Wednesday in the Passion Week, not on Tuesday (see Matthew). The anointing in Bethany was on the previous Saturday. The question is now, In what relation do the sitting of the council and the anointing stand to one another? We could imagine the first history brings before us the chief priests, how undecided they still are; the second shows how Judas comes and gives advice. We must then adopt the idea, that the thought of treachery had been brooded over by Judas from Saturday in the preceding week till at least Wednesday in the Passion Week, and came then first to maturity. The declaration of Matthew, ver. 14, seems to speak against this, "Then Judas went out." Judas had undoubtedly gone much earlier to the high priests. To this the notice points, "how they might take Him with craft." If they had had just decided, Not on the feast, that is explained by the great triumphs which Jesus, on Palm Sunday, on Monday, and Tuesday, had celebrated over them; and with this, besides, the fact agrees well, that Judas had begun to hesitate during these days. The connection of the two recitals lies accordingly in the opposition of the previous anticipation of the crucifixion on the part of the Lord, and the strong presentiment of the female disciple, on the one side, as to the much longer prevailing indecision and short-sightedness of His foes on the other. But the second point of relation is this, that we see from the first narrative how far the foes had of themselves come; from the second, how Judas drove them to take their boldly wicked step, and succeeded in giving them the last impulse. They said, Not on the feast; Judas, on the contrary, bethought himself of the first, of the best opportunity.

4. Of pure, precious nard.—Upon πιστικῆς, compare De Wette, Meyer, Lücke on John, vol. ii. p. 493. Not drinkable, but veritable, real. Upon the nard, compare Matthew, Note 5.

5. Broke the box (bottle, or flask).—The narrow neck of the small flask. She did not wish to keep or hold back anything: offered up all, gave all away.

6. There were some.—See Matthew. Mark presents, without a doubt, the most accurate historic picture, John defines most sharply the motive, Matthew gives the especially practical historic form.—And they murmured against her. De Wette: They scolded her. Meyer: They addressed her harshly. In ἐμβριμάομαι lies especially the expression of a passionate feeling, which we strive to keep back in the utterance.

7. She hath come aforehand.—Προλαμβάνειν is the chief conception, not μυρίσαι; hence we see the error of Meyer's note, "A classic writer would have said, προλαβοῦσα ἐμύρισε.

8. One of the Twelve.—Brought forward as in Matthew. The tragic point lies not merely in this, that one of the Twelve was false, but that he committed that most abhorrent act of treachery which was the particular sting in the sufferings of Christ. In a wider sense, he extended himself through the whole sufferings of Christ: for the treachery of the disciple who betrayed the Lord to the chief priests, led to the betrayal, on the part of the Sanhedrim, of Christ to the heathen power.

9. Were glad.—They shuddered not, as the traitor laid before them his black design. They understood him. But Judas knew how to lead them still further into wickedness. He filled them with a satanic joy. And while they were still hesitating to take the last step, assuredly not from dread of the sin, but for fear of the people, Judas was watching for the first opportunity to accomplish his purpose.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Matthew, and the parallel passages in Luke.

2. Judas the betrayer, because he had been most disgusted at the thought of the death and cross of Christ; Mary the commended disciple, because she was the first found possessing a self-sacrificing courage like His own in His way to death.

3. The treachery, which springs up in the midst of the disciples of the Evangelical Church, surpasses the wicked counsel of the hierarchies in the Middle Ages. The secret and open apostasies from the Evangelical Church to Romanism.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Compare Matthew.—The counsel in Jerusalem, and the supper in Bethany, in their relation to the middle point of Christ's death; or, a picture of the uniting of all threads of ancient history in this death.—Not out the camp of the foes, but out the circle of the disciples, came the last decision regarding the death of Jesus.—Judas, the not free, and still free, instrument of the deepest revelation of wickedness.—The faithless disciple of Jesus an instructor of the chief council in the way of destruction.—The unexpected turning-points in life, how they arise out of the depths of the spirit-world: 1. Out of the realm of light (Mary); 2. out of the realm of darkness (Judas); 3. out of the struggle between the two.—The ointment in the house at Bethany a savour of death unto death.—Greed in its demoniac greatness: 1. A child of perfected unbelief as to Christ, God, and mankind; 2. a father of treachery, which has often injured the saints; 3. a companion of avarice, envy, anguish, audacity, despair.—Judas determines to take the best opportunity he can to betray the Lord, i.e., in the temple of His secret prayers.—Judas the calculator, and his miscalculation.—The estimation of Mary, and the estimation of Judas. The presentiment-filled spirit in its clear prospect, as opposed to the selfish mind in its blindness. —The most multiplied purposes and projects, and over them the deep design of God.—Woman is here again before man, as is so often the case in the Gospel history.

Starcke, Hedinger: Satan rests not till he has injured Christ and His cause in life, honour, and possessions.—At feast-seasons the devil generally excites the greatest uproar against Christians.—Hedinger: Nothing must be squandered away on Christ? Miserable parsimony, when we refuse Him anything!—The prating of a fault-seeker can soon move others to aid him.—Quesnel: The pious must remain silent regarding the world's judgment. God will speak and conduct their affairs.—Behold, how the godless rejoice if they get an opportunity of fulfilling their wicked wish!—Gerlach: The greatest praise ever spoken by Jesus regarding an act.—Braune: The Sanhedrim required him to point out Jesus' tarrying-place. And Judas is ready to do it.—Brieger: Exactly what the enemies wished least of all to do, that must they.—Also to an uproar it came, but this was to the advantage of hell.—The greatest, the most immediate, most difficult, but the most blessed thing that ever a sinful being was able to do, namely, to receive the Lord's word in all simplicity and proceed to act, that did Mary; and that is to maintain her memory on earth till the end of time.—Gossner: She did what she could. From this may every one take comfort, that nothing more than faithfulness is asked from them.—Bauer: The deeds of love are often in the world turned into shame, because others turn them into an occasion to do evil.

2. The Feast of the Passion, and of Victory.—The Paschal Lamb and the discovered Traitor. The Last Supper and the Lord's Triumph over the Traitor. The Prediction of the Disciples being offended, and of their denying Him. (VERS. 12–31.)

A. The Disciples' Passover-thought.—Unguardedness and Foresight; or, the Jewish Custom and Christ's Spirit. (VERS. 12–16.)

12 And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, His disciples said unto Him, Where wilt Thou that we go and prepare, that Thou mayest eat the passover? 13 And He sendeth forth two of His disciples, and saith unto them, Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him. 14 And wheresoever he shall go in, say ye to the goodman of the house, The Master saith, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with My disciples? 15 And he will show you a large upper room furnished and prepared: there make ready for us. 16 And His disciples went forth, and came into the city, and found as He had said unto them: and they made ready the passover.

B. The Lord's Passover-thought.—The Passover, and the hardened and discovered Traitor in the circle of Disciples. The Lord's clear perception of the secret designs of the Traitor. (VERS. 17–21.)

17 And in the evening He cometh with the twelve. 18 And as they sat and did eat, Jesus said, Verily I say unto you, One of you which eateth with Me shall betray Me. 19 And they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto Him one by one, Is it I? and another said, Is it I? 20 And He answered and said unto them, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with Me in the dish. 21 The Son of man indeed goeth, as it is written of Him: but woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! good were it for that man if he had never been born.

C. The new Passover.—The Lord's fulness of Love on the night of the Betrayal. (VERS. 22–25.)

22 And as they did eat, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat: this is My body. 23 And He took the cup, and when He had given thanks, He gave it to them: and they all drank of it. 24 And He said unto them, This is My blood of the new testament, which is shed for many. 25 Verily I say unto you, I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, until that day that I drink it new in the kingdom of God.

D. A new Passover upon a new Night of Terror, and upon the Death of the First-born. (VERS. 26–31.)

26 And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the Mount of Olives. 27 And Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended because of Me this night: for it is written, I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered. 28 But after that I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee. 29 But Peter said unto Him, Although all shall be offended, yet will not I. 30 And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee, That this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny Me thrice. 31 But He spake the more vehemently, If I should die with Thee, I will not deny Thee in any wise. Likewise also said they all.

Ver. 19. Καὶ ἄλλος, μήτι ἐγώ; omitted by B.C.L., etc.; probably because the words were deemed superfluous, and that the construction was inadmissible. (We suppose εἷς to be supplied with the first μήτι ἐγώ.)

Ver. 20. The evidence against ἀποκριθείς is quite conclusive.

Ver. 22. Φάγετε must be struck out, on the authority of A.B.C., etc.

Ver. 24. Καινῆς is wanting in B.C.D.L., etc. Tischendorf rejects it, but it is retained by Lachmann. The uncertainty of the reading even in Matthew excites suspicion, that the Pauline tradition gave rise to it; for "the blood of the testament" can mean nothing else than "of the new testament."

Ver. 27. Ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ. Most MSS. want these words. Lachmann, however, retains them on the authority of A., though even A. encloses them in brackets.

CRITICAL NOTES.

Compare Matthew and Luke.—The unity of these sections is to be found in the contrast between the disciples' unprepared state, and the ever clear perception which the Lord had of what lay before Him. Besides we have the opposition between the Passover and the Supper, the great institution of love, and of treachery; finally, the contrast between the faithful care with which the Lord warned the disciples, and their presumptuous ignoring of the fact of their own weakness. Peculiarities of Mark:—Exact statement of the day, ver. 12, with Luke. He brings forward (what is passed over by Matthew) the sending of the two disciples, but does not name them, as Luke does; and this again is to be traced back to Peter's modesty, for Peter was one of those sent. The direction of Jesus also,—in Matthew, Go ye πρὸς τὸν δεῖνα,—is given here in a more expanded form, as does Luke: the description of the man with the water-pitcher, who should meet them at the gate of the city, and the directions which they were to follow. He passes over, in his description of the Passover, the special narrations of Luke and John, and hastens forward with Matthew to the detection of the traitor. The indication of the betrayer has been already given: He who eateth with Me, ver. 18. The peculiar ἤρξαντο again, ver. 19. From the audacious question of Judas, Is it I? which Matthew introduces, Mark turns away, as previously from his words to the chief priests. In the celebration of the Supper, he agrees, excepting a few trifling deviations, with Matthew. Peter has, through Mark, directed attention to the fact concerning the cup, And they all drank of it. In recording, Shed for many, Mark allows—For the remission of sins—to fall out. The words concerning the new cup in the kingdom of God he causes to follow the words of the Supper, as is the case in Matthew, but more briefly expressed. The statement in John to the disciples, Ye cannot follow Me, in Mark (and Matthew) runs—All ye shall be offended because of Me. Peter's vow, as given by John, is extended in Mark: Although all shall be offended, yet not I; shorter than in Matthew. The statement in John, My life will I give for Thee, stands in Mark—If I should die with Thee, etc., as in Matthew. The prediction that they would deny Him, follows this asseveration in John, but precedes it in Mark and Matthew; in this latter case, the affirmation was, of course, more presumptuous. Mark alone has the more positive signal, Before the cock crow twice. The particular points which are introduced by Luke before this transaction, and which bring Peter still more prominently into view, are not related by Luke. He and Matthew have the strongest form of the matter (also an assurance of faithfulness after the declaration of the denial).

2. Two of His disciples.—Peter and John. Compare Luke.

3. And there shall meet you a man.—The description is exactly as mysterious as in the despatching of the disciples to catch the ass. Just so again is the prominence given to the talismanic word εἰπεῖν, to be noticed. Quite groundless is the view of Meyer (in a mood of rationalizing), that we find in the wonderful manner in which the supper is ordered, as recorded by Mark and Luke, a symbol of the later method of revelation. In this passage Matthew has only hinted at what the other two have explicitly stated. See Matthew, Note 3.

4. A man.—It is a very mistaken conclusion, if we, from the fact that it was a slave's employment to carry water (Deut. xxix. 11; Josh. ix. 21), conclude this man was a slave.

5. Guest-chamber, τὸ κατάλυμά μου.—The reception-room, which is appointed for Me. With the word lodgings, the conception of a separate house is united. Much nearer the idea is, "My quarters."

6. A large upper room.—The form ἀνάγαιον is most favourably received. Meyer: "According to the meaning, it is exactly ὑπερῷον, עֲלִיָּה, upper room, place for prayer, and assembling together." Nevertheless, we must undoubtedly think of the upper room as being on the second floor: the Alijah, on the contrary, is a tower-like erection upon the flat house-roof (see 2 Kings iv. 10; compare Acts x. 9). The learned Winer, too, has no clear idea of the Alijah. Compare articles, "Houses, Roof." On the contrary, Gesenius: עֲלִיָּה, cubiculum superius, conclave, super tectum domus eminens; ὑπερῷον; balcony, projection; and De Wette, Archäol. p. 146.

7. Furnished (laid with pillows).—That is, with pillow-beds laid around the table, as the custom of reclining at meals required.

8. With the Twelve.—The two messengers have returned and announced, All is ready.

9. He that eateth with Me.—The word of pain. See John xiii. 18. Reference to Ps. xli. 10.

10. That dippeth with Me in the dish.—Meyer: "He was one of those lying closest to Jesus, eating, namely, out of the same dish." No very definite description. Yet the eating of the Passover was no common eating from a dish. The head of the family distributed the portions. The case is, I presume, this: Jesus was about to hand Judas his portion. Now it is a psychological fact, that an evil conscience causes the hand to move with an uneasy motion, even at the moment when one succeeds in showing a hypocritical face, full of innocence and calmness. The hand, in opposition to the steady countenance, makes a hypocritically sportive motion. So, accordingly, does the traitorous hand of Judas, betraying himself, hastily extend itself, it would appear, to meet the Lord's hand, as it is still in the dish, in order with apparent ease to receive the sop. The three statements—Who dippeth with Me in the dish (Matthew, and almost identically Luke); To whom I shall give the sop (John); and, The hand of My betrayer is with Me on the table (Luke),—agree, therefore, as regards the actual state of the case.

11. And He said unto them, This is My blood.—That our Evangelist mades this expression follow the drinking, creates no difference between Matthew, and Luke, and Mark. Because Mark, namely, wished to make this the prominent fact, that all the company in rotation drank of the cup, he represents the Lord as speaking these important words while the act of drinking was being performed; from which it is self-evident, that He speaks them while the cup was passing round.

12. Spake the more vehemently.—We understand this not quantitive—he made regarding this many additional statements,—but qualitative, of the increasing force in expressing himself, as the following sentence shows.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Matthew.

2. As the first Old Testament Passover was celebrated before the realization of the exemption and deliverance of the Israelites in the Egyptian night of terror, in the believing certainty of their salvation: so was also the New Testament Passover, the Supper, celebrated in the certainty of actual preservation and deliverance before the external fact, the death and resurrection of Christ. Exactly thus, in the justification of the individual sinner, does the celebration of his salvation precede the completion of his salvation in sanctification.

3. The art and manner in which Jesus unites with the celebration of the Supper the announcement that His disciples should be offended because of Him, and His solicitude for their preservation and restoration, brings before us the relation subsisting between the disciples and the first-born in Egypt, for whom atonement had been made. The disciples, too, must the destroying angel pass by. No doubt, because Christ, who is the First-born in an especial sense, presents Himself a sacrifice for them. But this First-born, too, wins back His life from death.

4. Three Passovers: The typical Passover of the typified deliverance; the actual Passover of the real deliverance, finished in principle, pointing to the completion in life; the coming Passover in the kingdom of God, the celebration of the perfected salvation.

5. The detection of Judas, and the announcement of the disciples being offended after the Supper, is a sign that the Supper is appointed to exclude the apostate and the hypocritical, to strengthen, establish, and restore the weak.

6. The celebration of the Supper: 1. The external preparation, and the internal (One of you); 2. the celebration itself; 3. the practical improvement (In this night).

7. The Lord changes the Passover into the Supper: Christ's disciples now make with great willingness a Passover out of the Supper, in various ways. A simply ecclesiastical meal of custom; a simply memorial meal; a dogma-teaching meal; a meal falsely alleged to be capable of removing guilt.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew.—The pious recollection of the disciples, and the holy thought of the Lord (paschal lamb, the Last Supper).—The quiet, hidden friend of Christ in the city of His foes, and the concealed enemy of Christ in the disciple-band.—Both brought to view by Christ.—The Lord's Supper a celebration of salvation in the certainty of faith: 1. Externally, a pre-celebration; 2. inwardly, an after-celebration.—The holy appointment and efficacy of the Supper: 1. Revelation of the hearts (acknowledgment of sins, and confession of faith); 2. the affrighting of sinful consciences; 3. the exclusion of the wicked; 4. the celebration of the pardon and the establishment of believers; 5. the setting firm the future path; 6. the restoration of the erring.—The self-exaltation with which Peter goes forth after the Supper, is a sign that he had not yet properly understood it.—Peter, before and after the Supper, and during its progress; pointing to a mistaking of the Supper in its symbolic import.—The disciples forget too soon after Judas' departure, how much they have in common with him.—The consciousness of success, with which the Lord looks to the coming season of the perfect reunion of His disciples and Himself, being fully assured that all their temptations and conflicts could not prevent this result.

Hedinger: At the approach of death, life-endangering perils, and other misfortunes, God's word and sacrament are the best anointing and refreshment. Happy is he who consecrates his room to Jesus as household church, or entertains Him oft in His poor members.—If we hazard all to obey God, we shall find it as the Lord hath promised before.—Osiander: Who serves, believes, and obeys Christ, shall be deceived in nothing.—Canstein: Whosoever receives the holy Supper aright, receives in it an assurance of the coming eternal glory.—Osiander: In suffering and trouble look to salvation.—He will not break the bruised reed. So gracious is Jesus, that He promises consolation to, and addresses in the language of promise, even the stumbling disciples.—Hedinger: He who relies too much on self, is building on sand.—Whosoever in a deliberative assembly introduces anything evil, may easily (in a greater or less degree) bring all the others over to his own side, so that they all express the same views.

Braune: If amongst His friends there was a secret foe, there were many secret friends amongst His foes.—The traitor proceeds to complete his transgression, and Jesus proceeds to the institution of the sacrament of the Atonement.—Ignatius: The Supper is a remedy bringing immortal life, an antidote to death.—Mark, who was most intimate with Peter, gives Jesus' words thus: Before the cock crow twice, wilt thou thrice deny Me. The third part of the night, from twelve to three, was called the cock-crowing: before this should end, Peter would have thrice denied the Lord.

Brieger: In the Passover, Christ is shadowed forth from every side. According to the law, the paschal lamb must be set apart on the tenth day of the month Nisan. And upon the tenth of this month, upon the so-called Palm Sunday, Christ made His triumphal entry, etc. (Add to this, that Jesus died about the ninth hour, almost the time when the paschal lamb was usually slain; that all the people put Him to death, as every head of a family slew a lamb; the roasting-spit for the lamb had the form of a cross; that no bone of the lamb dare be broken.)—How precious the promise, that He, as the Risen One, should go before them into Galilee! But they have ears for nothing. They regard only that word, which they attack so hardly, so deeply despise. The Apostles were now occupied so entirely with themselves, that they were unmoved by what was immediately to befall their Lord.—However, if they had not dwelt upon the statement that the sword should fall on Him, they could not have had regard to the promise of His resurrection.—Gossner: Christ can raise the hymn of praise, although He knows His disciples are about to betray Him, etc. We must not be restrained from praising God because of anything.—Bauer: His body, His blood; that is, receive His life.

3. Gethsemane and the Betrayal; or, the Lord's sorrow of Soul.—The coming of the Traitor. (CHAP. XIV. 32–42.)—The Betrayal and its effect. The Arrest of the Lord. The Flight of the Disciples. (VERS. 43–52.)

Parallels: Matt. xxvi. 36–56; Luke xxii. 39–53; John xviii. 1–11.

A. Gethsemane. (VERS. 32–42.)

32 And they came to a place which was named Gethsemane: and He saith to His disciples, Sit ye here, while I shall pray. 33 And He taketh with Him Peter, and James, and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy; 34 And saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch. 35 And He went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from Him. 36 And He said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee; take away this cup from Me: nevertheless not what I will, but what Thou wilt. 37 And He cometh, and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? couldest not thou watch one hour? 38 Watch ye, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation: the spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak. 39 And again He went away, and prayed, and spake the same words. 40 And when He returned, He found them asleep again; (for their eyes were heavy;) neither wist they what to answer Him. 41 And He cometh the third time, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: it is enough, the hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. 42 Rise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth Me is at hand.

Ver. 35. The remarkable difference between προσελθὼν and προελθὼν is found here, just as in Matthew. The most MSS. are in favour of the first; the sense favours the second. If we retain προσελθὼν, the terminus ad quem is wanting: unless there be a reference to drawing near to God in prayer, קָרַב. Luke uses an expression denoting separation.

B. The Betrayal.—The Arrest. The Flight of the Disciples. (VERS. 43–52.)

43 And immediately, while He yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a great multitude, with swords and staves, from the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders. 44 And he that betrayed Him had given them a token, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He; take Him, and lead Him away safely. 45 And as soon as he was come, he goeth straightway to Him, and saith, Master, Master; and kissed Him. 46 And they laid their hands on Him, and took Him. 47 And one of them that stood by drew a sword, and smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his ear. 48 And Jesus answered and said unto them, Are ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and with staves to take Me? 49 I was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took Me not: but the Scriptures must be fulfilled. 50 And they all forsook Him, and fled. 51 And there followed Him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on him: 52 And he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke.—Peculiarities of Mark:—In narrating the sufferings of Christ in Gethsemane, Mark is the only Evangelist who gives the subject of Jesus' prayer, —that " the (dread) hour might pass from Him." The prayer, too, has with him a more earnest expression, with the Abba, and All things are possible unto Thee. In the passage recording the finding the three asleep, the reproof of Christ is directed especially to Peter, and Jesus names him Simon, as ever when He would remind him of his weakness and old nature. The modification of the first petition in the second, mentioned by Matthew, is omitted by him. Jesus prays, according to him, in the same words; that is, Mark will emphasize the wrestling importunity in this petition likewise, while Matthew gives prominence to the stronger manifestation of the resignation of Jesus. The third prayer is not introduced by Mark, but is nevertheless implied in his recital. In the statement, The eyes of the disciples were oppressed with sleep, he has, according to Codd. A.B. (Lachmann), the stronger term, καταβαρυνόμενοι. Besides, he gives the noteworthy statement, Neither wist they what to answer; which recalls the similar expression in the history of the transfiguration. Strikingly characteristic is the short phrase, It is enough (it is out, ἀπέχει), which is addressed by Jesus to the sleep-oppressed disciples. According to his representation, Judas stands suddenly before Him, like some unearthly thing. The traitor had given to the enemy a distinct, previously appointed signal (σύσσημον), and commanded them to seize the Master with all possible care, and to lead Him away. With a twofold salutation, Rabbi, Rabbi, the traitor here approaches Jesus eagerly and with feigned friendship. Jesus' address to Judas is here passed over. Of the sword-stroke of Peter he speaks in milder terms, saying he had cut off the ὠτάριον of the servant. The command of Jesus to Peter is also omitted. On the other hand, we are indebted to him for the remarkable episode of the youth who changed so quickly from a follower of Jesus to a deserter.

2. To be sore amazed, and to be very heavy; ἤρξατο ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι καὶ ἀδημονεῖν.—Matthew has λυπεῖσθαι καὶ ἀδημονεῖν. Luke, instead of either expressions: γενόμενος ἐν ἀγωνίᾳ (in a dreadful struggle or agony). This agony has its two sides, which are marked out with equal prominence in Matthew's Gospel and in Luke's; because ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι is the stronger term for λυπεῖσθαι, and is given only by Mark; indeed, the word is only found in the passages, ch. ix. 15, xvi. 5, 6. Upon this point, consult Note 3 in the Commentary on Matthew. The traitorous, false, despairing world, represented in Judas, fills Him with sorrow to amazement: He shudders before it, before the infernal powers lying behind it, and before the abyss of wickedness in this spiritual hell; the impotent, poor, deliverance-requiring world, which lay sleeping around Him, overcome with sorrow and devoid of all presentiment, as represented by the three sleeping disciples, gives Him the feeling of eternal abandonment. Isa. lxiii. 3. Compare Matthew. Starcke: ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι is used of fright at a peal of thunder, Acts ix. 3, 6; and before a phantom, Matt. xiv. 26: from this some conclude that the most frightful phantoms may have presented themselves to Christ, etc.

3. The hour might pass from Him.—Not His suffering generally, but that hour. That entire feeling of suffering and judgment, to be so betrayed by the one-half of the world, and to be so forsaken by the other half. See Matthew.

4. Abba.—Most vivid narration. Quotation of the actual words, as in the expression, Talitha cumi, and the exclamation on the cross. Meyer: "This address, among the Greek-speaking Christians, received the nature of a nomen proprium." Now, without looking at the great misunderstanding which is here involved, the phrase Talitha cumi, and other expressions, speak against this opinion. Accordingly, ὁ πατήρ is certainly an explicative addition.

5. But not.—We augment, But do not this, as I will, as My feelings would have. Meyer: "Let this not be, as I will. Matthew indicates by πλὴν οὐχ ὡς. Luke uses appropriately το θέλημα (inclination of the will), not θέλησις (act of will). Accordingly, ἀλλ' οὐ τί is to be taken in rather a formal sense."

6. Found them asleep again.—Luke, for sorrow. Sorrow kept the Lord awake, but lulled the disciples to sleep.

7. They wist not to answer.—Compare ch. ix. 6.

8. Sleep on now, and sleep.—See Note 22 upon Matthew. The ironical meaning, as conveyed by Matthew, is altered by Luke into a reproof, Why sleep ye? Mark takes the intermediate place: first irony, then the call to wake.

9. (It is enough.) It is out, ἀπέχει.—This is the opposite of οὐδὲν ἀπέχει: nothing stands in the way, nothing hinders. The meaning accordingly is, It has failed; it is no more of use, etc. Meyer: "It is enough, = ἐξαρκεῖ." This is quite a derivative force, an application of the word very remote indeed. Quite as untenable is another interpretation: There is enough watching, ye have watched enough; or, My anguish is past.

10. Rabbi, Rabbi.—Not merely an exclamation of excitement, but also of a hypocritical reverence carried to its greatest height.

11. A certain young man.—This forms an episode as characteristic of Mark as the Emmaus-disciples of Luke; and given, it is certain, from similar reasons. That he was no apostle, is evident from the term, A certain young man, from the circumstance that he had already the night-dress on, and especially from the contrast he presents to the Apostles. He only presents himself after their flight, a youthful Joseph of Arimathea, and so a precursor of him. So that some have unjustly settled upon John (Ambrose, Chrysostom, Gregory the Great); others have selected, equally without ground, James the Just (Epiph. Hæres. 87, 13). That the youth belonged to a family standing in a relation of friendship to the Lord, we may safely assume; at least, he was himself an enthusiastic follower of Christ. On this account, it was easiest to suppose a youth of the family where Jesus had eaten the Passover (Theophylact): in that case, however, we must assume that the young man had on this occasion been sleeping, or retiring to rest, in the house which belonged to the family, whose property lay in the valley of the Cedron. For, that the young man had been startled from his sleep, or in preparing to retire to rest, in the neighbourhood of Gethsemane,—that he, accordingly, comes from a neighbouring country-seat (Grotius): this is proved by his wearing the night-covering. Both circumstances might possibly be found united in Mark himself, whom we, with Olshausen, consider to be this certain one. (See Introduction.) Reasons: 1. The youth's picture agrees in every line with the character of Mark. 2. The circumstances of the youth agreed perfectly with those of Mark: the friend of the Lord, resting in this country-house for the night. 3. In support of this view the analogy speaks, that John also, by a mere hint, weaves himself and His mother into the narrative (John i. 40, xix. 25); and probably Luke in this same style (xxiv. 18). 4. The fact, that this circumstance is related by Mark alone, which Meyer considers so very trifling, and Bauer holds to be a piquant addition.

12. The young men.—These certainly were not the temple-guards, nor yet the soldiery, but young persons who had of their own accord joined the company; partly from their interest in adventure. From this reason they found themselves particularly tempted to make an attack upon this young man, their equal in years, in the night-dress, who wished to follow Jesus, clad in so ridiculous a manner.

13. But he left the linen cloth.—The night-mantle, thrown about him, was easily loosed. Bengel: pudorem vicit timor in magno periculo. Whitefield has properly pointed out the handling of this youth as a picture of a late reception of Jesus, though others have praised it as the picture of an earlier following of the Lord, as belief in youth. Both are to be found in it: a beautiful enthusiasm of belief, and a fanatical self-dependence and over-estimation of personal strength. Rather far-fetched is Guyon's allegory, that we must follow Jesus, stripping off all that is our own, and all that is false. This youth was a follower while he had the linen cloth; deprived of this, he became a deserter.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare Matthew.

2. The suffering of Jesus in Gethsemane, and the treachery of Judas, stand in the most intimate relation to one another. The bringing about of His sufferings by means of the treachery, which grew up in the midst of His disciples, and the spirit of worldliness, of worldly sorrow and worldly falseness, of self-disrespect and despair, manifested in this treachery,—that is, in the particular sense, the bitter cup which He had to drain; for it is the heaviest judgment of God, that sin itself must break forth in treachery proceeding out the disciple-circle; a fact, in which is revealed the full judgment of God upon the sin of the world in its faithlessness, and in its despair—upon the sin of that world which could break through the barriers separating the disciples of Christ from the world. In Christ's experience of this judgment, there are two points to be marked: the realization of His being perfectly deserted; the manifestation of the world's weakness, and of the imminent danger to which the wickedness of the world exposed Him even amid His disciples. That He must see Himself forsaken by His young Church, that He must grieve because of the apostasy in the midst of this Church: therein lies the bitter gall of His passion-cup, therein was judgment finished. He prayed that this hour might pass, if it were possible (ver. 35). And (ver. 41) it is said, The hour is come; behold, the Son of man, etc. The betrayal marks and seals this hour.

3. Therefore, in taking this cup out of the Father's hand lay the atonement for the guilt incurred by this world's murmuring and despair; preceding the atonement for His Church.

4. The sleeping of the good disciples is contrasted, especially on this ground (alluding to the view advanced in 3), with the watchfulness of the evil disciple. What was common to both parties, was the unspeakable sorrow. In the case of Judas, this has changed into absolute demoniacal distress, animosity, and rage; in the case of the Eleven, it is manifested in complete relaxation, cowardice, and indecision. On this account, Christ opposes to the sleep and indecision of the Eleven, the intensest agitation of soul and energy; to the fevered excitement of Judas, on the contrary, the most perfect quiet of soul.

5. The youth who follows the Lord in his night-garb, and then flees, a striking picture of the pious resolutions of Jesus' disciples, which are dissipated in the night of great temptation.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew.—The Lord's preparation as opposed to the enemies' preparation.—The unfathomable clearness of spirit in the agony of the Lord, and the unfathomable confusion of spirit in the agony of Judas.—The treachery of a disciple in Gethsemane, the Lord's secret place of prayer, forms a page black as midnight in the history of the world and of the Church.—God's providence has changed this terrific curse also into a cup of blessing for the salvation-requiring world, through Christ's obedience.—Jesus could pray twice or thrice almost the same words, yet make from them each time a new prayer (differently placed emphasis): 1. Take from Me this cup; 2. yet not what I will; 3. but what Thou wilt.—The chasm which opens between the Lord and His disciples, while He prays and they sleep: 1. Christ ever more wakeful, more calmed, more sure of victory; 2. the disciples ever heavier with sleep, more confused and undecided.—How the Lord Himself announces the hour of which He prayed, that it might pass by: The hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinful men.—Arise, let us go! lo, he that betrayeth Me is at hand.—Jesus' disciple as guide to the hostile band.—The kiss of Judas; or, here likewise is Antichrist revealed in the pseudo-Christ (a lying Christ).—Christ between the helpless assailants and the helpless defenders: 1. The assailants in their helplessness: a. the traitor, the soldiers; b. He grants them the might which they are allowed to have, according to the Holy Scriptures and God's providence, though it seems as derived from human laws. 2. The defenders in their helplessness: a. the sword-stroke of Peter, the fleeing disciples, the fleeing youth; b. He grants them the might of His preserving grace.—There existed a natural relationship between this young man and the disciple Peter, as there existed a spiritual relationship between the Apostle Peter and the Evangelist Mark.—Christ betrayed and captured: 1. How all appears in this state of things to be lost; 2. how sin and Satan are thereby betrayed and captured.—By His bonds are we freed.

Starcke: To pray is the best thing we can do in the hour of temptation.—Quesnel: God's will must be at all times dearer than our own, let it cost what it may to perfect it.—Canstein: Prayer is needed with watching, and watching with prayer. Both must go together.—Alas, if Israel's Shepherd should not be watchful, how evil should it stand with us, from our sleep-coveting security and sloth!—Judas sells Jesus. We should not consider the whole world a sufficient purchase-price for Jesus.—Osiander: The wickedness of the world is so great, that the very persons who are appointed to administer justice persecute the just, and defend the unjust.—Canstein: Whosoever allures others into sin, sins himself, and loads himself with all the sin which the others commit.—Osiander: Satan blinds men, that, when they do evil, they know not what will be its result.—Canstein: A good intention may lead to evil (the blow of the sword).—Hasty passions are dangerous; therefore resist a blind zeal, which, the hotter it burns, incenses God the more.—Hedinger: Where the cross is, there is flight.

Braune: As He collected Himself at the beginning of His public ministry in the wilderness, so also now at the conclusion of His mission.—He addresses Himself to Peter at once, to do all that He could to bring him to see his weakness.—It is not the Scripture which makes the necessity of fulfilment; but the will of God, revealed in the prophets, causes the fulfilment of the Scriptures. The darkness likewise is subject to God's light.—It is noticeable, that upon the spot where Jesus was seized by the band, Titus, the Roman commander, pitched his camp forty years after. The Turks, however, have walled the place where Judas kissed Christ, as an accursed spot.

Brieger: Had Christ not as well been tempted from the side of terror as formerly from that of lust, the Scriptures could not say: He was tempted in all points.—Should that, perhaps, be fulfilled, which He prophesied of this time (Luke xxi. 26), in His own person? Then did that statement receive its accomplishment in Gethsemane, I have trodden the wine-press alone, Isa. lxiii. 3.—Rabbi, Rabbi. It was the last Rabbi his lips uttered.—The whole transaction (the arrest of Christ) presents itself as a drama arranged by the chief council. But all the plausibility being destroyed, the leaders of the people stand before us as common criminals.—This terror could not have overmastered the disciples, had they not erred regarding the Lord. Being dissatisfied that Jesus did not deliver Himself from suffering, they held themselves bound to withdraw from danger.—Gossner, on ver. 27: If thou canst not overcome sleep, how wilt thou overcome death?—Bauer: And these were the best of the disciples of Jesus!—Judas, accordingly, is there with his band already! He has been quick. Yes, sin runs a rapid race.

4. Christ betrayed to the Jews, in the Palace of the High Priest, and before the Ecclesiastical Court. The False Witnesses. The Truthful Witness, and His sublime Testimony. The Sentence of Death. Peter's Denial. (VERS. 53–72.)

Parallels: Matt. xxvi. 57–75; Luke xxii. 54–71; John xviii. 12–27.

A. Vers. 53–65.

53 And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled all the chief priests, and the elders, and the scribes. 54 And Peter followed Him afar off, even into the palace of the high priest: and he sat with the servants, and warmed himself at the fire. 55 And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus, to put Him to death; and found none. 56 For many bare false witness against Him, but their witness agreed not together. 57 And there arose certain, and bare false witness against Him, saying, 58 We heard Him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands. 59 But neither so did their witness agree together. 60 And the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest Thou nothing? what is it which these witness against Thee? 61 But He held His peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked Him, and said unto Him, Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? 62 And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. 63 Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses? 64 Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned Him to be guilty of death. 65 And some began to spit on Him, and to cover His face, and to buffet Him, and to say unto Him, Prophesy: and the servants did strike Him with the palms of their hands.

B. Vers. 66–72.

66 And as Peter was beneath in the palace, there cometh one of the maids of the high priest: 67 And when she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him, and said, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth. 68 But he denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest. And he went out into the porch; and the cock crew. 69 And a maid saw him again, and began to say to them that stood by, This is one of them. 70 And he denied it again. And a little after, they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto. 71 But he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak. 72 And the second time the cock crew. And Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept.

Ver. 68. We read, with Cod. A., etc., and the Rec., οὐκ οἶδα, οὐδὲ ἐπίσταμαι. No doubt οὔτε, οὔτε is strongly attested by B.D.L., and is adopted by Tischendorf and Lachmann. We consider that mode of expression too strong to be used in the circumstances. Matthew says, I know not what thou sayest; Luke, I know Him not: our reading, in what appears the original account, receives support from these two expressions.

. . . Καὶ ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησε, wanting in B.L.; probably accommodated to the parallel passage in Matt.

Ver. 70. Καὶ ἡ λαλιά σου ὁμοιάζει, omitted in B.C.D.L., etc., and in the texts of Tischendorf and Lachmann. It is interpolated probably from Matthew

Ver. 72. Τὸ ῥῆμα ὡς, A.B.C.L.Δ., Lachmann, Tischendorf.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew, and the parallels in Luke.—Mark gives the same account of the false witnesses as Matthew; but he is the only one who says why the chief council obtained no false witness: the witnesses did not corroborate one another. Matthew selects two witnesses as testifying to Jesus' statement regarding the destruction of the temple; Mark says, a few. I should suppose Matthew had the legal number, which must be present before his mind; Mark, the actual smallness of the number. In his account, the false testimony is strongest on the point, I will destroy this temple, etc.; at the same time, he has the opposition between the temple made with hands and that not made with hands. Again, he brings into view the conflicting nature of the testimony. Perhaps even in Matthew the varying expression is alluded to, under I can rebuild, etc. According to Mark, the high priest advances into the middle. The silence is strongly marked. The adjuration of Jesus by the high priest is only implied in the remark, He interrogated Him. The testimony of Jesus is more strongly expressed than in Matthew, ἐγώ εἰμι. On the contrary, he does not report literally the sentence of death, as Matthew. But, again, he gives us the most distinct view of how the servants now take Christ—probably the prison-warders—to lead Him to a place of safe custody till the next morning. Then he says, Peter was beneath in the palace (in the hall); and gives us thus to understand that the trial had taken place in an upper storey, or at least in an elevated hall. The maid of the high priest terms Jesus here, The Nazarene. The first statement of Peter is characteristically ambiguous. The first cock-crow is mentioned by Mark alone (according to the exact remembrance of Peter). The second attack, Mark again appears to place, contrary to Matthew, in the mouth of the same maid; but it is, without doubt, the porteress of the προαύλιον that is meant. The ἕτερος here, alluded to by Luke, belongs to the bystanders, of whom Mark here informs us. The porteress did address Peter himself, but denounced him to those about: upon this, one of them laid hold of Peter. Of the second denial, Mark gives a shorter, and thus milder account, than Matthew; there is here no mention of the oath. Upon the second denial, immediately follows the second crowing of the cock. At the end, he marks, with a short forcible expression, ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιε, the repentance of Peter.

2. And with him were assembled, αὐτῷ.—Of course it is the high priest who is meant. The meaning given by Meyer is quite foreign to the passage: They come, that is, they meet Jesus there all at the same time. The words might, literally taken, bear that explanation; but the thought of their meeting there at the same time must be expressed more accurately; overlooking the fact, that according to Luke several members of the Sanhedrim had joined themselves to the band, and had gone to meet the party. It was only because there was a council at the palace of the high priest that matters happened in this way, although, no doubt, the αὐτῷ which follows immediately must relate to Jesus.

3. At the (hearth) fire, πρὸς τὸ φῶς.—It is an open hearth, which lights and heats the hall at the same time, at which they warm themselves. The designation is employed to explain the circumstance, that Peter was recognised in the light of the fire.

4. And agreed.—Two witnesses at least must agree, Deut. xvii. 6, xix. 15. In the main, the witnesses could not contradict one another.

5. We have heard Him say, I will destroy this temple.—The differences, as respects Matthew, form the smallest difficulty in this passage; the great difficulty is, that, as is remarked, the testimonies do not agree. In the opposition,—made with hands, not made with hands,—we have probably one of the most false declarations. Meyer: From this it is evident that the one witness was not examined in the presence of the other. Let the conduct of the judges in the trial of Susanna be compared with this.

6. Of the Blessed.—The εὐλογητός, or הַבָּרוּךְ, in the absolute sense, is God. Undoubtedly this is a hypocritical expression of reverence in refraining from naming the name of God, wishing as did the high priest to designate Christ's declaration blasphemy of God, of the Blessed. "The Sanctus Benedictus of the Rabbis is well known (Schöttgen ad Rom. 9, 5)." Meyer.

7. His clothes, τοὺς χιτῶνας.—Compare Note 16 on this passage in Matthew. He tore all his clothes, except that which was next his body. Winer: Persons of respectability or travellers sometimes wore two articles of underclothing.

8. And some began.—Meyer: "The members of the Sanhedrim. The servants follow." Rather the temple attendants, who were surrounding the Lord in the hall (see John and Luke): those who afterwards took Jesus into custody, under the designation of servants, are prison-warders, as Matt. v. 25; hence servants in a special sense. Mark presents the whole scene of the mocking, given by Luke, under the one aspect of abuse, which is in this way thrown out into stronger relief; and Matthew gives a similar view.

9. Beneath.—This opposed to the hall of trial, which lay higher.

10. I know not; or, it is unknown to me, not understood.—The double force in οὐκ οἶδα οὐδὲ, κ.τ.λ., is difficult to express. If we translate, I know not, this is too little; I know Him not, that is too much; I recognise not,—then we have a phrase too decidedly unconnected.

11. Into the porch, or, according to Matthew, the entrance-hall. It is the same idea.

12. And a maid.—As soon as she noticed him. On the comparison between Matthew, and Luke, and Mark, consult Note 1.

13. And began to say again.—As the other had begun. The first πάλιν relates to a repetition of the denunciation to the bystanders, the second πάλιν to the second denial of Peter in the same circumstances; the third πάλιν implies that those around had already once laid hands upon Christ, and in this way substantiates the recital of Luke, ver. 58.

14. For thou art a Galilean.—Not, as Jesus is. But among other proofs that thou art one of them, is this, that thou art a Galilean.

15. And Peter called to mind the word.—A similar important thought or self-recollection of Peter is related in ch. xi. 21.

16. And he rushed forth—and wept.—It is extremely difficult to bring clearly out what ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιε imports. For the various explanations, compare Bretschneider's Lexicon, De Wette, Meyer, etc. Many consider it, as the Vulgate, cœpit flere; but this is not grammatically correct. Others, he went out hastily (accordingly, analogous to the phrases in Matthew and Luke); others, he threw a covering over his head; or, he cast his eyes upon the Lord; or, he began to weep; or, according to Ewald, he interrupted with his weeping the sound of the crowing (that is, answering with loud sobbing the crowing of the cock), or he took notice of that sound, bethought himself of the matter. (De Wette: 'Επιβαλών refers to the cock-crow. Meyer.) We find only three interpretations tenable: 1. He flung himself forth, that is, involuntarily he rushed out, meeting the cock-crow as he hurried out, according to the narratives of Matthew and Luke. 2. Referring the phrase to the word of Jesus, he threw himself into it, under the condemnation of this word (took it to heart), and wept. Or, 3. making the cock-crowing to be as it were Christ's waking call; and thereupon he threw himself out of the place (as though Christ had called him) and wept. First a rushing forth, as if he had an external goal to reach, then a bitter sinking down into himself and weeping. The turning-point between the carnal and spiritual mode of viewing the life. He hastened forth at the call; on the outside, he found the call went inwards and upwards, and he stopped and wept.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Peter has not lessened his fault; for from him, through Mark, we are informed that the first crowing did not suffice to recall him to his duty, but a second was needed.

2. In the three words, καὶ ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιε, we have the perfect revolution in Peter's view of the world given to us. As he rushes forth upon the call, as though he sought in his remorse some object exterior to himself, his world-view (his opinion of the world) is still an external one; when he begins to weep, it becomes an inner view. His whole outer world has fallen in ruins; he has no external objects of pursuit more; he has been thrown back into himself, and comes through his inner self to the Lord, who has now become to him a new Christ in the light of the Spirit. Judas could not attain to this change and revolution: he went out—to the associates of his guilt, the chief priests, and they gave him in his despair the final blow. In the case of Peter it was true, "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned."

3. The maid mentioned in this passage, and Herodias, are the only examples of female wickedness, or enmity on the part of woman to what was good, recorded in the Gospels.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See the parallel passages in Matthew.—The true Shepherd betrayed by a faithless disciple at the tribunal of a false world: 1. By the treachery of the false one, He stands as the Faithful One at the bar; 2. by the false judgment, He passes forth as the Faithful.—The false judgment passed by the world upon the Lord: 1. The false judges, who seek false witness against Him; 2. the false witnesses, who contradict one another; 3. the false judgment, which stamps the true praise of God as blasphemy, and represents blasphemy of God to be the judgment of God; 4. the false servants of God, who abuse and make a mock of the prisoner entrusted to their guardianship.—As the sun bursts through mist and clouds, so breaks Christ triumphantly through all the false obscurations of His honour (by false judges, witnesses, judgments, guards).—So does God's truth, work, and reality break through all juggleries, deceits, and timeserving judgments, of sin and lying.—Christ's true testimony and confession is the only star of salvation in the awful night of human destruction and judgment.—Self-contradiction, the everlasting self-judgment of Satan, of sin, and of Christ's foes.—Christ the confessor, and Peter the denier (as Christ was the divinely faithful friend to men, Judas the betrayer, Christ was He who held His ground, the disciples were the runaways).—The great and marvellous spirit-combat: 1. One strove against all, and yet for all; 2. He suffered as a lamb, yet conquered like a lion; 3 He is overcome, and yet He is the victor.—Contrast the great opponents of Christ and the weak opponents of Peter.—The difference between the confession of Christ and Peter's Galilean (Christian) dialect.

—Mark how the chasm which bursts apart between Christ and His disciples unites them for ever: 1. The chasm which opens: Christ, the denied confessor; Peter, the positive denier. 2. Peter, now an actually humbled sinner; Christ, in the fullest sense, now his Saviour and Comforter.—The Lord's great discourse in His deep silence.—Christ's sublime silence at the world's tribunal, a prediction of His sublime speaking at the future judgment of the world.

Starcke, Quesnel: Let the world say what it will, how entirely different are things to the eye of faith, from what they seem to the eye of the world! What is more distinguished than this assembly? There at the same time sanctity, rank, and wisdom appear to collect and unite together; and yet it is nothing but a company of murderers, and a godless assembly (except, indeed, that it possessed a historic right, which was destroyed at Christ's crucifixion).—He who audaciously flings himself into danger, will soon find that he sinks continually deeper, till finally he cannot free himself.—Canstein: It is dangerous to be in the company of the wicked.—Alas! how much injustice is found in law-processes and contentions!—Envy. —Nova Bibl. Tub.: Is it not to be deplored that many strive for the stones of the temple, and pull down and destroy the temple of the living God!—Quesnel: The greatest truths, when ill-understood, are often considered blasphemies, and furnish occasions for rage and tumult, Heb. xii. 3.—Keep silent (before the godless world's accusations).—Reply (to those who exercise authority).—One may mislead many.—As is the shepherd, such are the sheep (applying to the high priest. But this is only partially applicable).—When the higher classes condemn Christ, those beneath them mock Him. This is the effect of evil example. Oh! what an account is to be rendered!—Sufferings generally come in troops.—Petrus: Lies of necessity are not to be excused.—The cock which crows still, when we deny Jesus, is the conscience of each; ah, would that weheard its voice!—Bibl. Würt.: God uses every means to bring men to repentance.

Braune: Death was pronounced upon Christ: in the sight of God, the haters of the divine love had no right so to act, merely the appearance of right before the people.—We never hear that these false witnesses were punished.—The first Epistle of Peter evidences how changed his views regarding suffering and the cross had become. That change of view dates from his repentance.—Brieger: His sitting at the right hand of God they should soon find to be true (the founding of the Church, the Apostles' acts, the destruction of Jerusalem, etc.).—Jesus, although awaiting condemnation and death, subdued Satan in His people.—This we recognise in the repentance of Peter.—Gossner: Before Pentecost, the disciples fled from death; after, they rejoiced in death.—Bauer: A fearful assembly.—On ver. 72. Alas! how lonely, how isolated, does sin leave us in the world!

5. Christ betrayed to the Gentiles, before Pilate at the Tribunal of temporal authority: a. The Examination. Christ and the Accusers. The Confession, the Accusations, and the Lord's Silence. b. The Judge's attempt to deliver. Christ and Barabbas. The Outcry of the Enemy, the Silence of the Lord. The Surrender. The Mocking. (CHAP. XV. 1–15.)

Parallels: Matt. xxvii. 1–26; Luke xxiii. 1–25; John xviii. 1–16.

1 And straightway in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes, and the whole council, and bound Jesus, and carried Him away, and delivered Him to Pilate. 2 And Pilate asked Him, Art Thou the King of the Jews? And He answering, said unto him, Thou sayest it. 3 And the chief priests accused Him of many things; but He answered nothing. 4 And Pilate asked Him again, saying, Answerest Thou nothing? behold how many things they witness against Thee. 5 But Jesus yet answered nothing: so that Pilate marvelled. 6 Now at that feast he released unto them one prisoner, whomsoever they desired. 7 And there was one named Barabbas, which lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him, who had committed murder in the insurrection. 8 And the multitude, crying aloud, began to desire him to do as he had ever done unto them. 9 But Pilate answered them, saying, Will ye that I release unto you the King of the Jews? 10 (For he knew that the chief priests had delivered Him for envy.) 11 But the chief priests moved the people, that he should rather release Barabbas unto them. 12 And Pilate answered and said again unto them, What will ye then that I shall do unto Him whom ye call the King of the Jews? 13 And they cried out again, Crucify Him. 14 Then Pilate said unto them, Why, what evil hath He done? And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify Him. 15 And so Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged Him, to be crucified.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the parallels in Matthew and Luke.—Mark, with Matthew, takes notice of the second formal council-meeting on the morning of the crucifixion: he, like Luke, brings more distinctly into view the circumstance that the whole Sanhedrim led Christ away to Pilate; and along with him omits the end of Judas, recorded by Matthew, the dream of Pilate's wife, the washing of the hands, and the cry—"His blood be on us, and our children." Besides, Mark, along with Matthew, passes over the fact that Jesus was sent to the bar of Herod, which Luke records; the full examination before Pilate, omitted by all the Synoptics, related by John; and, finally, the repeated hesitations of Pilate in condemning. Mark merely notices what John and Luke relate very fully, that many additional serious accusations were raised against Jesus, regarding which He maintained an unbroken silence. He limits himself, like Matthew, particularly to the chief moments in the suffering of Jesus before Pilate: his confession of His Messiahship (King of the Jews), and His being placed side by side with Barabbas. The characterization of Barabbas he gives more accurately, in a manner similar to Luke. He marks the decision of Pilate in a peculiar way, ver. 15. It is worthy of note that he, along with Matthew, represents the scourging and mocking of the Lord in Pilate's prætorium (Luke, on the contrary, relates the putting to shame of Jesus in the palace of Herod) to be part of the crucifixion-agonies; consequently, the second unsuccessful attempt of Pilate to free Him, which the governor, according to John, sought to effect by bringing forth the scourged One to the people, is passed over unnoticed. The assembling of the populace before the prætorium, and the more exact designation of the prætorium, are peculiar to Mark.

2. He released unto them one prisoner.—This was a personal, voluntary custom.

3. In the insurrection.—In which he had been captured. One of the numberless Jewish insurrections; not known more exactly. "Paulus refers to Joseph. Antiq. 18, 4." Meyer.

4. That had gone up.—The stream of the populace comes, namely, back from the palace of Herod, whither Pilate had sent the Lord. Meanwhile the priests have prepared their people, have instigated and instructed them.

5. After he had caused Him to be scourged, that He should be crucified.—John, viewing matters from the psychological standpoint, mentions the scourging among the acts of Pilate, as the final attempt to deliver Jesus; Mark and Matthew, viewing the events from the historical stand-point, judge from this act that all is decided, and they look accordingly upon the scourging as the opening act in the awful tragedy of the crucifixion, παρέδωκε φραγελλώσας. Both are equally correct points of view. The scourging should have moved the people; it only led them to obduracy. And, as the matter issued, the crucifixion had already begun. In relating this circumstance, Matthew emphasizes the fact that the scourging resulted in the yielding up of Christ to the Jews (φραγγελώσας παρέδωκεν); Mark points out that the scourging was the opening scene in the crucifixion, and took place in consequence of the surrender.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare Matthew.

2. Christ before Pilate, beside Barabbas, amid the soldiers: a threefold climax in the world's judgment upon the Judge of the world.

3. Barabbas, the murderer, a representative of the first murderer, the father of lies, as Christ stood there in the name of His Father.—The people's choice between the two. 1. The miscalculated and improper juxtaposition caused by the political party, a self-condemnation of worldly polity; 2. The evil advice of the chief priests, a self-condemnation of the hierarchical guardianship of the people; 3. The horrifying choice, a self-condemnation of the self-destroying populace.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew.—The world assembled to judge the Lord: 1. Jerusalem (the chief council); 2. Rome (Pilate); 3. the whole wide world (the soldiery).—Jesus condemned as Messiah, as the Christ of God. As Christ: 1. Condemned by the chief council, 2. given over to judgment by Pilate, 3. mocked by the soldiery.—The surrender of the prisoner at the paschal festival (probably a Passover-drama to represent the atonement for the first-born of Israel) is here a judgment of completed blindness.—Barabbas is made to represent the first-born of Israel, Christ the first-born of Egypt.—Christ justified upon His trial by the hostile judges: 1. By the judge: he seeks to free Him. 2. By the accusers and the people: their petition for the release of Barabbas reveals the bitterness of their hate. 3. By the soldiers, who adorn Him with the symbols of His patience and His spiritual glory.—The very mockery of truth must witness, even by its caricatures, to the glorious original.

Starcke: When superior judges act unjustly, they accumulate upon their heads much more guilt than the subordinate authorities; for in that case the oppressed have no further appeal.—Quesnel: The assembling of the magistrates is orderly and beautiful; but the more proper their appearance, the more sinful the abuse of their authority in the oppression of the innocent.—Hedinger: When innocence itself must appear and be accused before the judges, is it anything strange that Thou, precious Jesus, art persecuted by the devil, accused, slandered, and condemned?—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Liars' mouths can devise much; enough, if thou art guiltless.—Envy is hateful in every man, especially in ministers of the Gospel, who should content themselves in God.—Quesnel: What envy did here against Christ, the Chief Shepherd, that does it still to His servants, and will not cease till the world's end.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: If the rulers among the people, who should put a stop to evil, themselves instigate and make the people sin, then must Christ be crucified.—Hedinger: In the last day the heathen will put many Christians to shame.—Quesnel: The rank of men and the fear of the world may lead a judge (who is not firmly settled in his love to justice) to many sins.—One single sinful passion makes slaves of men.—Natural honour a weak shield against temptation.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: The King of glory wears a crown of thorns, in order that He may take the curse away from the earth, and gain for us the crown of holiness.—The crowns of princes, likewise, have their thorns. Should they wear these to the honour of the crowned Jesus, then will they aright discharge the duties of their difficult office.—Hypocrites and the godless still insult Christ, though they even bow the knee at His name.

Braune: The deeper He went down in suffering, the less He pleased them.—All that God did to perplex the enemies of Jesus in their acts, was in vain (Peter's tears, the acknowledgment of Judas, the silence of Herod on the chief point, the witness of Pilate, the dream of Procula; the comparison between the insurrectionist and murderer Barabbas, and Jesus in His majesty and tranquil greatness).—Brieger: Pilate gave the Jews nothing, yet condemned the Son of God to death. And thereby fulfilled in two respects the wisdom of God: First, that the Lord should be crucified, and not stoned; second, that Jews and Gentiles should unite in His death.—Bauer: Sad is the scene which here meets our eyes, as it would be if goodness had to protect itself by the votes of the masses.

6. Jesus on Golgotha.—His Death, and the Death-signs. a. The Mockings and the Lord's Silence. b. The Crucifixion, and Blasphemy against, and Silence of, the Lord. c. The World Darkened, the Anguish-cry, and the Silence of Victory, the Death-shriek, and the Death-silence of the Lord. d. The Rent in the Temple-vail, and the Silence of God upon the End of the Old Covenant. (VERS. 16–38.)

Parallels: Matt. xxvii. 27–53; Luke xxiii. 26–46; John xix. 17–30.

A. Vers. 16–19.

16 And the soldiers led Him away into the hall called Prætorium; and they call together the whole band. 17 And they clothed Him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about His head, 18 And began to salute Him, Hail, King of the Jews! 19 And they smote Him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon Him, and, bowing their knees, worshipped Him.

B. Vers. 20–32.

20 And when they had mocked Him, they took off the purple from Him, and put His own clothes on Him, and led Him out to crucify Him. 21 And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear His cross. 22 And they bring Him unto the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull. 23 And they gave Him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but He received it not. 24 And when they had crucified Him, they parted His garments, casting lots upon them, what every man should take. 25 And it was the third hour; and they crucified Him. 26 And the superscription of His accusation was written over, THE KING OF THE JEWS. 27 And with Him they crucify two thieves; the one on His right hand, and the other on His left. 28 And the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And He was numbered with the transgressors. 29 And they that passed by railed on Him, wagging their heads, and saying, Ah, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, 30 Save Thyself, and come down from the cross. 31 Likewise also the chief priests, mocking, said among themselves, with the scribes, He saved others; Himself He cannot save. 32 Let Christ the King of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe. And they that were crucified with Him reviled Him.

C. Vers. 33–37.

33 And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour. 34 And at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me? 35 And some of them that stood by, when they heard it, said, Behold, He calleth Elias. 36 And one ran and filled a spunge full of vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave Him to drink, saying, Let alone; let us see whether Elias will come to take Him down. 37 And Jesus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost.

D. Ver. 38.

38 And the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom.

Ver. 28. This verse is wanting in A.B.C.D.X.; and Griesbach and Tischendorf have decided against it. But it is found in P., in Origen, Eusebius, and the Versions. The verse has probably been omitted, because commentators thought a difference was caused by its insertion between Mark and Luke, as in Luke xxii. 37 the quotation is applied to the apprehension of Jesus. (Lange might have added, as supporting his view, L.Δ. 1. 18. 69. Alford's remark, that Mark rarely quotes from prophecy, however, is deserving of attention.—Trs.)

Ver. 29. The best MSS. read, οἰκοδομῶν τρισὶν ἡμέραις.

Ver. 34. Consult Lachmann and Tischendorf upon this verse.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the parallels in Matthew and Luke.—Mark points out more distinctly the ironical consciousness with which the cowardly Pilate yielded to the demands of the populace. With Matthew, he employs φραγγελώσας παρέδωκε, in which the thought is involved, the surrender was decided in the scourging. In describing the mocking, he omits, like John, the mention of the reed, which the soldiers, according to Matthew, forced into the Lord's hand, or sought to force, and with which they struck Him (probably because He let it fall). Mark designates Simon of Cyrene the most accurately: he is the father of Alexander and Rufus. The address of the Lord to the daughters of Jerusalem, as they were following, which Luke reports, is omitted by Mark, as well as by Matthew. The bitter wine he names myrrh-wine. He makes the crucifixion to begin at the third hour. The citation of Jesus from Isa. liii. 12, which we consider genuine, is given by him alone. The address of Jesus to Mary and to John, beneath the cross, is passed over by him as by the other Synoptics; also the repentance of the thief, in which he agrees with Matthew. He describes more graphically than the other Evangelists, the mockery of the passers-by, using the word οὐὰ for this purpose; the derision and biting irony of the priests is given in their own words. He records in the original Syriac, Eloi, Eloi, etc. Of the man who gave the Lord vinegar to drink, he says puzzlingly, A certain one, and that he called to the others, Let alone. Of the seven sayings of the Crucified, he records, like Matthew, only the Eli, Eli, and the last loud, piercing cry of Christ, without stating what the Lord expressed in it.

2. Within into the inner court.—(Into the hall, E. V.) Compare Matthew, Note 20. They conducted Him into the palace-court, which we may easily suppose was surrounded by the neighbouring buildings of the governor's palace, forming a kind of barracks.

3. A scarlet military mantle (see Matthew, Note 21) was made to represent the purple; hence the designation a purple, a purple robe, as Mark and John describe it. And because this is the symbolic import of the robe, there is no difference. The scarlet military cloak no more required to be a real purple, than the crown of thorns required to be a real crown, or the reed a real sceptre; for the whole transaction was an ironical drama, and such a one, too, that the infamous abuse might be readily perceived through the pretended glorification. The staff must be a reed, the symbol of impotence; the crown must injure and pierce the brow; and so too must the purple present the symbol of miserable, pretended greatness: and this was done by its being an old camp-mantle.

4. And they compelled.—Upon the term ἀγγαρεύειν, compare Matthew (ch. v. 41).

5. The father of Alexander and Rufus.—These men must have been well-known persons in the then existing Church; and they testify to the personal, lively recollection and originality of Mark, as "Timæus, the son of Bartimæus." We are induced to turn first to Christians known to the Church at Rome. On this account, Rufus, whom Paul greets, Rom. xvi. 13, may well be this Rufus. The Alexander, however, who is spoken of in the Acts of the Apostles, ch. xix. 33, appears not to have been a Christian, but to have belonged to the hostile Judaism. (Lange refers here to his work,—Apostol. Zeitalter ii. p. 275 folg., die erste note.) Whether he was the same person as Alexander the coppersmith, who was the enemy of Paul, cannot be positively made out. Meyer: "But how common were these names, and how many of the then well-known Christians are strangers to us. In 'Actis Andreæ et Petri' both are mentioned as the companions of Peter in Rome.'" They are, of course, here brought forth from the treasures of the evangelical tradition.

6. Coming out of the country.—Meyer will have it, that this remark, given likewise by Luke, is a proof that Jesus was not crucified on the first day of the feast. In this view, no attention is paid to the circumstances: 1. That the country, or the country-seat as it might be termed, from which Simon was coming, might have lain within an easy Sabbath-day's journey of Jerusalem (Meyer maintains,—If so, it must have been stated!); 2. that in case the Passover began with Friday, the second day as Sabbath and Passover would be the chief festival-day; 3. that it is by no means historical to admit no contraventions of the Sabbath-law, and that it would exactly lead the multitude to notice Simon, if there was anything remarkable, anything offensive, in his appearing at such a time. Such results are by no means uncommon in the similar circumstances of multitudes running together; so that the notice rather supports the view which adopts the feast-day. Jesus was crucified under the pretext that He was the great Sabbath-breaker. The people, in their witticism, might perhaps say, See, there comes another Sabbath-breaker from the country; let him suffer a little along with the other.

7. Golgotha.—Meyer makes Golgotha genitive (as if, Golgotha's place). Because the translation is κρανίου τόπος. But the question is, Has τόπος in the first case no more common import,—the place (Golgotha)? John retranslates κρανίου τόπος into Hebrew, Golgotha; Matthew also names the place, Golgotha; Luke simply, Skull. No doubt it is strange that Mark has τόπος following Golgotha. Probably the place was called sometimes Skull, and sometimes Place of a Skull, and Mark gives the more exact designation. See Matthew, Note 4.

8. They gave Him; that is, they offered Him myrrh-wine. This myrrh-wine cannot, from the different descriptions of Mark, be identical with the vinegar, or the wine-vinegar, of which a drink was at a later period given to Jesus. Most likely the wine was in each case the same, but the stupefactive intermixture was omitted in the second instance.

9. Parted His raiment.—John gives the more exact description. The prevailing point of view among the first three Evangelists was the making the division an occasion for gambling. Compare Note 8 on Matthew. The form of the play is not more closely described. Meyer: "We must leave unsettled the question, Whether was the lot-casting performed with dice, or were the lots shaken in some vessel (a helmet), and that which fell out decided for him who first seized it?"

10. And it was the third hour.—Upon the apparent difference between this declaration of Mark and Matthew, and the statement of John, ch. xix. 14, compare Matthew, Note 16; also John (p. 381 of the German work). We cannot avoid, however, drawing attention to the striking relation subsisting between the third and the sixth hour. At the third hour, by the crucifixion of Jesus, the endurance of the cross for His people was decided, as it meets us in the superscription, The King of the Jews, and is presented in the crucifixion of the thief (and the later deridings of the chief priests, etc.). But when the sixth hour came, and the darkness spread over the whole land—actually over the whole world and earth—then was the judgment of the whole world decided. The third hour was the dying hour of Judaism: in the sixth hour, the dying hour of the old world was present to the view in typical signs. We have here, also, to make prominent the relation between the superscription, which according to Mark was decided about the third hour, and the declaration of John, It was about the sixth hour: "And he saith to the Jews, Behold your King! But they cried out, Away with Him, away, crucify Him." When the third hour had come, and it was advancing to the sixth, then was the crucifixion of Jesus decided in His being scourged, the judgment of the people and of Pilate; but in this was also the crucifixion of the Jewish people determined, which was first made apparent in the crucifixion of the two thieves in company with Jesus. About the sixth hour, according to John, the judgment of the world was decided along with that of Judaism—the presage of the dies iræ presented itself; that is to say, John has made this sign of the third hour to be the decisive, universal symbol, and has, on this account, probably brought it into connection with the sixth hour.

11. And there were crucified with Him.—As to the alleged difference between the accounts of Mark and Luke, consult Matthew, Note 15.

12. Eloi.—See Matthew, Note 18.

13. Let alone; let us see.—According to Meyer, this is contradictory of the account given by Matthew, xxvii. 49. But it is not to be overlooked, that there is no reason why, in this moment of the intensest excitement, two divisions might not call out to one another, and that, too, in different senses—the one mocking, the other speaking more earnestly. (Compare the scene in Shakespeare's Macbeth after the murder.) If this sympathizer meant it humanely to cry, Let be, perhaps the idea shot through him, that Elias might interpose.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The death.—Jesus is the life-kernel of humanity; and hence the death is here completed in the death of the principle of life, in the death of Jesus. Considered in this light, Christ's death becomes prophetical of the great world-dissolution, to ensue at the end of all things. The extinction of the primary light:[1] Christ condemned, His rights unacknowledged; derided, and by this derision looked upon by the world as destroyed; led forth, robbed, crucified, and in this act rejected in His person, and with His work, as the curse of the world; blasphemed, and so made pronounce sentence of death upon the obdurate; Christ dead upon the cross. Hence have we announced in presages the future extinction of the derivative light[1] (i.e., the death of the world);—the sun of the old world darkens at mid-day; the holy of holies of the divine ordinance in the old human world vanishes like a vision of the night, when the temple-vail rends asunder. All is now over with the old world; it has but to live out its remnant of life. It has judged itself; and in that self-condemnation lay God's condemnation,—a condemnation which nothing but the conquering love of Christ could turn into a blessing.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew; also the preceding reflections.—Christ was, notwithstanding, the King of the Jews the whole crucifixion through. This is seen, 1. in the accusation of His enemies; 2. in the impression produced upon Pilate, and according to his decision; 3. in the kingly ornaments which the soldiers placed upon Him; 4. in the train which bore Him forth with them out of Jerusalem; 5. in the superscription on the cross; 6. in the terror which breaks forth from the blasphemy of His foes; 7. in the miracles accompanying His death.—The great dying on Golgotha: 1. There dieth the King of the Jews; 2. there dieth the Son of God; 3. there dieth the old world; 4. there dieth old sin; 5. there dieth old death.—Simon of Cyrene and his sons; or, the everlasting memorial of the cross-bearers and their children.—Simon; or, how man becomes unconsciously separated from his commonplaceness, and involved in the great history of the cross.—The terrifying world-darkness at bright mid-day forms a symbol of the terrifying world-darkness spread over mankind by their blindness of heart.—Christ the clear light of the world in this night of the world.—His heart and His eye are fixed most earnestly on God during this world-judgment; and that preserves the world, which is lost in itself, from sinking into the abyss. —The unholy and the holy Golgotha: 1. The unholy: men of violence, drunkards, gamblers, thieves, blaspheming priests. 2. The holy: the great Sufferer, the temperate One in holy clearness of soul and knowledge, the Labourer, the Warrior of God, the Supplicant.—The despair in the seeming triumph, and the triumph in the seeming despair: 1. In the conduct and mockery of the enemies; 2. in the supplicatory cry of the Lord: My God, etc.—The signs of hellish madness in the blasphemies with which the chief priests end their work.—Let alone, let us see; or, how, at the life flame of the dying Jesus, a new life has kindled in the dying world: 1. From the horrors of His death springs the horror of the world; 2. from His trust in God, the world's belief; 3. from His pity, the compassion of the world.—Let alone, let us see; or, this history is not yet completed: it is only beginning at the time when it seems to approach its completion.—The death-shriek of the Lord is the great waking call to a new life for the world of man.

[1] Lange's expressions are, der principielle Tod, and, Daher kündigt sich der peripherische Tod der Welt in seinen Vorzeichen an. Now it was thought that a literal translation of the italicized words would be to most unintelligible; hence a metaphor was chosen. But in terming Christ's death "the extinction of the primary light," and the death of the world "the extinction of the derivative light," the translator seeks only to bring out a relation, expressed by Lange in the opposition of der principielle Tod to der peripherische Tod.

Starcke, Quesnel: Christ, by becoming the derision of His creatures, has atoned for the criminality of the creatures in mocking God and religion.—Many would willingly pass by the cross of Christ; but, before they are aware of it, they are laid hold of, and forced into companionship with Christ in suffering.—Participation with Jesus in the cross, is that which alone makes our name in truth eternally renowned, and prevents it from passing into forgetfulness.—At the end, the world is bitter as gall, but heaven is sweet. Hedinger: View, O my soul, in faith this picture of martyrdom! —Christ has been reckoned with the transgressors; hence we may console ourselves, that we shall come to God's blessed companionship, and the company of the holy angels.—The understanding, in its wisdom, is offended at the cross of Christ.—He succeeds ill in the faith, who must see (John xx. 29), and who will believe when He wills (John vi. 29).—Christ died for thee; be thou ready to die for Him.—When the true Lamb of God was offered, all the Levitical offerings found their completion.

Braune: They caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him, Matt. xxi. 39.—God's wrath is heavier to bear than Christ's cross.—Isa. liii. 12.—My God, etc. Let us imitate Him in the employment of the Holy Scriptures; also, that, when in the anguish of our hearts we cannot pray more in our words, we may allow the Spirit, whose work the holy word is, to represent us with groanings that cannot be uttered.

Brieger: And they that passed by. So thoroughly helpless was Jesus upon the cross, that this crowd easily persuaded themselves that all was deception that they had seen and heard of Jesus.—The chief priests. So spake Satan, too, in the wilderness: If Thou be the Son of God, command that these stones, etc. To self-help he there challenged the Holy One of God: here he does the same through his well-approven servants.—Ps. ii. 5.—The darkness. God must witness against these murderers.—In the destruction of the holy of holies, Jehovah destroyed the temple itself. The Most Holy was taken forth from the city of Jerusalem and laid outside the gate upon Golgotha. There, too, was a vail rent, even the flesh of Christ (Heb. x. 20).—Gossner, on ver. 30: Self-help.—One might often free oneself by a mere word. But if the truth and the honour of God suffer by that word, one dare not speak it.—His death was the rising sun for the spirit-world; and therefore the world's natural sunlight veiled itself before Him. (Lampe: The sun set over Christ, and rose for me.)

7. The Descent of Jesus into the Realm of Death. His Death, and the Symbols of the New Life. (VERS. 39–47.)

Parallels: Matt. xxvii. 54–66; Luke xxiii. 39–56; John xix. 31–42.

39 And when the centurion, which stood over against Him, saw that He so cried out, and gave up the ghost, he said, Truly this man was the Son of God. 40 There were also women looking on afar off: among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses, and Salome; 41 (Who also, when He was in Galilee, followed Him, and ministered unto Him;) and many other women which came up with Him unto Jerusalem. 42 And now, when the even was come, (because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath,) 43 Joseph of Arimathea, an honourable counsellor, which alsc waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus. 44 And Pilate marvelled if He were already dead: and, calling unto him the centurion, he asked him whether He had been any while dead. 45 And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joseph. 46 And he bought fine linen, and took Him down, and wrapped Him in the linen, and laid Him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre. 47 And Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of Joses, beheld where He was laid.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew and Luke.—In the account of the centurion's exclamation, Mark harmonizes with Matthew: the occasion he makes, characteristically, to have been the loud cry of the expiring Jesus. The three women beneath he designates, like Matthew; also Salome by name, adding many other women, whom he does not specialize. Still more generally and comprehensively is this sorrowing circle alluded to by Luke. Like the other two Synoptics, Mark is less full in his narration of the burial than John; nevertheless he declares with exactness, as do John and Luke, the day to have been the παρασκευή. Nicodemus is missing here; Joseph of Arimathea is described as the disciple of Jesus in words different from Matthew, and more explicitly than Luke—"who waited for the kingdom of God." In this the Petrine idea of the kingdom is met. That the step of Joseph was a bold one; that Pilate called the centurion, and assured himself of the certainty of Jesus' death: these are features which are peculiar to Mark.

2. Said, Truly this man.—Compare Note 25 upon Matthew. The noticing of the motive of the cry, that He οὕτω κράξας ἐξέπνευσεν, is peculiar to Mark, and is strikingly characteristic of him. The Lion out of Judah is, even in His departing, a dying lion. The expression of a wondrous power of life and spirit in the last sign of life, the triumphant shout in death, was to the warrior, who had learned to know death from a totally different side upon the battlefields, a new revelation. Theophylact: οὕτω δεσποτικῶς ἐξέπνευσε. De Wette, following some others, gives but a weak conception. He saw in the earlier death of Jesus a favour from the gods. As to the monstrously gnostic explanation of the passage given by Baur, consult Meyer.

3. James the Less.—Meyer makes this remark apply solely to the stature. Compare, on the contrary, Judges vi. 15. No doubt it points to James the Second, more than to a James the disciple, in the circle of the disciples more intimate with our Lord, even though James the son of Alpheus, as he is elsewhere termed, were not the brother of James the Greater. Compare Note 11 on Matthew. That this Mary the mother of James the Less and of Joses is identical with Mary the wife of Alpheus, is proved by John xix. 25.

4. And now, when the even was come, because.—We cannot construe this passage, Because it was even, Joseph came. Reasons: 1 The Jews, indeed, who, according to John, prayed Pilate to remove the bodies, had no other ground for the request than that the next day was the Sabbath. Joseph, on the contrary, had quite a differ ent motive. He wished to entomb the Lord's body with respect, and could only employ the circumstance that the Jews themselves wished it removed. 2. The connection of the words, ἐπεὶ ἦν, κ.τ.λ., with ἐλθὼν Ἰωσήφ, κ.τ.λ., would be, notwithstanding all that is said to the contrary, very clumsy; and the correction ἦλθεν, moreover, goes to prove this. 3. Then had Joseph in a legal sense come too late. He must come before the evening. Accordingly, we understand the passage thus: between ὀψία and ὀψία there was a difference (sunsetting, and the disappearing of the last red streak from the sky); upon the evening preceding a feast, the earlier ὀψία was observed. About this time Joseph appeared upon Golgotha, and then he went to Pilate.

5. Was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath.—See Note 12 on Matthew. Meyer says: "Here, accordingly, there is not a trace that that Friday was itself a festival." The trace is given fully, ch. xiv. 12. If the day mentioned there was the 14th Nisan, then the following day must have been the 15th Nisan. Besides, we know that upon a Passover-feast, where the second day of the feast was at the same time a Sabbath, upon this day, according to the Jewish ideas of the Sabbath, the chief feast fell, as is distinctly shown in John xix. 31. See Wieseler, Chron. Synop. p. 386. By the Sabbath occurring upon the second day of the feast, the first feast-day became the preparation, the day before the Sabbath.

6. Came, and went in boldly.—He had come, namely; had seen what occurred as the bones of the crucified were broken; knew that Jesus was about to be taken down; and now he felt there was no time to be lost, and hence he dared to ask.

7. Whether He had been any while (already long) dead, πάλαι.—Before the return of the centurion. He wished to be sure as to what he did.

8. Gave the body.—Joseph being known as a wealthy man, we might have expected, from the character of Pilate, he would have extorted money, because the bodies were frequently sold (see the quotations in Meyer). This generosity was the mark of a strange state of mind. Probably he was glad to hear Jesus was really dead, because the Saviour in His higher nature had grown awful to him.

9. Where He was laid: ποῦ τέθειται.—This is the first time that there appears to have been a relation of confidence and friendship between the old disciples, the women, and the new disciples, Joseph and Nicodemus. In consequence of this new-born confidence and friendship, the Galilean women enter without hesitation the garden of the rich councillor, and kneel down before the grave. According to Mark and Luke, their intention was at the same time to mark accurately the grave; already they were thinking of the anointing after the Sabbath. Bauer: It was not always the custom in Israel to employ a shroud in burying, and the shortness of time on this occasion did not admit of it.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the parallel passages in Matthew.

2. The signs of the new life, which present themselves in the death of Jesus.

3. The Lord's death-cry in expressing the might of His life and spirit, the quickening of the heathen captain. Death is swallowed up in victory, 1 Cor. xv. The death of believers is henceforth a new death, the prospect of a new world, the presentation of a new world for contemplation.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The last word of the Jewish priest, He was a blasphemer, is contradicted by the first word of the heathen soldier, He was the Son of God.—Golgotha becomes changed by the Lord's death: 1. The enemies, mockers, and blasphemers have vanished; 2. the friends, confessors, and worshippers appear.—The exchange of life and death in the dying hour of Christ: 1. While He still lived, all sank in death; 2. when He died, all awoke to a new life.—With Christ's death, the presentiments of His resurrection spring up in the minds of believers.—The miraculous workings of the death of Jesus upon those who come under its influence, so different and yet so uniform: 1. So different: the heathen, Roman warrior, the monument of the Roman Empire shattered to its foundations; the timid Jewish women transformed into heroines; the honourable Jewish councillor, a Christian grave-digger; Pilate, the proud man of the world, himself overcome by the spirit of mildness. 2. So uniform: all agree in the self-forgetful manifestation of their homage, and in an expression of readiness to do or to suffer, evidencing the beginning of a new life.—The soft sleep of the Saviour, and His sacred watchers: two female disciples on Good Friday, two angels on Easter morning.—The little congregation at the grave of Jesus, the germ of all Christian congregations.—All Christian Churches are Churches of the Holy Sepulchre.

Starcke: Christ is also the heathen's Saviour.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Even in the assembly of the wicked, and in a godless council, there may be a pious councillor; therefore beware of impious judgments.

—Quesnel: God knows where to find persons who will carry out His works, how dangerous soever they may be.—What appears to be destroyed, will turn out at the end well. Therefore despair not, dear Christian; believe and trust.—Whosoever hazards anything for the Lord, God will enable that venturer to succeed.—The counsel of the godless never succeeds; that of the righteous standeth sure.—Look more to Christ's glory than to self-interest and personal praise.—It is a beautiful work of love when the rich bury the poor.—Let the grave be as deep and as well-guarded as it may, the omnipotence of God will open it, and bring forth the dead.—Braune: The Head, like the members, was carried to resurrection through the grave.

Brieger: The pious confessors (the first, the penitent thief; the second, the captain) condemn the chief council and all the people, Isa. liii. 9. He should have been buried, like other transgressors, on Golgotha. The heavenly Father had decreed otherwise.—Bauer: From this time forward, God's witnesses for the crucified Jesus come forward into view.

PART FIFTH.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE LORD. THE GREAT VICTORY, AND THE APPEARANCE OF THE VICTOR IN THE COMPANY OF THE APOSTLES, TO BRING TO COMPLETION THE NEW CHURCH. HIS ASCENSION (LAST WITHDRAWAL) TO COMPLETE HIS CONQUEST OF THE WORLD.

FIRST SECTION.

THE RISEN ONE AS CONQUEROR ON BEHALF OF THE CHURCH; OR, THE INTRODUCTION OF THE BELIEF IN THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. THREE EASTER MESSAGES: THE ANGEL, THE WOMAN, THE TWO MEN.

CHAPTER XVI. 1–13. (Parallels: Matt. xxviii. 1–15; Luke xxiv. 1–35; John xx. 1–18.)

1. The Resurrection. The Angelic Message, and the Women. (CHAP. XVI. 1–8.)

1 And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint Him. 2 And very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun. 3 And they said among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? 4 And when they looked, they saw that the stone was rolled away: for it was very great. 5 And, entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. 6 And he saith unto them, Be not affrighted. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified: He is risen; He is not here: behold the place where they laid Him. 7 But go your way, tell His disciples and Peter that He goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see Him, as He said unto you. 8 And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; for they trembled and were amazed: neither said they anything to any man; for they were afraid.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke.—This portion, considered in itself, is manifestly a fragment; for no scripture, especially no Gospel, can conclude with ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ. Upon the critical question, as to the authenticity of the following part, compare the Introduction, Section 3. In this portion we have followed the remarkable division of the Pericope; but we would point out that this part might most properly be united with the following, under the common idea with which we have designated the section. Mark gives the day of the resurrection in such a way as to supplement the other Gospels. The early morning is termed by him the sunrising. He is the most accurate in the account of the women who came to anoint Christ's body, stating their number to be three, and giving their names. He agrees with Luke in saying that the women came for the purpose of embalming the Lord's body. The representation of the moment of the resurrection, and the revelation to the women as they were returning from the grave, of which Matthew gives the details, is omitted by him; and we find here, moreover, but a brief notice of the meeting of the risen Lord with Mary Magdalene. He alone remarks upon the anxiety of the women, as to how the stone was to be rolled from the door of the sepulchre. Only one angel, according to his account, appears to the women; and the same is true of Matthew. This was the first appearance, whereas Luke and John relate a later appearance (see Matthew). In describing the return of the women from the grave, the Evangelists differ the most from one another. Matthew states, "And they departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy, and did run to bring His disciples word." Luke similarly. Mark, on the contrary, "And they said nothing to any man; for they were afraid." The circumstances, however, are different

These women who were afraid, are Mary the mother of James, and Salome, who had gone into the grave after Mary Magdalene had hurried forth on finding the grave empty. The women, however, who departed quickly with great joy to declare what had taken place to the disciples, form a larger group, composed of those who had been the first at the grave with the materials for embalming, and of those who had followed them. (See Matthew.) Mark omits this fact in order to introduce the separation of Mary Magdalene from the other two women. And yet he makes it appear that the first impression produced on the women was a mingling of fear and ἔκστασις.

2. And when the Sabbath was past.—That is, on Saturday evening, after sunset. Luke says, xxiii. 56: After their return (when they came back), they prepared spices and ointments; and rested the Sabbath day, according to the commandment. It is not said, "and thereafter," but, "and of course rested;" so that it is intended as a special explanation of the preceding. We have no contradiction, accordingly, between Luke and Mark, as Meyer would make out. The antecedent embalming, John xix. 39, is not excluded by this. Neither is the fact excluded, that some of the women purchased the spices as early as Friday evening, before sundown; only the two Maries had remained too long at the grave to do so, and hence they could not make their purchases till the Sabbath had passed. (See Lange's Leben Jesu ii. 3, p. 1623.)

3. Spices, ἀρώματα.—"Aromatic herbs to mix with ointment." Meyer. The ἀρώματα are not necessarily dry substances. "The ointments were seldom simplicia (e.g., the nard); mostly, they were composed of various substances (Job xli. 22; Plin. 29, 8),—of olive oil (that much-praised product of Palestine), and various fragrant, especially foreign (Ezek. xxvii. 22), herbal extracts,—namely, oils and resins, such as nard and myrrh. Such ointments were in part very expensive, and particular articles of luxury. Amos vi. 6." Winer.

4. When the sun had begun to rise.—We translate thus strangely, because De Wette (and, following him, again Meyer) maintains, ἀνατείλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου can only mean, when the sun had risen, not, as it was rising. In the words immediately preceding, very early, we are given to see a contradiction of this statement. Between the beginning of the sunrise and its ending is a considerable interval, as between "eve" and "evening;" and according to this distinction has Mark conceived of the matter, as he previously distinguished the two evening seasons. The sunrise had begun, accordingly, oriente sole. Meyer discovers in this passage not only a difference between Mark and John, who indeed says it was still dark, but in a certain measure between the statements of the Evangelist Mark himself (very early, when the sun had risen).—Beza's conjecture, οὐκέτι ἡλίου ἀνατ., is quite unfounded.

5. From the grave—when they looked up—rolled away—it was very great.—These are all accurate statements, which are characteristic of Mark's clear view of things. The stone was lying in the hollow cut deep into the rock, so as to form the door, and must accordingly be rolled forth from this recess outwards; hence "rolled away." The rock-tomb, however, itself lay upon a height; hence the women saw the stone when they looked up. That upward glance, accordingly, does not form a mere contrast to the supposed circumstance, that before this "their eyes were cast down to the ground." And because the stone was very great, they could even from a great distance see it lying. A later remark of Meyer upon the stone points out properly how the sentence, "for it was very great," goes back in its reference to, "Who shall roll us away the stone?" and is opposed to the attempts of Wassenbergh, and to the reading of Cod. D. It is true, moreover, that the words, Who shall, etc., receive a more clear explanation, though quite carelessly, by the concluding sentence of ver. 4.

6. A young man.—The angel is described in these terms, because of his external appearance. Similarly does Luke express himself: "Two men in shining garments." The facts, as they occurred in point of time, must be distinguished in the following way: First, the appearance of one angel in the grave, who revealed himself to the two Maries after Mary Magdalene had hurried forth (Mark); then, two angels who manifested themselves to her upon her return (John). These two appearances of the angels are given most generally by Luke, who unites them in an indistinct way. Finally, we have the appearance of the angels outside the grave upon the stone, which was seen by the larger group of women who assembled in the garden at a later period (Luke xxiv. 1: "And certain with them"). This construction presents itself if we adopt the view that Luke's account is not designed to give an exact description. In the note on Matthew, we thought we must look upon Mark's narrative as wanting in precision; but we now consider Mark to have the greatest claim to originality, although the return of Mary Magdalene is omitted. The second matter to be looked at is, that the Magdalene sees two angels in the grave, then the Lord, while the two Maries wait irresolutely for the other women, or go to meet them. Third point: The assembled women, among whom also Johanna, see first the angel upon the stone (or even two angels, one in the grave); then, as they are returning, the Lord Himself. Accordingly, abandoning the view given in Matthew, we return to the arrangement given in Leben Jesu ii. 3, p. 1663, inasmuch as it involves us in great difficulties if we make the appearance of the angels follow the appearance of the Lord.

8. Be not affrighted.—In the liveliness of the words, we find by asyndeton the copulatives omitted.

9. And Peter.—Especially. Meyer (following De Wette): "Because of his superiority, not because Peter as denier required a mark of forgiveness (as is the common opinion)." But the superiority of Peter had entirely ceased for a space. It must be first, according to John xxi., restored to him. So it is, accordingly, a gracious token to unfortunate Peter.

9. He goeth before you.—Ὅτι introduces a message.

10. As He said unto you.—See ch. xiv. 28. Upon the apparent contradiction between this announcement, that Jesus would precede the disciples, and His appearing unto them so shortly after, consult the commentary on Matthew. The first message applied especially to the Galilean disciples in a body. They had as such seen the Lord in Galilee again. Second, it was in a more special sense a preparation of the disciples for the approaching appearance of the Lord, which was by no means excluded by the message. And thirdly, the return of the disciples to Galilee was delayed, contrary to the wish of the Lord: first, through their own unbelief; secondly, through the unbelief of Thomas. See Leben Jesu ii. 3, pp. 1664–5–6.

11. They trembled and were amazed.—The term εἶχε δὲ is intended without doubt to express the idea, that, even when out of the sepulchre, their former feelings held fast possession of them. These feelings were the opposing sentiments of trembling and ἔκστασις, which latter cannot be possibly conceived of as horror. It is the parallel to the phrase in Matthew, With fear and great joy. The ecstasy indicates always, that one is not master of oneself; and here it indicates such a state of feeling, in opposition to the extreme measure of fear, τρόμος. It is a state of transition from trembling and amazement; and while this play of feeling continues, men find it impossible to act.

12. Neither said they anything to any man.—De Wette maintains that this is contradicted by Matthew and Luke. It certainly does not mean simply, they said nothing to any one by the way (Grotius), nor yet to any man beyond the circle of the Apostles; but, nevertheless, there is no contradiction. The intention of Mark was to lay hold of the fact of their indecision, and to unite it to the two following manifestations of hesitating unbelief. The women did not act upon the message of the angels, the individual disciples did not act upon the women's message, the assembled Apostles did not act upon the message of the men and of the disciples who had been met upon the way to Emmaus. The intention of our history is this, to bring out prominently the barriers unbelief throws up, by which the ever-increasing urgency of the pressing messages is repelled. In the first instance, this little-faith of the two Maries prevented them from fulfilling their mission. The Magdalene met them in this state, and they did not allow themselves to be cheered by her information till they had met the other women (see Luke), and with them had seen the Lord. Now, their message was naturally a new and different one. Meyer distinguishes thus: They related the message at a later period, but it is self-evident that they had not fulfilled it. We distinguish thus: They did not fulfil their original commission, but, at a later period, they related, along with the other women, the earlier and later occurrences in one united narrative.

3. They were afraid.—This can only mean: The occurrence was so new to them, great, unheard-of, that they ventured not in the full confidence of faith to publish it, and that they, still more, did not hope to find any faith among the disciples.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Consult the parallels in Matthew.

2. The entire chapter in its one central idea: Christ risen in perfect certainty and in the might of His resurrection, the destroyer of all unbelief in His faithful, and thereby the destroyer of the kingdom of darkness throughout the world; or, Christ appearing in His triumphal glory, able to redeem to the uttermost by that unlimited power which He acquired through His victory.

3. The three grand divisions of the chapter are—the Risen One as the Conqueror on behalf of the Church, in the Church, with the Church.

4. The contrast in the chapter: The annunciations of the resurrection of the Lord to the Church, by the angels, by the women, by individual disciples, are not sufficient to overcome fully the unbelief of the disciple-circle; the disciple-circle becomes a believing Church only when Jesus Himself reveals Himself personally in their midst. And this is, indeed, the thought underlying this entire Gospel, which is grounded upon the mission of Peter—of the Peter whom man would and will make the head of a new Church, in which the apostolic tradition concerning one Apostle, angel-voices, holy women, and visions to women, should be made to represent Christ Himself.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Upon the whole chapter, consult the superscription and the Doctrinal Reflections.—Upon the Section, vers. 1–16: The Church has not arrived at the full belief in a risen Saviour by even the most glorious messages, but by the personal revelation of the Risen One Himself. —Upon the Section up to ver. 13: The three Easter-missions of Jesus to His Church in their progressive effect: 1. Through the angels to the women, 2. through the women to the amazed disciples, 3. through the two amazed disciples to the assembled company.—Upon the Section before us: The Sabbath is passed away, the Sunday has appeared;[1] or, a new division of the periods of rest and labour has been made by Christ. Man proceeds no more to the holy day from his labour, but from his holy day to his labour. 1. So is it in the life of the glorified Christ: first sitting at the right hand of God, then ruling, then coming again. 2. So is it in the life of the Church: first Sunday, then working-day. 3. So in the life of the believer: first justification, then sanctification. Conclusion: In this form, Christianity is the beginning (the principle) of the glorified world. —Our conversation is in heaven.—The walk of the three women to the grave is a symbol of the separation between the old and the new world in the history of the Passover: 1. The three women with their care [Mary Magdalene in deepest emotion; the others, two mothers of five Apostles, two aunts of Jesus of Nazareth, calmer, quieter]; their unconsciously-entertained hopes of life, and their ointments for the dead corpse. 2. The rising sun, but the heavy stone of their care. 3. The angel appears, but the Lord has disappeared. 4. The resurrection of Christ declared in their retrospect away into the distance out of the mouth of the grave. 5. The delightful commission to proclaim these good tidings; but their souls are oppressed by the overmastering feelings of fear and joy.—And Peter [Peter could never forget this addition, and hence Mark records it].—As the sinner ever thinks of the word, which shows the Saviour thought of him.—The first Easter-message, a message from the Prince of Life given by angelic lips to the women who wished to anoint the dead.—This message is not carried to its destination; but in the contending feelings of the women, between their fear and joy, is left unfulfilled.—Why female disciples, even at the present time, do not come up to that evangelizing faith which the message commands: 1. They are not yet able to give themselves up to that obedience of faith, because the fact overcomes their feelings [could not believe for joy]. 2. They cannot yet give themselves up to the confidence of faith, because their feelings amid the signs of the fact are not yet stilled [they cannot believe for fear; they miss the Lord, whom they have not seen; and they are still afraid of finding among the disciples no faith to receive their great news]. 3. They cannot yet give themselves up to the peace of faith, because these conflicting feelings are contending in their hearts.—As high as Christ is elevated above the angels, so far is the certainty of the resurrection elevated above the testimony of the angelic appearance.—Since Christ died, a new heavenly activity is demanded, which lies far above all the visions of the old economy.

[1] This is in accordance with the German habit of distinguishing the day of rest under the old economy, and the day of rest under the new, by the respective terms—Sabbath and Sunday.—TRANSLATOR.

Starcke, Nova Bibl. Tub.: What does not love do, when it is strong?—Through woman was life lost at first; by women must it be first sought, found, and revealed.—(The stone.) Hindrances in the way of salvation.—Men make to themselves often unnecessary cares: before they look right at them, the Lord has helped them already.—If we look with believing eyes into Christ's grave, all our anxiety falls into it; for Christ's resurrection is our resurrection.—God will comfort the penitent, and will make their anguished hearts joyful again.—Christ's heart is as compassionate after, as before, His resurrection.—God's promises pass certainly into fulfilment, and that too more gloriously and sooner than their mere form would lead one to expect.—Osiander: Untimely fear often hinders from fulfilling one's office.

Braune: No shrine is made of the grave, the contemplation of it no worship; but the women are bidden to bring good news and to awaken faith.—Weak sentimentalism avails nothing in the kingdom of God, which has been established in the earth by the death of Jesus.—Brieger: The resurrection, which is also a birth, is a mystery, like every birth. It is also an act of God's omnipotence, like every other birth.—If we are because of sin related to death, so foreign to our being, much more are we related to life.—Heubner: The morning of the resurrection of Jesus: 1. Distinguished by Heaven itself; 2. gloriously rewarding for Jesus Himself; 3. fearfully condemnatory as regards His foes; 4. joyfully quickening as regards the disciples of Christ.—Dietzsch: The mingling of fear and hope which the thought of death and immortality is wont to awake in us.—Schultz: The first witnesses of Christ's resurrection: 1. They were strong (their love is manifested in their going to the grave); 2. they were weak (their sorrow, their fear).—Thiess: The cross of Calvary illumined by the rays of the Easter-sun.—Rautenberg: Easter at the graves: 1. The stone of the curse is rolled away; 2. angels inhabit them; 3. the dead are risen.

2. Mary Magdalene and the Two Disciples. (VERS. 9–13.)

Parallels: Matt. xxviii. 9–15; Luke xxiv. 9–35; John xx. 11–19.

9 Now, when Jesus was risen early, the first day of the week, He appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom He had cast seven devils. 10 And she went and told them that had been with Him, as they mourned and wept. 11 And they, when they had heard that He was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not. 12 After that He appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country. 13 And they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed they them.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See Matthew and Luke.—According to Meyer, the apocryphal fragment of some other writing begins here. Compare the Introduction on this point, Sect. 3. The epithet, apocryphal, would not be appropriate, even if the section were an addition taken from another Evangelist's narrative. The narrative contained in our Gospel comprehends within its very brief hints the detailed statement of John regarding the Easter-message of Mary Magdalene, and the still more detailed account by Luke of the Easter-message sent by the disciples met on the road to Emmaus. Mark groups both accounts under the single head of two duly-authorized embassies, which do not meet with full credence. The first and second halves of this chapter are, however, united into an inseparable unity in the one fundamental thought, that the risen Saviour is the absolute and universal conqueror of unbelief, which was already, even in the disciple-circle, throwing obstacles in the way of Jesus; and that Christ, as the subduer of this unbelief, stands raised above all the messages of men and angels.

2. Was risen early.—The manifestation of the Risen One by the angels had been preceded by His own personal appearances. The first day of the week is again named, of course, for the purpose of bringing into prominence, even at that early period, the Christian day of rest. We would translate: Upon the first of the seven days (τὸ σάββατον indicating here, as frequently, the week, after the later and more extended custom of the Jewish language). Upon this day He appeared to the Magdalene, out of whom He had driven seven devils. Christ, as the Risen One, has sanctified the week as a holy period; and at the beginning of the holy week, He reveals Himself to one who was pre-eminently sanctified and susceptible, because He had cleansed her from seven demons. The Evangelist has, accordingly, not merely before him the contrast,—the risen Saviour revealing Himself to so poor a woman,—but the spiritual relationship. She who had been freed from seven devils stands especially near to the conqueror of demons on the morning of His great triumph, and she is peculiarly fitted in spirit to be the first to see Him, and to announce to the disciples His resurrection. Accordingly, in this revelation we have the activity of the Saviour in His conquest over devils set over against the passivity of the pardon-seeking woman, who had been freed from the seven devils. Meyer considers this remark concerning Mary to belong in no respect to this passage. We contemplate the expulsion of seven devils in connection with the sacred number seven, and consider the term symbolic of a glorious deliverance out of the great snares which Satan had prepared. (Compare Matthew.) Mark is wont to employ ἐκβαλλειν in other passages to express strongly a glorious redemption. It is questionable whether the words, early on the first day of the week, go back to ἀναστὰς δέ (Beza, Ewald, etc.), or are to be construed with ἐφάνη (Grotius and others). We prefer the first construction, because the second mention of the resurrection having occurred upon the first day of the week appears to point out the sanctification of that period. In verse second, μία σαββάτων had reference to Jewish customs; but here the allusion is to the renewed week, the πρώτη σαββάτον.

2. And they went.—That is, even they. It must be acknowledged that Mark employs πορευεσθαι to express a solemn proclamation of the Gospel only in this place (ver. 12 excepted). By this, however, he reminds us of the mode of expression employed by his teacher, Peter: 1 Pet. iii. 19.

4. Them that had been with Him.—This also is a peculiar expression to indicate the disciples in a wider sense. It indicates, however, their scattered condition, their present despairing state, as opposed to their former blessed communion with Him. The expression itself is not an unusual one with Mark; see ch. i. 36.

5. As they mourned and wept.—Compare Luke vi. 25. This has undoubtedly a special reference to sorrow-oppressed and weeping Peter. To bring prominently out that Jesus revealed Himself to Peter after the message given to Mary, consists not with the matter-of-fact disposition of Mark.

6. And been seen of her, ἐθεάθη.—A strong expression. "That θεᾶσθαι is not found elsewhere in the Gospel by Mark, considering how frequent is its use by others, is one of the marks of a strange hand." Meyer. Hermeneutics might, we think, have taught him: new facts, new words.

7. In another form.—An explanation of the expression in Luke xxiv. 16, but by no means a condensation of Luke xxiv. 13–35, as Meyer would represent. Jesus' form was, on the one hand, changed; different clothes (John xx. 15), traces of the sufferings during the crucifixion: on the other hand, more sublime in its appearance, Jesus being in the transition-state from humiliation to glorification.

8. After that.—The three specifications, πρῶτον, μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα, ὕστερον, relate manifestly to one another. Hence it cannot be at all remarkable that μετὰ ταῦτα is not elsewhere to be found in Mark (comp. ch. xiii. 24).—Of them, of the unbelieving disciples in a wider sense.

9. Neither believed they them.—Even they did not once gain credence. Meyer: "'A different tradition from that given in Luke xxiv. 34." It is certain that no interpolator would have allowed this manifest appearance of a difference. But the Evangelist, who was writing from the stand-point of a special idea of the resurrection, was not afraid to employ it. And Luke gives the means of knowing what is meant. The Eleven knew for a certainty, in the evening, that Christ had appeared to Simon, and were consequently for the moment believing. Now the Emmaus-disciples arrive, and declare that Jesus had revealed Himself unto them. Not being able to comprehend this new mode of being on the part of Christ, that He now is here, now found there, new doubts fill them. The idea of spiritual apparitions occurs to them; and hence they are affrighted when Jesus at length appears in their midst, and imagine that a ghost is present. And now the Lord must convince them as to the truth of His new corporealness. The point brought forward by Mark speaks, accordingly, in proof of an exceedingly accurate, and besides, a perfectly independent, witness of the facts of the resurrection. The expression is, of course, explained by Luke xxiv. 34, without, however, referring to it (Schulthess). And so it is unnecessary to suppose, with Augustine, the λέγοντες were certain believing disciples, to be distinguished from certain who did not believe; or to adopt, with Calvin, At first they doubted, then they believed. The situation of affairs was of such a nature as to lead them into new difficulties on hearing the message of the Emmaus-disciples, instead of being strengthened in their belief. Because as yet they were not in possession of the idea of a glorified body; and hence they thought very naturally, that if the Lord had appeared to Simon in Jerusalem, He could not have at the same time appeared unto others at a distance from the city. Not to speak of this, that several of the Eleven might very reasonably have thought, Why should He reveal Himself to these two at Emmaus earlier than to us at Jerusalem?

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Matthew and the parallels in Luke and John: also the foregoing Note 9.

2. The Easter-embassy of the angel-world to the man-world has been replaced by the message of the resurrection passing from man to man, at first from the female disciples to the male disciples, then the message passing between individual disciples and the disciple-band. The Risen One has destroyed, in His resurrection, the bands and bolts of the grave; He must now destroy, likewise, the doubts, the little faith, the unbelief of His own, in order with them to destroy in like manner the unbelief of the world. The certainty of His life presses gradually forward; but the Church comes only to perfect knowledge when He reveals Himself in her midst.

3. The appearing and disappearing of Jesus in the disciple-circle is a type of His appearance in, and of His disappearance from, the Church.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew, and the parallel passages in Luke and John.—The risen Saviour presents Himself to be recognised by one who stood especially near to the kingdom of heaven, and of the Unseen, because He has freed and cleansed her heart from seven devils.—Mary Magdalene, the much-forgiven sinner, sent as comforter to the weeping Peter, to the sorrow-laden and mourning disciples.—The two Maries, who had remained with Jesus beside His grave, late into the night of His dying day, are to be the first to see Him on His resurrection morn.—The distinction made in the case of the two disciples going into the country: 1. Because they, like Magdalene and Peter, especially required consolation; 2. because they united in going before the Lord as two messengers and witnesses unto the Church.—The risen Saviour brings His own at once together again.—Jesus appearing in another and new form, as the Prince and Pledge of another, new world: 1. In the form of one who had passed through death; 2. with the glorified crucifixion-marks; 3. with signs of the new life (even the Magdalene did not at once recognise Him).—The threefold form of the unbelief which departed not without assistance even from the Church itself: 1. They could not conceive to themselves the mysterious majesty in which Christ caused an angel to represent Him; 2. they cannot conceive to themselves the greatness of the grace, in consequence of which He appears to Mary Magdalene first; 3. they cannot conceive to themselves the might of His exaltation, by reason of which He appears now here, now there.—Neither the angels, nor the woman, nor the two Evangelists, satisfy their faith: they wish to be assured of His actual existence by His own appearance.—Not having yielded themselves to the belief in His prediction, they find it difficult to believe in its fulfilment.

Starcke: As the woman was the first to sin, so hath Christ, after finishing salvation, chosen to reveal Himself to a woman first.—The most despised in the opinion of the world are often the most precious in the eyes of God.—Quesnel: God delights in blessing those who have remained faithful to Him in persecution, and have not been ashamed of the cross.—Christ imparts His grace according to the need for it, not according to state, Matt. v. 4.—Jesus ever, even upon our journeyings, with us.

Braune: The intelligence brought by Mary and the women concerning the resurrection of the Saviour is believed neither lightly nor superstitiously; and hence we see their belief and their witness is the more firmly based, and the more trustworthy.

SECOND SECTION.

THE RISEN LORD AS VICTORIOUS IN THE CHURCH, DESTROYING UNBELIEF, PERFECTING FAITH, AND PREPARING THE CHURCH TO GO FORTH WITH THE GOSPEL MESSAGE.

CHAPTER XVI. 14–18. (Parallels: Matt. xxviii. 9–20; Luke xxiv. 36–49; John xx. 19–21, 25.)

14 Afterward He appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen Him after He was risen. 15 And He said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. 16 He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. 17 And these signs shall follow them that believe: In My name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; 18 They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.

Ver. 14. C.D. add δέ to ὕστερον.

" " Ἐκ νεκρῶν, supported by A.C.X.Δ. 1. 33.

Ver. 17. The omission of καιναῖς by C.L.Δ. is not decisive against it.

Ver. 18. Codd. C.L.M.X.Δ., the Coptic, Armenian, and Syriac versions, read before ὄφεις, καὶ ἐν ταῖς χερσίν. But it is probably a mere explanatory addition.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. See the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke.—The section before us is another of those peculiar passages which are so characteristic of Mark. The object sought in it is to show the full persuasion of the Apostles of the truth of the resurrection,—the complete subjugation of their hard-heartedness, so often brought out by the Evangelist (ch. vi. 52, viii. 17), and of their unbelief. This is with him the decisive point; and hence he unites all further information to the revelation made by Christ in the midst of the disciples upon the evening of the first day after the resurrection. In giving the account contained in ver. 14, he agrees with Luke and John. But while Luke brings prominently forward the pains Jesus was at to free His disciples from all fear, through convincing proofs of His bodily presence, Mark gives prominence to the fact, that Christ blamed their unbelief; the completion of the disciples' training, of their deliverance from hard-heartedness, and to the fact of their being brought at last to a full belief. Luke's account is not, however, wanting in the points which go to corroborate the Lord's reprimand, vers. 38, 44, and especially ver. 45. John relates this revelation of Jesus from the other side,—from the side of the solemn perfecting of the disciples' faith. Mark then brings forward in this connection, ver. 15, the apostolic commission, which Matthew makes to have been issued on the mountain in Galilee. As to this point, we have only to remark, that he unites the actual, anticipatory re-installation of the Apostles upon the first Easter evening, of which we are informed by Luke and John, with the sending forth of the Apostles from Galilee, and gives to the whole the solemn expression of the latter commission. In doing this, he selects a stronger term than Matthew, "Preach the Gospel to every creature;" this is the phrase corresponding to "Make all nations to be disciples." He is the only one, which agrees with his energetic character, who gives the alternative, "He who believeth and is baptized," etc.; and he combines in the brief expression, "and is baptized," both the words, "make disciples of," and the baptismal formula contained in Matthew. Very strong and peculiar to him is the promise given by the Lord; and it is a grand thought, that He gives it to the Apostles for all who believe, vers. 17 and 18. It is the full, the last unfolding of the charisma, which the Lord (according to ch. iii. 15; Matt. x.) has lent to the Apostles, the wonderful presentation to them of the proclamation of the forgiveness of sins, the institution of absolution recorded by Luke and John, and also the declaration of the promise of Jesus given by Matthew, "Lo, I am with you alway."

2. Afterward.—By ὕστερον we are not certainly to understand, lastly; still it marks here the later, the personal revelations of Christ in the circle of the disciples, which succeeded the former isolated manifestations of Jesus, and which decided the matter. The confusions, which Meyer discovers in the account now following, rest upon critical prejudices, and the inaccuracies (the absence of exact accounts) of the Evangelist, which last are to be met with also in the last chapter of Luke.

3. And upbraided their unbelief.—Upbraiding, the original form which Christ's contest took against the little faith, the doubting, and the weak yielding to the influences of the evil one. (See Leben Jesu ii. 1, p. 295.) And these are the causes of Christ's last upbraiding among His disciples.

4. Their hardness of heart.—Compare ch. viii. 17.

5. And He said unto them.—Thus Mark, exactly as Luke xxiv. 45, passes over to a general conclusion.

6. Preach the Gospel to every creature; πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει, the entire creation.—We find no reason to limit, with De Wette, this phrase to the conception, "all men" ["really all creatures, that is, all men, as also the Jews use בְּרִיוֹת:" Lightfoot, Wetstein]. Comp. Rom. viii. 21. Because the miraculous gifts of the Christians, here mentioned, point to a glorification of all nature through the Gospel. See Isa. xi. Still less is the phrase to be restricted, with Lightfoot and others, to the heathen, who were contemptuously termed by the Rabbins הבריות; for, as Meyer remarks, that is in opposition to vers. 16 and 20.

7. He that believeth.—Expressed from the stand-point of Christ, as He who was one day to return in the capacity of the world's Saviour and Judge, for the purpose of giving the due recompense. Baptism is not named along with faith as an additional, in itself indispensable, matter, but as the natural, certainly also necessary, consequence of faith; because baptism indicates the entering of the believer into the communion of the believing Church. There is no occasion for the distinction made by Meyer between the newly converted and the children of Christians, because the antithesis runs, ὁ δὲ ἀπιστήσας; and it is not self-evident that baptism was not dispensed to such children. It is manifest that Jesus, according to Mark, has made the damnation depend upon a positive, personal disbelief, or rejection of the Gospel. But the Gospel is to be proclaimed to every creature, without exception. In this we have a connection opened between this passage and the passages 1 Pet. iii. 19, iv. 6.

8. Signs.—Σημεῖα is first brought forward, the term indicating that miracles of all kinds should accompany them, should make their testimony trustworthy; but these signs Christ will specify.

9. That believe (that have believed).—That is, who have become believers, have adopted the faith. This promise holds good of not merely the Apostles and the Seventy (Kuinoel), but also all Christians, without exception. Meyer: "Finally, Jesus does not mean that each of these signs should manifest itself with each believer, but this miracle with one, that with another." In the entire Christendom, however, all; and without referring to their original, miraculous form, they were always to be, according to the character of the miracle, more glorious and potent in their action,—the powers which are occasioning changes in the world.

10. Follow; παρακολουθήσει.—Literally, to follow accompanying, to proceed along with. See the expression, Luke i. 3.

11. In My name.—The miraculous power by which they were to effect all the succeeding wonders. To the demon expulsion corresponds speaking new tongues, and the lifting up of serpents to the drinking of anything deadly; finally, to the laying of hands upon the sick, their recovery. The first division indicates negatively the overthrow and expulsion of ethical evil (the casting out of devils); positively, the new form taken by the ethical world in the life of believers (speaking with new tongues). The second division indicates negatively the destruction of what was physically injurious, and its transformation into what was beneficial for the world (to hold serpents on high); positively, the overcoming of all that was physically injurious, through the strengthening of the life of Christians. The third division (laying hands upon the sick) indicates negatively the removal of all ethico-physical sufferings from others; positively (they shall recover), the return of the perfect, natural feeling of health to those who believe. These six members represent a proclamation, by means of facts, of that Gospel which is designed for every creature, or better, for the whole creation.

12. Cast out devils.—Employed in the most extensive sense, and with the deepest meaning. Purification of the new, divine world from all evil spirits.

13. Speak with new tongues.—This statement is to be restricted neither to the form under which "the speaking with tongues" evidenced itself at Pentecost, nor to the more general form of the Corinthian gift of tongues, nor yet to the general form "of speaking with tongues" obtaining commonly among the new converts of the apostolic era (Acts x. 46, xix. 6). For the statement of Christ applies to Christians generally, and to all time. The germ of this promise, of speaking with new tongues, lies in the instructions to the Apostles, ch. xiii. 11; compare Matt. x. The new form, which the spirit-world takes under the word of the Spirit, is here revealed accordingly by means of a symbolic expression; and we have an indication of the miraculous development of that world when the apostolic gift of tongues appeared. Meyer declares that there is a reference in this passage to the Apostles speaking with tongues under the influence of ecstasy (a state as entirely different from the Montanist conception as the free, ethical inspiration is from pathological somnambulism); that tradition has explained this "speaking," with reference to what occurred at Pentecost, as speaking in foreign tongues,—the truth being that Mark, influenced by traditions, conceived of the matter in a mythical way, and went far beyond Luke's idea. But, holding such opinions, Meyer is on the fair road to a mythological explanation of the passage, and only obscures a statement which demands to be received as a most sublime expression, symbolical in character, but in meaning most fully accordant with the Bible.

14. Take up serpents.—By αἴρειν may be understood destroy, drive forth (Luther), or exterminate (Theophylact). This explanation would give a good sense, and might find support from some other passages of the Scriptures (Luke x. 19): nevertheless, to express such an idea, no such peculiar expression would have been selected; and moreover the conception we obtain thus is too trifling, for Hercules had already proved himself able to exterminate serpents. The word may, however, have another meaning: heave into the air (and so mediately destroy the reptiles), as Paul acted with a serpent (Acts xxviii. 5). But to express this idea, the term before us is not sufficiently clear. Or it may signify, to draw forth by means of some potent conjuration; an idea that savours too much of heathenish magic arts. Or, finally, it may mean, to set up on a pole, as a token of victory. Commentators have hitherto passed over unnoticed this signification of αἴρειν, to lift up, or elevate as a σημεῖον or signal upon some pole or staff, and yet it is a force properly belonging to the verb; and it leads our thoughts back to the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness as a symbol of victory. The expression ἱστάναι ἐπὶ σημείον, Num. xxi. 9, is of the same import as αἴρειν, for which John employs (ch. iii. 14) ὑψοῦν for a particular reason. The special reference of that brazen serpent was to Christ, who was elevated upon the cross in the character of a heretic and transgressor, rejected by the old world, and so formed a type of the arch-enemy, and yet was made by God Saviour of, and means of life to, all that looked up to Him. Still, the more general reference was this, that the deadly and horrible serpent was not only overcome, but that its image was made to be a standard of victory. And this is accordingly a type which has been fulfilled to the fullest extent in Christianity: serpents are not simply overcome, destroyed; they are lifted up on high as ensigns of victory, with healing efficacy. What was in itself injurious has been serviceable to the interests of God's kingdom, as we find represented in the Gothic cathedrals. And this occurs not merely in a typical manner, but with actual serpents,—of course according to their symbolic signification. The fact that Christ only represented a serpent (that is, represented a deceiver and destroyer of the people dying on the cross, by whom the world was delivered from ruin), does not prevent our adopting the more general explanation, according to which actual serpents, the signs of death in the world, are changed into signs of life. Meyer, in his remarks on this passage, far surpasses De Wette, when the latter says, "If Mark had before his mind the serpent-charmers so common in the East (Mich. Mos. Recht, § 255), the account is apocryphal." Meyer puts this view aside with the one hand, and with the other takes it back again, with many additions. This conversion of the symbolism of the Bible into obscure, mythical allusions is now altogether antiquated.

15. And if they drink any deadly thing.—This expresses symbolically the subjective restoration of life to such a degree as to be actually inviolable. De Wette thinks that the apocryphal story of John having, without injury, drunk a poisoned cup, and the similar story regarding Barnabas, related by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 39, gave origin to this passage. Meyer has good reasons for opposing this view; but he is somewhat inconsistent, since he considers this section to be an apocryphal addition. It is better remarked,—The custom of condemning a criminal to drink a cup of poison suggested the idea. And why should this custom not have occurred to Christ? yea, why may He not have thought of the condemnation of Socrates, and then have declared, "The poisoned cup shall not harm My people;" primarily, of course, in a symbolic sense (just as the cup of hemlock hurt not the soul of Socrates)? But also in a typical sense the life of believers should grow more and more able to overcome all injurious influences, and often literally overcome these influences in a miraculous manner. The passage Matt. xx. 23 is the most general, the passage Matt. xxvi. 39 the most special, Christological, conception of the similar thought in a symbolic form.

16. Sick.—Miraculous cures. Also symbolical expression of the removal of sickness.

17. They shall recover.—We consider, guided by the two preceding parallels, this last sentence to refer to believers themselves. They are, on their side, to enjoy perfect health.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare the parallel passages in Matthew, in Luke, and John.

2. By the first appearance of Jesus in the full assembly of the disciples, on the first evening after the resurrection, the certainty of His having risen is decided for the Church, and so mediately for the world. This first revelation of the risen Christ stands opposed to the last rising of the unbelief of the disciples. They have sinned, in respect to His resurrection, through unbelief; and hence His appearing is accompanied by shame-causing upbraiding of their want of faith. The last remnant of unbelief is now actually driven forth by rebukes with this departing unbelief, the hard-heartedness disappears, the spiritual life of the disciples becomes free and active; they can now yield themselves up to the perfect revelation of His glory, and all succeeding revelations of that glory, with full confidence, and with an ever-growing soul-life. This upbraiding of the unbelief, which passes over into a blessing, marks the perfected triumph of the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and so gives the concluding thought of Mark, through whose entire Gospel the contest of Christ against the unbelief and hardness of heart of His disciples is found running as the fundamental thought. Least of all could the Gospel by Mark conclude, as a Gospel of fear, with the little faith of the disciples. In the belief, however, of Christ's absolute glory through His victory, the spiritual glory of the Church is also declared. According to the Gospel of Peter, the Church of Christ must go on from one degree of faith to another, till it attains unto perfection. It cannot, like the Romish phantom of Peter, remain amazed for ever upon the first step of faith; it must advance with the almighty administration of Christ, must grow and work in the fulness of spiritual life, till the Gospel be preached to every creature.

3. The Gospel to every creature.—Out of the demon-polluted, the enslaved, the fear-of-death-ruled world, shall arise a Gospel-filled, freed, glorified world of faith, of peace, of life. The glorification of the world through the Gospel is an idea and a promise which runs through the whole of Holy Writ (Deut. xxviii.; Song of Sol.; Isa. xi., ch. lxv. 17; Rom. viii.; Rev. ii. 1): and Christ here makes this promise to take the form of an institution. What His resurrection is in fact,—a proclamation of the Gospel to every creature: that the apostolic preaching is in the world to make known to the world, bring about, and seal by the sacraments. And every true, living, earnest preaching of the word is consequently a proclamation of that Gospel, the aim of which is to free all creatures from their subjection to vanity, a power conducing to that regeneration which the great palingenesis is to bring about, and which shall appear along with the world's end. This thought of the great regeneration of the world rests altogether upon views peculiar to Peter: Acts ii. 20, iii. 20, 21; 2 Pet. i. 4, ch. iii. 13.

4. He that believeth.—With the Gospel, accordingly, begins the great crisis, the separation, which appears to view at the end of the world. See John iii. 19, 36. Belief and unbelief form the grand distinction in the new history of the world; and they are operating to bring to its completion the separation of the eternal, divine world from the territory of death and of the devils' torment; and they will continue to act thus until judgment begins. That the believer, as such, is at once baptized, that is, enters under the sacramental seal of his faith into the communion of the believing Church, is a self-evident presupposition; therefore, whoso believeth and is baptized. The promise of salvation, of deliverance, is not annexed to baptism in itself, but to the faith which receives its completion in baptism. Hence, on the other hand, want of baptism is not followed by damnation, but the want of faith, which may undoubtedly evidence itself in contempt of baptism.

5. Upon the doctrine of baptism, consult the Systems.

6. The accompanying miracles.—The new birth of creation is completed in three stages: 1. The personal stage, preaching the Gospel; 2. the social stage, the sacrament; 3. the cosmical stage, the cures, as they enter into the natural life, and lead it on to its transformation, by working on the one hand to purify, on the other to free. Compare the preceding observations on the single miracles. Heubner: "Promise of miraculous powers. How far does it extend? Many commentators maintain, it extends to all time, and in a very wide sense; e.g., Grotius. He says, we are to blame that the χαρίσματα have ceased (so also Lavater, Hess). But have, then, the later Christians,—e.g., from the third century down, the most spiritual of the Christian Fathers, the Reformers,—had no faith, because they wrought no miracles? Augustine says: The miraculous gifts continued so long as they were needed, until firm ground was laid for the Church to rest upon; they could be dispensed with, when the Church became firmly established (Conf. de civ. dei x. 7)." According to Mark, however, this promise is given in as universal a form as the sending of the Gospel into all lands, for all times. The later period was wanting in the defined conception of the organism of the metamorphosis; were it not so, it had seen that the miraculous signs continue, though the forms are not the same,—least of all, do the forms at the beginning correspond with those to obtain at the last end.

7. The festival of the Ascension.—It was from the first, undoubtedly, celebrated within the great Quinquagesima period, between Easter and Pentecost. After the fourth century, it arose as a special festival, and was celebrated when the fifty days began to end.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew, and the parallel passages in Luke and John.—Our section. Not until after the personal appearance, and presence of Christ in the Church, did the belief of the Church in the resurrection become perfect: 1. The personal revelation as opposed to the earlier, preparatory revelations; 2. the belief in the resurrection as opposed to those degrees of faith, at which the hardness of heart remained stationary.—With the personal announcement of Christ in the Church comes the Spirit and spiritual life, in which all hardness of heart ceases.—The last upbraiding of Christ in the circle of His disciples changes into a blessing.—Lo, the Lion of the tribe of Judah hath prevailed!—The last death-cry of the Lord upon the cross, and His first life-word in the Church, in their great and ceaseless efficacy.—The Easter-period, the great turning-point at which the Church of the disciples became the Church of the Apostles.—The Lord's upbraiding in the Church; or, the seven thunders which from time to time resound in her (Rev. x.): voices of reformers, which affright the demons, and predict new summer-seasons.—The expulsion of unbelief from the hearts of the disciples is succeeded by their being sent into all the world.—The Gospel of faith: 1. From the faith; 2. in the faith; 3. for the faith.—The Gospel in its unbounded appointment: 1. To the end of the world—all creatures; 2. to the end of time—blessed or damned; 3. appointed to work till all imperfection in the kingdom of God is ended [the miracles].—The Gospel in its threefold attestation: 1. By itself; 2. by the sacrament; 3. by miracles.—The miracles which accompany the Gospel: 1. In the world of spirit: a. the evil spirits expelled; b. the good spirits praise the Lord [new tongues]. 2. In the external world of nature: injurious things overcome, the evil in life made serviceable, life triumphing over death. 3. In the personal life, as soul and body: diseases removed, the restored rejoicing in a new existence.—Christianity remains a continuous miracle of curing and of life till the new, great signs of the world's glorification.—The Lesson for Ascension Sunday, vers. 14–20. See the following section.—The ascended and glorified Christ, revealing His perfect victory over the world's unbelief: 1. In the Church [ver. 14, 15]; 2. by the Church [vers. 16–18]; 3. above and along with the Church [vers. 19, 20].—The exaltation of Christ, how it was unfolded in the resurrection and ascension of the Lord: 1. The resurrection, the beginning of His ascension; 2. His ascension, the completion of His resurrection.—The last retreat of the Lord into concealment, the ground of His victorious advance into and progress through the entire world: 1. He retires from view, in order to advance again into the light as the risen Lord; 2. He retires to heaven, in order to advance again as He who had been raised to the glory of heaven.—Preaching faith is an upbraiding of unbelief to the end of the world.—The upbraiding of unbelief in the Church and the world, the sweetest message of highest love and grace.—The Lord's glorious upbraiding: 1. Glorious in the storm and the thunder-peal; 2. glorious in the law; 3. still more glorious in the Gospel. Or, 1. Fearful only to devils, opposed only to them; 2. to all susceptible, pious hearts a greeting of peace.—Who soever cannot rebuke in the spirit of Christ, can expel no demons.

Starcke, Bibl. Würt.: We must willingly and pleasantly receive even the denunciatory statements of God's word. They proceed from the purest love, to effect our salvation.—Luther: The words of Christ are words of majesty; for that may well be termed majesty, by virtue of which these poor beggars are commanded to go forth and preach this new truth, not in one city or country, but in all the world, principality, and kingdom, and to open their mouths freely and confidently before all creatures, that all that were of the human race might hear this preaching. That was most assuredly stretching the arm far out, grasping on all sides, and lading itself with a great burden. That is a command so strong and powerful, that no injunction of earth has surpassed it.—Those alone can preach repentance who have repented, and are truly humble.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Lo, Jesus has instituted the ministerial office for the benefit of all the world. The portals of grace stand open to all: oh! let us enter, and not delay!—Osiander: God wishes to exclude none from eternal blessedness, if no one excludes himself through unbelief.—Faith is enjoined upon all, but given only to those who do not obstinately oppose themselves.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Mark well, my soul, how blessed thou mayest be, and escape damnation! One way alone leads to heaven, faith; one way alone to hell, unbelief.—Unbelief is the sole ground of damnation.

Gerlach: Although no man can be saved except through Christ, nevertheless Christ declares him alone damned who has refused the salvation offered to him.—All wonders which accompany the proclamation of the divine word are signs: they point to that internal wonder of salvation and the new birth which the word effects, and only in so far have they value.—Lisco: He who is ashamed of such a confession of Christ [baptism] should think of Matt. x. 32, 33. —In the name of Jesus, in faith upon Him, qualified by His might, for the furtherance of His ends, were these signs to be wrought.

Braune: From Rieger: "Wonder not, when even in thine own case faith is a constant overcoming of unbelief."—Brieger: The command of Christ given to the Church, which came into prominence at Pentecost.—The Gospel is for all.—The state of a Church may be seen in what it does for missions. [But how about the Church at the Reformation? So we see that a growing, rising Church may be doing but little for missions; and that, on the other hand, a slumbering, dying Church may be doing much for missions. The question is, how does the Church stand affected to the cause of missions?]—Since the signs which accompanied belief had ceased (never!), the ascension of the Son of God can be found to be true only from that which manifests itself as the life of faith [and that is the sign of the regeneration of the world; a sign, no doubt, manifesting itself ever under new forms, while the divine power remains ever the same].

The Lesson. Heubner (in addition to Luther's explanation, Works ix. 2546–2747): Unbelief is blameworthy, is dependent upon the heart, upon being willing or not willing. Were it otherwise, Christ could not rebuke.—The world is the theatre for the display of the Gospel.—Christianity is a matter for humanity.—It is a duty continually to spread the Gospel.—We must profess the faith we have in our hearts (baptism).—Faith is necessary for all without exception, would they be saved. And Christ is preached to every one in his time, even in the other world. To disbelieve is very different from not knowing the Gospel (unbelief and ignorance are two essentially distinct ideas): unbelief is rejecting an offered, an understood Gospel, which has to some degree influenced one. Unbelief is chargeable, when it is a positive, determined rejection. The heathen cannot be charged with (personal) unbelief.—The revelation of the glory of Jesus in the moment of His parting from His disciples.—The departure of Jesus from the earth: 1. Description; 2. how edifying for us.—The power of faith in the heavenly majesty of Jesus.

Schleiermacher (Predigten, Bd. ii., 1834, p. 204): The close of our Lord's appearance upon earth compared with its beginning.—Grüneisen (Pred. 1842, p. 280): Upon the blessing of the exalted Redeemer.—Heidenreich: The ascension of the Lord, contemplated from the stand-point of faith.—Illgen: How heaven appears to us in the light of Christ's ascension: 1. As our eternal fatherland; 2. as the land of our spiritual perfection; 3. as the place of our highest blessedness.—Von Kalm: Let the entrance of Jesus into glory strengthen during the period of probation: let it strengthen, 1. our faith in heaven; 2. our longing for heaven; 3. our striving to attain heaven.—Uhle: What Christ in His exaltation is to men upon the earth.—Rambach: If we look into the hearts of the disciples of Jesus upon His exaltation to heaven, we see the deepest reverence for His divine majesty, living faith in His promises, heart-longings after the better world, joyous zeal to fulfil His commission, courage undaunted by consequences.—Reinhard: The connection between true Christians and the Church above.—Rambach: Seek the things above.—The ascension of Jesus in its power to elevate the heart.—Reinhard: Our unbroken communion with the perfected of our race.—Kummich: Our Lord's ascension shows us the way to heaven.—Hossbuch: Our Lord's ascension is the real completion of His work on earth.—Herberger: The ascension, the last miracle; with it the Lord closed His visible sojourn on earth: a blessed termination of Christ's entire journey, as St Bernard says. —Kapff: The ascension of Jesus shows us heaven now standing open.—Dietz: Jesus' ascension contemplated as the entrance upon government by Jesus as the King of God's earthly kingdom.—Harless: The Gospel being preached to every creature, is the best testimony of Christ being raised to the right hand of God.—Bengel: With the ascension, the kingdom begins to extend on all sides.—Genzen: The Lord ever continues to bless His Church.—Ahlfeld: The last expression of the will of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Kem: Not till His ascension did He become properly our Saviour (i.e., the most remote distance becomes the most immediate contiguity).—Florey: The disciples' pain and consolation in the departure of the Lord.—Burk: Consider how Jesus, by His ascension, has opened all that formerly was closed: 1. The human heart to faith; 2. the whole earth to the Gospel; 3. heaven for all to enter who believe on Him.

THIRD SECTION.

THE RISEN SAVIOUR IN HIS ASCENSION, AS CONQUEROR WITH THE CHURCH, GIVING POWER TO THE MESSAGE OF SALVATION THROUGHOUT THE ENTIRE EARTH.

CHAPTER XVI. 19, 20. (Parallels :

19 So then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. 20 And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen.

Ver. 19. After κύριος stands 'Ιησοῦς in Codd. D.K.L.Δ. Lachmann adopts this reading. (Lange renders thus,—The Lord Jesus, after He had spoken thus unto them, was raised, etc.—Trans.)

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the parallels in Luke and the Acts; also the comments upon the conclusion of Matthew.—Mark's account of the ascension possesses a noble simplicity; and so conveys to the mind a comprehensive idea of Christ's majesty and rule, which consists most fully with the character of this Gospel. The ascension, described accurately by Luke, is here briefly sketched: the exaltation of Christ in the words, "and sat on the right hand of God," which implies, besides, the supreme rule of Christ, related by Matthew; while the last verse is analogous to the end of the Gospel by John, and expresses in a word the essence of all contained in the Acts.

2. The Lord Jesus.—Term of reverence.

3. After He had spoken.—Augustine and the majority of commentators understand this to refer to the forty days; but Meyer will not concede that. According to him, this account and the lapse of forty days are quite irreconcilable. It is the chronological statements, in which the trustworthiness of the Gospels is handled, which are not to be reconciled with our narrative.

4. He was received up. (Raised.)—Taken up. Meyer denies the representation given by Strauss and Bauer, that Christ ascended to heaven from the room where they had supped. Properly, if we must not interpret this passage literally regarding the place, Meyer has as little right to insist upon a literal view as to the time. The account of the ascension is in every point to be supplemented by that of Luke, with whom Mark stands in no contradiction.

5. And sat on the right hand of God.—An account, resting partly upon vision (Acts i. 19), partly upon a revelation (Acts i. 11), partly upon the words of Christ (John xiv. 3), and upon the lively inference of faith, especially upon the circumstances occurring at Pentecost, Acts ii. 33. The fact is itself, on the one hand, local—that is, the being seated upon that throne of glory where the self-revelations of God take place, and in the midst of that majesty whence the manifestations of His power proceed; and, upon the other hand, is symbolic of Christ's royal dominion, Phil. ii. 6.

6. Everywhere.—As it is probable the Evangelist wrote in Rome, and had been in Babylon, he knew that the Gospel was extending over the earth.

7. The Lord with them.—See Matt., close; Eph. i. 19.

8. With signs following.—The previously-promised powers to work these signs have been conferred: the miracles have appeared in striking forms, and conveying their symbolic import in their more general working. We see here the Gospel's absolute power to conquer in the might of the Lord. From this we perceive how close the connection between the closing of this Gospel and its beginning, and its every statement. Each Evangelist concludes in a manner peculiar to himself, but with each the common topic is the glory and the kingly rule of Christ. The view peculiar to Mark is the forthputting of Christ's power by His servants on earth, to free the world and remove all demoniacal powers by which the earth was polluted.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the conclusion of Matthew and the parallels in Luke.—We find the explanation of the circumstance, that Mark has not taken up the ascension in his Gospel narrative, in the fundamental principle of his Gospel,—Christ, the omnipotent conqueror, bursting through all barriers, the Lion in His retreat and advance. By this principle he was led to mention the last retirement of Christ, the ascension; but then, only as the basis for the last forthcoming of Christ in His people, in their preaching of the Gospel and their working of signs in all places. Matthew presents Christ as a spiritual, invisible, theocratic King, beneath whose jurisdiction the present and the future worlds both lie, whose administration over His people is in this present scene universal, and of a specially spiritual character. By John, the universality and the present manifestation of Christ's glory are still more strongly emphasized. The typal form of this administration of Jesus is to be seen in the activity of a John and a Peter; or in contemplation and profound meditation, combined with earnest labour and constancy in faith. By Christ Himself it is only hinted that He goes and comes again. According to Mark and Luke, Christ is with equal distinctness characterized as King of both worlds; but He works individually and personally from the other world outwards: and hence both these Evangelists present the ascension as a link, connecting Christ's life on earth with His work in and from heaven. In addition to this, however, Mark, like Peter, makes the rule of the exalted Christ in and with His people prevail, because it is a work of the exalted Jesus which success will certainly crown; while Luke, with Paul, makes this prevalence result from the exalted state of the working Jesus.

2. When we estimate the resurrection properly, and consider that it was not the return of Jesus to His old, His first life, but His exaltation to His second, His new life, we see at once that the ascension must be joined to the resurrection as its necessary consequence. Christ's last departure from His disciples must have therefore, in any case, been termed His ascension; nevertheless, it consisted with His glory, that His return home should be an imposing and sublime ascension.

3. The doubts of critical writers as to the history of the ascension rest upon a mistake, often alluded to, regarding the nature of the Gospels, which are held to be memorabilia collected from various sources, instead of being received as individual, graphic life-pictures and views of the world, organic in form, and Christological in character. The doubts of writers upon dogmatics are to be connected with their doubts regarding the resurrection itself, the divine dignity of Christ, the eternal continuance of personality, and the reality of a future state in heaven. In each of these two points the Apostles agree, as witnesses of the ascension, in their testimony with one another.

4. The theologians of the Lutheran school have thrown as much obscurity around the historical ascension, as those of the Reformed school around Christ's descent into hell. The Reformed Church has gone too far in its teaching regarding the glorified Christ's spiritual, omnipresent working; and the Lutheran, in its views upon the distinct localization and extension of Christ, now exalted. (Luther upon the Supper.) But the descent into hell and ascent to heaven must not be separated; and the localization of the exalted Redeemer in heaven must be held, along with His omnipresent manifestation. "That He reveals Himself in one way only in heaven amid the blessed, and that He in some other sense is omnipresent, are not contradictory propositions." Spener, Katechismus Predigten, 2 Bd. p. 914.)

5. When we represent the ascension as the triumph of Christ and His Church, let us not forget the sad, earnest side for the Church in her human weakness. But as death is swallowed up in victory, so human sorrow is swallowed up in divine joy.

6. For the accounts given in Church history, and for the various traditions regarding the apostolic labours in preaching the Gospel, see Lange's Apost. Zeitalter, 2 Bd. p. 401.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Matthew and Luke.—Christ's exaltation the great turning-point in His life and work.—The exaltation of Christ to heaven, a sign of the completion of His work on earth (After that the Lord, etc.).—The union of the Father and the Son seen in the ascension: as He had been sent, and yet came freely,—as He had finished the work given Him by the Father, and unfolded His own secret life, was given up to the death, and resigned His life,—as He was raised from the dead, and rose by His own power,—so is He exalted by the Father, and yet ascends by virtue of His own might.—The degrees of Christ's exaltation shadowed forth in the ascension: 1. It points back to His descent into hell, and His resurrection; 2. it points forward to His being seated upon the throne of glory at the right hand of God.—Christ's ascension: 1. A return home; 2. an exaltation; 3. a never-ending march of triumph.—The import of Christ's exaltation for His people. It settles, 1. the ascension of the members along with Him, the Head; 2. that the members shall ascend in the spirit; 3. that the members shall be brought home at the coming of the Lord.—Christ's seat at the right hand of God, the goal of His pilgrimage; or, the Star of the perfected world, from whom the entire glorification of the world proceeds; or, 1. In His localization: a heavenly where and how; 2. in His spiritual unboundedness at the right hand of the omnipresent Omnipotence: a heavenly everywhere, and supremacy over everything.—Because He is the highest above all heavens, He is the nearest to His people in all their depths: In their depths, a. of strugglings, b. of sufferings, c. of want, d. of death, e. in the depth of the grave.—The Lord's rest causes the motion of Apostles, and of the members of Christ's body.—From the tranquil, rejoicing, divinely-human heart above, proceeds every pulsation of the new life throughout the entire world.—All Christ's Apostles are Apostles of His royal authority.—The blessed consciousness of Christ's glory, the motive power of the Gospel in the hearts of believers.—The preaching of Christ is a preaching for all places. —Human proclamation of salvation confirmed by the divine manifestations from the Lord.—The truth of the faith established by the signs of love.—The Lord was one with them in the power of the Spirit.—The ever blessing, causing, victory-attended efficacy of the Gospel, a witness for Christ's everlasting administration of blessing and conquest.—Christ above all; Christ here, too, in His people.—Lo, the Lion of the tribe of Judah hath prevailed!—Our faith is the victory which overcometh the world.—Christ's seat, His throne: 1. The unceasing rest and festival in heaven; 2. unceasing work on earth; 3. unceasing rule in both kingdoms.—At the right hand of God, working in concert with Him (or, the revelation of the Trinity in Christ's exaltation, as at His birth and baptism, in His death and resurrection).—Where the exalted Christ appears, there doth heaven appear: 1. Where He is throned, there is heaven; 2. where He works, thither heaven comes (the spiritual, glorified world; the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, that fadeth not away, 1 Pet. i. 4; 2 Pet. i. 4, 11).—We are with Christ transferred to the heavenly state.

Starcke: Let each see that he hold his confidential interview with Jesus, ere he leave the earth.—God is gone up with a shout, Ps. xlvii. 6.—The ascension of our Jesus is our after-ascension. Where is the Head, there are the members. "Where I am, there shall My servants be, that they may see My glory."—The heavens stand open: we are certain of our salvation. Even so come, Lord Jesus! —The presence of Christ in the earth has not ceased with His ascension; it is rather established, being united to His session at the right hand of God.—Hedinger: Be faithful and industrious in thy calling; God will add His blessing and success.—If believers are not able to see Christ with their eyes, yet they feel His working in their hearts (proof sufficient that He is with and in them).—Osiander: Jesus is to the present day with the preachers of the Gospel.—When the spiritually blind are enlightened, the spiritually dead quickened, the spiritually deaf and dumb made to hear devoutly and speak piously, the spiritually lame made to be righteously industrious and active, and the spiritually leprous are cleansed from sins, these are greater signs and wonders than physical changes.

Lisco: He wished to depart from them in such a way that they, seeing whither He had gone, could not imagine that they had lost

Him: rather should the thought that He lived and was in heaven be ever present to them, that they might testify courageously of Him, and labour for Him, as though they had Him by their side.—They should know Christ no more after the flesh (2 Cor. v. 16), but as the exalted Son of God, whose glorious elevation filled them with the most blessed hopes and opened to them the most blessed prospects.—Braune: A close of the activity of the visible, personal Redeemer, which corresponds perfectly with the beginning. Not more mysterious than the birth and resurrection of the Saviour is His ascension.—Christ, having conquered death, could not die, and so ascended to heaven.—Brieger: Ps. lxviii. 19; Eph. iv. 8: Christ, to manifest His victory over the devil and his angels, returns as a conqueror to heaven, Col. iii. 1, 2; Heb. viii. 1.—We are the subjects of the heavenly (the second Adam), who is transforming us more and more into His likeness.—Bauer: Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of His glory.

MURRAY AND GIBB, PRINTERS, EDINBURGH.

CLARK'S

FOREIGN

THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY

THIRD SERIES.

VOL. XVII.

Oosterzee on the Gospel of St Luke.

VOL. II.

EDINBURGH:
T. & T. CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET.
LONDON: J. GLADDING; JACKSON, WALFORD, AND HODDER.
DUBLIN: JOHN ROBERTSON AND CO

MDCCCLXVII.

THEOLOGICAL AND HOMILETICAL COMMENTARY

ON THE GOSPEL OF ST LUKE.

SPECIALLY DESIGNED AND ADAPTED FOR THE USE OF MINISTERS AND STUDENTS.

FROM THE GERMAN OF

J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE, D.D.

EDITED BY
J. P. LANGE, D.D.,
PROFESSOR OF DIVINITY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF BONN.

TRANSLATED BY SOPHIA TAYLOR.

VOLUME II.

EDINBURGH:
T. & T. CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET.
LONDON: HAMILTON, ADAMS, AND CO. DUBLIN: JOHN ROBERTSON AND CO

MDCCCLXVII.

MURRAY AND GIBB, PRINTERS, EDINBURGH.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST LUKE.

E. The Son of Man dealing with the Sin of some, and the Misery of others. (Chap. xiii. 1–17.)

1 There were present at that season some that told Him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. 2 And Jesus answering, said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? 3 I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. 4 Or those eighteen upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? 5 I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. 6 He spake also this parable; A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. 7 Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? 8 And he answering, said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it: 9 And if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down. 10 And He was teaching in one of the synagogues on the Sabbath. 11 And, behold, there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself. 12 And when Jesus saw her, He called her to Him, and said unto her, Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity. 13 And He laid His hands on her; and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God. 14 And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation, because that Jesus had healed on the Sabbath-day, and said unto the people, There are six days in which men ought to work: in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the Sabbath-day. 15 The Lord then answered him, and said, Thou hypocrite, doth not each one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? 16 And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath-day? 17 And when He had said these things, all His adversaries were ashamed: and all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by Him.

Ver. 11. ἦν is omitted by Lachmann and Tischendorf, after D.L.X.

Ver. 15. There is overwhelming authority, both external and internal, for the plural ὑποκριταί. The singular of the Receptus has been caused by the transcribers' regard to the preceding αὐτῷ. The Lord, however, addresses, in the person of the ruler of the synagogue, the whole race of hypocrites.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. At that season.—According to Luke, this report reached our Lord, while He was in Galilee, when He had (chs. xi., xii.) just repelled the attacks of His enemies, and warned the people against the leaven of the Pharisees. Probably there were, among the hearers of the discourse He had just delivered, some individuals whom this sad news respecting certain Galileans had just reached, and who now hastened to communicate it to Jesus, in order to hear His opinion concerning it. In all probability, this deed of cruelty had but just been perpetrated, and had excited general indignation.

2. Of the Galileans, etc.—Many particulars concurred to enhance the atrocity of this deed. Pilate, the Governor of Judea, had unlawfully seized the subjects of Herod. Pilate, the heathen, had not even reverenced the sanctity of the Holy Place, but had shed human blood in the temple. Indignation seems to resound in the very form of the expressions in Luke.—Whose blood Pilate had mingled. A tragically graphic representation, justifying the supposition that these unfortunate victims had been suddenly surprised and slain by the Roman soldiers. The occasion of this deed is uncertain; nor is there any reason for supposing (with Euthym. Zigab., Theophyl., Grotius, and others) that they were the followers of Judas Gaulonitis. It is certain, however, that the Galileans of those days were much given to sedition (Joseph. Ant. Jud. 17, 9, 3), and that insurrections not unfrequently occurred, even at the feasts, at Jerusalem; while Pilate was not a man to omit the execution of a punishment he believed necessary, out of reverence to the sanctity of the place. When we remember the cruelties which the Romans afterwards perpetrated upon the Jews, the slaughter of these Galileans seems but a drop in the midst of an ocean; and we need not be surprised to find that this fact, though universally known (τῶν Γαλιλ.) in the days of our Lord, is recorded only by Luke. We have an indirect proof of its credibility in the subsequent enmity of Pilate and Herod, ch. xxiii. 12, which may perhaps have arisen from this unlawful proceeding. It does not appear that this communication was made to the Lord in any inimical spirit; and since Luke, besides, gives us no hint with respect to the time when, or the festival at which, it occurred, we can draw no chronological conclusion from this isolated historical fact.

3. Suppose ye, etc.—It is highly probable that they who communicated this report to the Lord were infected with the general error which would interpret so sudden a death, in the midst of so holy an employment, as an undoubted proof of the special wrath of God against those who were thus slain. Perhaps they were thinking of what the Lord had just said (ch. xii. 47, 48) concerning the exact retribution of punishment which would be meted out in another world, and wished to call His attention to the connection between sin and punishment even in this life. At all events, the Lord felt it necessary to contradict the erroneous notion, that the judgment which had fallen upon them marked these Galileans as greater sinners than others (ἐγένοντο, declarative). He by no means denied the connection between natural and moral evil, but opposed the infallibility of the conclusion, that every individual visitation is a retribution of individual transgression; and did not concede to the witnesses of a judgment the right of pronouncing upon the moral depravity of those, whose calamities surpass the calamities of others. This saying of Jesus is abused by those who conceive Him to say, that these Galileans were not ἁμαρτωλοί, but rather martyrs.

4. I tell you, Nay.—"Dominus hoc profert ex thesauris sapientiæ divinæ." Bengel. The Lord knows and refutes the error of so many, who, when they hear of public calamities, are much more ready to look without than within; while He gives, on the contrary, a serious hint, that the fate of individuals should rather be used as a mirror by all.—Unless ye repent, etc. This saying is the more striking if we accept the notion, that this mysterious occurrence was related to the Lord for the purpose of exciting a fear, that a similar fate might perhaps await Himself and His followers. Nay, says He, it was not He, but themselves, who needed to fear an approaching judgment of God. In the eyes of Jesus, all Galilee was ripe for future judgment; and, to show that Judea was in no respect better, He adduces a similar example, vers. 4, 5.

5. Likewise perish.—The reading ὡσαύτως (Tischendorf) seems preferable to the weaker ὁμοίως (Lachmann). The Lord does not intend to say that they shall perish in a similar, but in the same manner, viz., by the cruelty of the Romans, whose vocation it was to avenge, in a fearful manner, the crime of their rejection of the Messiah. What streams of blood were afterwards shed in that same temple, and how many were, at the same time, buried under the ruins and towers of the city and temple!

6. Those eighteen.—The Lord again refers to a similar occurrence, which was still fresh in the memory of all. From some cause, unknown to us, one of the towers, standing not far from the pool of Siloam, had fallen, and buried eighteen persons beneath its ruins. There is no proof that it was one of the towers of the city walls (Meyer). The rule and application are the same as in the preceding instance, with this difference only, that the Lord is not now contemplating the fate merely of unrepentant individuals, but also that of the whole Jewish nation; and seeing, in spirit, not the fall of a single tower only, but that of the city and temple. The question which might perhaps have been retorted: To what circumstance, then, were so many, who were as great sinners as those eighteen, indebted for their preservation hitherto from a similar fate? is answered by the Lord in the parable of the unfruitful fig-tree.

7. Siloam.—Comp. John ix. 7. Probably the same water mentioned, Nehem. iii. 15,—a pool in the neighbourhood of the Water Gate, outside Jerusalem, in the valley of Cedron, dug perhaps by David, or some of his successors (comp. Isa. viii. 6), and in whose neighbourhood was a village or town of the same name. It probably received this name (Sent), because the water by which it was supplied was artificially sent into it from the rocks. Though Josephus frequently mentions Siloam, archæologists are not agreed concerning the spot where this pool must be sought. The principal views are given in Winer, on this passage. On the inquiry, whether Siloam and Gihon are identical, see Hamelsveld, Bibl. Geogr. ii. p. 187. Nothing more is known of the πύργος ἐν τῷ Σιλ. The view of Stier, that these eighteen victims were prisoners confined in the tower, which would give more colour to the notion, that the judgment of God had overtaken them, is as incapable of proof as the idea of Sepp, that they were labourers, among whom also was the bricklayer, said by Jerome to have been healed by the Lord. See above, on Luke vi. 6.

8. A fig-tree—in his vineyard.—Though the mention of a fig-tree in a vineyard sounds somewhat strangely, yet this was by no means unsuitable, nor in opposition to the precept, Deut. xx. 9, which speaks indeed of seeds, but not of trees. If the fig-tree be considered a symbol of Israel (Hosea ix. 10; Matt. xxi. 19), the vineyard must denote the world, in which this nation, presenting characteristics quite peculiar to itself, was planted. "Ficus arbor, cui per se nil loci est in vinea. Liberrime Israelem sumsit Deus." Bengel.

9. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard.—If God be the Lord of the vineyard, the dresser can be none other than Christ. This view is at least preferable to the arbitrary view of Stier, that by the dresser is meant (as in Matt. xxi. 33) the rulers and leaders of Israel, collectivo sensu. It is by no means certain that the "Behold, I come," is to be applied to Christ only. The Father Himself is represented as coming, because, since the day of the new covenant has dawned, He has a right to demand special fruit from Israel. It is very certain, indeed, that all that is said of this fig-tree is applicable to individuals, and that every one having the cure of souls may here see his own image; but it is as evident, from the connection, that the Lord uttered this parable with primary reference to the Jewish state, and that the representation of Himself, under the image of the dresser of the vineyard, corresponds with the care He had so long exercised over this fig-tree, as well as with His character as an intercessor for the guilty.

10. These three years I come.—These three years denote neither the past period of Christ's public ministry in Israel (Bengel), nor the whole pre-Christian era (Grotius), nor, least of all, the τρεῖς πολιτείας of the Prophet, Priest, and King (Euthym. Zigab.); but a short, definite delay, here limited to three years, because a tree generally brought forth fruit within that period after planting. If, however, it be thought proper to define Israel's day of grace as extending over a definite period, it might be reckoned from the public appearing of John the Baptist—about half a year before the commencement of our Lord's public ministry—till the present moment, making together but little less than three years. Israel, however, had not profited by this day of grace. The fig-tree not only bore no fruit, but also, by exhausting the soil and overshadowing the ground, deprived other plants of the warmth and nourishment they might otherwise have obtained (καταργεῖ. See Meyer on this passage).

11. This year also.—A short, but still a sufficient delay, is yet granted to the fig-tree for bringing forth fruit.—Dig about it, and dung it. A hint of the continued and increased care and pains wherewith the Lord, during the last weeks and days of His life, met the increased hatred of His enemies. To intercession He now unites persevering effort; and not till this shall prove vain, will He cease to intercede for the fruitless fig-tree. Yet He does not say that He will Himself cut it down; but, that He will no longer restrain the Master of the vineyard, nor make request for a tree which shows itself incapable of improvement. He considers it possible that fruit may appear in the fourth year, though none had been produced during the three preceding; but is convinced that, if not, the fig-tree must be removed from the vineyard.

12. And He was teaching.—The narrative of the cure of this deformed woman is peculiar to Luke. The time of this miracle is not stated; but the insolence with which the ruler of the synagogue expresses his opposition to Jesus, gives us reason to suppose that this occurrence belongs to the last period of the Lord's public ministry. Its insertion, in this connection, may serve as a proof how the Lord, in accordance with His own words, continued, in spite of increasing opposition, to dig about and dung the fruitless fig-tree. For the rest, this Sabbath-miracle much resembles many others before related: the reason, perhaps, why both Matthew and Mark omit it. This omission proves nothing against the credibility of the fact, except with such as would deny, a priori, the possibility or propriety of such miracles.

13. Πνεῦμα ἀσθενείας.—It is obvious that Luke here intends some kind of possession. She was tormented by a πνεῦμα who caused ἀσθένεια. Her nervous power was so impaired, that she could not lift herself up. "Ex nervorum contractione incurvum erat corpus." Calvin. The Lord unexpectedly calls her to Him, with the words, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity;" and thus first works psychically upon her, in order to render her susceptible of the cure He is about to bestow. Then He lays His hands upon her, and the usual result follows.

14. The ruler of the synagogue.—Indignation at the supposed breach of the Sabbath, struggles in this man with a sort of fear, excited by the miracle he has just witnessed. What he dares not say to the Lord Himself, he says the more loudly to the people, so that Jesus shall hear it. It appears from ver. 17, that there were other ἀντικείμενοι besides, in the synagogue; an internal evidence in favour of the reading ὑποκριταί, ver. 15.

15. The Lord, cum emphasi.—The Son of man now speaks as Lord of the Sabbath, and uses the same figurative language as on former similar occasions. Observe, however, the difference between the argumentum ad hominem employed here, and in ch. xiv. 5 (comp. Matt. xii. 11, 12). Lightfoot and Wetstein prove that the leading of beasts to watering was allowed on the Sabbath. How, then, was it possible to denounce that as a crime, when performed for a human being, which was regarded as a desirable act of kindness to the brutes?

16. Being a daughter of Abraham.—Not merely a general contrast between a human being and a brute, and still less a narrow national reason why this individual should excite interest; but an emphatic recognition of the spiritual relation existing between Abraham and this his daughter: comp. ch. xix. 9. It is evident that we are justified in considering this woman a daughter of Abraham in a spiritual sense, from the fact, that the Lord makes no inquiry concerning her faith; having, without doubt, already read it, in her heart. Her ascription of glory to God, immediately after the miracle, testifies to the piety of her heart; while the saying, "Thy sins are forgiven thee," is not used on this occasion. When, then, such a daughter of Abraham was bound by Satan, the Lord could not omit depriving him of his prey.

17. Whom Satan, etc.—The Lord could not have declared more plainly, than by this otherwise superfluous expression, that He attributed the demoniacal state of this sufferer to directly satanic influence. Since possession can never be merely corporeal, we may consider that, together with the spirit of despondency and infirmity, a spark of faith had been preserved and developed in this woman.

18. And all the people, etc.—Comp. ch. v. 26, ix. 43. The words of the Lord struck their consciences, as His deed had their feelings. The sight of this miracle renews their remembrance of earlier ones, while the continuity (γενομένοις) of this healing agency disposes their hearts and tongues to glorify God. These sounds of praise, evoked to the glory of the Father, were a proof to the Son that His stay in Galilee at this time had not been entirely in vain, and an escort, so to speak, on His way to the feast of the Dedication (John x.), to which He was now about to proceed.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. These verses (1–9) show us the Lord in the presence of human sin, and (vers. 10–17) of human misery; and, in both instances, in all the brightness of His love and holiness. Thus much, in justification of the title we have chosen for this section.

2. The Lord, on the one hand, declares Himself to be opposed to the levity of those who entirely overlook the connection between natural and moral evil; on the other, to the narrowness of those who look upon individual unhappiness, and individual punishment, as synonymous. The true aspect in which national misfortunes should be viewed, viz., as calls to repentance, is here pointed out.

3. The parable of the fruitless fig-tree contains not only a short sketch of the history of Israel, but also of God's gracious way of dealing with every sinner. There is, to every one living under the light of the Gospel, sooner or later a καιρὸς τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, Luke xix. 44, which, if unimproved, ripens him for the judgment of God. But the Mediator of the new covenant is also his Intercessor, as long as recovery is possible. Far, however, from the long-suffering of God being any ground for expecting lasting impunity, it is rather a pledge that its rejection will be fearfully requited. Hence, we find here also, an intimation of final judgment followed by no further probation.

4. While this parable sets before us an image of the people of Israel, it affords us, at the same time, a glance at the holy mind of the Mediator; for it was owing to His intercession that the Jewish nation still existed. The prolongation of their day of grace had been the subject also of His solitary evening prayers. Certainly, if the spirit of the Baptist seems to echo in the words, "Cut it down" (Matt. iii. 10), the pity of the Son of man, "who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save," is heard in the prayer, "Lord, let it alone this year also."

5. Parallels to the parable of the fruitless fig-tree are found Isa. v. 1–7; Hosea ix. 10; Jer. xxiv. 3; Ps. lxxx. 9–15; Mark ix. 12–14. On the Sabbath-miracles of the Lord, see the remarks on Luke vi. 1–11.

6. The sufferings of the woman in the synagogue are a faithful picture of the misery into which Satan plunges the soul of man; her recovery, a picture of its redemption. The reality of this miracle is indirectly testified by the ruler of the synagogue, who, though mean enough to blame the woman for allowing herself to be healed, has not sufficient effrontery to deny that a sudden cure has taken place.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Jesus, 1. in the presence of human sin, vers. 1–9: a. He punishes sin with inexorable severity, vers. 1–5; b. He would save the sinner with inexhaustible patience;—2. in the presence of human suffering, vers. 10–17: a. wherever Jesus comes, He finds misery; b. wherever Jesus finds misery, He brings relief.—Many find pleasure in being the first narrators of evil tidings.—The Lord often answers us far otherwise than we expected and wished.—Unexpected death.—All who are visited with heavy and deserved misfortunes are sinners; but not, therefore, greater sinners than others.—What happens to others should be a warning to ourselves, 1 Cor. x. 11.—The riches of the forbearance and long-suffering of God, Rom. ii. 4.—The parable of the fruitless fig-tree, an image of God's dealings with sinners: 1. The active care; 2. the just search; 3. the sad result; 4. the just judgment; 5. the entreating intercessor; 6. the last respite.—The goodness and severity of God, Rom. xi. 22.—In the counsels of God, there are days which may outweigh whole years, and years which may outweigh whole centuries.—The acceptable year of the Lord.—All God's gracious dealings have this end, that we may bring forth fruit.—He who brings forth no fruit, does harm to others.—The Lord is slow to anger, but great in power, Nahum i. 3.—The right celebration of the Sabbath determined by the Lord's example, vers. 10–17: 1. pointed out, 2. justified.—The house of God, the best resort for sufferers.—No suffering so lingering that the Lord cannot send relief.—The Lord understands even inarticulate sighs.—The terrible power of Satan over both body and soul.—He whom the Son looses, ought to praise the Father.—Even the most glorious displays of love are lost upon him whose heart is at enmity with God.—Hypocrisy and cowardice are, not seldom, inwardly united.—Even when the Lord is but indirectly accused, He never fails to find an answer.—Hypocrisy condemned before the tribunal of human reason, conscience, and feeling.—All the adversaries of Jesus will be ashamed.—How the Lord conquers His enemies: 1. by the deeds, 2. by the words of His love.—Jesus bursts the bonds of Satan.—The confounding power of truth.—The glory of God, the fruit of the work of redemption.

Starcke: Always something new; seldom anything good.—The open enemies of God are often the instruments of His judgments upon those who are, in other respects, regarded as His people.—Canstein: In no place, and under no circumstances, are men secure from misfortune.—Cramer: Faithful preachers should apply all that they hear to the edification and amendment of the flock.—The judgments of God are incomprehensible; it therefore becomes us to lay our hands on our mouths, and to admire them with holy humility.—We should seek for fruit in our own lives, before God comes to seek it.—Public and private intercessions prevail with God, when seriously offered.—When the day of grace is past, Christ intercedes no more.—The sinner is cut down when God gives him up to judicial hardness.—Cramer: It is needful and salutary to meet with examples of lingering affliction, Rom. v. 3–5.—Jesus looks upon those who are bowed down, lowly, and humble, that He may lift them up.—Assemblies for public worship have a promised blessing; let none forsake them.—There have ever been fanatics, both in churches and schools, who harm rather than profit the cause of God.—Quesnel: Religion has often been made the pretence for covetousness and envy; let us beware of this sin.—Love and necessity break all laws.—Canstein: Nothing better becomes the Lord's day than doing the Lord's work, viz., destroying the works of Satan.—The value of souls redeemed by Christ can never be sufficiently inculcated and insisted on.—Though faithful pastors and teachers have to pass through the valley of sorrow, they yet gain victory upon victory.

Heubner: The purposes of God in special judgments.—God sends presages before heavy storms.—The false comfort derived from the misfortunes of others.—To perish in the ruin of a city is a trifle, compared to the misery of perishing in the future destruction of the world.—God also numbers our years.—The wicked always do harm to the good, in this world.—Envy towards what is good often assumes the appearance of piety.—Without Christ, the spirit is bowed down and cannot praise God.

The Parable.—Arndt: The greatness and duration of the divine forbearance.—Zimmermann: How the long-suffering of God leads the sinner to repentance.—Lisco: How the justice of God has been manifested in Christ.—The whole parable is well calculated for a New Year's sermon.

The Miracle.—Pichler (Wilhelmsdorf, Samml. p. 544): The Lord Jesus, such a Saviour as we need: 1. To preserve us in manifold dangers; 2. to reveal to us the state of our hearts; 3. to advance us in the life of faith and humility.

Palmer: Wherever the Lord comes, He encounters sin and misery.—Schmidt: Opposition against the Lord: a. How it arises; b. how it is quenched (by truth and grace).—Lisco: The true sanctification of the Sabbath.

F. The Nature, the Way, the Conflict of the Kingdom of God. (Chap. xiii. 18–35.)

1. Parables. (Vers. 18–21.)

18 Then said He, Unto what is the kingdom of God like? And whereunto shall I resemble it? 19 It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took, and cast into his garden; and it grew, and waxed a great tree; and the fowls of the air lodged in the branches of it. 20 And again He said, Whereunto shall

I liken the kingdom of God? 21 It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened

Ver. 20. The καί of the Receptus, expunged by Scholz and Tischendorf, but defended by Meyer, seems to us very doubtful.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Compare the notes on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.—The manner in which Luke connects these two parables with the passage preceding them is so slight, that we are not obliged to suppose that the Lord uttered them immediately after the miracles just recorded. Their correct historical connection is to be found exclusively in Matthew and Mark, and the reason for which Luke records them here can but be conjectured. According to Meyer, Jesus was authorized, by the conclusion of the foregoing scene, in entertaining the brightest hopes for the kingdom of the Messiah, and it was to these hopes that He thus gave utterance. According to Lange, both parables were, in the idea of the Evangelist, calculated to explain the preceding miraculous narrative, and each a special feature of it. Schleiermacher says, that the two parables refer to what the Lord had just been teaching in the synagogue. It can hardly, however, be denied that ver. 17 gives the impression of being a concluding form; while a fresh paragraph in the narrative of this journey seems to commence with ver. 18.

2. Unto what, etc.—According to Mark iv. 30, the parable of the mustard-seed begins with this subjective and familiar exclamation; its report in Matthew is more objective. It is obvious that this question of our Lord is not one of actual uncertainty or perplexity; but that it is rather in accordance with the familiar and dramatic form of His discourse.

3. It is like a grain of mustard-seed.—See remarks on Matt. xiii. 32. The scientific objection, that the mustard-seed is not absolutely the smallest of seeds, is best met by the remark, that it is not minuteness, considered in itself, which is here intended; but minuteness in comparison with the largeness of the plant produced from this seed, which was, especially in Palestine, very considerable. In the days of Jesus, the mustard-seed was used by the scribes also, as a figure, to denote the smallest of objects. Thus, e.g., the earth, with respect to the universe, is compared to a mustard-seed, which is also designated as scarcely a seed. See Lightfoot on this passage.

4. In his garden.—In Matthew only a field, in Mark only the earth, is spoken of. The mustard-seed also, in Luke, merely grows εἰς δένδρον μέγα; while the comparison to other plants, in Matthew and Mark, is omitted here. Such variations, however, by no means justify the notion, that the Lord uttered this parable on two different occasions. We find, at least in Luke, rather an emphatic reference to what has been just expressed, than a repetition. In Mark, the beautiful conclusion of the parable is most graphically worked out.

5. Πάλιν, again.—Here follows the parable of the leaven, omitted by Mark, and given by Matthew (in his 13th chap.), with whose report of it that of Luke agrees ad litteram. See Lange on this passage. The view of Stier, that the three measures of meal denote the three sons of Noah, whose descendants were to be leavened with Christianity, and also the three quarters of the ancient world (in which case, Columbus must, in 1492, have destroyed the correctness of the comparison), is perhaps ingenious, but, at the same time, somewhat arbitrary. It is just as untenable to see here an allusion to the trichotomy of mankind, as of a microcosm, into body, soul, and spirit. How much more simple is the remark of Bengel on this number three: "quantum uno tempore ab homine portari vel ad pinsendum sumi soleret." Compare Gen. xviii. 6.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The parables of the mustard-seed and of the leaven both point to the same leading idea, viz., the blessed propagation of the kingdom of God, first extensively, and afterwards intensively. They belong, especially, to that class of parables, whose character is prophetic, and whose fulfilment takes place, in a greater or less degree, in every age of Christianity. This was especially the case with the first parable, in the time of Constantine the Great; with the second, in the Middle Ages, by the spread of the Gospel in the different European nations, through the influence of the Roman Catholic Church. Every interpretation, however, which maintains that these parables have been fulfilled, not only a parte potiori, but exclusive, in any particular period of the history of the Christian Church, must be unconditionally rejected.

2. The Lord's purpose, in describing the blessed extension of His kingdom under this double figure, could have been none other than that of obviating the offence which might have been felt at its poor and weak commencement, and of encouraging His disciples, when they would have to commence their work from a scarcely perceptible beginning.

3. The principle here laid down, maximum e minimo, is, properly speaking, the leading idea of the kingdom of God, and presents a specific distinction between it and the kingdoms of the world, in whose history the reverse, minimum e maximo, usually holds good.

4. It is remarkable, in a Christological point of view, that the Lord here expresses, not merely the dim expectation of a quiet faith, but the highest possible assurance of the triumph of His kingdom over all opposition. To the eye of His mind, the future becomes the present, and the results of ages are concentrated in a moment of time. If He raises the inquiry, Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? we cannot suppress the question, Whereunto shall we liken its King? Compare Isa. xl. 25.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The history of the development of God's kingdom: 1. From small beginnings, 2. with visible blessings, 3. to an astonishing greatness.—The parable of the mustard-seed, an image of the history, 1. of the Founder of the kingdom, 2. of the Church in general, 3. of every Christian life in particular.—The leaven: 1. Leaven leavens flour only (inward relation of the Gospel to the human heart); 2. all the flour (harmonious development of all the powers of man by Christianity); but 3. only gradually; comp. 2 Cor. iii. 18; 1 John ii. 12–14; and 4. in secret, 1 Pet. iii. 4; yet 5. so that it never ceases, so long as a particle of the mass has not been leavened.—Does the parable of the leaven justify the doctrine of an ἀποκατάστασις πάντων?—The difference between the working of the leaven in the flour, and the operation of the Spirit of God in the heart: the provinces of physical necessity and moral freedom should be carefully distinguished.—The woman kneading, a picture of the untiring activity demanded in, and for, the kingdom of God.—Work for God's kingdom, an, 1. apparently insignificant, 2. constantly indefatigable, and 3. finally blessed work.—When once the leaven has been hidden in the flour, it must have time and rest allowed it to rise.—Likeness of the Gospel to leaven: leaven is a small, powerful, wholesome, penetrating substance.—The word of God must be carefully blended with everything human: Nil humani a se alienum putat.—The kingdom of God follows the same law of development in universal manhood, as in each individual.—The Past, the Present, and the Future, considered in the light of these parables.—The development of the kingdom of God from small beginnings, a manifestation of the glory of God. The kingdom of God is thereby presented to us, as, 1. the special work of God's omnipotence, 2. a striking exhibition of God's wisdom, 3. an inestimable benefit of God's love.—The development of the kingdom of God from small beginnings, a call to, 1. thankful faith, 2. spiritual growth, 3. persevering zeal.—These parables, a picture of Israel, the boast of Christianity, the hope of the heathen world.—The difference between human philanthropy and the saving love of the Lord. The former applies, as far as possible, to masses, and seeks in this way to work upon individuals; the latter applies first to individuals, in order thus to penetrate the masses.

Starcke, Hedinger: Christianity is communicated by the word, example, and intercourse. Happy he who walks in light, in the communion of saints.—Brentius: We have neither words nor comparisons adequate for depicting the beauty of the kingdom of God.—Bibl. Wurt.: The Gospel changes and renews a man, in continually increasing degrees.—We must take care lest we resemble such dough, as quickly rises, and then falls again; and lest our conversion be more like a bladder filled with wind, than a compact solid substance.

Eylert: The development of the kingdom of God upon earth: 1. Small in its beginning, 2. gradual in its progress, 3. great and glorious in its results.—Arndt: The hidden agency of the kingdom of heaven: 1. Where, 2. how, 3. what it works.

A. Schweizer: The penetrating nature of the kingdom of God; 1. because its aim is to lay hold on all that is human; 2. because its power, being divine, is victorious; 3. because its servants devote their whole hearts to its interests.—(Sermons on the kingdom of God, Zurich 1851.)

2. A Serious Answer to a Useless Question. (VERS. 22–30.)

22 And He went through the cities and villages, teaching, and journeying toward Jerusalem. 23 Then said one unto Him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And He said unto them, 24 Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. 25 When once the Master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and He shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are: 26 Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in Thy presence, and Thou hast taught in our streets. 27 But He shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence ye are: depart from Me, all ye workers of iniquity. 28 There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham and Isaac, and Jacob and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. 29 And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. 30 And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last.

Ver. 24. Θύρας according to B.D.L. The Receptus πύλης is derived from Matt. vii. 13.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He went through the cities and villages.—According to our view, the historical incidents which Luke mentions in chs. xiii. 22–xxii. 10, follow our Lord's stay at Jerusalem at the feast of the Dedication (John x. 22–29). From Jerusalem the Lord went "beyond Jordan, into the place where John at first baptized," ver. 40, and remained there, till the account of the sickness of Lazarus summoned Him to Bethany, John xi. 6. About this time, therefore, a journey of about three days took place, from Peræa into Judea; and there is no reason why the journey mentioned by St Luke, ver. 22, etc., should not have been identical with it. (See Wieseler.) In this case, the account of the Lord's last journey to the Passover does not begin till ch. xvii. It cannot be denied that we are equally at liberty to apply the words εἰς Ἱερουσαλ. (ch. xiii. 22) to the direction, as to the end of His journey; but that they must here be understood in the former sense, is apparent, from a comparison with John xi. 54. The answer, too, of Jesus to the Pharisees, given, according to ch. xiii. 31, on the very day of His departure, remarkably coincides, with respect to the period of time mentioned in it, with John xi. 6; and even the supposition of the above-named chronologist, that the name Lazarus, in the parable ch. xvi. 19–31, was purposely chosen by the Lord with reference to the friend who was then just dead, seems to us not improbable.

2. Then said one unto Him.—Neither time nor place is indicated. The question would give us no reason for forming an unfavourable opinion of the questioner, unless the Lord's answer led us to conclude, that this man had not, as yet, been earnestly concerned about his soul's salvation. In any case, he was only an external follower of Jesus (ver. 24), and did not see any reason for being anxious concerning his personal safety. His question was probably induced by what he had either heard, or been told by others, of the strictness of Christ's demands, with which but few complied.

3. Are there few?—On the proper signification of εἰ, in similar questions, see Meyer on this passage. "Dubitanter interrogat, ita ut interrogatio videatur directa esse."—Saved. By reception into the kingdom of the Messiah, upon the conditions stated.

4. Strive, ἀγωνίζεσθε, certate.—What the Lord thinks of the inquirer, is evident from both the matter and manner of His answer. We may certainly gather from it, that it was not hearty interest, not even compassion for so many who might perhaps be lost, nor, least of all, concern for his own salvation, which prompted his inquiry; but that it was rather a question of mere curiosity, united with both levity and insolence. Without giving a decided reply, the Lord removes the question from the region of abstract theory into that of practice, and directs His words not only to the inquirer, with whom He enters into no further explanations, but to all the people, who were then listening to Him. It is, however, obvious, that the Lord's exhortation does contain a satisfactory and powerful, though indirect, answer to this question; and hence, we can by no means subscribe to the notion, that such questions (both here and ch. xii. 41) are only insertions by Luke, for the sake of continuing the discourse (De Wette). Such traits seem rather, to us, to bear the impress of life and motion, of freshness and simplicity. We may safely suppose that the inquirer was more or less surprised at the small number of the followers of Jesus; but he would certainly consider himself secure of inheriting eternal life, according to the popular belief of the Jews, "Omni Israelitæ erit portio in mundo futuro." See Lightfoot on this passage.

5. The strait gate.—Comp. Lange on Matt. vii. 13. We cannot consider it improbable, that the Lord should have used so speaking and simple an image more than once in His public teaching; and the more so, since it is here introduced in a manner quite peculiar.

6. Many will seek, etc.—In any case, we must here understand such a seeking as does not deserve the name of ἀγωνίζεσθαι. A seeking, therefore, without real earnestness, and without a stedfast resolution to obtain admission at any price. Even where more than a merely superficial desire to be saved is felt, its attainment is sought in ways of a man's own choosing, and hence never reached. It is worthy of remark, that they who are here represented as ζητήσοντες, desire to enter in, but not decidedly διὰ τῆς στενῆς θύρας. Much may be done for salvation without result, if the one thing needful be omitted.

7. And shall not be able.—Because of the moral impossibility of entering the kingdom of God by any other way than by the strait gate (= μετάνοια). The Lord shows (vers. 25–27) when this will come to light.

8. When once, etc.—Vers. 25–27 give two examples of vain and fruitless seeking to enter in. First (vers. 25, 26) they knock and call, but too late; then (ver. 27) they appeal, but unreasonably, to their acquaintance with the Master of the house. The parable is not derived from a marriage feast to which individuals come too late, but from a family whose head, having awaited as long as possible the return of such members of the household as are wandering about, now that the appointed time for admission has expired, inexorably refuses them entrance. The climax is striking: first, they stand without; then, they knock; afterwards entreat; and at last appeal to former intimacy; but all in vain.

9. I know you not whence ye are.—In these words the Lord declares, in the most decided manner, that, be they who they may, they are not members of His family. This declaration is repeated immediately afterwards, but with still greater emphasis, showing that the sentence is irrevocable, and followed by a decided ἀπόστητε. "How can He call them 'workers of iniquity,' if He does not know them? For this very reason; that they are outwardly so near to Him, and inwardly such strangers; that they are Israelites, and yet, in a theocratic sense, Barbarians whose origin is so dark and distant, that the Lord of the universe Himself, so to speak, cannot recognise it; and, because the fact of their having thus obscured their very nature to the Saviour of the world, testifies that it must have been by great iniquity that such a self-deforming change has been wrought." Lange.

10. We have eaten, etc.—See the remarks on Matt. vii. 22. It is specially to be noted, that eating and drinking in the Lord's presence (ἐνώπιον) is spoken of, without inward communion with Him; while the words following, "in our streets," seem to say that once, at all events, He knew them well, and that it is almost impossible that they should now be such utter strangers. The attempt to recall themselves to the memory of the seemingly forgetful Master of the house, is taken from life. The reminiscence of His teaching in the streets, shows also that none other than Christ, manifest in the flesh, is here intended.

11. There shall be weeping, etc.—In a certain sense, a third ἄρξεσθε, and the most terrible of all. The rejected ones are now represented as being in the midst of darkness (= hell); but as being, though at such a distance, still witnesses of the joy of the members of the family,—the patriarchs and prophets of the Old Testament, their spiritual fathers, occupying the foreground of the picture. The Marcionite reading, πάντας τοὺς δικαίους, evidently deprives the representation of this Israelitish element, which the connection necessarily demands, and is, therefore, objectionable on internal grounds. (Volkmar is of a contrary opinion.)

12. And they shall come.—See remarks on Matt. viii. 11, 12. It is remarkable that the mention of the πολλοί, which is found in the parallel passage, is omitted. Its introduction here, would have given a definite answer to the question of ver. 23, which it was not the Lord's purpose to do, and would have been opposed to that aptness to teach which He manifested. It might, however, be inferred, from the figure of a guest table, that not individuals alone are to be understood. With respect to the signification of the sentence, here pronounced by the Lord, it must certainly be conceded, that, according to the connection, it is not eternal damnation, but the temporary exclusion of the Jews from the blessings of Messiah's kingdom, which is here intended (Stier); while, on the other hand, there is nothing to forbid our applying this figurative language, in its fullest force, to those who persevere to the end in their unbelief and impenitence.

13. There are last.—See remarks on Matt. xix. 30, xx. 16. The originality of this indication, so frequently repeated, and in so various connections, is indisputable (Meyer). Its sense, however, differs in different places. In Matt. xix. 30, the πρῶτοι are indeed ἔσχατοι, but not therefore entirely excluded from the kingdom of God, as they decidedly are in this place. There degradation, here rejection, takes place. There, the Lord is speaking of mercenary servants; here, of unbelieving rejecters. Besides, He is here speaking generally (without an article) of some πρῶτοι, and of some ἔσχατοι, to lead the inquirer to search his own heart, to see on which side he stands. The history does not tell us what impression was made upon this individual by the Lord's instruction. He was, probably, too superficial to fathom the deeper sense of these words, the decided announcement of Israel's rejection. It is remarkable, and at the same time a proof that this chapter of Luke relates to the last period of our Lord's public ministry, that here, as well as in the three parables of the following chapter, this idea of the preference of the "last" to the ungrateful "first" is made so prominent, showing that the fruitless working for the house of Israel is drawing to a close.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. This whole discourse is an important contribution to the right appreciation of the kingdom of God. On the one hand, it appears as a thing most earnestly to be desired: he who enters it, is saved (ver. 23), he finds himself in the company of the blessed (vers. 28, 29), and obtains a place among "the first" (ver. 30). But, on the other, it is impossible to inherit this kingdom without a personal struggle; and although not a few are represented as sitting at the table (ver. 29), yet many seek to enter in vain (ver. 24). Undoubtedly, among the fruitless seekers, the Lord was reckoning not only the unrighteous, but the self-righteous. Hence the question proposed is not difficult to answer: the entrance into the kingdom of God is not so difficult as many think, for the strait gate is open to all; but, again, this entrance is not so easy as many suppose, for it can only be entered by earnest effort, and many seek to enter in, in vain.

2. A clear light is here thrown upon the character of the King, as well as upon the nature of the kingdom. On the one side, we are struck with His holy severity; on the other, with His condescending love. But, above all, must we admire that unsurpassable aptness to teach, by which He leads the inquirer from the unprofitable field of speculation into that of practical instruction. In this respect, the Lord is an unequalled example, especially for spiritual intercourse with such members of the flock as fix their view rather on the dark than on the light side of the Gospel, who would rather rack their brains over the βάθη τοῦ Θεοῦ,—rather dispute about predestination, than hear about the personal call to faith and conversion; in a word, who always begin where they ought rather to stand still and finish. Comp. Deut. xxix. 29. Needless questions are answered by the Gospel, only in a certain degree: the answer to the one question needful may be read, Acts xvi. 30, 31.

3. The Lord gives here, as also in vers. 34, 35, an ethical and not a metaphysical reason why so many are not saved. He views the question from an anthropological, and not a theological point of view. And this method is the only one adapted to popular instruction, and likely to be productive of good results.

4. What the Lord here says, concerning the rejection of Israel, must be completed by what His Apostle teaches us on the same subject (Rom. xi. 25, 26). The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. That, however, which gives to this teaching its highest importance for all future ages and people, is its serious declaration, that no outward participation in the blessings of Messiah's kingdom can bestow a reversionary interest in the future salvation, if the demand of μετάνοια has not been really, and seriously, complied with.

5. The inexorable severity with which the Master of the house unconditionally refuses entrance, even after repeated calls and entreaties, contrasts remarkably with the laxity wherewith many preachers and theologians are continually holding forth the ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, as an infallible expectation. Without an earnest representation of the "eternal too late," the preaching of the Gospel is deprived of its most profitable savour.

6. Even though we do not venture to maintain, with Bengel, that by the succession in which the four quarters of the heavens are mentioned (east, west, north, south), is pointed out the course of missionary history, which began in the east, and now remains in the south; yet the principle here laid down, There are last, etc., is indisputably one of great importance in the work of Christian missions. Many nations who might be called "first," as partakers of faith, and heirs of the kingdom, go back; because they become cold and careless. Others, at first poor, unknown, and inferior, afterwards rank as first among Christian nations. And what is here said of "the first" and "the last," has been literally fulfilled in Israel and the Gentile world. Christian Europe may well pray that this may not be true of her also, and that the dew of the Spirit, which is refreshing America and distant heathen lands, may not be withheld from her soil.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The question, What must I do to be saved? the most pressing and vital inquiry.—The question, whether few are saved, may be asked for various reasons: 1. From vain curiosity; 2. from silent concern; 3. from concealed insolence; 4. from true philanthropy.—Salvation, not a matter of abstract speculation, but of persevering effort.—Strive to enter in: 1. An important demand; 2. a reasonable demand; 3. a benevolent demand; 4. a practicable demand.—Many seek to enter in, but cannot: 1. When they seek to enter by another gate than the strait one; 2. when they seek indeed to enter by the strait gate, but want to make it wider first; 3. when they seek to enter by the strait gate, but without leaving behind them what cannot go through it.—Salvation is neither easy nor impossible.—The reality of the "eternal too late."—First, able, but not willing; then, willing, but not able.—The strait gate: 1. Sought too carelessly; 2. found too late.—The door shut: 1. When? 2. against whom? 3. for how long?—We must be born of God, otherwise the Lord Himself knows not whence we are.—No excuse will avail, when once the day of grace is past.—Knocking at the door of grace avails on this, but not on the other side of the grave.—The resentment of the Jews, when they saw that others were called to be sharers of the blessings they had rejected, was manifested in their animosity towards the first believing Gentiles, Acts x. 45, 46.—The fathers, called of free grace; their children, rejected through their own fault.—The kingdom of heaven, compared to a feast: 1. The banquet; 2. the host; 3. the guests; 4. the spectators.—Repentance too late is repentance in vain.—Many last shall be first, and many first, last: 1. The truth of this saying: a. in the days of our Lord; b. in Christendom in all succeeding ages; c. in the history of missionary operations. 2. The reasons of this phenomenon: a. the arrogance and indolence of many of the first; b. the seriousness and earnest desire of salvation of many of the last; c. the holy love of God, which rewards all according to their works. 3. The value of this remark: a. it speaks encouragement to the last; b. it teaches humility to the first; c. and faith in the Lord to both, He being the point of union between the first and the last.—"This saying should alarm the greatest saints:" Luther.

Starcke: It concerns us, indeed, to know what kind of persons are saved, but not their number.—Canstein: Men have a desire of future salvation, but few prize it so highly as to be willing to renounce the present, and the visible, for its sake.—Quesnel: God has His hour, which man must not suffer to pass by in vain. —Zeisius: Late repentance seldom true repentance.—Osiander: Hypocrites, with all their seeming holiness, are but workers of iniquity in God's sight.—Brentius: He who will not be a subject and child of God in the kingdom of grace, cannot be so in the kingdom of glory; the one depends upon the other.—They who are farthest from the kingdom of God often receive it most eagerly.—Thanks be to Thee, O Lord, that Thou hast called the Gentiles also. —Canstein: God always has a Church on earth; it is confined to no one nation.—Boast not of thy preference before others: before evening, matters may be otherwise than they were in the morning. —Heubner: This was a question of curiosity. There are many such: questions concerning the salvation of the heathen, and of the evil angels, among theologians, have often been merely questions of curiosity.—The vain expectations of some, who think they have a right to salvation.

3. The Threatening of Herod. The Woe pronounced upon Jerusalem. (Vers. 31–35.)

Vers. 34 and 35, parallel to Matt. xxiii. 37–39.

31 The same day there came certain of the Pharisees, saying unto Him, Get Thee out, and depart hence: for Herod will kill Thee. 32 And He said unto them, Go ye and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected. 33 Nevertheless I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem. 34 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not! 35 Behold, your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord.

Ver. 31. According to the Receptus, ἡμέρᾳ, which seems preferable to ὥρᾳ, the reading of Scholz and Griesbach.

Ver. 35. ἔρημος is omitted by preponderating testimony, and is probably derived from Matt. xxiii. 38.

Ver. 35. The reading of Tischendorf and others, according to D., ἕως ἥξει ὅτε, κ.τ.λ., seems, to us, to have greater probability.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. The same day.—This whole narrative is peculiar to Luke, but bears internal evidence of probability, and forms an important link in the chain of his account of the behaviour of Herod, with regard both to Jesus and John. It must be remembered, that not only Galilee, but Peræa, and the neighbourhood in which Jesus now was (ver. 22), were under the jurisdiction of Herod. If the Lord, according to ch. ix. 51, were not within his dominions, it is a proof that another journey must be described here, from that there mentioned (in opposition to De Wette).

2. Get Thee out, etc.—It is a question, whether these Pharisees were really speaking by Herod's authority, or only making use of his name, for the sake of inducing the Lord to depart, by means of a false report. The latter view (Olshausen, Stier, Ebrard) is, at first sight, not improbable, since a similar stratagem well agrees with the character which they everywhere exhibited; while it seems scarcely credible that Herod, who formerly and subsequently evinced so much curiosity with respect to Jesus, should have sent Him such a message at this time. And yet this difficulty, when more closely considered, is but apparent. Inconsistency is always a feature in the character of those whose conscience is uneasy; and it is very conceivable that Herod, filled now with desire, now with fear, would be at one time desirous to drive the Lord from him, and at another to see Him. Thus had he, at one time, trembled at the shadow of John the Baptist, though in heart he believed neither in the immortality of the soul nor in eternal life; and thus might he also, at one moment, wish the Nazarene at his court, and, at the next, beyond the limits of his dominions. Perhaps the wish of the present moment might have been occasioned by the suggestions of the Pharisees and Sadducees, as well as by the fact that the followers of Jesus now numbered even families of the court party (ch. viii. 3). And, since wickedness always prefers creeping in crooked ways, and is ever cowardly by nature, it is quite in accordance with its spirit, that he should use the Pharisees, who alternately flattered and feared him, as messengers to the Nazarene, whom he did not dare to threaten by means of a public functionary. If these should, in an underhand manner, threaten Him with possible danger, He might, he would perhaps think, be prevailed upon to withdraw of His own accord. This view, too, justifies the Lord's answer; and we are not reduced to the necessity of understanding ἀλώπεξ, by a very forced explanation, to denote the Pharisees themselves, and seeing in this figurative language an announcement that the Lord penetrated their lies and craft. For all these reasons, we believe that the message really proceeded from Herod, and that the answer was directed to the tetrarch.

3. Tell that fox.—An intimation of his craft and cunning. Proofs of this meaning (superfluous, perhaps, since its reason is obvious) may be found in Wetstein and others. To the objection, that such an answer to Herod, on the part of Jesus, was unbecoming, it may be replied, that ancient times did not carry courtesy to the exaggerated extent of modern times; that the man who was spoiling the Lord's vineyard (Cant. ii. 15) fully deserved this name; and that no one needed to be treated with less forbearance than this tyrant, who had so lately stained his hands with the blood of the prophet. Besides, the Lord had here less regard to the man than to the prince (Lange); and the fear of incurring the displeasure of such a man was never in the slightest degree excited within Him, as appears from the message which follows this epithet. Hence there is no need of the view, that this message of the Pharisees was merely the consequence of a report then current, or of some intrigue concerted between them and the courtiers of Herod (Riggenbach). Herod showed himself to be deserving of the appellation of "Fox" by the fact, that he used, as his instruments, those who desired the Lord's departure, at least, as urgently as he did.

4. Behold, I cast out devils.—Evidently, the Lord is not speaking of His words, but of His miraculous deeds, because these had most strongly excited the uneasiness of Herod (ch. ix. 9). We have already seen, that to-day, and to-morrow, and the third day, are no proverbial expression for a short, but definite period, but a real statement of the time which the Lord occupied in His journey from Peræa to Bethany, in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem.—Τελειοῦμαι, Present Middle, not in the sense of I die, which militates against both the connection and the phraseology; but in the sense of I complete, not My work in general, but this part of My work, the casting out of devils, etc. He will not leave the dominions of the tetrarch one moment before the work He has to perform there is finished. Herod might, therefore, have spared himself the trouble of this embassy. "This is one of the deepest sayings of Jesus, giving us a glance into the inmost nature of His history" (Baumgarten).

5. Nevertheless I must, etc.—Not an insignificant, and perhaps incorrectly reported, speech (De Wette); but a very plain declaration, that He had nothing to fear from Herod so long as His day of life should last, and that He united the most sublime repose in the present with the clearest consciousness of His approaching end. Meyer very well indicates the connection of ideas: "Although I do not suffer Myself to be deterred from these three days' work by your counsel, yet necessity is laid upon Me that I should comply with your πορεύου ἐντεῦθεν, since it is not allowable that a prophet should perish out of Jerusalem," etc. He continues, therefore, to work in Galilee, but proceeds, while thus working, towards Judea; not because Herod drives Him away, but because He must follow a higher direction, since it would be contrary to all rule or precedent that a prophet should be put to death anywhere but in the capital, which possessed, so to speak, a sad monopoly in this respect. It is self-evident that the three days of ver. 33 can denote no other period of time than ver. 32.

6. It cannot be that, etc.—An expression in which holy irony is united with deep melancholy. On the third day the Lord will be at Jerusalem, which is afterwards destined to be the scene of His bloody death. The view of Sepp, a. a. O. ii. p. 424, that the three days are intended to symbolize the three years of His public ministry, is purely arbitrary, and in direct opposition to the connection. The usual objection to this saying of Jesus, that, in point of fact, not all the prophets were slain at Jerusalem—John the Baptist, for instance, having died in Galilee—is best met by the remark, that the latter did not fall a victim to the unbelief of the Jews; and that the Lord is not here furnishing a statistical fact, but laying down a general rule. Besides, it is less the local situation than the symbolic signification of Jerusalem which is here intended, as metropolis of the theocratic state. Every murder of a prophet, perpetrated by the Jews, proceeded either mediately or immediately from the rulers of the people, whose residence was at Jerusalem; just as we should say, for instance, that the cruelties committed in the south of France under the Reign of Terror, at the close of the preceding century, proceeded from Paris as a centre. For the rest, the Pharisees might now judge for themselves how utterly unimportant, in the eyes of the Lord, an accidental and passing threat like that of Herod must be, after this divinely-appointed δεῖ.

7. Jerusalem, Jerusalem!—Comp. Matt. xxiii. 37–39, and Lange on this passage. Unless it be conceded that the Lord uttered this expression also on two different occasions (Stier), we must choose between the position assigned it by Luke, and that which it occupies in Matthew. The former is considered the correct one by Olshausen; the latter, by De Wette, Ebrard, Lange, Meyer, and many others. The lament over Jerusalem is indisputably more appropriate towards the close of our Lord's public ministry, on the occasion of His last departure from the temple, than here, while He was still at a distance from Jerusalem. Indeed, it seems to have been inserted by St Luke, in this place, on account of its logical connection with ver. 32, and to be, in this respect, not unsuitably placed.

8. Blessed is He that cometh, etc.—The view (of Wieseler and Paulus), that the Lord meant only the usual paschal salutation of the inhabitants of Jerusalem to the travellers arriving at the festival —and hence, that He only intended to say, in other words, that He should no more be seen in the capital till the time of the Passover— seems, to us, to be most unnatural, and to have arisen solely from harmonistic predilections. Why should the Lord have expressed Himself so inappropriately, if He had intended merely to point out the period of His approaching arrival in the city? For the true explanation of this saying, see Lange on the parallel passage.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Here, as in the subsequent history of our Lord's passion, we see the temporal and spiritual powers in league against Jesus. In accordance with the word of prophecy (Ps. ii.), Herod here appears associated with the Pharisees, as afterwards with Pilate, and on both occasions in opposition to the Christ.

2. With the craft and cowardice of the tyrant, are contrasted the transparent purity and stedfast courage of the Son of man. To this period of His history also may the words, John xi. 9, be applied. To the cunning of the fox, He opposes the patience of the lamb and the courage of the lion.

3. This saying of our Lord must be numbered among the prophecies concerning His life and death, in the widest sense of the word. They prove that He was perfectly conscious what end His earthly course would meet with, where this end awaited Him, and by whom it would be caused. Such a departure from the dominions of Herod may certainly be looked upon as a victory. No man takes His life from Him; He alone has power to lay it down, John x. 18.

4. This touching lament of the Lord over Jerusalem is a powerful testimony against the fatalist view, that Jesus must die at any price, and of necessity. Either the Lord's tears over His country and nation are a deceptive pretence; or we must infer from His expressions, not merely an abstract, but a substantial possibility, that the Jewish people, if they had really known the time of their visitation, might yet have been spared and delivered. Almighty power appears as impotence in the presence of the obduracy of the creature, and has nothing but tears wherewith to overcome it. Whose heart would venture, for the sake of systematic accuracy, to reply, Thy desire and Thy persuasions were not quite real—Thy lament, only a piece of acting and a mockery; for Thine irresistible grace was not present to give them the will?

5. The threatening against Israel, "Ye shall not see Me henceforth," is still in course of fulfilment. Their senses are blinded; and the veil of the Talmud, which hangs over their eyes, is twice as thick as the veil of Moses. But the promise, "until the time come," points to a brighter future, which is also more fully described, e.g., in Zech. xii., Rom. xi., and in other parts of Scripture.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Jesus in the presence of false friends and irreconcilable enemies.—The dangerous advice of pretended friendship, to forsake the appointed post.—What one Herod began, another continues, after thirty years.—Now that the Lord cannot be allured into visiting the court of the tetrarch, He is driven from his dominions.—How untiringly, yet how quietly, does the Lord press towards His appointed goal!—The fox contrasted with the hen, Matt. xxiii. 37. —The Christian also is, in a certain sense, invulnerable as long as he is needed on earth.—The triumphal retreat from Galilee.—The sad prerogative of Jerusalem.—Jesus, contrasted with Herod: 1. Stedfast courage, with wretched cowardice; 2. heavenly simplicity, with grovelling craft; 3. immoveable resolution, with painful indecision; 4. certain knowledge of results, with powerless threats.—Jerusalem, Jerusalem!—How Jerusalem is contrasted with the Lord, and the Lord with Jerusalem.—The rejection of Christ, the culminating point of the wickedness of Jerusalem.—He who will not take refuge under the wings of the hen, must fall a victim to the claws of the eagle.—The house left desolate.—Night and morning in the condition of Israel.—The call of the Lord to Jerusalem, addressed to every sinner: 1. The loving care which watches over Jerusalem; 2. the enmity which prevails in Jerusalem; 3. the pity which mourns over Jerusalem; 4. the retribution which comes upon Jerusalem; 5. the ray of light which breaks forth over Jerusalem.

Starcke, Zeisius: The way of Satan, by means of his children, is, partly by threats, and partly by craft, to withdraw a Christian from good; but, like his Saviour, he must not yield.—Osiander: When timid counsel is offered us, we must judge it according to the word of God and our vocation, and despise it, if contrary to either. —No man, however powerful, can hinder or retard the work of God.—Great sins are committed in great towns.—The temporal and eternal ruin of man is caused by his own fault, and not by God, who is rich in mercy.—Osiander: Persecution of the Gospel, the chief cause of the desolation of cities, provinces, and kingdoms. —Quesnel: What a terrible desolation is there in a heart, when God departs from it; what darkness, when eternal light no longer shines upon it!—Bibl. Wurt.: The greater the favour God bestows upon a nation, the greater the punishment that follows if it be ungratefully rejected.—Nitzsch: Serm. v. p. 95; Christ and Jerusalem: 1. The call of love and the perseverance of repugnance; 2. deadly hatred and self-sacrificing faithfulness.—Tholuck: Serm. i. p. 173; As many as are lost, are lost not through the will of God, but through their own (Jerusalem, Jerusalem!): 1. What seems opposed to this saying; 2. what it corroborates; 3. what it demands.

G. The Son of Man eating and drinking. (CHAP. XIV. 1–24.)

1. The Cure of the Man that had the Dropsy, and the beginning of the Lord's Discourse at Table. (VERS. 1–14.)

1 And it came to pass, as He went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the Sabbath-day, that they watched Him. 2 And, behold, there was a certain man before Him which had the dropsy. 3 And Jesus answering, spake unto the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day? 4 And they held their peace. And He took him, and healed him, and let him go; 5 And answered them, saying, Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the Sabbath-day? 6 And they could not answer Him again to these things. 7 And He put forth a parable to those which were bidden, when He marked how they chose out the chief rooms; saying unto them, 8 When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room, lest a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him; 9 And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room. 10 But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee. 11 For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. 12 Then said He also to him that bade him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee. 13 But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: 14 And thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.

Ver. 3. Or not, according to the reading θεραπεῦσαι ἢ οὔ, which Tischendorf accepts for weighty reasons, and which was previously recommended by Lachmann.

Ver. 5. ἀποκριθ. πρὸς αὐτ. is, on critical grounds, doubtful. See Lachmann and Meyer.

Ver. 5. The widely received reading υἱός (son), though often defended, seems to us doubtful, for internal reasons.

Ver. 6. The αὐτῷ of the Receptus must be omitted.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And it came to pass.—The narrative of the cure of the dropsical man is peculiar to Luke, and undoubtedly belongs to the journey recorded ch. xiii. 33; while the repast mentioned here, probably took place on one of the before-named three days. As a kind of melancholy joy, better felt than described, is expressed in the Lord's reply to the Pharisees (ch. xiii. 31–33), it was certainly the same feeling which induced Him to accept so dangerous a mark of honour at this critical period of His life, and to sit down at a Phari see's table.

2. One of the chief Pharisees.—According to Grotius and Kuinoel, a member of the Sanhedrim; according to De Wette, a ruler of a synagogue, a chief man among the Pharisees. They had, however, as a sect, no chief, in the usual sense of the word; and we can scarcely understand anything more by the expression, than a Pharisee who, either from his rank, learning, or influence, possessed a moral superiority over his fellow-sectaries, like Nicodemus, Gamaliel, Hillel, Schammai, or others.

3. To eat bread.—The Jews were accustomed to pay visits and to give feasts on the Sabbath-days, Neh. viii. 10; which could the more easily be done, without any actual desecration of the Sabbath, since there was no need of kindling a fire for the preparation of the viands; these having been cooked the day before, that their household might have no work, properly so called, to perform on the Sabbath, Exod. xxxv. 3. A public repast (Paulus), however, is not here intended; the Lord was, rather, specially invited, as on former occasions (ver. 12). It is peculiar to Luke, that he seems to delight in presenting the Lord to us, seated at the social table, and displaying His pure humanity in its most attractive form. On this occasion, He shed a glory over the meal by His discourse, which was, more than that of any other, "seasoned with salt" (Col. iv. 6), and which Luke reports, in a manner at once natural, and bearing strong internal marks of credibility, as addressed first to the guests (vers. 7–10); then to the master of the house (vers. 11–14); and afterwards, when an opportunity offered itself (ver. 15), to both (vers. 16–24). A Sabbath-miracle immediately preceded it.

4. A certain man . . . . which had the dropsy.—The καὶ ἰδού, which introduces this narrative, plainly expresses how unexpected was the appearance of this man, who was by no means an invited guest, since Jesus sent him away after his cure (ver. 4). As we read nothing here of any great concourse of people, such as took place at other repasts, and among whom this man might perhaps have entered, it is very probable that the Pharisee may have placed him there with some evil design. This notion is not arbitrary (Meyer); for we read, ver. 1, that the Pharisees were watching Jesus; and though ver. 2 does not begin with γάρ, yet it is evident enough that the very occurrence is here related which occasioned this watching. (A similar case to Luke vi. 6, 7.) Hence, we find the sick man placed ἔμπροσθεν αὐτ., in such a situation that he must meet the Lord's eye. The same treacherous design was the motive of the Pharisees' hospitality, as of their recent friendly warning (ch. xiii. 31). The sick man, probably, was unaware of the intention with which he had been placed there; perhaps, even, the great promises held out to him, might have kindled in him that spark of faith and hope, which the Lord always made a condition of the exertion of His miraculous power; but of which, however, nothing was now said, unless more passed between Jesus and the patient, before his cure, than is here reported. Perhaps the sight of this man's helpless condition made them conjecture, that any attempt to cure might, this time, be unsuccessful, and the Lord's impotence be thus exposed. Besides, if not, a cure would be performed on the Sabbath, which might afford fresh grounds of accusation. Sufficient reasons these, why they should grant to this afflicted, and perhaps also indigent man, for a few moments, the honour of their presence, and the privilege of approaching their festive table.

5. Jesus answering, spake.—This saying of the Lord is an answer to the act of His enemies, as well as to the secret evil thoughts which He could read in their hearts. He will not perform the miracle, without first showing them that He penetrates their design. Hence, He begins the conversation of His own accord, while the patient stands by in silence, either from fear of so distinguished an assembly, or perhaps in expectation of some kind word.

6. Is it lawful, etc.—In a certain sense, it may be said that the Lord shows His superiority by laying a snare for them with so categorical a question. Had they answered, unconditionally, in the affirmative, they would have approved of His miracle; while a reply in the negative would have exposed their own want of charity in this instance. They were therefore silent, as on a former occasion (ch. vi. 9). It is not till after this victory over them, that the Lord goes on to speak by deeds. He lays hold of the patient with His powerful hand (ἐπιλαβόμενος), and sends him away cured. His forbearance, however, to those at whose table He is sitting, in reproving them, not in the presence, but after the departure of the healed man, deserves notice.

7. Which of you.—The Lord here, as on a former occasion, defends His action by an allusion to everyday life; but this time in a form having peculiar reference to the nature of the miracle. After the cure of the woman whom Satan had bound eighteen years, ch. xiii. 16, He spake of loosing an ox or an ass; here, when a dropsical patient is restored to health, of a pit in which the animal was in danger of perishing. (A proof, by the way, of the exactness with which the Evangelists reported the sayings of Jesus.) The various Sabbath-miracles especially, even in the midst of their unavoidable similarity, present so many delicate shades of variety, that the notion (Strauss) that they are all only mythic variations of one and the same monotonous subject, is best convicted of falsehood by a stricter comparison of these occurrences.

8. An ox or an ass.—Though the reading υἱός has a large amount of external testimony on its side (see Lachmann and Tischendorf), and is ingeniously defended by Rettig (Theol. Stud. und Kritik. 1838), it yet introduces a disturbing element into the discourse. There is plainly here a conclusio a minori ad majus, which would be almost destroyed by the combination of son and ox. An appeal to the paternal feeling of the Pharisees would here, where the cure of a stranger was concerned, have been entirely beside the mark. This various reading seems rather attributable to the desire of some ignorant transcriber, to put a stronger expression into the Lord's mouth, than that which He really used, according to the usual reading; while, by this very strengthening of the expression, he has involuntarily weakened the argument. It is certainly possible that the Lord might have intended to lay down the ethic principle, that whatever we would do on the Sabbath, with respect to our own property, we also owe to others (Meyer); but by no means probable, if we compare this with other similar apologetic dicta. If the Lord had meant, in this manner, to inculcate the rule of Matt. vii. 12, the mention of the ox would have been, in any case, superfluous; the figure, too, of a son in the pit sounds strangely. For all these reasons, we cannot venture, in this instance, to apply the generally useful rule: lectio difficilior præferenda. The variation πρόβατον (D.) also points to an uncertainty in the reading, rendering it safer, perhaps, to keep to the Receptus.

9. And He put forth a parable to those which were bidden.—The word parable is here to be understood, not as a fictitious narrative, but in its wider sense of a parabolical saying. With regard to the objection, that a want of courtesy was evidenced in speaking thus at the table (Gfrörer, De Wette), see the remarks on ch. xi. 37. Meyer also rightly remarks on this subject, "The transaction with the dropsical man had already produced another point of view than that of urbanity." And if we also accept the view of Lange, that both the short parables were of a symbolical character, and pointed out the relation of the guests to the kingdom of heaven, even the very slightest appearance of discourtesy vanishes. Nor must we forget how much would, in such a case, depend on the tone of the speaker, and remember the well-known saying, "quod licet Jovi, non licet bovi."

10. When He marked.—The unbecoming conduct of His fellow-guests gave occasion to the first of these parables. We can scarcely think that the Lord here intended to point out what conduct was suitable with regard to the feast of the kingdom of God; since He did not look upon the unbelieving Jews as taking the chief seats at this table, but as those who, though indeed invited, did not choose to come (ver. 18, etc.). On the contrary, it seems to us, that the precept, "Go and sit down in the lowest room, etc.," was entirely confined to the present circumstances. We might almost imagine that the Lord Himself, and His disciples, were among those seated in the lower places, and justly, but vainly, expecting to be summoned to the higher, which, however, they would by no means appropriate. In this case, the noblest self-consciousness, and the most exalted hope for the future, are expressed in the words, "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted;" as, on the other hand, a sharp threatening of the Jews is contained in the warning which He, on this particular occasion, uttered as a universal truth, that "whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased." It is obvious that this saying was one of those which Jesus might fitly repeat on several occasions. Comp. Matt. xxiii. 12; Luke xviii. 14. For the rest, the whole delineation is taken from the life, and is a fresh proof of the minute attention with which the Lord observed even the most common usages of everyday life. The repast in question is no merely ordinary δεῖπνον, but a marriage, at which the etiquette of places would be more observed than even on other occasions. If contention should arise about it, it must naturally be decided, not by one of the guests, but by the impartial master of the house, who had invited both the one and the other (σὲ καὶ αὐτόν, te et illum, Vulg.). To one thus indecorously promoting himself, he would abruptly say, Give this man place; while the latter, thus repulsed, would then begin (ἄρξῃ, expressing the hesitating commencement of retreat, caused by a feeling of shame, Meyer), not only to take a lower, but the lowest room (τὸν ἔσχ. τόπ.). "Qui simul cedere jubetur, longe removetur." Bengel. The humble man, on the contrary, who gladly and cheerfully went to the feast (πορευθείς), and contented himself with the lowest place, would be accosted with a friendly φίλε, summoning him, if not to the chief place, at least to a higher (ἀνώτερον); and the honour, naturally involved in this promotion, would receive a double value by being bestowed upon him in the presence (ἐνώπιον) of his fellow-guests. Comp. Prov. xxv. 6, 7.

11. Then said He also.—This second parable bestows no praise upon the Pharisee for having invited the Lord, although He belonged neither to his friends nor rich neighbours; but rather a sharp reproof of the fault almost always committed, at sumptuous repasts, in the selection of guests. It is obvious that this precept of the Lord must be understood not absolute, but a parte potiori. The Mosaic law had already granted to the poor and needy a place at the festal meal (Deut. xiv. 28, 29, xvi. 11, xxvi. 11–13); and the Lord also desires that hospitality should not be shown exclusively, to those who would most liberally repay it. The notion, that the origin of Christian love feasts must be traced to this precept (van Hengel), is quite gratuitous.

12. Lest they also bid thee again.—Jesus here represents the usual supposition under which a feast is given to the rich, viz., that of being invited in return, as something rather to be avoided than anxiously desired. It stands on a level with the ἀπέχειν τὸν μισθόν of Matt. vi. 5. Metus mundo ignotus. Bengel. It is when we act, not from the usual love of gain, but from unselfish love, that the Lord promises the richest recompense.

13. At the resurrection of the just.—These last words, τῶν δικαίων, would have been entirely without meaning, if the Lord had here intended that general resurrection which He describes, e.g., John v. 28, 29. He, as well as St Paul, distinguishes between a first and second resurrection (comp. also Luke xx. 34–36), and thereby impresses upon this often controverted doctrine the stamp of His infallible αὐτὸς ἔφα. At all events, this saying contains a germ, which was further developed in the subsequent writings of the Apostles. Compare Bertholdt, Christol. Judæorum, § 38. The Lord here passes over what takes place, according to St John and St Paul, between the first and second resurrections, without in any respect contradicting it. It is obvious that He is speaking of δικαίων, not in a pharisaic, but in an ethical sense. His object is, not to praise His host, who had probably invited Him from sinister motives; but to lay down a general principle, which should never be lost sight of in social intercourse, and to point to the happy prospect in which they may rejoice who obey this precept.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the Critical Notes, and remarks on Luke vi. 1–11.

2. On this occasion also, the Lord does not refuse the invitation of a Pharisee; thus exhibiting the benevolence of His character, while His divine greatness is manifested by the miracle He performs, and the confusion brought upon His opponents by His words. He also shows, in social intercourse, a freedom, mingled with conscientiousness and dignity, which His disciples may, in all cases, safely imitate.

3. The Lord's warning against seeking after vainglory, may also be applied, in a wider sense, to seeking after distinguished places and posts of honour in the kingdom of God, when it vexes us to see another set over us, and when our pride thus inflicts upon us many a humiliation. So far, this warning agrees with the principles more copiously expressed, Matt. xxiii. 6–8; John xiii. 1–17, and elsewhere. Comp. 1 Pet. v. 5; Jas. iv. 6. The Lord here represents self-humiliation, as a deed of holy policy. Other, though still more powerful motives, could not well be introduced here. He, however, who, like Paul, calls himself the chief of sinners, 1 Tim. i. 15, certainly acts in conformity with this exhortation.

4. The eternal rule of the kingdom of God, according to which, that which is lowly is exalted, and that which is exalted brought low, was not unknown even to pious heathen. Comp. the fine reply of Æsop, to the question: "What does God do?" Elata deprimere, humilia extollere. It may, nevertheless, be affirmed with certainty, that the humility which the Lord here and elsewhere requires, was unknown to the heathen, and must be considered a virtue peculiar to Christianity.

5. The complaint (of Newton), that the Lord's precept, with regard to those who should be especially invited to a feast, is but too often forgotten by His disciples, is not unfounded. On the other hand, however, it must not be overlooked, that such exhortations must by no means be interpreted κατὰ ῥητόν, but in the same manner as Matt. v. 39–42, and similar passages. Everything depends upon that unselfish disposition, which is here so emphatically inculcated. Nor is heathen antiquity wholly wanting in such precepts; as, for instance, the poseis munera, Sexte, non amicos of Martial, and especially the remarkable words of Plato in the Phædrus, edit. Bipout, x. 293. Another proof that a pure human feeling, but not a transgression of courtesy, is expressed in this saying of Jesus. But the Lord alone could connect the principle here commended with the future and eternal happiness of His people.

6. The Lord Himself fulfilled, in a most remarkable manner, what He here commands to others. He invited to the feast of the kingdom of God, not those especially who were related to Him according to the flesh, and from whom He might have expected a recompense, but the spiritually poor and blind. Hence, He now has fulness of joy in the kingdom of His Father, and a name which is above every name.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Even in the midst of increased opposition, the Lord was not insusceptible of social pleasures.—The Sabbath-meals, the Sabbath-journeys, the Sabbath-duties of the Christian.—We are often exposed to inimical inspection, even when we least suppose it.—Human misery in the house of feasting.—The house of feasting and the house of mourning (Eccles. vii. 3), here united under one roof: the Lord is in His proper place in both.—Jesus understands even the unuttered sigh.—Where Jesus stretches out His hand, healing follows.—Humanity, even to animals, required by the Lord.—Humanity to animals, not unfrequently united with inhumanity to men.—Impotent silence in the presence of the Lord's mighty deeds: 1. From animosity; 2. from perplexity; 3. from proud disdain.—Seeking after vainglory, 1. in daily life, 2. in the Christian life.—The shame succeeding unbridled ambition, even on this side the grave.—"Sit down in the lowest room" (a communion sermon): 1. It suits thee best among thy fellow-guests; 2. the Master of the feast will be best pleased to see thee there; 3. the feast will most refresh thee there; 4. thence, thou wilt soonest reach the place of honour.—"He that exalteth himself," etc.: 1. The result of the world's history; 2 the fundamental rule of the kingdom of God; 3. the motto of every Christian.—Selfishness, the foundation of the kindness of the natural man.—Frequenting feasts is not forbidden to Christians, but every feast is not equally good in the sight of the Lord.—Recompense from man, and reward from God, are seldom combined.—The blessedness of him who receives no earthly reward for his kindness.—True love not only helps the needy, but it rejoices and refreshes him also.—He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth unto the Lord.—The resurrection of the just, the time of the most glorious reward.

Starcke, Brentius: Though learned wickedness is the worst of all wickedness, we have no need to be too much frightened at it.—Canstein: Our feasts ought to be feasts of love; but falsehood is often the first dish set on the table.—Though we find ourselves among wicked people, we shall not be without opportunities of doing good.—Cramer: It is sometimes well to be silent; but to be guiltily silent, when we ought to speak, is a sin.—Canstein: We should willingly receive the needy, and, instead of requiring to be moved by long supplication, should rather compassionately anticipate entreaty.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Falsehood is shamed and silenced by sincerity; craft by wisdom; and wickedness by the light of truth.—It is well to hold edifying conversation at table, even when many are present, 1 Tim. iv. 5.—Zeisius: "Only by pride cometh contention," Prov. xiii. 10.—Osiander: O Christian, thou must concern thyself not merely about godliness, but also about courtesy and politeness, Phil. iv. 8.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: In lowliness of mind, let each esteem other better than themselves, Phil. ii. 3.—Brentius: There is a great distinction between seeking honour, and humbly receiving honour that is due, as should be carefully remarked, 1 Thess. ii. 5, 6.—Scriptural hospitality is that exercised towards the poor and needy.—Hedinger: Love is not greedy of gain: the children of God will share with others as long as they possess anything.—To entertain the poor and needy, is to receive Christ, and has the promise of this life as well as of that which is to come, Isa. lviii. 7.—Quesnel: He thinks himself fortunate who has performed some needed service for a royal prince, with expectations of the crown: the (pious) poor are princes in need, theirs is the kingdom of heaven; we shall certainly make our fortunes by lending to them in their necessity.

Heubner: The customs of polite society.—Jesus leads a man to look within: he must himself feel and confess what is right.—The evil heart is secretly and unwillingly forced to recognise the truth.—The words of Christ are serious and convincing, but never satirical, towards His enemies.—Every man esteems it his duty to save another's life; why not, then, his soul?—The behaviour of the Christian with respect to rank.—The power of renouncing worldly honour dignifies.—Examples of the fulfilment of the precept, 12–14, Vol. II., pp. 108–110.

On the whole paragraph.—Jesus, a guest in the Pharisee's house.—Sunday travelling.—The right use of the Sabbath.—Lisco: Connection of thoughts in this miraculous history: Thou shalt hallow the sacred day.—Ulber: The limits of Christian liberty; with respect, 1. to public worship, vers. 1–6; 2. to intercourse with our neighbour, vers. 7–11; 3. to temporal pleasure, vers. 12–14.—Fuchs: The worship of God on the Sabbath: 1. Public worship; 2. family worship; 3. private worship.—Self-elevation and self-humiliation: 1. Their nature; 2. their manifestation; 3. their consequence.—Ahlfeld: How does the true flock of Christ sanctify the Sabbath? 1. They have the Lord in their midst; 2. they perform offices of love; 3. and are humble before the Lord their God.—Westermeyer: Jesus at the Pharisee's table: how He manifested, 1. His generous love, 2. His infallible wisdom, 3. His humble seriousness.

2. The Parable of the Great Supper. (VERS. 15–24.)

15 And when one of them that sat at meat with Him heard these things, he said unto Him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. 16 Then said He unto him, A certain man made a great supper, and bade many: 17 And sent his servant at supper-time to say to them that were bidden, Come; for all things are now ready. 18 And they all with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it: I pray thee have me excused. 19 And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them: I pray thee have me excused. 20 And another said, I have married a wife; and therefore I cannot come. 21 So that servant came, and showed his lord these things. Then the master of the house, being angry, said to his servant, Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. 22 And the servant said, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. 23 And the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled. 24 For I say unto you, That none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. One of them that sat at meat with Him.—It was undoubtedly one of the rich friends of the master of the house whose words gave rise to the parable of the great supper, since no poor guests were invited besides Jesus and His disciples. "The appropriateness of the exclamation, and its connection with the following parable, bear decided testimony to the genuineness of the whole narrative." (Olshausen.) That the form of this exclamation, considered in itself, "does not argue a carnal and pharisaic confidence with respect to future participation of the kingdom of God" (Lange), must certainly be conceded. The words themselves are easily comprehensible. Ἄρτον φαγ. is the expression applied, 2 Sam. ix. 7, to the provision at a royal table. The reading ἄριστον, for ἄρτον, is certainly spurious,—see De Wette in loco; and φάγεται must be viewed as Future. It is, however, difficult to decide in what spirit, and for what purpose, these words were uttered on this occasion. If we had met this individual in other society, and if the Lord had answered him in another manner, we might suppose that the Saviour's holy frame of mind had communicated itself to this guest, and say, with Bengel, "audiens eoque tactus." But this would make this saying, appearing as it does, somewhat more pious than it really was, and place it even above the enthusiastic exclamation of the woman in ch. xi. 27. We, on the contrary, find in it a tolerably unsuccessful attempt to put an end, by an edifying remark, to a discourse not flattering to the host, and, perhaps, about to bestow still sharper reproofs upon the guests. It is an endeavour, on the part of this guest, to come to the assistance of the Pharisee who invited him, and by worldly courtesy to avert the threatening storm. But the parable shows that the Lord is by no means to be diverted from His track by this digression; and He goes on to say to him, in other words, What can it avail thee to extol, with so much seeming enthusiasm, the happiness of those who eat bread in the kingdom of God, while thou and thy fellows, though invited, actually refuse to come?

2. A certain man, etc.—On the different connections in which this parable and that of the royal marriage feast are recorded, see Lange on Matt. xxii. 2–14. A comparison of the two shows that the latter is depicted with much stronger colouring, and belongs to a later period of Christ's public ministry, when the opposition of His enemies was more fully developed.

3. A great supper.—The occasion of representing the kingdom of God under this image, was furnished by the words of the guest, and the repast of the Pharisee. The Lord made use of this imagery on other occasions also; e.g., Matt. viii. 11, 12. This δεῖπνον may be called great, as well on account of the abundance of refreshing food, as of the numbers for whom it was prepared. The first invitation here mentioned, was, chiefly, that given by the prophets of the Old Testament, since by the πολλοί we can only understand the Jewish people in general. Though the Lord does not expressly say so, yet it is quite in accordance with the nature of things, that we should consider this first and preliminary invitation to have been unconditionally accepted.

4. And sent his servant.—Δοῦλος is not here used in a collective sense for all the servants (Heubner), but denotes very expressly one particular servant, the vocator (Grotius), who, according to Eastern custom, repeated the invitation as soon as the feast was ready, not to ask a second time whether the guests were willing to come, but merely to tell them when they were expected. The time here pointed out coincides with "the fulness of the time," Gal. iv. 4; while the servant can be none other than the Messiah, the עֶבֶד יְהוָה of Isaiah. He announces to Israel that the blessings of Messiah's kingdom are from henceforth open to them, so that they have now nothing else to do, but to come, to accept, to eat.

5. 'Απὸ μιᾶς.—Some supply γνώμης; others, ὥρας, φωνῆς, ψυχῆς, αἰτίας. The first seems preferable, though the sense is obvious. The motives which they adduce are various; but they all agree in withdrawing the promise they had given.—To make excuse: to apologize, deprecari. Those who had been invited, acknowledge the necessity of a suitable apology, and thus indirectly allow that they were bound, both by duty and gratitude, to be present.

6. I have bought a piece of ground.—They who think it absurd that the piece of ground should have been bought before it was seen, can surely suppose that the purchase was not absolutely concluded, but dependent on approval. I must needs.—The invited guest is desirous of convincing the servant, in a courteous manner, of his great regret, that it is impossible for him to act otherwise. He requests him to have him excused, i.e., to act as his apologist.

7. Five yoke of oxen.—Again, it is his earthly possessions which hinder this invited guest, as well as the former, from a participation in the privileges of the kingdom of heaven. It seems to us a forced explanation to say, that, in this case, the wielding of the whip over the yokes of oxen figuratively denotes the ambition of this individual. Both seem rather, so far to resemble each other, that, in both cases, it is earthly possession, as, in the third, it is sensual pleasure, which becomes the stumblingblock. If there be any difference between the first and second guest, it consists in the fact, that the man who has bought a piece of ground has still his earthly fortune to make, while the owner of the oxen is seeking to increase what he already has. The first is the man of business, whose chief concern it is to cultivate, and profit by, his purchase. The second is the independent man, who will be hindered by no one; who says "to one, Go, and he goeth, to another, Come, and he cometh;" in whom something of the stubborn nature of his oxen is apparent, and who means to let himself be troubled by no one. His tone is less civil than that of the former: he does not ask permission to go, does not resolve upon doing so, but actually departs at the very moment. Πορεύομαι, I am now upon my way, says he, when on the point of departure; and has only just time to add, I pray thee, etc., while already longing to be with his oxen.

8. I have married a wife.—This third excuse seems the most reasonable; on which account it is uttered in that tone of self-confidence which does not think excuse necessary. According to the Mosaic law, Deut. xxiv. 5, the newly married man was free from military service for a year; hence it seemed, also, as if this man could not be required to leave his young wife. If it should, however, be therefore supposed that his excuse was a valid one, we would cite the unimprovable dictum of Lange, "Exegetical pedants often take great pains to represent as reasonable what the Gospel depicts as foolish." Besides, the invitation had been accepted before the marriage was concluded; and marriage released a man from military service, but did not exclude him from the pleasures of social intercourse. If necessary, he might have brought his wife with him; or, if she refused to accompany him, this would be a case to which Matt. x. 37 would apply. No wonder, then, that the vocator accuses this guilty self-excuser to his lord, no less than the two former.

9. Into the streets and lanes.—The second class of invited guests must still be found within the city. Hence, it is apparent that Jews are intended, and not proselytes from among the heathen (Lisco). The Lord is thinking of the publicans and sinners (comp. Luke vii. 29; Matt. xxi. 32), and the poorest part of the nation: those whom the Pharisee ought to have invited to his feast, vers. 12, 13. This plainly shows that those formerly invited (ver. 17), who began ἀπὸ μιᾶς to make excuse, were not the people of Israel, but the representatives of the theocracy, the scribes and Pharisees, the 'Ιουδαῖοι of John, to whom, as was fitting, the invitation was officially made, and whom their very office obliged to take due notice of it. From those now invited in their place, no such excuses were to be feared. The blind could not go to see his ground, nor the lame follow his oxen, the maimed would have no wife to hinder him: the feeling of poverty alone could have hindered them; but this difficulty is obviated by the servants being directed to bring them in.

10. Lord, it is done.—We must coincide, with Meyer, in the remark, that the servant by no means went away after the Lord's second command (according to the usual explanations), and returned again. "No, the servant, repulsed by the first invited guests, did, of his own accord, what the Lord now bids him do; so that he could immediately reply to this injunction, It is done, etc. This also strikingly applies to Jesus, who fulfilled this counsel of God, known to Himself, before His return to the Father." According to this view, the parable becomes a faithful transcript of reality, and says, in other words, the same as ch. vii. 29, 30. It is a very delicate feature of this delineation, that it is not the lord who directs the attention of the servant, but the servant who directs the attention of the lord, to the fact that yet there is room. So great was the feast, that though many had excused themselves, and not a few had been brought in, there was still room for others. The ardour of redeeming love for the salvation of sinners is also perceived in the "Go out quickly" of ver. 21; which ταχέως is omitted in the command following (ver. 23), because the work of grace among the χωλοί, etc., of Israel, was limited to a very short space of time, while the call of the Gentiles, on the contrary, would extend over many centuries.

11. Into the highways and hedges.—Those who were longing for salvation among the unhappy heathen are here intended: Matt. xxii. 9; Eph. ii. 12. "Sæpes mendicorum parietes." Bengel.

12. Compel them to come in.—The use made of these words to justify the forcible coercion of heretics, is well known. It scarcely needs remarking, that only a moral constraint can be justified by them. It was thus, and not by physical force, that Jesus constrained His disciples to go away in the ship, Matt. xiv. 22; Mark vi. 45. Peter also compelled the Gentiles to ἰουδαΐζειν, exclusively by the power of his example. Not the manner in which Saul was zealous for Judaism, but that in which he was zealous for Christianity, must be the model of him who would enter into the spirit of the "compelle intrare." The house must be filled with such as are neither dragged nor carried in, but persuaded to enter by the power of love.

13. For I say unto you, etc.—It is a question, whether we are to consider these words as spoken by the lord of the servants (Bengel, Grotius, De Wette, Olshausen, Meyer), or as the words of the Lord Jesus Himself (Kuinoel, Paulus, Stier). The former idea is favoured by the fact, that Jesus is represented in this parable, not as the lord, but as the servant (ver. 17), and that the δεῖπνόν μου sounds somewhat harshly in His mouth; the latter, by the solemn tone of this assertion, and by the ὑμῖν,—there being not the slightest indication in the parable of more servants than one, to justify the use of this word. Our own preference is for the latter view; and, far from regarding the sudden transition from the figure to the thing intended as any detriment to the form of the parable, since this may without difficulty be regarded as terminating at ver. 23, the change of the speaker seems to us an additional beauty. The Lord suddenly, we could almost say involuntarily, discloses His purpose, and expresses, without disguise, His conviction of that truth which was the foundation of the parable. A glance at the calling of the Gentiles presents a glorious prospect to His mind; while the contrast it presents to the rejection of Israel moves Him so deeply, that He suddenly lets fall the veil which had hitherto obscured this truth under the words of the parable. O ye unthankful ones! He seems to say, it was My supper to which you were invited; it was for My honour, who invited you, that it was prepared; but it is your own fault that you will never taste it. It is as though this truth had become too mighty in the Lord's eyes to be any longer clothed in figurative language. Thus this discourse at the table fitly concludes with the personal testimony of the Lord Jesus; and we need not be surprised, if we consider the slight echo it would meet with in such a circle as this, to find Him (ver. 25) immediately afterwards resuming His journey.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The comparison of the kingdom of heaven to a δεῖπνον is specially appropriate for representing the peculiar nature of this kingdom under its most attractive aspect. It is a kingdom of perfect satisfaction, of blissful joy, and of glorious society. Hence the behaviour of those first called into it is the more unpardonable and absurd.

2. The mutual relations of divine love, and divine wrath, are strikingly depicted under the image of the master of the feast. The more free, unlimited, and pressing the invitation, the more violent would be the wrath arising from the love which gave it; but this wrath leads again to a fresh and more expansive manifestation of love, which is determined to gain its glorious end at any cost. "He has made such preparations, that He must have guests to eat, drink, and be merry, though He should have to make them out of stones." Luther.

3. The representation of the Lord under the image of a servant, inviting guests to the feast of the kingdom of heaven, is, if considered in the light of the Old Testament, one of the most distinguished testimonies of Jesus to His own person and dignity. Comp. Prov. ix. 1–5; Isa. lv. 1, 2.

4. The call to the kingdom of God is one made in all good faith: otherwise the anger of the Lord would be incomprehensible; it is pressing, for no means must be left untried for filling the house; hence it is also one, whose inexcusable rejection will bring untold misery upon the contumacious. It is a decretum irrevocabile, that such shall not taste of the supper.

5. This parable contains important instruction for all messengers of the Gospel. They are to invite with all the urgency of love, excluding none who do not exclude themselves. They must be prepared for manifold opposition; but order themselves, in every case, according to their Lord's directions. If they are repulsed, they can confidently complain to Him; and never must they entertain the idea, that there is no room for any one. And if they are but conscious that, in this urgent appeal of love, they make use of no unlawful means, they need not fear that they can go too far. Comp. Luke xxiv. 29; Acts xvi. 15; 2 Tim. iv. 2.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

To appreciate the blessedness of others, and to become sharers of it, two very different things.—We may utter great truths, without being ourselves of the truth.—Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God: He finds, 1. full satisfaction, 2. joy, 3. companionship.—The great repast in the kingdom of heaven is, 1. lovingly prepared, 2. urgently offered, 3. unthankfully rejected, yet, 4. still open to acceptance.—Many are called, few chosen. The order of events in the history of the kingdom of God, 1. before, 2. during, 3. after, the appearing of Christ.—Many first shall be last, and the last first.—The call to the kingdom of heaven, 1. a widely given, 2. a real, an urgent, 3. an obligatory call.—The loving message of the New Testament: 1. All things are now ready; 2. all things are now ready; 3. all things are now ready; 4. all things are now ready for all who will only come.—The art of making excuse, 1. an ancient art, Gen. iii. 7, xiii. 2; 2. a universal art; 3. an unavailing art.—The excuses: 1 Their outward difference; 2. their inward similarity.—The excuses: 1. Numerous in quantity; 2. worthless in quality; 3. ruinous in their results.—The more or less courteous manner in which we withdraw ourselves from the fulfilment of our calling, makes no real difference in the nature of our conduct.—I cannot: a euphemism for, I will not.—The wrath of love; love in wrath; comp. Rev. vi. 16.—Yet there is room! This saying, 1. a condemnation of those who ought to come, and will not; 2. an allurement to those who long to come, but dare not; 3. a warning to the servants never to cease their invitations, but rather to spread them as far as possible.—Yet there is room! 1. in the visible Church, 2. in the invisible communion of saints, 3. in the many mansions of the Father's house, John xiv. 2.—The happiness of the servant who can always say, "Lord, it is done as Thou hast commanded.—The revenge of the Lord when He sees His first invitation rejected: 1. The guests whom He invites; 2. the entertainment He offers; 3. the numbers whom He desires to see.—The sad consequences of refusing the joyful message: 1. We are deprived of the most glorious privileges; 2. we incur the Lord's anger; 3. we see others enter in our stead.—The command of the Lord, the motive of every home and foreign mission.—He who has wilfully excluded himself, will remain excluded.—Compelle intrare: the use and abuse of this saying; the degree and limits of the constraint of love.

Starcke, Hedinger: Wishing and praising will not suffice in Christianity. Doing and acting is what God requires, Matt. vii. 21.—Canstein: The call of God is so general, that it includes the rejected, as well as the elect.—Quesnel: Too much leisure, and too much business, are both prejudicial to the attainment of salvation. —The holy tie of marriage, which ought to be a help, is often a hindrance, to salvation.—The servants of God and the Lord Jesus, always take counsel of God in the fulfilment of their office.—God puts the greatest honour upon what is esteemed foolish and base by men.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: By the fall of the Jews, salvation is come unto the Gentiles, Rom. xi.—Canstein: God will at last despise them, who have despised Him.

Heubner: The exceeding love of God, and the contemptuous ingratitude of the world.—The loss of the time of grace entails the loss of eternity.—Man has no one to blame but himself, if he is not saved.—The divine call to salvation.—The truth: God earnestly desires our salvation.—Lisco: The love of the world, a hindrance to many who are called to the kingdom of God.—Arndt: The carnal mind considered according to, 1. its nature, 2. its position with respect to God's kingdom, 3. its blindness, 4. its punishment. —Zimmermann: Christianity the religion of the poor; for, 1. it makes the poor rich, 2. the spiritually sick, whole, 3. the spiritually blind, to see.—Dräseke: Yet there is room: a summons, a. to the poor, to be of good cheer, b. to believers, to assemble, c. to sinners, to be converted, d. to the good, to distinguish themselves (! ! !), e. to the mistaken to arise, f. to those born late, not to think themselves neglected.—Ahlfeld: The great supper of the Lord: 1. Wherein it consists; 2. how the Lord invites to it; 3. the excuses; 4. the sad effects of the excuses.—Burk: The upright conduct of a true and faithful servant of God, who invites others into the kingdom of God.—Fuchs: Come, for all things are ready! 1. The feast; 2. the host; 3. the guests.—Petri: What should move us to come, when God calls: 1. The greatness of His grace, 2. the earnestness of His love.—Uhle: The loving and the severe sides of Christianity.—Krummacher: Why do we not come to Christ? (Sabb. Glocke v. 2).—This paragraph is also peculiarly suitable at the celebration of the Lord's Supper; also, for consecration, ordina tion, and missionary sermons.

H. The Son of Man opening His mouth in Parables. (CHAP. XIV. 25–XVII. 10.)

1. The Address to the People. (CHAP. XIV. 25–35.)

25 And there went great multitudes with Him: and He turned, and said unto them, 26 If any man come to Me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple. 27 And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after Me, cannot be My disciple. 28 For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? 29 Lest haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, 30 Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish. 31 Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth, whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? 32 Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace. 33 So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be My disciple. 34 Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be seasoned? 35 It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Ver. 35. Upon the authority of B.L.X., etc., we would, with Tischendorf, admit οὖν into the text.

Ver. 35. According to the evidence of B.D.L.X., etc., καί, which much enhances the force of the expression, must be here inserted: "If even the salt also have lost its savour," which might least be expected, etc. Καί seems to have been omitted here merely because it is not found in Matt. v. 13 and Mark ix. 50.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And there went.—This whole paragraph is peculiar to Luke; and though expressions, such as vers. 26 and 34, occur also elsewhere, there is no reason for supposing that the Lord did not repeat similar pregnant expressions on different occasions. The parables of the building of the tower and the king going to war, which seem to have been simultaneously delivered, were peculiarly adapted to the greater multitude of followers who were flocking after the Lord on this occasion. To appreciate the suitability of this instruction, we must realize that period of our Lord's history at which it was spoken. Just about to depart from Galilee (see ch. xiii. 32, 33), He finds Himself surrounded by a continually increasing multitude, drawn towards Him either by the foreboding that He would be seen in those parts no more, or by the expectation that the Messiah was now about to establish His millennial kingdom, or perhaps by a desire of giving the Lord an unambiguous proof of their adherence amidst the increasing enmity of His opponents. But whatever might be their motive, the Searcher of hearts could, neither now nor on a former occasion, be deceived by a delusive appearance. He pitied the multitude, because He knew how hard a trial of their well-meant but superficial attachment it would soon be, to remain faithful to His cause. Hence, love induces Him to depict discipleship in its darkest colours, in order to save them from the folly of self-delusion, and to lead them to serious self-examination. Requirements hitherto exclusively addressed to the Twelve, are now extended, and indeed in a still more cogent form, to all without distinction. He who, after these seemingly repelling, but really attractive words, should not retreat, but persevere in his resolution of following Him at this crisis, would be doubly, nay, tenfold, welcome to this best of masters.

2. If any man come to Me.—Coming to (πρός) Jesus, is not the same as coming after (ὀπίσω) Him, Matt. xvi. 24. The latter presupposes a man to be His disciple; the former, that he desires to become one. The Lord's knowledge of what was in man, is shown by the fact that He treated those who were, in the proper sense of the word, coming after Him—for He was obliged to turn round to address them—as people who had by no means taken the first decided step, but were only, in the more favourable cases, about to do so.

3. And hate not.—Comp. Matt. x. 37. "The nearer He is to His end, the more decided and ideal are the claims which He makes upon the unstable and undecided crowd who followed Him." The lax interpretation of μισεῖν = minus amare (Kuinoel, De Wette, and many others), unnecessarily weakens the force of this expression, and derives no support from Matt. vi. 24. Compare rather what is said of Levi, Deut. xxxiii. 9. Hatred, considered in itself, is not opposed to the spirit of Christianity, but is so, only, when at variance with the command of the highest love given by the Lord, Matt. xxii. 37–40; John xiii. 34, 35. Hatred is attributed even to the God of love, Rom. ix. 13; while the Lord, who loved what was human in Peter, hated and reproved what was satanic in Simon Barjona, Matt. xvi. 21–24. It might even be asserted, that he who is incapable of hatred has never known the full power of love. This is the deep meaning of the famous saying of the tragedy: va, je taimais trop, pour ne pas te haïr. That the Lord does not here mean hatred towards our nearest relations, merely as such, is scarcely worthy of mention. Comp. Eph. v. 29. He is only contemplating that in them which irreconcilably interposes between the heart and His kingdom; while He defines His meaning still more distinctly by the concluding words, ἔτι δὲ καὶ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ψυχήν. All, then, that stands in relationship with the jurisdiction of the ψυχή, as opposed to that of the πνεῦμα, must be hated, denied, and abstained from, when it comes in competition with the claims of the kingdom of heaven. True as it is that we may love our relations in the Lord, and that faith does not loosen, but unite and hallow, the ties of family affection, it is equally so, that, not only in our Lord's days, but even at present, circumstances may arise in which the duties of faith, and of merely natural affection, might be so conflicting, that their union would be impossible. Comp. Matt. x. 34–36.

4. And whosoever doth not bear his cross.—See the remarks on Luke ix. 23, and on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark. We need scarcely remark, that this does not refer to all the sufferings of earth, but only those endured for Christ's sake.

5. Intending to build a tower, πύργον.—Not so much a tower in the proper sense of the word, as a high palace, a magnificent building; in short, some material creation demanding a considerable amount of means and ability. Entrance upon discipleship, and striving after the kingdom of God, are by this figure represented as impossible without extreme exertion and earnest consideration. The proceedings of the tower-builder are very graphically delineated. First, great design is entertained in his mind (θέλων). He then considers, not hastily, but tranquilly, what is required for carrying out this design (καθίσας ψηφίζει. Bengel: "Sedens dato sibi spatio ad faciendam summam rerum suarum"). Afterwards, he does not proceed to the execution of his plan till he is thoroughly convinced, from this calculation, that he really has τὰ πρὸς ἀπαρτισμόν, i.e., what is necessary for its external and internal completion. Thus, he escapes the mockery to which he would have been exposed, if he had begun, not indeed without certainty, but without due consideration.

6. Lest haply, etc.—In the next following parable, the danger and ruin in this, the folly and absurdity of unconsidered undertakings, are exposed. We can scarcely avoid the supposition, that some reminiscence of the builders of the Tower of Babel, Gen. xi. 1–9, was at this time present to the Lord's mind. While a decidedly Christian course of life compels the involuntary respect of the world, a half and half Christianity attracts its not unnatural scorn. The force of the picture is not a little enhanced by the Lord making even the mockers say δεικτικῶς one to another, οὗτος ὁ ἄνθρωπος, κ.τ.λ. The ridicule is more refined in the third person, than if directly addressed to the foolish tower-builder.

7. Or what king, etc.—It is evidently the Lord's purpose again to impress the same subject upon the hearts of His hearers, though the picture is somewhat different. The words themselves are easy to understand. Συμβαλεῖν belongs to εἰς πόλεμον; the numbers twenty thousand and ten thousand are evidently selected to express a comparatively important, but totally unequal amount of force; and τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην, = the former τὰ εἰς ἀπαρτισμόν, denotes not peace itself, but such conditions of lasting peace as he obtains from his too powerful enemy by supplication. With respect to the subject itself, we may perhaps distinguish between the two parables, by regarding that of the tower-builder as descriptive of the inner conflict of the Christian life; and that of the king going to war, of the outward opposition such a life meets with. And so far Bengel rightly says, that the first image is evidently taken from a res privata, the second from a res publica. On the other hand, it is mere arbitrary assumption to view the ten thousand soldiers as a reference to the ten commandments; and still more forced, to see in the king with the twenty thousand a representation of God Himself (Stier, Lisco). We cannot understand how it can be said, in this connection, that it is God who enters into the contest, while the ten thousand of His adversary are made to represent spiritual power bestowed by Him. The symmetry of the discourse imperatively demands that the ideas, not to follow Jesus without consideration, not to begin a tower without counting the cost, and to sue for peace (i.e., not to incur, but to avoid war), should be viewed as co-ordinate. Comp. Lange, Leben Jesu ii. p. 1041.

8. So likewise, whosoever he be, etc.—According to De Wette, the application is not sufficiently evident. It is obvious, however, that the consideration recommended by the Lord, vers. 28–31, necessarily leads to renunciation; and that the building of the tower will remain incomplete, and the war undecided, so long as any one is, in heart, still disinclined to this renunciation. It is because self-denial is required, that serious consideration is indispensable. (See the γάρ, ver. 28.)

9. Salt is good.—"Nil sale et sole utilius." Plin. H. Nat. 31, 9. Admitting the οὖν (see notes on various readings), this sentence is not an unconnected one, but is, in some measure, an application of what precedes it: comp. Matt. v. 13; Mark ix. 50. "Adagium hoc sæpiuscule Christus usurpavit, ut et alia ejus sæculi." Grotius. This saying would be less suitable (De Wette), if it were now addressed to the multitude in the same sense as formerly to the Lord's Apostles. Such a view is, however, entirely unnecessary; nor is there any reason why we should not consider the meaning of this expression as modified by the auditors to whom it was addressed. As the disciples were a purifying salt with respect to the unbelieving world, so was Israel (here represented by the multitude) with respect to the Gentile world. By the significant conclusion of His discourse the Lord would lead the crowds who were following Him to deeper consideration, whether, and how far, they were fulfilling this high vocation, and show them that, by persevering in unbelief and unfaithfulness, they were incurring the danger of being despised, as salt that has lost its savour, cast out on the highway of heathendom, and trodden under foot by the unclean. Thus understood, this figure applies to the mixed multitude, and expresses also a thought which was—as appears from the parable of the great supper, and more than one saying of the preceding chapter—at this time constantly present to Christ's mind, namely, that Israel would, in consequence of their rejection of the Messiah, be themselves rejected.

10. Neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill.—It is from this addition that the figure of the salt receives its peculiar force in this connection. It is the nature of salt that it can only be used for its own peculiar purpose, and is good for nothing else. The people of God, as well as every individual, if they fail to satisfy the requirements of their high destination, become not merely less useful, but absolutely useless. At the close of this address, such a warning was needed to make the audience aware that it would avail them nothing, although at first there might have been reason for hoping better things concerning them, if they did not obtain victory in the war they had undertaken, and completeness in the tower they had begun to build. He who should resemble the uncalculating builder, and the presumptuous combatant, would resemble "salt that had lost his savour." He is neither directly nor indirectly of any use, who does not fulfil the requirements of his high distinction.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The whole paragraph sets before us the high importance and difficult demands of the Christian life. These words are calculated to alarm the unreflecting, and to lead the light-minded to self-examination. What the Lord here says to His contemporaries, is of high importance to all who come to Him, impelled by merely superficial feeling. There is a remarkable coincidence between the instruction here given, and the answer made by the Lord to the well-meaning scribe, Matt. viii. 19, 20.

2. This instruction is of high importance, not only at the beginning, but during the progress and completion, of the Christian life. Many a man thinks that all is won as soon as he finds in his heart a beginning of the Christian life, the stirring of some pious emotions. The Lord gives all such to understand, that it will avail them but little to come to Him, unless they perseveringly follow Him; and that every genuine disciple is distinguished by at least two characteristics: viz., by not beginning till he has thoroughly considered; and also, by persevering to the end after he has once begun. There is much truth in the saying, "It is easier to lay down one's life, than to spend it in a Christian manner." Nitzsch. A beginning which does not lead to an end, means nothing: a good end is impossible without careful calculation, and continually renewed exertion of all the powers of heart and mind. Without these, we shall never come up to that high definition of the Christian life contained in the two words, "building, fighting."

3. The world's ridicule of so much that is called Christian loses somewhat of its astonishing character when we consider how much half Christianity appears in various forms, and with the assumption of being whole Christianity. As long as the city of God shows so many unfinished towers, and heaps of rubbish, it cannot give its enemies the impression of being an impregnable fortress. The world is quite right in its ridicule of so many, who have indeed a desire to be distinguished from it, but show no power to conquer it.

4. But what if, after due consideration of means, it should appear that the tower cannot be built, the war not undertaken? The parable does not answer this question; and we should, certainly, wholly misunderstand our Lord, if we should infer from His words, that, in this case, it would be better to abandon the building, and give up the conflict. The tower must be built, the fight must be fought, the kingdom of heaven must be sought, at any price, and above all things. But if the difficult demands of self-denial and conflict bring the sinner to the conviction of his own impotence, the Gospel gives us the assurance, that the Lord can Himself provide him with all that he requires; and, that what is impossible with man, is always possible with God: John i. 17; Matt. xix. 26. This whole instruction is well calculated to bring home to us that prayer of one of the Fathers: "da, quod jubes, et jube, quod vis."

5. Three times did the Lord warn His disciples of the fate of the "salt that had lost its savour," as He elsewhere spoke of the branch which is cut off, and cast into the fire, John xv. 6. To regard such warnings as idle threats, because they cannot be reconciled with the Church dogma of the perseverantia sanctorum, is as arbitrary as to lay exclusive stress on them at the expense of other expressions which seem to point out the very reverse; e.g., John x. 28–30. It is evident enough that, in the Gospel, the same matter is often viewed at one time on its theological, at another, on its anthropological side; and that the Lord's warnings are quite as seriously intended, as His promises are faithful and true. It is one of the most difficult, but at the same time one of the grandest exercises of believing science, to search more and more thoroughly into the connection between the freedom of man and the election of grace; to recognise, with increasing impartiality, the connection of the divine and human agents in the work of salvation; and, where the solution of every difficulty is perhaps impossible in this world, to do equal justice to the one truth on both sides, and to hope for the solution of the problem in a world where our knowledge will be no longer in part only, 1 Cor. xiii. 9. In no case can difference of opinion, with respect to this mystery, justify lasting separation between truly believing evangelical Christians.

6. That which applies to every individual, and to Israel, applies also to the New Testament Church, placed in the midst of an unbelieving world, as a purifying salt, to preserve it from ruin. If it fail of fulfilling this purpose, it is wholly useless, and deserves to be rejected: comp. Rev. ii. 5, iii. 3, 16. This saying of the Lord offers an answer to the question, Why so many candlesticks, whose lights burned with continually decreasing brilliancy, were at length removed from their places? It is Love that is speaking in the announcement of this warning, while inexorable Justice is seen in its execution.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Lord is as little misled by a great multitude of followers, as discouraged by the diminution of their number, John vi. 67.—The preacher of the Gospel must also set forth its stricter requirements, when he is followed by a mixed multitude.—The hatred and the love of the Lord's true disciple.—Not all who outwardly follow Jesus, truly come unto Him; not all who begin by coming, continue by following.—Discipleship on its easy and its difficult side.—The unselfishness of the Lord, contrasted with the short-lived enthusiasm of the multitude.—The demand of self-denying love to Jesus: 1. A seemingly incongruous, yet extremely simple, 2. a seemingly prejudicial, yet really profitable, 3. a seemingly arbitrary, yet perfectly justifiable, 4. a seemingly superfluous, yet thoroughly indispensable, 5. a seemingly superhuman, yet certainly practicable, demand.—How the Lord calls His disciples, 1. to serious consideration before, 2. to unreserved surrender in, 3. to constant watchfulness after, resolving to follow Him.—The Lord's disciples called to fight and build at the same time, Neh. iv. 17.—Better never to begin, than only half to finish.—Discipleship to the Lord, a matter of special and serious consideration.—We have to take heed, 1. what, 2. how, and 3. why we choose.—The Christian, a builder: 1. His plan of building; 2. the cost of his building; 3. the completion of his building.—The world's mockery of a half Christianity: 1. The justness of the ridicule; 2. the terribleness of its reality.—The Christian, a bold hero: 1. The enemy; 2 the preparation; 3. the battle; 4. the result.—Christ, too, forsook all to be our Saviour.—The noblest things are exposed to the greatest ruin.—The rejected salt: 1. What it once was; 2. what it now is; 3. what it necessarily becomes.

Starcke, Canstein: Christ is not so much concerned about the number of his followers, as about their sincerity.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Self-love is death, and the self-mortification of the old man is life.—Believing, doing, and suffering cannot be separated in Christianity.—Brentius: God cannot be served by a great tower of Babel.—Christians, when they begin anything, should look to its end.—There is no lack of mockers at true Christianity; but let every one take heed that he gives no just cause and occasion of ridicule: comp. 1 Pet. iii. 16; Tit. ii. 7, 8.—Satan and the world leave true Christians no peace here.—It does not always happen that a Christian has to forsake all for Christ's sake, but a heart ready to do so is demanded from all, Acts xxi. 13.—He who finds his all in and with Christ, can easily indeed give up all for Christ.—Canstein: True Christians profit both themselves and the world by word and deed, Col. iv. 6; but pretended Christians are the most hurtful and useless beings on earth, like salt that has lost its savour.—Brentius: It is because apostasy and declension from Christianity are so little heeded, that the Lord Jesus gives so strong and emphatic a warning: O that they were wise!

Zimmermann: Important questions for all who would enter the kingdom of God: 1. What will you, and what ought you to build? 2. What should you fight against? 3. Have you strength enough to carry on this contest?—A sermon of Steinmeyer, Geistliche Vorträge, p. 122, on ver. 28.

The whole paragraph is very suitable for confirmation lectures. With respect to missionary work, it may serve as an answer to the inquiry, whether the building begun, and the contest undertaken, can be carried on or not. If the pro and contra should be weighed one against another, the result cannot be doubtful, while fresh direction is also given for awakening increased zeal.

2. The Lost Sheep, and the Lost Piece of Money. (CHAP. XV. 1–10.)

Partly parallel with Matt. xviii. 12–14.

1 Then drew near unto Him all the publicans and sinners for to hear Him. 2 And the Pharisees and scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them. 3 And He spake this parable unto them, saying, 4 What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? 5 And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. 6 And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost. 7 I say unto you, That likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance. 8 Either what woman, having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it? 9 And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbours together, saying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost. 10 Likewise, I say unto you, There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Then drew near unto Him.—The explanation, used to draw nigh unto Him (De Wette), is grammatically unnecessary, and has the disadvantage of creating a needless separation between this verse and that which precedes it. Rather, they were at that very moment occupied in approaching Him, and that, too, for the purpose of hearing Him. We have, then, to imagine an audience gathered in some publc place, at the time of our Lord's departure from Galilee, and consisting, for the most part, of publicans and sinners, to whom the Pharisees were obliged for the moment to give place,—a circumstance increasing their exasperation.—All the publicans and sinners: πάντες, not in the sense of all kinds of (Heubner and others), but a popular expression, to denote the assemblage of publicans and sinners there present. Comp. ch. iv. 40.

2. The scribes and Pharisees murmured, διεγόγγυζον.—Διά points out the murmuring of several among themselves, which would be plainly audible to others. The reason of their displeasure was, that the Lord was willingly receiving and welcoming (προσδέχεσθαι, in the sense of comiter excipere: comp. Rom. xvi.; Phil. ii. 29) men of ill name and reputation (ἁμαρτωλούς, without an article). This was the usual complaint, while the subsequent συνεσθίει αὐτοῖς denotes a special aggravation. He not only received them, but allowed them to receive Him. We need not suppose that the Lord had, on that very day, been present at an entertainment given by a publican, as Sepp, for example, insists; alleging, without any reason (a. a. O. ii. 169), that the three following parables were delivered immediately after the call of Matthew, and on the occasion of the feast given by him to the Saviour. The Pharisees are only remembering what it was the Lord's frequent custom to do, and openly expressing their displeasure at the fact. They thought that, by such conduct, the Master was lowering Himself, and showing unmerited honour to the worst part of the nation; while He was, at the same time, offending the Pharisees, who had occasionally bestowed upon Him the distinction of receiving Him at their tables, but who would now have reason to be ashamed of their guest.

3. And He spake this parable.—When we consider that the principal parable of this chapter, vers. 11–32, is only introduced with a simple εἶπεν δέ, and that the two examples from daily life, vers. 3–7 and vers. 8–10, have less the character of a complete parable than the history of the lost son, we almost come to the conclusion, that vers. 3–10 are merely introductory to the παραβολή announced in ver. 3, but not begun till ver. 11. On the other hand, however, we cannot overlook the fact, that Luke often uses the word παραβολή in its wider sense; not, i.e., merely as denoting a fictitious narrative, but also a parabolical expression, or an illustration from daily life: see, e.g., ch. iv. 23, v. 36, vi. 39, xiv. 7–13. It is, therefore, simplest to consider that the παραβολή announced ver. 3, was delivered vers. 4–7; that the Lord immediately afterwards reiterated the same idea, vers. 8–10, in another παραβολή; and finally, after a short pause, resumed His discourse in order to inculcate the same leading truth, and this time in the form of the complete parable.

4. What man of you.—From this commencement, as well as from ver. 8, it appears that the Lord appeals to that universal human impulse which impels man, as well as woman, to seek after that which is lost, and rejoice over that which is found. It is thus that he introduces the first of the three parables of this chapter, that of the lost sheep. There can be no doubt that the three were delivered on one occasion; and that we have here no chrestomathic grouping of parables, but a well connected discourse, having for its purpose the expression of one leading idea under different forms. On the question, whether the first of these parables and that of Matt. xviii. 12–14 were the same, see Lange on this passage. For our part, we cannot see what can be objected to the view, that the Lord should twice have used the same figure of speech: at one time, for the instruction of His Apostles; at another, for the confusion of His enemies. The two parables differ: 1. In form. In Matthew, the ninety and nine are left upon the mountains; in Luke, in the wilderness. Luke xv. 5–7 is also entirely different from the parallel passage in Matthew, and serves to prove that Luke communicates the more elaborated and developed, Matthew the simpler and original, form of the parable. 2. In design and signification. In Luke, the chief feature is the infinite love felt by God for sinners, while still lost; in Matthew, it is the gracious work of Christ for erring believers. According to the connection, the motive, too, of its delivery differs. Besides, the image is so natural, so taken from life, that we cannot be surprised at finding, even in the writings of the later Rabbis, an imitation of this parable. See Sepp, ii. p. 169.

5. Having an hundred sheep.—Ἑκατόν is used not merely as a round number, but also to denote the trifling nature of the loss, compared with the property still in safety. The Lord here depicts, in the most striking manner, the faithful love which seeks the lost; while His delineation is reported with a freshness which makes this parable really peculiar to this Gospel. The good shepherd immediately leaves the ninety and nine ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, the usual place of pasture for flocks, and seems for the moment wholly unconcerned at the great danger to which he exposes them. He goes after the lost one (ἐπί) for the definite purpose of bringing it back. Nor does he soon give over his exertions; he rests not till he has found it. His love is an enduring and continually increasing effort for the recovery of the lost. And when it is again in his possession, he does not unmercifully drive back the wearied sheep, nor even commit it to the care of the most trusty of his hirelings, but lays it upon his own shoulders (ἑαυτοῦ). He bears it joyfully home, and calls together not only his neighbours, but also friends dwelling at a greater distance. They had heard of his loss (τὸ ἀπολωλός, the well-known lost sheep); they must now share his joy, which even exceeds his gratitude for the quiet possession of his other sheep.

6. Likewise joy shall be in heaven.—Here, only generally spoken of, though subsequently, ver. 10, with special mention of the angels. It is remarkable that the Lord should here represent the joy of heaven as something still future (ἔσται), while in ver. 10 He speaks of it as already beginning (γίνεται). It almost seems as if He had in view the joy which He, the Good Shepherd, would chiefly experience, when He should return to His "Father's house," after His work on earth should be finished: John xiv. 2; Heb. xii. 2.

7. More than over ninety and nine, etc.—The question, whom we are to understand by these δίκαιοι, has been variously answered. Luther, Spener, Bengel, consider them: Those who are already justified by faith, who have repented, and are in a state of grace; e.g., Manasseh and others.—De Wette: The actually just; i.e., more just than the publicans and sinners.—Meyer: The δίκαιοι in a legal point of view, not from inward morality.—Grotius: Only an anthropopathic force of description, quia insperata et prope desperata magis nos afficiunt. In our opinion, such passages as Matt. ix. 13, Luke xviii. 14, should be compared. When we reflect, also, that our Lord's audience consisted partly of Pharisees, and remember the manner in which these had just expressed their displeasure (vers. 1 and 2), we cannot doubt that the righteous in their own eyes, who, when compared with a higher standard, would be found more sinful than others, are here intended. Comp. Matt. xxi. 31, 32. We do not see why we should not, in this as well as in other cases, allow that there is a holy irony in these words of the Lord; and that hence it is not till the third parable that He makes any direct attack upon pharisaic pride. The comparison between the joy over the one and that over the ninety and nine, which really is no joy at all, must then be interpreted like the expression, Luke xviii. 14.

8. Or what woman.—To show that it is not so much the actual value of that which is lost, as its value in the eyes of its possessor, which is the motive of the loving care with which it is sought, the Lord takes a second example from daily life; and now it is not anything so valuable as a sheep, but a comparatively insignificant δραχμή. This loss is, however, a more proportionably considerable one to the woman, since her whole possession consists but of ten such drachmas.—Δραχμή, the usual Greek coin then current even among the Jews. The Attic drachma = ¼ stater; the Alexandrine was twice as heavy. The former seems here intended, which in our Lord's days was often still lighter.

9. Doth not light a candle, etc.—The efforts of the woman to regain possession of her lost piece of money are very graphically portrayed from the life. We seem to see the dust raised by her sweeping, till she at length succeeds in finding the lost piece in some dark corner. The coin, originally bearing the image of the emperor, now hidden by the dust, and almost imperceptible, is a true picture of a sinner. "Sum nummus Dei thesauro aberravi, miserere mei." Augustine. For the rest, the lighting of the candle, the sweeping and seeking, belong so entirely to the graphic nature of the representation, that it seems almost arbitrary to see in them an intimation of the threefold activity of the preacher, the presbyter, and the whole congregation, for the recovery of the lost sinner. "If we will ascribe a deep meaning to every single expression, we shall often be in danger of introducing into Scripture that which it by no means involves. For, as the artist adds, for the embellishment of his picture, much that is not indispensably necessary, so did Christ also utter many a word which often has but a distant reference, and sometimes even none, to the leading idea." Zimmermann.

10. Likewise . . . there is joy, γίνεται.—The Lord is not here speaking comparatively, but absolutely, not generally of the joy of heaven, but ἐνώπιον τῶν ἀγγ. τ. Θ. Nevertheless, it is not strictly correct to adduce this saying as a direct proof of the view, that the angels rejoice at the conversion of the sinner. For the Lord is not speaking directly of the gaudium angelorum, but coram angelis. As both the shepherd and the woman rejoiced before and with their friends, so does God rejoice, in the presence of the angels, at the conversion of the sinner. But as the friends and neighbours rejoiced with the woman and the shepherd, so may we also think of the angels as participating in the divine joy. But if it is God, in the whole fulness of His being, who is here and ver. 7 represented as rejoicing, it cannot be allowable to refer this joy, exclusively, either to the Holy Ghost (Stier, Bengel), or to the Church of (God) the Lord (Luther, Lisco). We willingly recognise the applicability of the parable to both; but that it was the Lord's design to allude to the munus either of the Spiritus sancti or of the ecclesiæ, peccatores quærenti, can hardly be proved. It seems equally rash to see (with Bengel), in the friends and neighbours of the woman and the shepherd, an intimation of various degrees and ranks among angels, vel domi vel foris agentes.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. It is not without reason that the eye loves to dwell upon the picture of Jesus among publicans and sinners. It is a gospel within the Gospel, resembling in this respect John iii. 16, Rom. i. 17, and a few other passages. It is worthy of notice, that from the first the greatest sinners felt drawn to Jesus by the power of some secret attraction; how peculiar, then, must have been the impression made upon these troubled and dejected hearts by His character and person! It was thus that He manifested Himself as the Prince of peace of Ps. lxxii. 12, and so many other prophecies; and what the Pharisees account a failing, becomes but one cause more for our praise and esteem. The feast to which He sat down with the publicans is a striking symbol of the feast of the kingdom of God, Luke xiv. 21–23, and at the same time a prophecy of that heavenly feast which He will one day partake of with His redeemed in glory.

2. The parable of the good shepherd very strikingly sets before us how God seeks for His lost ones with a shepherd s faithfulness. Already, in the Old Testament, Israel had often been compared to a lost sheep—Isa. liii. 6; Ezek. xxxiv. 5; Ps. cxix. 176, etc.; while Jehovah had of old been represented under the touching image of a shepherd—Ezek. xxxiv.; Ps. xxiii.; Isa. xl. 11. So far, then, as this shepherd-like character has received its most glorious exemplification in the redeeming work of Christ (comp. John x.), we may recognise in the first parable an image of the earthly ministry and heavenly joy of the loving Son of man. But it is certainly going too far to find (with Melancthon) even the vicarious death of the Saviour, depicted in the shepherd, with the sheep upon his shoulder. "Ovem inventam ponit in humeros suos, i.e., nostrum onus transfert in se ipsum, fit victima pro nobis." Such an allusion could not then, at least, have been understood by any of our Lord's hearers. And yet they had no farther to look than at Himself, to be convinced that the good shepherd of the parable was no imagination, but a reality; nor can we be surprised that ancient Christian art should have laid hold upon this symbol with evident predilection. (For proofs, see e.g. Augusti's Beiträgen zur christlichen Kunstgeschichte und Liturgik ii.) Even the present moment showed how near it lay to the Lord's heart to seek the lost. "Ideo Jesus Christus secutus est peccatores usque ad victum quotidianum, usque ad mensam, ubi maxime peccatur." Bengel.

3. The Lord set before His first Apostles a glorious model of pastoral wisdom and effort, in what He related of the shepherd and the woman. Not till they should interest themselves in the erring and the lost, with similar love and desire, would they be sent to the great work of their calling. That they did not forget this instruction, is shown, among other instances, by the beautiful narrative of the aged John and the disciple Theagenes, which Clem. Alexandr., quis dives salvetur, communicates, ch. 42,—an excellent practical commentary on the parable of the good shepherd.

4. Both these parables, and still more so that of the prodigal son, are a substantial proof of the erroneousness of one-sided and fatalist views of the world; according to which, the finding of the lost sheep and the lost piece of money were so absolutely certain, as to leave room for scarcely any pains in seeking, or any joy in finding.

5. What our Lord here tells us of the joy in heaven over the recovery of sinners on earth, deserves to be called one of the most striking revelations of the secrets of the other world. The angelic world is something more to the Lord than a poetic dream, than an æsthetic form,—even an assemblage of conscious, reasonable, and holy beings, acquainted with what happens in the moral world on earth, taking a lively interest in the salvation of sinners, and rejoicing as often as this work of love is crowned with success. Their joy is caused by their knowledge that, by the conversion of even one sinner, the glory of God is enhanced, the kingdom of Christ extended, the happiness of mankind increased, and the future reunion of heaven and earth hastened. The Lord leaves it to our faith to calculate how much their joy must have been increased by the foundation of the kingdom of God on earth, and what a height it will one day attain when all converted sinners shall be fully prepared and sanctified. Comp. Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12; and the imagery of the Apocalypse.

6. If anything could yet be wanting for the complete abolition of every doubt in so glorious a revelation, it would be the remembrance that, according to this parable, the joy of God and of the angels at the recovery of the sinner is as natural as that of the woman and the shepherd. Apart from Gospel considerations, this idea is emphatically recognised and expressed, e.g., by Goethe, when he says, in the ballad of God and the Bayadere,

> "Es freut sich die Gottheit der renigen Sünder, > Unsterbliche heben verlorene Kinder
> Mit feurigen Armen zum Himmel empor."

7. See also the reflections on the succeeding parable.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

What attractions publicans and sinners find in Jesus! They see in Him, 1. the highest ideal of humanity realized, 2. the highest revelation of Deity manifested.—Jesus, even as the friend of publicans and sinners, is set for the fall of some and the rising again of others.—The good news of salvation proclaimed by our Lord's revilers.—See also the notes on Luke vii. 34.

The good shepherd, an image of the love of God, in Christ, towards sinners: 1. Its unexampled compassion; 2. its long-suffering patience; 3. its sparing tenderness; 4. its blessed joy.—"Until he find it." The highest aim of divine love: 1. How much is demanded before this is attained; 2. how heartily it rejoices when this is attained.—Rejoice with them that do rejoice!—The salvation of a sinner, the joy of angels.—The value of a single soul.—Reasons for the joy of heaven when a lost sheep is found. The angels rejoice, 1. for God's sake, 2. for Jesus' sake, 3. for the sinner's sake, 4. for their own sake.—The joy of the angels considered on its practical side. This saying of Jesus contains, 1. a striking revelation of the happiness of heaven, 2. a powerful call to conversion, 3. a strong incentive to the work of seeking lost souls, 4. a motive for quickening the Christian's desires after heaven.—How much the greatest unrighteousness excels self-righteousness, in an evangelical point of view.—The lost piece of money: 1. The surprising nature of the loss: it was lost, a. out of a carefully guarded treasure, b. lost in the house, c. lost almost without hope of recovery. 2. The suggestive nature of this loss: it induces, a. the lighting of a candle, b. the sweeping the house, c. the seeking till it is found.—The lost piece of money, a striking image of the sinner: 1. His original splendour; 2. his present fall; 3. his value when once recovered.—The soul of the sinner, the subject of supreme concern, labour, and joy: 1. No loss so great as the loss of the soul; 2. no pains too great, if only the soul be saved; 3. no joy so blessed as when the soul is saved.—The human heart needs the participation of others in its joy.—No sinner so mean, but he may become the object of the joy of heaven.—The love of Jesus to sinners: 1. Its objects (ver. 1); 2. its opponents (ver. 2); 3. its motives (vers. 3–9); 4. its sharers (vers. 7, 10).

Starcke, Quesnel: The chief thing we have to do in this life, is to draw nigh to Jesus.—It is right to avoid the society of the wicked, but we must not wholly withdraw from it.—Hypocrites are more difficult to convert than open sinners.—What a blessing it is to a preacher of the Gospel, when the greatest sinners like to hear him!—Osiander: The world attributes all that faithful ministers do to the worst motives.—The whole ministry of Christ, a directory for pastors (Pastorale): let us diligently study and meditate upon it.—Brentius: Returning sinners should be kindly and lovingly received, and all their former wickedness forgotten, Philem. 10; Ezek. xxxiv. 16.—Quesnel: The Church triumphant and the Church militant have one heart and one soul.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: A lost sinner cannot be easily found, the grievous sweeping of the law and of chastisement is needed.—Peccatorum lacrymæ sunt angelorum deliciæ.

Heubner: The spiritual intercourse of one who has the care of souls with his flock, is more than the literary activity which the world admires.—To hearken to Christ's words, the beginning of conversion.—Jesus everywhere points out the inconsequence and inconsistency of men, both in earthly and heavenly matters.—As the shepherd knows and numbers his sheep, so does God His children.—God does not wait for the lost one to come back of himself, but seeks him.—God never showed Himself so much as God, as Love, as when He redeemed mankind.—Nothing is too hard for love: he who loves souls for God's sake, and knows what Christ has done for them, will take much pains about them.—Quesnel: How does the joy of angels put us men to shame!—The thought of this joy should strengthen and comfort all who have the care of souls.—The diligence of men in seeking temporal profit, stands contrasted with their negligence in seeking spiritual advantages.—By the amendment of a single sinner, many others may be saved.

On the paragraph.—Heubner: Christian care for the salvation of lost souls.—Jesus receives sinners.—Lisco: How important is the salvation of every sinner to Jesus!—A Christian's love for souls, a copy of Christ's pastoral love for souls: 1. A copy resembling the original; but 2. a copy never equalling the original.—Palmer: 1. Jesus receives sinners when they come to Him; 2. Jesus seeks sinners before they come to Him.—Fuchs: The different hearts mentioned in this passage: 1. The repentant heart of the sinner; 2. the envious heart of the Pharisee; 3. the loving heart of the Lord.—Ahlfeld: Seeking love: 1. Whom, 2. how, 3. why it seeks. —Souchon: Jesus would make the righteous sinners, and sinners righteous.—Von Kapff: Joy over a repentant sinner: 1. The joy of the repentant sinner himself; 2. the joy of the saints; 3. the joy of God.—W. Thiess: Jesus receiveth sinners: 1. This saying is the central truth of the Bible, 2. the essence of Christian preaching, 3. the chief jewel of life.—Rautenberg: Who is found? 1. He who is recovered from his wanderings, 2. borne by Christ, 3. introduced into the communion of His people.—Höpfner: How great is the mercy of God! 1. He seeks the lost, 2. brings back the wandering, 3. binds up the wounded, 4. ministers to the weak, 5. keeps the strong. (Nos. 3 and 5, however, can hardly be deduced from the text.)—Burk: The blessed experience in spiritual matters: 1. I am lost; 2. God seeks me; 3. God has found me.

The paragraph is excellently adapted for sacramental sermons.

3. The Prodigal Son. (Chap. xv. 11–32.)

11 And He said, A certain man had two sons: 12 And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. 13 And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living. 14 And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want. 15 And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. 16 And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. 17 And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough, and to spare, and I perish with hunger! 18 I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, 19 And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. 20 And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. 21 And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. 22 But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: 23 And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: 24 For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry. 25 Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing. 26 And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. 27 And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound. 28 And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and entreated him. 29 And he answering, said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee; neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: 30 But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. 31 And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. 32 It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

Ver. 17. We agree with Griesbach, Scholz, and Meyer, that ὧδε must be admitted into the text, but that it should stand before λιμῷ.

Ver. 19. There is not sufficient evidence for καί: its omission makes the prodigal's self-communing to consist of more broken sentences, increasing its beauty.

Ver. 21. See note on ver. 19.

Ver. 22. τὴν should be omitted before στολήν, see Tischendorf; thus the στολή is first spoken of generally, and τὴν πρώτην added in apposition. See Winer, Gramm. § 19, 4. Though the addition ταχύ (D. ταχέως) has some evidence of weight (B.L.X., etc.), yet it is very probable that this word was a later insertion, to add force to the words of the father.

Ver. 29. αὐτοῦ should, according to Lachmann and Tischendorf, be received into the text, on the authority of A.B.D.P. and others.

Ver. 30. Ἐρίφιον, according to the more refined and internally probable reading of B. and Ewald.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. A certain man.—This simple, unassuming commencement of this most beautiful of all parables, is a beauty in itself. The man is an image of God; the Son anthropomorphises the Father in a manner quite peculiar. The two sons do not exactly denote the Jews and heathen (Augustine, Bede, and the Tubingen school), nor angels and men (Herberger); but the assembly of men then present before our Lord, as divided into publicans and Pharisees. Strictly taken, these are both prodigal sons; the one lost by the unrighteousness which debases him, the other by the self-righteousness which blinds him.

2. The younger.—The more light-minded, and hence the more easily seduced. He desires to have present possession of the property that would fall to him at his father's death, in order to be quite at liberty, and his own master.—Τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος, a somewhat strange, yet genuinely Greek expression (see Grotius), denoting that share of his father's possessions which he may lawfully claim as his property.—And he divided unto them, αὐτοῖς, and, therefore, not only to the younger, but to the elder also; with this difference, however, that the younger now had his share under his own control, while that of the elder, though he might look upon his share as his own property, still remained under his father's management.

3. Gathered all together.—We soon see what the younger really meant to do. A mistaken desire for freedom, which the father did not thwart, led him to seek his happiness elsewhere. He gathered all together, and went away as far as possible from his home. The far country is a symbol of the sinner's wide departure from God. The beauty of the parable is enhanced by the tender forbearance which abstains from depicting, by a circumstantial narration, the depth of his degeneracy, of which, indeed, we have no details till afterwards, from the mouth of the elder son. His manner of life is plainly enough characterized as ἀσώτως, a word only appearing here, but sufficiently explained by the use of the substantive, Eph. v. 15; Tit. i. 16; 1 Pet. iv. 4. Thus his inward was as great as his outward separation from his father. "Qui se a Christo separat, exul est patriæ, civis est mundi." Ambrose.

4. And when . . . a mighty famine.—The natural consequences of such a course of life were but hastened by the famine that arose. (Ἰσχυρὰ λιμός, here feminine, according to the Doric dialect, and more modern usage; in Luke iv. 25, it is still masculine: the reading ἰσχυρός of the Receptus is only an emendation, in accordance with the usual custom.) The want which he now begins outwardly to suffer leads to the turning-point of his inner life. He does not, however, come to this turning-point until he has made a last and desperate effort to save himself from want, by means of his own exertions.

5. And joined himself, ἐκολλήθη, adhered to him forcibly as it were, so that he might help him in his necessity.—He is left a stranger in the country where he has spent his all. "Quem reditus ad frugem manet, is sæpe etiam in medio errore suo quiddam a propriis mundi civibus distinctum retinet." Bengel. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. The citizen of the far country sent him (ἔπεμψεν, change of the subject of the discourse) into his fields (ἀγρούς, in plur.) to take care of swine, in which employment needful support ought not to have failed him. Perhaps this was an intentional insult on the part of the rich Gentile to the needy Jew; it is certainly a striking picture of the unspeakable misery to which sin reduces us. And yet it is this very depth of wretchedness which lifts him up, and it soon fares better with this unhappy being among the χοιρους than with the πορνας.

6. He would fain have filled his belly.—An undignified expression, but quite consistent with the terrible state of affairs, and so far adding to the beauty of the parable. Some of (ἀπό) the swine's food was now his highest desire, and yet he is not allowed to partake of it.—With the husks, κεράτια, wild fruits of Syria and Judea, used as food for swine; perhaps the sweet fruit of the carob-tree (caratonia siliqua, Linnæus), which, on account of its great abundance, was but little esteemed, and though sweet to the taste, was unwholesome. "The husks of this pulpy fruit (κεράτια), about a foot in length, were thrown to the swine; its kernels (gera, gran) were used as the smallest weight among the Hebrews."—And no man gave unto him (thereof), "either because the food of the swine was delivered to others, or because he was prevented access to the swine-trough by the harshness and avarice of the owner whom he served." De Wette. At all events, he saw himself deprived of the means of satisfying the cravings of hunger, the only thing which could have reconciled him to his degrading employment.

7. When he came to himself.—A striking expression for an inward change in the heart of one who had hitherto been, as it were, beside himself, but was now recovering from his delusions. Εἰς ἑαυτὸν δὲ ἐλθών, he repented (Luther). If the sinner would truly turn to God, he must first return to himself. He begins by comparing his condition with that of those so far better off: the μίσθιοι have bread, and even περισσεύουσεν ἄρτων; he, the son, has not even κεράτια. By the μίσθιοι are to be understood labourers, hired by the day; by the παῖδες, ver. 26, the lowest kind of household servants, who were standing outside and not sharing the feast; by the δοῦλοι, ver. 22, on the contrary, servants of higher rank, overseers of farms, vineyards, etc., who were invited to a personal share in the master's feast on the joyful occasion. Hence, it appears that the prodigal son was really envying the happiness of the very lowest class of servants. Now that the pride of his heart is broken, false shame no longer prevents his seeing his condition in its true light.

8. I will arise.—Not the primordia pœnitentia (Bengel), for this has already been denoted by the εἰς ἑαυτὸν ἐλθών, but the transition from inward to outward conversion. The sincerity of his repentance is shown, by its union with his still unextinguished confidence in his father's affection, by his seeking no special excuse, and carrying out his resolution without delay.—Against Heaven, and before thee, ἐνώπιον σοῦ; i.e., with relation to thee. Since, however, this relation was the appointment of Heaven (a general reference to the dwelling-place of the higher world of spirits), he feels, at the same time, how this holy and heavenly world has been outraged by his offence against the inviolable rights of his father. It is always a mark of the sincerity of repentance, when sins committed against others are looked upon as offences against our heavenly Father.—Make me, etc. He would not only tractari tanquam mercenarius, but esteemed on a level with one, in every respect; the emphasis being on ὡς. He would have no difference made between himself and the meanest day-labourer, and thus gives an implied promise to work with the diligence and obedience of a day-labourer. He says not a word about hoping, by this means, once more to deserve the name of a son; and hence it is rather an over-refinement to detect (with Stier) in this request the traces of self-righteousness. He is merely desirous to be delivered, at any cost, from his present wretched condition, and to prove by his deeds the sincerity of his professions.

9. When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him.—The father is represented as daily awaiting, with anxious desire, the return of the prodigal. He pities his unhappy son when he perceives, from a distance, his pitiable condition and tattered garments. The kiss with which he greets him (comp. Gen. xxxiii. 4, and Matt. xxvi. 48) is a sign of preventing love, shown before the confession of sin, which the father reads in the returning wanderer's heart, could be uttered by his lips. The conclusion of his intended speech, Make me, etc., "is, in fact, repressed by his father's loving behaviour; the son, touched by his tenderness, cannot bring his lips to utter these words in the presence of such fatherly affection." Meyer.

10. But the father, etc.—A ταχέως may certainly be imagined, even if it may not be inserted in the Greek text; see notes on the text. The father assures his son of forgiveness, not by an answer to his words, but by the command he issues, in his presence, to the servants standing near them. First, they must bring forth a robe, and indeed the best one (see note on text); the father cannot endure to see his son in these filthy rags. Thus he is reinstated in his former rank, for the robe was the long white upper garment of distinguished Jews. See Mark xii. 28. The seal-ring and the shoes must show that he is recognised as a free man (slaves generally went barefoot). The (τό) fatted calf can be used on no more joyful occasion than the present. All the household must immediately join in the feast; and it seems as though the inventive power of love would exhaust itself in the proofs it would give to the wanderer, of how welcome he is to the happy heart of his father. The reason of all this is shown by the words, For this my son was dead, and is alive again, etc. Death and life are, in Scripture phraseology, equivalents for sin and conversion; see Eph. ii. 1, 1 Tim. v. 6, and other passages. The father does not mean to say only, that he was dead to him (Paulus, De Wette), but that he had absolutely passed, in a moral sense, from a state of death to a new and higher life. What he had been, and now was, to his father—he was lost, and is found—is stated in the second member of the sentence, thus avoiding a tautological view of the parallelism of these expressions.

11. And they began to be merry.—Naturally at the feast, though εὐφραίνεσθαι, independently considered, is not to be taken in the sense of epulari (Kuinoel). The parable has now arrived at the point denoted by ver. 7 in the first parable, and by ver. 10 in the second; for the joy in the prodigal's home exactly corresponds with the joy in heaven, and before the angels of God. It is not impossible that this third repetition of the same leading idea may have excited visible displeasure among the Lord's pharisaic hearers, inciting Him to expand the allusion, already made in ver. 7, into the delineation of the elder son, in whose conduct their unamiable selfishness is depicted. Thus once more do human perverseness and opposition give rise to one of the most beautiful passages in the Gospels.

12. His elder son.—The less the Pharisees recognised their own image in the description of the younger son, the more should their conscience have held up the mirror to them in the description of the elder. The beauty and graphic power of the narrative have been already enhanced by the fact, that the elder son was not at home at his brother's return, but spending the day in hard, self-imposed menial service, and did not return till evening, when the feast was already in progress.—Music and dancing (without an article), as was customary at feasts in ancient times; comp. Matt. xiv. 6. He was vexed even by the fact that these should take place in the house without his knowledge; and, betraying his displeasure by his astonishment, he called a servant to him.

13. Thy brother is come.—There is no reason for seeing any secret malice in the servant's answer. After the example of his master, he accords to the returned prodigal his proper rank, and, without mentioning the condition in which he arrived, merely states that he has returned safe and sound. The servant certainly uses ὑγιαίνειν in a physical sense, as the father had spoken of life and death in a moral sense. He then goes on to mention the fatted calf, which he had perhaps slaughtered with his own hand, and which was perhaps to him the most important item of all. There certainly could be nothing in so good-humoured an answer, considered in itself, which could give the elder son any just cause for exasperation; it is far more likely that the occurrence itself was more than sufficient, in his opinion, to justify his indignation. This last feature also sufficiently proves the absurdity of the strange interpretation, that the unfallen angels are intended by the elder brother.

14. His father . . . entreated him, παρεκάλει.—Prayed him (Luther), called him in (Kuinoel), required him to come in (Meyer). This last interpretation, however, is rather too strong, since the refusal of the son would then have been, in contradiction of his own words, ver. 29, an act of direct disobedience. We rather consider that the father tried by gentle words to make him first think, and then act differently; comp. Acts xvi. 39. Thus the forbearing and untiring love of the father, who for his sake loses some moments of the festival, is strikingly contrasted with the obstinate and selfish nature of the elder son.

15. These many years, etc.—He is speaking with his father, yet the loving πάτερ of the younger son does not once pass his lips; but, on the contrary, he reckons up, with the greatest possible effrontery, his merits and services. He had probably never received wages, and had certainly not yet enjoyed the only true reward in his heart. It is worthy of remark, that his highest desire seems to be concentrated in a kid (ἐρίφιον; see notes on text); while he is looking down upon the disgraceful conduct of his brother. He evidently avoids calling him his brother, as his father had just done (ver. 32), designating him merely, Ὁ υἱός σου οὗτος, and lifting up the veil hitherto covering his sinful life. The father's love seems, to his ideas, to be concentrated in the fatted calf, which was of much more value than the ἐρίφιον he had desired in vain.

16. Son, thou art, etc.—Though self-righteousness has been already convicted by its own words, it is still further condemned by the affectionate address of the father. With a loving τέκνον, he seeks to bring his son to a more kindly disposition, showing him that his continual abode with his father, and his prospect of the whole paternal inheritance (ver. 31), should have raised him above these unamiable feelings. An entirely different humour from his present one was required by the nature of the event. It was right now to make merry and be glad, instead of indulging feelings of bitterness. The father does not say that the elder son ought to do so—the σε is omitted—but speaks generally of the moral necessity that this should be the case. By no means, therefore, shall the festivities be interrupted on his account; but he himself must determine whether, after the explanation just given, he still chooses to exclude himself. The father has the last word; and it seems as if the Lord intended thereby to inquire of His pharisaic hearers, How is the parable to end? will you always persevere in refusing to share the joy of heaven over the conversion of sinners?

17. With regard to the whole of this parable, it must also be remarked, that it very appropriately belongs to the Pauline Gospel of St Luke. "The Pauline representation of the incapacity of the νόμος for true δικαιοσύνη, and the need of another way of salvation through πίστις and χάρις, forms the best commentary on this parable." Olshausen. But the Pauline and catholic character of this teaching of our Lord has been sadly abused by the Tubingen school, to support its views of primitive Christianity, and of the peculiarities of the third Gospel. Ritzschl, (formerly) Zeller, Schwegler, and von Baur, have each, with various modifications, found in it a symbolic representation of the different relations in which Jews and Gentiles stood to the kingdom of Messiah. According to their interpretations, the prodigal son represents the Gentiles in their degeneration, return, and reception; while the elder son, on the contrary, represents the proud and inimical disposition entertained by the Jewish Christians towards these later called and highly favoured people. "Who does not see here the behaviour of the Jewish towards the Gentile Christians, and Pauline Christianity, as described in the Epistle to the Romans?" It is impossible to read the whole construction thus put upon these passages of primitive Church history, without doing justice to the rare talent and brilliant gift of combination which produced it. But even the most splendid edifice must fall without a firm foundation. This is signally the case in the present instance; and it has been well remarked, that Hilgenfeld and others have confused the applicability of this parable with its original aim and purpose. It is quite evident, and must be freely conceded, that a remarkable coincidence exists between the Jewish Christians and the elder son, and the Gentile Christians and the prodigal; but that it was the Lord's intention to refer to them, is opposed to vers. 1, 2, 7, 10. We might as justly find the image of the two sons in the Romish and Evangelical Churches. A trace of the Tubingen ideas is found even in Vitringa and others.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. There is no parable whose beauty and value have been more universally and openly acknowledged than that of the prodigal son. Nothing, in fact, would be easier than to give a selection of the enthusiastic praises that have been lavished on it, even by rationalists and infidels. "Let him who chooses, discourse, exclaim, and wonder, long and much, in the style of Lavater; how simple, yet how deep; how easily remembered in word; how unsearchable and inexhaustible in meaning; how dramatically related, etc., is this parable of the Lord, the crown and pearl of all parables!" Stier. Mindful, however, that that which is divine stands least of all in need of human praise, we would rather direct our view to the thing signified, and consider somewhat more closely the great contrast between sin and grace, exhibited in this popular, yet deeply significant parable.

2. Sin appears here not under one aspect only, but under two: not only as manifested in the widely erring, but also in the self-righteous man, who outwardly remains within the limits of the obedience required by God. This parable passes a sentence of condemnation upon every theory which would explain sin by the metaphysical imperfection of human nature, or view the fall as a sort of moral progress (Schiller).

3. The essence of sin is represented as selfishness, in the parable of the prodigal son. It was this that awakened his discontent with the prosperity he enjoyed in his father's house; impelled him to seek his own liberty, sensual pleasure, and honour; and rendered him the miserable slave of his unbridled passions. Two different branches grow out of this one root of selfishness: sensuality, on the one hand; pride, on the other. We see the former chiefly, and sadly developed, in the younger, the latter in the elder son. Sensuality abases man, blinds him, and at length leads him to the brink of the abyss. God, however, far from restraining the sinner's liberty, suffers him rather to walk in his own ways, and makes the bitter fruits of his wickedness available to his recovery. By seeking after false liberty, the prodigal was betrayed into his unhappy wandering from his father's house; by wandering, into miserable servitude; by servitude, into unspeakable depths of wretchedness.

4. The moral corruption of the elder son manifests itself in a very different form. He remained in his father's house, and outwardly served him; but was influenced only by a merely mechanical obedience, in which the impulsive power of love was wanting. He looked for his reward, not in the approbation of his father, but in the kid, which he longed and vainly hoped for. He proudly boasted of his imagined fulfilment of duty, though there was no heart in it, and this one want involved the want of everything; while he betrayed his true character by his indignation at the kind reception of his fallen brother. In his blindness, he believed that he had never transgressed any commandment, while he had been forgetting both love and mercy, the chief of the commandments. He loved neither his father nor his brother, and yet thought himself entitled to demand everything. This delineation of self-righteousness, as opposed both to God and man, is taken from life. On the other hand, the Lord exemplifies also the way in which God deals with men thus blinded and deluded. In His long-suffering, He bears with them; He kindly reasons with them; He does not immediately exclude them from the enjoyment of His fatherly favour, but lets them feel that they are in the way of excluding themselves from it, and that if they persist in their error, the joy of heaven over the conversion of a sinner shall by no means be interrupted or delayed on their account.

5. The nature of "a repentance not to be repented of" is depicted, for the instruction of all succeeding ages, in the image of the younger son. It begins when the sinner comes to himself, and perceives not only the depth of his misery, but the inexcusable nature of his guilt. Conviction of sin is, according to this parable, by no means a subjective delusion of the sinner, but the expression of an eternal truth, of the voice of God in the conscience. The father by no means opposes, but rather responds to this conviction, by a surprising manifestation of his pardoning love. Recognition of the nature of sin, as not merely a weakness, but an infinite debt, produces inward sorrow, 2 Cor. vii. 10; this sorrow leads to confession of sin, and this confession is combined with a desire of immediate return. It is characteristic of true repentance, that, even in its deepest self-humiliation, it is ever accompanied by a still unextinguished faith in the Father's love; that the good resolution is immediately fulfilled, at whatever cost; and that the son would, if possible, rather fill the lowest office in his Father's house, than remain a moment longer away from His home, seeking some happier lot. It has, indeed, been rightly remarked, that this parable especially "sets forth human agency in the work of conversion" (Olshausen). Nevertheless, it is equally true, that "divine agency is not lost sight of in this parable." (Lange.)

6. The grace of God to the returning prodigal is exhibited, in this parable, in its pitying and restoring aspect. The father does not, in this instance, seek his son, as the shepherd had his sheep, and the woman her piece of money. He has not to deal with an irrational being, but with a rational man, who must be brought to choose, for himself, the way of truth. The father has, however, been indirectly working for his recovery, by allowing him to bear all the consequences of his transgressions; he has, besides, been waiting patiently, and keeping both his heart and his house open to him. Scarcely does the son take his first homeward step, than the father observes him with a compassionate eye, goes to meet him (preventing grace); and while he does not refuse his confession of sin, remits so much of it as was painful and humiliating. He not only testifies his joy at the prodigal's return, but proves it; and not only pardons him, but reinstates him in the possession of the forfeited rights and privileges of sonship. Meanwhile, it is not necessary to find, in every separate feature of the parable, a symbol of some definite truth of the Gospel. He who sees in the ring a symbol of the sealing of the Holy Spirit (Olshausen), in the shoes the preparation of the Gospel of Christ, Eph. vi. 15, in the robe the perfect righteousness of Christ, loses sight of the distinction between a parable and an allegory, and occupies a position in which there is no reason against going one step further, and seeing (with Jerome, Augustine, and Melancthon) in the fatted calf a type of Christ. In this, as in other parables, a strict distinction must be made between historical intention and practical application. For further specimens of arbitrary interpretation, see Lisco on this passage.

7. The conclusions that have been drawn from the fact, that the prodigal son in the parable is received by the father, without the intervention of any mediator, are well known. "All the dogmatic dreams of the Supralapsarians and Infralapsarians, and even of the upholders of an atonement by blood, who have no notion of the infinite difference between divine and human justice, vanish, like oppressive night-mares, before this single parable, in which Jesus reveals the heavenly mystery of man's redemption, not according to a mystic or criminal theory of punishment, but anthropologically, theologically, and psychologically, to every pure eye that looks into the perfect law of liberty." V. Ammon, L. J., iii. p. 50. But as justly might a proof against biblical Satanology be deduced from this parable, because the prodigal is tempted and seduced by his own lusts; or against the doctrine of sanctification, because the parable does not go on to narrate the altered life of the thankful son in his father's house. Quod nimium nihil probat. Silence is not denial, and it is perfectly natural that, months before His atoning death upon the cross, and in presence of an audience of Pharisees and publicans, the Lord should have left this sacred mystery as yet untouched. It is acknowledged that He spoke but little (especially according to the synoptical Evangelists) of the chief design of His death and passion, even to His own disciples. This was among the things of which He says, John xvi. 12, that the Comforter should afterwards teach them to His Church. He who would use this parable as a weapon against the Pauline doctrine of the atonement, acts as foolishly as he who, pointing to the kindly dawn, should try to demonstrate the uselessness of the mid-day sun. To suppose that the Lord must have described the whole way of salvation in a single parable, is entirely gratuitous; while the Gospel nowhere teaches, that the Father was first induced to be gracious to sinners by the death of the Son. "A parable cannot exhaust the whole truth; but it may be said of the parable of the prodigal son, that the Saviour and Mediator are both concealed in the kiss which the father bestows upon the son." Riggenbach.

8. In conclusion, if we direct our view once more to the three parables, we shall find in them both rich variety and beautiful agreement. The first parable shows us the sinner in his pitiable folly: the sheep willingly forsakes the green pastures for the thirsty wilderness. The second depicts the sinner in his lamentable self-debasement: the piece of silver falls on the ground, and, though its impression is not effaced, it is hidden in the dust, from beneath which it does not make its appearance till after much seeking and sweeping. The third chiefly sets before us the ingratitude of the sinner: the prodigal returns his father's love by recklessly squandering his property. The sheep in the wilderness, the coin in the dust, the son at the swine-trough, all present us with images of the deep misery of the sinner. But, since only the prodigal of the third parable is a man, it is natural that here alone departure from God, as well as conversion, should be represented in its various stages and transitions. The divine love for sinners, on the other hand, is presented to our contemplation in all the three parables, though in each under a somewhat different character. In all, it is from God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, represented even in the Old Testament under the figure of a shepherd, and a woman (Ezek. xxxiv. 28; Ps. xxiii.; Isa. xlix. 15), that this manifestation of love proceeds; but the shepherd is more especially the image of love seeking, the woman of love untiringly labouring and caring, while in the father this love is represented in its anticipating, pitying, all-restoring character. In the description of what is lost, there is an unmistakeable climax: first, one of a hundred; then, one of ten; lastly, one of two: first, an animal; then, a piece of money; then, a man. There is also a beautiful harmony in the delineation of the persons who share the joy of the finder: the neighbours who rejoice with the shepherd, the friends with the woman, the household with the father, are necessary parts of the pictures, and all represent the angels sharing the joy of God over the conversion of even one sinner. In the first and second parable, all that divine love undertakes and effects for the recovery of the lost, is naturally represented as from its own point of view: in the third, it is the gentleness, beneficence, and sublimity of the divine love, as exhibited towards the sinner, which most vividly strike us; the object here being a man, whom love can adorn with a robe, a ring, and sandals,—traits which could find no place in the former parables. Finally, while the coin and the sheep could but exhibit a passive relation towards seeking and restoring grace, the spontaneity of the sinner, in his return to God, occupies the foreground in the parable of the prodigal son. The sinner's resolution to return is, however, by no means represented, after the Pelagian manner, as resulting from an isolated act of the will, but as arising from a chain of circumstances produced by higher agency, entirely against his will, and in which he feels the bitterness of sin. The conclusion of the third parable not only imparts to it an element wholly wanting to the first and second, but adapts it, as well as the other two, to the conviction and correction of its pharisaic hearers.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The parable of the prodigal son, an image of the history, 1. of each man, 2. of humanity.—The parable of the two prodigal sons; or, the two chief forms of sin.

The younger son: 1. The descending path of sin: a. pride; b. departure; c. servitude; d. misery. 2. The ascending path of recovery: a. humility; b. return; c. liberty; d. life.—The younger son, 1. in his father's house, 2. in the far country, 3. among the swine, 4. on his road home, 5. at the feast.—Self-seeking, how it is manifested: 1. In desires for a spurious liberty; 2. in shameless covetousness; 3. in unlimited indulgence.—The prodigal son first inwardly, afterwards outwardly, separated from his father.—Self-seeking only desires God's gifts; true love, God Himself.—The pleasures of sin are short; sorrow for sin, long.—The companions of our sinful pleasure stay with us no longer than our quickly devoured substance.—Outward misfortunes often hasten the discovery of the inward misery of sin.—The son of a prosperous family, constrained, 1. to join himself to a citizen of a distant country, 2. to feed swine, 3. to long after their food, 4. to find that he cannot obtain even this.—Coming to one's self, 1. the end of the old life of sin, 2. the beginning of the new life of repentance.—The awakening of, 1. the conscience, 2. the understanding, 3. the affections, 4. the will.—How infinitely better off is the father's meanest hired servant, than the sinner at the swine-trough, and even at the most luxurious feast!—"He began to be in want," the conclusion of the history of every sinner: he suffers, 1. the want of what he once enjoyed, 2. of what the world enjoys, 3. of what the hired servants of his father enjoy.—The resolution, I will arise, etc.: 1. How much it means; 2. how difficult it is to perform; 3. how rich is its reward.—Conviction of sin no delusion, but the expression of a terrible reality: well is it for him who learns in time to look upon his sins as so many debts to God.—Sin against others is still sin against God.—Confession of sin before God, felt to be a need by His repentant child.—The first step upon the path of conversion.—The Father sees us even while we are still far from Him. —The love of God to sinners, 1. a pitying, 2. a preventing, 3. a forgiving, 4. an all-restoring love.—God Himself longs no less after the returning sinner, than the sinner after Him, and pulls down every wall of partition.—The love of God spares the repentant sinner many a humiliation which he deserves, and would lay upon himself.—The prodigal son restored, 1. to his former possessions, 2. to his former rank, 3. to his lost enjoyment.—The best which the father's house affords, is not too good for the returned prodigal.—The children and servants of God must rejoice with their Father at the return of the sinner.—The service of sin is death; conversion, a birth into a new life.—The joy in the father's house over the returned prodigal is perfect, even though the self-righteous take no part in it.

The elder son: 1. How much better he seems than the younger: a. the younger left his father, while he remained; b. the younger devoured his father's substance, he preserved and increased it; c. the younger sought the society of harlots, he makes merry with his friends, even without a kid; d. the younger son comes from the swine, he from the field. 2. How deplorably lost he is: a. he serves his father in a servile, and not in a filial spirit; b. he has enjoyed his father's love, yet complains that he receives no reward; c. he asserts that he has never transgressed a commandment, while he has never fulfilled one; d. he boasts of his virtue, and thereby increases his transgression. 3. How immeasurably wretched is he! He is in the way of losing, a. his father's love, b. his brother's affection, c. the joy of his father's house, d. and even the fame of his seeming virtue.—Did he leave his father's house, and how have we to picture the rest of his history? Michaelis supposes it might be thus continued: that he left his father's house in displeasure, went into a distant land, and there became more unhappy, despicable, and criminal than his brother had been, was made a slave, and at length taken among a band of robbers.—How the self-righteous is opposed to God, and God to the self-righteous.—"Son, all that I have is thine."—There exists a moral necessity, which the proud Pharisee despises, for rejoicing over the conversion of a sinner.—Who is represented by the image of the elder son; and is it better to resemble him, or the younger?

Starcke: Brothers unlike each other.—Quesnel: How dangerous to desire to live on one's own resources, to be subject to no one, and to govern one's self!—When once the soul turns from God, its distance is continually increasing.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Many a young man goes into foreign lands to make his fortune, but let him take heed lest he come to shame.—He who will not be a child of God, may become a keeper of swine, and a slave of the world.—Hedinger: Want produces self-knowledge; loss makes a man wise, Jer. ii. 19.—Brentius: God draws us both by love and suffering; if love will not avail, sorrow and need will be employed.—A spirit in which is no guile is especially characteristic of true repentance; let no one tempt God.—A true penitent considers himself unworthy of God's grace.—Bibl. Wurt.: The door of mercy stands always open, and God is far more willing to forgive than we are to ask forgiveness.—Cramer: The mercy of God is great, but not so great that a sinner can partake of it without repentance.—Canstein: Joy in the Lord must be common to all true Christians, when they hear of genuine conversion.—He who truly repents, becomes alive again, and never dies, but lives in eternity.—Anger causes enmity, and, in the end, separation.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Hypocrites always think injustice is done them.—We ought not to reproach the penitent with their former sins, or stir up the remembrance of them.—Quesnel: Let us have a brother's heart towards our brethren, since God has a father's heart towards His children.—Heubner: The original relation of men to God, that of sons to a father.—"Omnis locus, quem patre incolimus absente, famis, penuriæ et egestatis est."—Without God, all things are but husks, even though they be sweetmeats, and served in gold or silver dishes.—The sinner finds no pity from the world, and its master.—No repentance is more noble, or more bitter, than repentance for our rejection of love.—The son came timidly through shame and fear, the father ran.—Pride in virtue is severe to the fallen.—A lukewarm mercenary feeling may at length creep in, even in the midst of long service for the kingdom of God.—The grace of God is never exhausted nor lessened.

Compare the explanations and homiletical hints, on this parable, of Ewald, Arndt, Eylert, Lisco, and M. Cohen Stuart, Utr. 1859. —Palmer: The parable contains, a. the history of all, b. warning for all, c. comfort for all.—The miracle of grace wrought for the sinner.—Beck: The sinner's way to life.—Maier: Light hearts must become heavy, and heavy hearts light.—Van Oosterzee (on the three parables together): The value of a single soul: 1. The loss that one soul is felt to be; 2. the pity felt for one soul; 3. the care devoted to one soul; 4. the grace magnified by one soul; 5. the joy caused by one soul. Hence it follows, that, 1. carelessness about our souls is the greatest of crimes; 2. care for the souls of others, the holiest of duties; 3. glorifying the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls, our most reasonable service.—Ahlfeld: The Prodigal Son, seven sermons between Easter and Whitsuntide 1849, Halle 1850.—Heubner: Three Sermons on the Parable of the Prodigal Son, Halle 1840.—Couard, Sermons; Karl Zimmermann, Four Sermons.—N. B. v. 18; an excellent text for the Lord's Supper.

4. The Parable of the Unjust Steward, and its application.

(Chap. xvi. 1–13.)

1 And He said also unto His disciples, There was a certain rich man which had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. 2 And he called him, and said unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward. 3 Then the steward said within himself, What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed. 4 I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. 5 So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? 6 And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty. 7 Then said he to another, And how much owest thou? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourscore. 8 And the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely: for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. 9 And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. 10 He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much. 11 If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? 12 And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own? 13 No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

Ver. 1. αὐτοῦ should be omitted, on the authority of B.D.L.

Ver. 6. ὁ δέ (But he), A.B.L., etc., Tischendorf.

Ver. 7. He said: the καί of the Receptus should be omitted according to Tischendorf.

Ver. 9. See Critical Notes.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He said also, etc.—There is no foundation for the view, that this parable was delivered on a separate occasion, and not in connection with the three preceding. On the contrary, that acknowledged crux interpretorum, the parable of the unjust steward, cannot be seen in its true light, unless considered as addressed to the same mixed audience of Pharisees and publicans, as those of the lost sheep, the lost piece of money, and the prodigal son were. A tolerably complete statement of the views of modern theology on Luke xvi. 1–9 will be found in Meyer on this passage, to which we would refer; also, to the Interpretation de la parabole de l'économe infidèle par M. Ensfelder, in the Revue Theol. de Colani, 1852. iii.; Stälbe, Versuch einer Erklärung der Parabel vom ungerechten Haushalter, Stud. und Kritik. 1858, iii.; and among Dutch expositors, an important treatise by the late Dr B. van Willes, 1842. In this instance, as in others, we prefer giving a simple exposition of our own views, to criticising the various and often very opposite opinions of others.

2. Unto His disciples.—Not the Apostles exclusively, but the wider circle of Christ's hearers and followers. See ch. xiv. 26, 27, 33; John vi. 66, and other passages; and comp. also Luke xvii. 1 with ver. 5. We have therefore to imagine our Lord as still surrounded by the publicans to whom He had addressed words of consolation, and the Pharisees whom He had just put to confusion. His design was to direct the attention of the former to the deep obligation laid upon them, as His disciples, to make restitution, as far as possible, of all they had obtained by extortion or dishonesty; and to reclaim the latter from their love of worldly wealth, by reminding them that they were but stewards, to whom a day of reckoning was appointed; and thus to lead both to the practice of that wise foresight, which He depicts in the parable of the unjust steward.

3. A certain rich man.—Neither the Romans (Schleiermacher), nor the Roman emperor (Grossmann), nor the devil (Olshausen), nor Mammon (Meyer),—the μαμμωνᾶς τῆς ἀδικ. is rather on a level with the ὑπάρχοντα of the rich man, ver. 1,—but God, who is here represented as the original proprietor of all that is lent to man for his use. The οἰκονόμος represents, not the μαθηταί of the Lord exclusively, but every man to whom the original Proprietor entrusts a portion of His goods.

4. A steward.—The wealth of the lord in the parable is shown by the fact of his needing an οἰκονόμος. The property which the latter had to manage, did not consist merely of ready money, but of tracts of land, which he let for such terms as seemed right to him, without acquainting his lord with the conditions of the agreement. Hence we must not look upon him as upon a steward in these days, who is continually rendering account, and deciding nothing on his own responsibility, but rather as one in whom his master had hitherto reposed entire confidence, and of whom he had required no account until, being convinced of his unfaithfulness, he had determined to dismiss him. If, then, the steward were invested with such full power, there is no reason for supposing that he had exhibited forged contracts, as it is more probable that, in those early times, these would not have been laid before the owner. How then had he wasted the ὑπάρχοντα? He had made the tenants pay more than he had handed over to his lord as rent; he had exacted from them an excessive, and paid to him a moderate sum, appropriating the difference between his receipts and payments to his own use. He had not, however, enriched himself,—for he found himself reduced to beggary by dismissal from office,—but had lived expensively and luxuriously on what he had thus appropriated, until his lord, by what means we are not told, obtained information of his base conduct. His lord now demanded of him the account which he well knew he was obliged to render (τὸν λόγον), and threatened him with dismissal. In this account, then, the agreements would be for the first time inspected; and dismissal must naturally follow, if a comparison of the contracts with the sums paid in should betray his treachery; but would, on the contrary, be unnecessary, if it were shown, by their agreement, that the suspicion entertained was unfounded. It must be kept in view that his dismissal was not yet irrevocably pronounced, but only threatened; it was not to precede the rendering up of the account, however this might turn out, but to follow it, if the steward could not clear himself. This is evident, first, from the very nature of the occurrence, since the Lord, by thus acting upon a mere report, and not affording an opportunity of vindication, would have been as unjust as his steward, which Jesus by no means designs to represent him; and, secondly, from the expression of the steward himself, who only sought to secure a maintenance in case (ὅταν) he should lose his situation, and who, though he considered his dismissal as good as certain, yet ventures upon an attempt at balancing his accounts.

5. What shall I do?—The soliloquy, by which the Lord represents the perplexity of the steward, is very appropriate, especially if we view these sentences as spoken ex abrupto. "What shall I do?—For my lord taketh away the stewardship. I cannot dig; to beg, I am ashamed.—εὕρηκα—I know, I perceive (ἔγνων) what to do." And what is to be expected from a man who is held up to our imitation, entirely on account of his wisdom? He will surely try some means of either warding off, if possible, the threatened blow, and retaining his post, or, in case this should not succeed, of providing for himself in old age.—They may receive me into their houses. Not exactly into their families (Schulz), but οἶκος in the sense of a family residence, into which he hopes to be received out of gratitude. The whole soliloquy exhibits the steward as a man of mature deliberation. These reflections are not intended as an explanation, but as a description of the crisis.

6. So he called, etc.—Not in the presence (Brauns and others), but in the absence of his offended master; for if the steward had to give in the required account, time must have been allowed him for its preparation, and his master would have departed. His words also, ἐν ἑαυτῷ, ver. 3, can hardly be conceived of as spoken otherwise than in solitude; and the expression, ver. 5, καθίσας ταχέως γράψον, is evidently the language of a man desirous of making an arrangement before his lord perceives it. The supposition that the steward made good the cancelled fifty measures of oil and twenty measures of flour from his own resources, is in opposition to his own assertion, ver. 3, that he must beg, unless he can find some means of retaining his post. If the Lord had intended to depict a repentant Zacchæus, desirous of doing some good with the property he had so dishonourably acquired (D. Schulz), He would, undoubtedly, have put some confession of guilt into the mouth of the steward.

7. How much owest thou, etc.—We have here to imagine him as calling together all the tenants at the same time, but speaking separately with each. His dealings with two of them are given as a specimen, from which we may easily conclude how he treated the rest. He did not, as is usually thought, make the tenants write out new contracts with a smaller figure,—this would have taken too long,—but merely caused them insert a smaller number in the place of the former, either by the alteration of a single letter in the original bond—which the Hebrew numerals would easily allow—or by filling in a new one, ready prepared for the purpose. The numbers, 50 and 80, which he inserts, instead of the former 100, express the sums which he had hitherto accounted for; and he thus gained the advantage of having the contracts in agreement with the sums paid in to his master, who had never yet seen the original documents. The tenants, however, who had hitherto been compelled to pay to the owner sums which they had thought excessive, could but feel personally obliged to the steward for this reduction of their rents, which he perhaps represented as the result of his influence and intercession with his master.—A hundred measures of oil. The Hebrew בַּת is, like the ancient μετρητής, the tenth part of a homer, and is thus the same measure for fluids that the ephah was for dry goods.—A hundred measures of wheat. The Hebrew כֹּר, according to Josephus, A. J. 15, 9, 2, equalled ten μέδιμνοι. See Winer on this passage.

8. Write fourscore.—By these measures the steward did all that could, in so grave a case, be expected from a prudent man; for, in the first place, he repaired his former injustice, though for selfish reasons; and, secondly, he made it possible to give in the required account as soon as the contracts should be laid before his master, and compared with his books; and, finally, if the dreaded dismissal should still ensue, he had procured, by the benefits he bestowed upon the tenants, a comfortable support for old age. The Lord by no means says that, after he had thus concealed his dishonesty, he was actually retained at his post (Baumgarten Crusius); but neither does He inform us that he was actually dismissed (the usual view). This point is rather left obscure, because it was not the Lord's purpose to finish the history, considered as such, but only to hold up to our imitation, in certain respects, an example of due deliberation and prudent action in critical circumstances.

9. And the lord commended the unjust steward.—It is self-obvious that the lord is not the Lord Jesus (Erasmus), but the rich lord of the parable, who soon perceived how the οἰκονόμος had helped himself in a time of need. We must view his conduct entirely from the point of view of worldly wisdom, and imagine his lord commending, not indeed the motives nor actions of the steward considered in themselves, but the prudence of the measures wherewith he had sought to ward off the threatened danger.—The unjust steward. That this epithet need not necessarily be connected with the conduct just described, but may refer also to the unjust dealings which he had now laid aside, appears from the similar diction of Matt. xxiv. 6, comp. Luke vii. 37.

10. For the children of this world.—There is as little reason for doubting that our Lord represents the οἰκονόμος as a child of this world, as that it is for his prudence alone that He holds him up as an example. The reasons of the phenomenon here pointed out are very evident. It is "because the means which wisdom employs are worldly, and therefore strange to the efforts of the children of light; and because wisdom appertains to the understanding and to worldly experience, while the children of light live in the spirit." De Wette. —Εἰς τὴν γεν. ἑαυτ., i.e., when they come in contact with such as are, like themselves, the children of this present world. The children of the world are strikingly represented as a γενεά, a family of like-minded individuals. In their mutual intercourse, they are accustomed to act with as much consideration as the unjust steward; and in this respect they generally far surpass the children of light, when these have dealings with each other, or with others. The disciples of the Lord, as such, are called children of light, as being enlightened by the light of truth, and accustomed to walk in it. See John xii. 35; 1 Thess. v. 5; Eph. v. 8. The expression γενεὰ ἑαυτῶν, moreover, is not to be referred to both the above-named classes of men (each in his own sphere), but exclusively to the υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτων, in whose presence the Lord was addressing His disciples, ver. 9.

11. And I say unto you.—The perplexity of both ancient and modern expositors concerning this precept, which has even gone so far as to venture upon the bold conjecture whether an οὐ should not be inserted, thus making the Lord say exactly the opposite of what He really expressed, is well known. What He means, however, by make to yourselves friends, is apparent enough by a reference to the unjust steward, who had made friends to himself of the tenants, his subordinates. Even so, says the Lord, should we make friends of the needy, by showing them kindness with the money which has been so often obtained by unjust means, and devoted to shameful purposes. It is quite arbitrary, and contrary to the spirit of the parable, to understand this of the angels, who receive the pious into heaven. The Lord was rather representing those to whom benefits have been done, as going before their benefactors to their heavenly home, and enhancing their joy by the welcome they give them at their own arrival. By everlasting habitations we may understand either heaven, or, according to the analogy of Ezra ii. 11, the future kingdom of Messiah (Meyer); which, however, involves the difficulty of representing all the φίλοι, obtained by the mammon of unrighteousness, as eo ipso citizens of Messiah's kingdom. It is safest to understand merely a happy habitation where our sojourn shall be perpetual, in opposition to the earthly habitation which we must soon leave.

12. Of the mammon of unrighteousness, ἐκ τοῦ μαμμ. τῆς ἀδικ.—Ἐκ, denoting the means by which the friends are to be obtained; comp. Acts i. 18. The employment of mammon must have the result pointed out by Jesus. Concerning the word itself, see Lange on Matt. vi. 24.—Μαμ. τῆς ἀδικ. Not because it is ordinarily obtained by unrighteous means (Euthym. Zigab.), nor because it is itself deceitful and transitory (Kuinoel, Wieseler), nor because the Lord's disciples took too little heed of it (Paulus); but in the same sense in which the οἰκον. τῆς ἀδικίας was spoken of, ver. 8. 'Αδικία is the inherent character of mammon, which is here personified, and called unjust, because money, as in the case of the steward, generally becomes an occasion and means of unjust dealings. "The moral condition it ordinarily entails is represented as adhering to it." Meyer.

13. When ye fail, A.V., when it fails (comes to an end), ὅταν ἐκλείπῃ; for, with Tischendorf, we consider this, on the authority of A.B.X., the correct reading. The ἐκλίπητε of the Receptus naturally arose from the mention of the everlasting habitations, which induced transcribers to make this verb plural, and to understand it of leaving the place of the earthly sojourn. Hence, also, the translation: cum defeceritis, alluding to death. In the reading which we have adopted, the meaning is much simpler, since the Lord is then speaking of the mammon τῆς ἀδικίας: cum mammon defecerit, when mammon fails. It had done so with the steward; it would do so, sooner or later, with every one who should place his confidence in his possessions. This need not be the time when mammon, strictly speaking, forsakes us at death (Wieseler); but the time when it fails, as with the steward, ver. 4.

14. Receive you.—Δέξωνται, not to be taken impersonaliter (Starcke), or referred exclusively to God, or to Jesus (Schulz, Olshausen); but as little to be interpreted (Grotius) as though the φίλοι recipientes were the means of effecting the reception into the σκηναὶ αἰώνιοι (efficiant ut recipiamini), which would necessarily lead to the doctrine of the meritoriousness of good works, or to that of the intercession of the saints. As joyful a reception by friends, obtained by a benevolent use of money, is intended, as the steward thought he might depend upon. The friends are to be thought of as already present in the everlasting habitations, and as meeting their benefactors at the entrance, to admit them into their future abodes (εἰς). Σκηνάς: "sic appellantur propter securitatem, amœnitatem et contubernii tanquam hospitii communicati commoditatem. Non additur: sua ut, v. 4, domas suas, quia tabernacula sunt Dei." Bengel. Comp. John xiv. 2.

The saying, thus explained, must also be briefly defended against two erroneous interpretations. The first, the Pelagian, which would make our Lord say, that a place in heaven may be obtained by benevolence, no matter what may have been its motive; and that admission into everlasting habitations is granted to benefactors, by means of those on whom benefits have been bestowed. For, though we may make friends by means of the unrighteous mammon, yet these only receive their benefactors, and are incapable of securing them a place in the heavenly mansion. Nor have they, in themselves, any right to this reception, which is only given them according to the will of God, if they have chosen the way of faith and conversion, and this faith has borne the fruit of love. Hence, we find here no other moral than that of Matt. xxv. 34–40. With respect to the other interpretation,—the Ebionite tone which has been perceived in this parable,—the Tubingen school has, indeed, in the μαμμωνᾶς τῆς ἀδικίας, a fresh support for its favourite theory, that the Gospel of St Luke favours an Ebionite contempt of riches, and commendation of poverty (see Schwegler, a. a. O. ii. p. 59); but it is very clear that the Lord is not here representing the use and possession of earthly wealth, but only its prevailing abuse, as the source of unrighteousness. If an Ebionite spirit had prevailed here, we much doubt whether St Luke would have put in our Lord's mouth an exhortation concerning the faithful employment of earthly treasures, and an assurance that with this was connected the eternal destiny of mankind. If the Lord had really meant that temporal prosperity was, in itself, a thing to be reprobated, He would certainly have withheld the exhortation of ver. 9. Among the weapons which impartial criticism finds at its disposal, in combating an Ebionite interpretation of Luke xvi. 19–31, vers. 1–9 are by no means the least powerful.

With respect, moreover, to our view of this parable, we think it offers unmistakeable advantages, and obviates many of the difficulties otherwise accompanying this parable. First, it allows for much more wisdom in the steward than those which represent him as merely trying to secure betimes a future provision; he is seeking to attain two ends at once. Secondly, the words of the Lord are thus more adapted to both classes among the audience; for the publicans hear reparation of previous injustice commended as a work of true wisdom and policy; while the covetous Pharisees are put to shame by this delineation of a man, far above them, and yet by no means holy. Thirdly, the objection against the Lord's moral character, which the Emperor Julian in ancient, and many in later times, have founded upon this teaching, affirming that it sanctions, at least in some degree, the Jesuitical principle, that the end sanctifies the means, is thus obviated. For, though we should reiterate a thousand times that it is not the measures of the steward in themselves, but only his wisdom in availing himself of a measure (bad in itself), which is held up to the imitation of the children of light, there will always remain some cause of offence as long as we maintain (according to the usual view) that the steward followed up his former injustice by a fresh act of dishonesty, instead of making (as we understand it) some amends, by repairing the mischief he had done. How otherwise could we account for the fact, that the Pharisees should find therein no material for fresh accusation? If we allow, on the other hand, that the steward, from motives of self-interest, forsook his former course of iniquity, it must be granted, indeed, that he acted only as a mere worldling,—we read nothing of humility or confession of sin,—but it is then evident that an important lesson for the publicans may be deduced, not merely from his cunning, but even from his manner of acting; for in how many respects might that which the steward had done, from merely worldly considerations, serve as an example to them. Finally, it is this view alone which enables us to enter into the full force of the expressions, vers. 10–13.

15. He that is faithful in that which is least.—It seems as if the Lord were anticipating the objection, that He was estimating too highly the faithful application and management of so unimportant and transitory a possession as temporal property. To obviate this objection, He lays down a universal principle, which He proceeds to apply in the succeeding verses. It is impossible to be, at the same time, faithful in great matters, and unfaithful in minor ones. True fidelity depends not upon the greatness of the cause in which it is shown, but upon the conscientious feeling of duty in him who exercises it. He, to whom it is wanting in trifles, will not practise it on more important occasions: he, to whom it is really a delight, will esteem nothing, whether great or small, unworthy of his attention: comp. Wisdom v. 18. "All faithfulness in great matters, without equal faithfulness in trifles, is but faithfulness in appearance: the scrupulosity which, while it strains out a gnat, can swallow a camel, is no fidelity of heart." Consequently, and inversely, let him who would remain or become faithful in great matters, be so especially, and constantly, in all the trifles of his everyday life. This connection is an indissoluble one.

16. If therefore ye, etc.—The parable teaches us what kind of faithfulness the Lord requires in the employment of the ἄδικος μαμμωνᾶς, (see ver. 9). It is to be shown by our employing it, according to His precept, in making friends who shall receive us into everlasting habitations. If His disciples were wanting in this faithfulness,—if, in other words, they should resemble the unjust steward in his former dishonourable dealings, but not in the wisdom with which he made timely amends for his injustice,—who would entrust them with the higher and true riches? Τὸ ἀληθινόν is here a general term for the gifts of the Spirit, truth and light, which may be obtained by all, in the kingdom of Messiah: possessions, the management of which was first entrusted to the Apostles, but afterwards to every believer, in his own sphere. They are here called per antithesin the true, because they are not deceitful and transitory, like the unrighteous mammon, but perfectly deserve the name of true and genuine riches, and realize the very highest anticipations that can be formed of them. Comp. John i. 9; Heb. ix. 24.

17. And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, etc.—A repetition of the same thought, in another form. Mammon is here called ἀλλότριον, because it is not the property of man, who is only the οἰκονόμος of earthly treasures, which belong to the supreme Proprietor, who can at any moment recall them. Money then has only a relative value, and the ἀλλότριον of this verse is equivalent to the ἐλάχιστον of ver. 11. In contrast with it are those spiritual gifts, which the Lord, referring to His disciples, calls τὸ ὑμέτερον, because when once obtained by faith, they are to remain their inalienable property, in time and in eternity. "That, pertaining to your true nature, that, originally yours in the counsel of the Creator, and which is to become yours by redemption." Meyer. Mammon can never be called ours in this sense, because it changes owners with every generation, and often makes to itself wings, and flies away.

18. No servant, etc.—Comp. Matt. vi. 24, and Lange on this passage. A proverbial saying, like this, might be appropriately repeated on various occasions; and it has here a very apparent psychological connection with the preceding subject. He who was not faithful in that which is least, and did not apply the ἀλλότριον to the end pointed out by ver. 9, proved thereby that he was a miserable slave of mammon, and could not, for that very reason, be a servant of God, who requires that we should employ our property in His service, and in promoting our reception into everlasting habitations. It is the serving of mammon which chiefly prevents our using it justly, and to the glory of God. Perhaps some of our Lord's hearers might have been silently thinking that it might be possible to be truly His disciples, even if the precepts of the foregoing parable were not so literally followed: He, therefore, declares the impossibility of uniting things opposed both in motive and principle. It is self-evident that the faithfulness commended, vers. 10–13, is at the same time the best manifestation of the wisdom to which we are exhorted, vers. 1–9; and that the whole of this instruction thus deserves to be regarded as one connected discourse.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. If the parable of the unjust steward, independently considered, has been a λίθος προσκόμματος to many expositors, it becomes, when viewed in its true historical connection, a striking proof of the Lord's aptness to teach. This is especially shown, when we remember that this instruction was uttered in the presence of Judas, who bare the bag, and to whom this exhortation to faithfulness ἐν ἀλλοτρίῳ was one of special significance. He was here indirectly, but clearly, warned that continuance in the way of dishonesty must end in the entire loss of his apostleship, and of his own soul. At the same time, it is worthy of notice, that this entire representation was eminently adapted to the wants of the publicans and sinners, whom the Lord had comforted in the three preceding parables, and whom He would by this lead to sanctification. When He takes them under His protection, He is loving in his consolations; but when He warns them, strict in His requirements. He shows, as it were, to the once lost, but now found sons, how their Father holds festival at their return; but also how they, after being strengthened and refreshed at His table, must immediately return to a faithful discharge of the obligations incumbent upon them. If they had been hitherto mere hirelings of the Romans, they shall henceforth be looked upon as the stewards of God, called to the faithful administration of earthly riches as of His property entrusted to them. After what has been said, the fact of His holding up to their imitation an unjust steward can only give offence to those who, contrary to the Lord's design, carry the comparison beyond the tertium comparationis. In this respect, this parable stands on a level with those of the importunate friend, ch. xi. 5, and the unjust judge, xviii. 1; and it may be reckoned among the Singularia Lucæ, that in his Gospel only do we meet with three parables, in the interpretation of which the cum grano salis must more than usually be kept in view, if we would not be betrayed into absurdities.

2. The ray which casts a light upon the obscurity of this parable is to be found in the remark, ver. 8: The children of this world, etc. It is evidently the Lord's intention, that His disciples should learn from the men of the world that in which they are, for the most part, but too deficient; and indeed this parable affords ample material for comparisons very disadvantageous to the children of light. The steward, the type of a genuine worldling, does not, for a moment, conceal from himself the greatness of the danger which threatens him. Without delay, he reflects upon the ways and means of assuring his future lot. He rejects such means as seem injudicious, in order to reflect upon such as shall be better suited to his purpose. He is inventive, and knows with great certainty what he is really in need of, viz., a safe and easy way of obtaining a daily maintenance. He does not rest satisfied with plans and designs, but immediately puts into execution what he determines upon; and pursues, both in word and deed, the course which he thinks best calculated to promote his interests. He so arranges that he is provided against every event, whatever turn circumstances may take, whether he is to remain at his post or not. What a contrast to the indolence, irresolution, and want of tact, of so many of the better-minded, when the promotion of their eternal interests is concerned! It need scarcely be added, that the Lord here speaks of the children of light in an empiric, and not in an ideal sense; and, that this indirect censure is generally more applicable to his young than to His more advanced disciples.

3. It is a striking proof of the practical tendency of Gospel morality, that the Lord should have considered the use and possession of earthly riches a matter of sufficient importance to form the subject of three parables (ch. xii. 15–21, ch. xvi. 1–9, ch. xvi. 19–31), besides the various hints on this subject with which His discourses are interspersed. Thus much may be gathered from a comparison of these various passages: that the Lord does not disallow the possession of riches, and is far from sanctioning that ultra-spiritualism which denies almost all value to that which is material. But He seriously and repeatedly warns us that covetousness, no less than ambition and sensuality, obstructs and renders difficult our entrance into the kingdom of heaven. He no more rejects the rich, than receives the poor for the sake of their poverty alone; but would have both look upon earthly possessions, when compared with higher and better riches, as the ἐλάχιστον and ἀλλότριον. Compare the homily of Basilius, contra ditescentes. Moreover, it cannot be proved that a different view of earthly riches is given in the writings of the Apostles—e.g., 1 Tim. vi.; Jas. v.—from that found in our Lord's discourses.

4. The purity of that fidelity which the Lord requires from His disciples, is by no means lowered by His allusion to the reward connected with the exercise of general love to mankind. The Gospel is as far from sanctioning a sordid desire of reward, as from the, perhaps, very philosophical, but certainly unpsychological hypothesis, that virtue should be practised purely for its own sake. It is only as a stimulus, and not as a motive, that He brings forward what love may hope for as a gracious compensation in the world to come; and thus the prospect which He here sets before the repentant publicans in no respect differs from that which He holds up to His faithful Apostles (e.g., Matt. x. 41, 42). There is also a natural connection between love in this, and happiness in the next world, which must by no means be overlooked. The thought of the everlasting love of the heavenly spirits, into whose society the redeemed hope to enter, has more charms for a loving than for a mercenary spirit; and he who really makes to himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, proves thereby that he does not find his chief happiness in the attainment of selfish ends, but in the happiness of others. All these things considered, we shall find it difficult to confute what Luther says of the following parable: "It is not works that can merit heaven, but it is Christ who freely bestows eternal salvation upon those who believe, and show their faith by works of love, and by a right employment of their earthly possessions. As this was not the case with the rich man, he had no faith; and the whole parable, ch. xvi. 19–31, is thus directed against unbelief, and warns us against its dreadful consequences." The saying of one of the Fathers, amicæ sunt scriptuarum lites, applies here; and the Gospel doctrines of grace and reward are by no means opposed to each other. Hence it was a deplorable error to deduce from this parable, that all that was needful for the discharge of our debts to God was to apply our unjustly-gotten wealth to pious and benevolent purposes, and that a pious endowment, on the approach of death, would purchase salvation. On this error, which so soon insinuated itself into the Christian Church, compare August. Hom. 113, Opera v. pp. 396–398.

5. There is nothing more justly urged by the Lord than unity and harmony in the inner life of His disciples. True wisdom cannot be imagined apart from genuine fidelity; but as little can we suppose the existence of genuine fidelity if internal discord and division occupy the heart. When the wills of two masters are in opposition to each other, obedience to one must necessarily involve unfaithfulness to the other. The warning of the Apostle, 1 John v. 21, is, therefore, specially applicable to mammon also. When he who ought to serve, rules, he who ought to command soon becomes a servant. There is scarcely a sin which so obstinately and boldly disputes with God the first place in the heart as the love of temporal possessions. Comp. the excellent discourse of Adolphe Monod, L'ami de l'argent, in the second part of his "Sermons."

6. He who grasps, in all its depth, the Lord's urgent demand of fidelity in little things, understands, at the same time, the difficult and the easy sides of the Christian life, the simplicity and infinity of the demand of Christian perfection. This requirement of faithfulness in that which is least, is, in fact, none other than to be without spot before God: Deut. xviii. 13; Ps. li. 8.

7. The right use of earthly treasure, as here recommended, leads to that Christian communism, whose ideal we see realized in the primitive Church: Acts iv. 32, v. 11. The difference between this voluntary manifestation of compassion and the communist dreams of the present age, is as great as that between selfishness and love.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

God, the supreme proprietor even of our earthly treasure.—Man, called to be a steward of God on earth. As such, he is, 1. placed in a dependent position; 2. bound to exercise conscientious fidelity; 3. obliged to give in a strict account.—"Give an account of thy stewardship:" 1. An account of the blessings you have received, O children of fortune! 2. an account of the fruits of trial, ye learners in the school of affliction! 3. an account of the time measured out to you, ye sons of mortality! 4. an account of the message of salvation which has been sent, ye that have been favoured with the true light!—Heavy complaints are made against God's earthly stewards; and He who hears them all will make strict inquiry into every one of them.—Life, a time of grace preceding the day of reckoning: it is, 1. short, 2. uncertain, 3. decisive.—"What shall I do?" 1. the question of painful uncertainty, 2. of careful deliberation.—He who cannot dig must not be ashamed of appearing as a beggar before God.—"How much owest thou unto my Lord!" a suitable question from a minister of the word to every member of his flock.—"If the fraudulent alteration of human compacts is evil, how much more so the arbitrary alteration of God's written word!" —All have not an equally large debt to give account of to the heavenly Proprietor.—The wise are praised by the wise.—"Be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."—The phenomenon, that the children of this world often surpass the children of light in wisdom, is, 1. a continually occurring, 2. an apparently strange, 3. a perfectly explicable, 4. a truly disgraceful, 5. a very startling phenomenon. —What the Christian may learn from the worldling: compare, 1. the carefulness of the worldling with the carelessness of the children of light: "What shall I do?" 2. the recognition of danger by the former, with the self-deception of the latter; 3. the ingenuity of the one in finding wise measures, with the spiritual indolence of the other; 4. the decision and skill of the steward, with the continual delay and procrastination of so many Christians.—"The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser," etc.: 1. It is not otherwise; 2. it should be otherwise.—The right employment of earthly possessions a means of enhancing the joys of heaven.—We cannot, indeed, purchase admission into heaven with our gold; but we may make it instrumental in procuring us a welcome into heaven if it be already opened to our faith.—Even when earthly possessions fail, their rents may still be received.—Fidelity in great and in little matters indissolubly united.—The infinite superiority of heavenly to earthly treasure: 1. The earthly is small, the heavenly is great; 2. the earthly deceptive, the heavenly real; 3. the earthly the capital of another, the heavenly the inalienable property of the Lord's disciples.—Fidelity in his earthly, and zeal in his heavenly, calling intimately united in the Christian.—The indispensable necessity of agreement between principles and actions.—"How long halt ye between two opinions?" 1 Kings xviii. 21.—The inward harmony of the Lord's various demands: 1. No true wisdom without fidelity; 2. no fidelity without constancy in resolve; 3. no constancy in resolve without sacrifice; 4. no sacrifice without rich compensation.

Starcke, Quesnel: If we do not employ the gifts of God to His glory and our neighbours' good, we may be said to waste and destroy them.—Brentius: The heathen thought it unjust to condemn any man unheard, much less should this be practised among Christians. —J. Hall: Let no one treat property entrusted to his keeping, as his own possession.—The great day of account is before every one, 2 Cor. v. 10.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Punishment, deprivation, and condemnation inevitably follow unfaithfulness.—Indolence and pride are the two evil sources of the knavery which is so common.—We are often ashamed of that which is no cause of shame, and not ashamed of that which is a just cause of shame in God's sight.—It does not content the ungodly to sin themselves; they also seek to draw others into the snare of sin.—What we owe to the Lord does not belong to the servant.—Canstein: A worldling will hardly attribute to others the evil which he would not himself be ready to practise.—We may praise what is good, even in a bad man.—Brentius: A great and ingenious mind is a precious gift of God, and, so far, deserving admiration.—Zeisius: Be "wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil," Rom. xvi. 19.—The children of light have indeed light; but they have also their natural darkness, which makes them idle.—J. Hall: He who does good, sows to the Spirit, Gal. vi. 8.—Canstein: He who would do good must do it especially to those who will be received into everlasting habitations, and are therefore true members of Christ.—Let no one say, May I not do as I will with my own? 1 Cor. iv. 7.—God all or nothing. Heubner: The man who does unjustly has always accusers before God.—Riches without religion, an instrument of mischief.—Three things make the worldly-minded fear death: an evil conscience, God's judgment-seat, and the loss of everything temporal.—Serious consideration always finds means.—Heavenly happiness the real and everlasting treasure.

The whole paragraph.—Heubner: The Christian order of salvation: 1. Repentance concerning our stewardship, vers. 1–3; 2. belief in the judgment of God, vers. 3, 4; 3. sanctification, a sanctified use of all, vers. 5–9.—The serious warnings which Christianity gives to the rich.—Three kinds of wisdom: 1. That of the Lord; 2. that of the steward; 3. that of the Christian.—The obscurities, or apparent stumblingblocks, in the parable of the unjust steward. —Lisco: On the wisdom of the children of the kingdom.—Arndt: Wisdom for the kingdom of God.—Zimmermann: The children of this world our instructors, in that they, 1. provide for the future, 2. profit by the past, 3. conquer the present.—The Christian, the servant of God, and the master of mammon.—F. W. Krummacher: A sermon in the Sabbath-glocke, i. pp. 140–154.—Ahlfeld: 1. What to avoid, 2. what to imitate, in the conduct of the unjust steward. —Couard: The part of Christian wisdom, in care for our eternal salvation.—Rautenberg: How to secure a welcome into everlasting habitations.—What constitutes a faithful steward?—The unjust steward on the brink of parting with his earthly possessions.—Our resource when we come to want.—Steinhofer: The union of wisdom and fidelity in a steward of God. There are characters which have, 1. neither wisdom nor fidelity, 2. which have wisdom without fidelity, 3. which have fidelity without wisdom, 4. which have wisdom and fidelity united.—Burk: The great faithfulness of God even towards the great unfaithfulness of men.—The wisdom of the steward in the kingdom of God, ver. 8.

5. The Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. (VERS. 14–31.)

14 And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided Him. 15 And He said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God. 16 The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it. 17 And it is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail. 18 Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband, committeth adultery. 19 There was a certain rich man which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day: 20 And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores, 21 And desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover, the dogs came and licked his sores. 22 And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried; 23 And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. 24 And he cried, and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. 25 But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. 26 And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence. 27 Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house: 28 For I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. 29 Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. 30 And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. 31 And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

Ver. 18. The πᾶς of the Receptus, in this place, is but a mechanical repetition, rightly expunged by Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tischendorf.

Ver. 20. The words ἦν—ὅς of the Receptus are wanting in B.D.L.X., etc., and were for this reason suspected even by Griesbach and Lachmann. We consider, with Tischendorf, that they should be omitted, and prefer the shorter reading.

Ver. 25. ὧδε (here), wanting in the Receptus, is supported by a preponderance of testimony.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. They derided Him.—ἐξεμυκτήριζον—2 Sam. xix. 21; Ps. ii. 4; Ezra i. 53—an unambiguous, and at the same time an odious, sign of contempt, the cause of which is easily seen, especially in the present instance. The wealthy Pharisees looked down with contempt upon the poor Nazarene, as much as to say, It is very easy for you to speak of the use and abuse of riches; but we are by no means inclined to concern ourselves about your advice. The Lord's answer, ver. 15, shows that He regarded their sanctimonious pride as the chief source of this contempt.

2. Ye are they, etc.—A saying nearly like the well-known one of the prophet Nathan, 2 Sam. xii. 7, Thou art the man!—Which justify yourselves before men, etc.; comp. Luke xi. 39, etc., and ch. xviii. 10, where the image of a Pharisee, who would justify himself even in the sight of God, is drawn.—But God knoweth your hearts; comp. 1 Sam. xvi. 7; Ps. vii. 10.

3. For that which is highly esteemed.—Naturally the Lord is not speaking of that which is highly esteemed, and ought to be so, in a moral sense; but only of that which excels other things in man's eyes, which is in high estimation κατ' ὄψιν.—Βδέλυγμα, generally that which is repulsive and abominable in the eyes of a holy God, but, in a more particular sense, the impurity often united with the worship of idols. Hence τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως, Matt. xxiv. 15, Mark xiii. 14; and the union of βδέλυγμα with ψεῦδος, Rev. xxi. 27. The word is strikingly well chosen here, because the Pharisees considered themselves the special favourites of God.

4. The law and the prophets.—From the earliest times, the interpreters of vers. 16–18 have been divided into two classes. Some have declared against any connection between these verses and what precedes them; e.g., De Wette, who says: "Verses 16–18 stand alone; every attempt at pointing out their connection has failed."

Among Dutch theologians, V. d. Palm thought that St Luke, before commencing another parable on another page, wrote down certain isolated dicta of Christ, apart from any historical connection, in order to fill up the empty space of his almost finished preceding page. Others, on the contrary, have endeavoured, with more or less success, to point out the connection of these sayings, both with the reproofs that precede, ver. 15, and the parable which follows them, vers. 19–31. According to Stier, for example, "all these separate sayings are exactly adapted to their position." According to Meyer, the special difficulty is ver. 17, while ver. 16 is merely introductory, and ver. 18 an example which more definitely explains the preceding saying concerning the enduring authority of the law. According to Lange, Leben Jesu iii. p. 464, the Lord desired to make the Pharisees feel that their day was past, and that a new era had dawned without their perceiving it. The exposition of the whole passage by the lâtter will repay consultation. Meanwhile, the variety of these attempts does but prove the difficulty of the question. For our part, we have not yet met with any view of the sequence of ideas in these three verses which entirely commends itself by its simplicity and naturalness; and we therefore think it easier to explain each of these three verses independently, than to state satisfactorily why they stand connected, and why the Lord should, on this occasion, bring these subjects before the covetous Pharisees.

5. Until John.—According to De Wette and Ewald, not ἦσαν, but ἐκηρύσσοντο, or some such word, should be supplied. In any case, the Lord points out, not that the Old Testament dispensation was now abolished (Olshausen); but that, till John, the old covenant found a whole complete in itself, which, as a period of preparation, must now give way to the word of fulfilment, the preaching of the kingdom of God.

6. And every man presseth into it.—Comp. Matt. xi. 12, 13. We cannot agree with the usual view, that the efforts of increased interest, and of vehement desire to enter into the kingdom of God, are here alluded to. The connection (vers. 14, 15) seems to us rather to lead to the idea, that an inimical attack, manifesting the inward wickedness of the heart, is here spoken of. In the midst of the increasing opposition which He experienced in Israel, the Lord could hardly mean to say, that so general a desire to enter His kingdom then existed. But the necessity of understanding this expression in an unfavourable sense is self-evident, if we consider the parallel passage in Matthew in its entire connection. The βιασταί, the mighty of the earth, were not, in the days of Christ, really much addicted to the cause of the kingdom of God, comp. Matt. xi. 12–19; Luke vii. 29, 30; and what motive could the Lord have had for speaking of an impulse acting upon the hearts of many, among whom the Pharisees were not included? With our view, too, it is perhaps possible to point out some connection with ver. 14. The Lord would then say: However inimically you may be disposed towards the kingdom of God, which (ver. 16) was announced by the law and the prophets, the demands and threatenings of the law still remain (ver. 17) in undiminished force, and you will not therefore escape the judgment of God (ver. 15), who knows your hearts.

7. And it is easier, etc.—Comp. Matt. v. 18–20, and Lange's remarks on the passage. The Lord is not here teaching, that the law is everlastingly binding; for, according to His own words, heaven and earth shall pass away, Matt. xxiv. 35; but that, till the dawn of the new dispensation, the moral requirements of the law remain in undiminished force. "In the world of perfection there will be no need of law, since each will be a law unto himself. As there is no law for God, so also will there be no law for a perfect world; for, as God is, so will it also be a law unto itself."

8. Whosoever putteth away his wife.—According to most expositors, a special example, by which the principle laid down, ver. 17, is further confirmed. The strangeness, however, of the example led Olshausen to the strange notion, that the spiritual adultery of the Pharisees, who worshipped mammon more than God, was here intended, and caused Stier to suppose an indirect reference to the offence of Herod, Mark vi. 18. This was certainly possible, but not, in our idea at least, probable. Is it not much more simple to consider that St Luke, who has nowhere else in his Gospel a passage stating the Lord's teaching concerning the inviolability of marriage (comp. Matt. xix. 3–12), should here, with the mention of the inviolability of the law, introduce an isolated passage, showing how strictly the Lord upheld its moral precepts, without regard to historical connection? This precept concerning marriage, and the dissolution of marriage, appears in a more complete form, Matt. v. 31, 32. But if the Lord really uttered it a second time on this occasion, we have but to imagine that He interrupted His discourse, perhaps only for a few moments, before proceeding to deliver the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

9. General remarks on the parable.—This parable was evidently spoken with a view to the Pharisees, upon the occasion of the derision expressed by them, vers. 14, 15. It is very fitly placed; for its aim, evidently, is to teach them how little it would avail to appear pious before man, and to be rejected by God; to make them feel how despicable was the want of love which they had shown in their judgment of the publicans, ch. xv. 2; but especially to direct their attention to the terrible consequences of misusing those earthly possessions, to which their hearts were so strongly attached. The purpose, then, of this parable is not to give special information concerning a future retribution—for, although we would thankfully gather up the rays of light which it casts on this subject, it is obvious that the whole parable is clothed in a garment of Jewish eschatology—but to announce the great truth, that to neglect the application of wealth to benevolent purposes, is to make it a source of everlasting misery. So far, then, this parable is a counterpart to the preceding, and stands in natural connection with it. He who, like the unjust steward, makes to himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, will be received into everlasting habitations; he whose pride and selfishness prevent him from applying his wealth to such purposes, is represented as in everlasting punishment.

It is the first part, especially, of this parable (vers. 19–26) of which this is the definite purpose; while vers. 27–31 must be rather looked upon as supplementary, and as taking the place, in a parabolical form, of an application of the whole representation. Some (De Wette, Strauss, and the Tubingen school) have insisted on seeing in this parable a proof that the Lord considered earthly riches as something reprehensible, and earthly poverty as, in itself, something meritorious; and appeal, in support of this opinion, to the fact, that nothing is here said either of the moral perversion of the rich man or of the piety of the poor man; and that Abraham only points to the different conditions of both in this world (ver. 25), which were afterwards reversed in the next. But it is very evident that this conclusion is both partial and superficial. The actual failings of the rich man, distinct proofs of his want of pity, are not indeed mentioned in the parable; but this very fact enhances the beauty of the picture, and the deep seriousness of its moral: not the evil which the rich man has committed, but the good which he has left undone, condemns him in the sight of God. Could the Lord have more forcibly impressed the precept of ver. 9 than by a representation, showing how a man who did not fulfil it, but gave ear to his selfishness, became eternally unhappy? To be exposed to eternal punishment, it was by no means necessary to ill-use an unhappy Lazarus on earth; they who could suffer him to pine in helpless misery, and abandon him to the dogs, would be grievously responsible for their neglect. Just so seemingly harmless an epicure must be held up as a mirror to the Pharisees, who were pious in the sight of men; there was nothing to be said, also, against the rich man, according to common opinion, and yet—he came into the place of torment. There is, moreover, no lack of indirect proof of the moral corruption of the rich man: in hell, it is but bodily relief that he desires; he repeatedly supposes that he can dispose of Lazarus as if he were at his bidding; even in the request that one from among the dead might go to his brethren, there is an indirect acknowledgment that he himself had not formerly repented. With respect to Lazarus, it may be remarked, that he is not represented as a principal, but as a secondary character, and rather as suffering than acting; but would the Lord have represented him as carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom, if he had been able to exhibit to his ancestor no better a recommendation than his former poverty? And can the deep significance of his humble silence be wholly overlooked?

Finally, it is quite unnecessary to conclude, with certain expositors, that the Lord was here narrating the actual history of an individual, either living or dead. If, according to tradition, there really was at that time a well-known beggar at Jerusalem, bearing the name of Lazarus, it is still merely accidental that the poor man in the parable should bear the same name. The supposition that the Lord, when He gave him this name, was thinking of His friend Lazarus, who had but lately died at Bethany, to which place His present journey was directed, is probable, though it cannot be proved. But least of all can we see here any reference to Annas, his five sons, and his son-in-law Caiaphas, whose Sadducean levity the Lord is said to have thus exposed. Such a notion, which might, moreover, have had the appearance of private resentment, surely never entered His mind. If any of this set had at the moment been in His mind, He would, perhaps, have chosen other numbers, in order to avoid the appearance of so unsuitable a reference. We trust it is superfluous to remark, that something higher than an isolated historical fact, even the most sublime reality imaginable, is the foundation of this parabolical discourse.

10. A certain rich man.—The concealment of his name is no sign of his rejection (Euthym. Zigab. and others), but a means of rendering the representation general. It is quite unproved that the Lord intended to draw from life the picture of an individual of Sadducean opinions. "Nullum adest vestigium vel mentio transitus ullius a Pharisæis ad Sadducæos," as Bengel justly remarks; and it can scarcely be doubted, that there were not a few among the Pharisees to whom the description of the rich man's luxurious way of life was perfectly applicable. Comp. Ps. lxxiii. 4–9. Neither can it be proved that the Lord had in view any historical personage of past times, such as Saul, Laban, etc.—In purple and fine linen: the first denoting the Syrian upper, and the latter the Egyptian under garments. Fine linen, or byssus, an Egyptian product, sold for its weight in gold; distinct also from silk, as appears from Rev. xviii. 12. Compare Pliny, H. N. 19, 1, and many other passages, collected by Wetstein in loco. We need not, however, conclude (with Stier) that the rich man was dressed above his station, though it is very certain, from the continuation of the parable, that it was not a heart full of love and sympathy that was beating under the fine linen.

11. Named Lazarus.—Perhaps a symbolical name, לֹא עֵזֶר, the helpless, the forsaken (Olshausen, Baumgarten, Kramer, Lange). According to Lightfoot and Meyer, a contracted name, signifying Deus auxilium (Eleazar). If we consider that the Lord's mind was at this time dwelling on His dying friend at Bethany (see above), the name is sufficiently accounted for. In no case, however, can we find (with De Wette) a traditional intermixture of John xi.

12. Laid at his gate, ἐβέβλητο.—He had been laid there by others, either because they wanted to get rid of him, or for the sake of the refuse of the rich man's crumbs (Stier, Meyer); and he remained there helpless, a daily reproof, as it were, to the rich man's want of love.—Full of sores. Quite covered with them, ἡλκωμένος—Desiring to be fed with the crumbs. Comp. Matt. xv. 27. The Lord does not directly tell us whether his desire was granted or not; but a gloss was soon interpolated in the text, καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐδίδου αὐτῷ. See the Vulgate and Luke xv. 16. Though critically inadmissible, this addition is so far correct, as an explanation, that the sequel shows that the desire of Lazarus was not generally granted.

13. Moreover, the dogs, etc.—The enigmatical ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ κ. seems best understood by considering this circumstance as mentioned, not as an alleviation, but as an aggravation of his miseries. The parable does not indeed say that the poor man was entirely refused the crumbs from the rich man's table; for how then could he have remained lying at his door without starving? But although he occasionally had the crumbs only, and scarcely the crumbs, he yet saw himself obliged to dispute even this scanty provision with the dogs. We have to picture to ourselves the stray dogs, always wandering about an eastern city, attracted by so rich a booty as the refuse of the rich man's table, and depriving the poor beggar of a part of what would perhaps have been his portion. These savage and unclean animals also licked his sores, and thus increased his helpless misery. To represent the licking of the dogs, as an amelioration of his pain, would be directly opposed to the Lord's purpose. The antithesis of ἀλλά and ἐπιθυμῶν indicates rather a climax to this scene of misery, than an anti-climax: the sufferings of the rich man in hell were also without alleviation. And even if we adopt the view that it was the Lord's intention to contrast the sympathy of the animals in the sufferings of Lazarus with the apathy of the rich man, such a sympathy, if unaccompanied by any other, would be rather an aggravation of his sorrow. Comp. Meyer on this passage.

14. And it came to pass.—With these words the scene of the parable is transferred to another world. "En subita mutatio: qui modo non hominum tantum, sed et canum ludibrium fuerat, repente angelorum ministerio honoratur." Grotius.—Carried by the angels, i.e., evidently, his soul. There is no foundation for the supposition that Lazarus was not buried, but carried, body and soul, into Abraham's bosom, where he lived again and was happy (Meyer). No one doubts, concerning other Israelites, of whom it is said that they went to Abraham's bosom, that their bodies, nevertheless, were consigned as usual to the earth. Why then should it have been otherwise with Lazarus? No, his funeral was so poor a one as to deserve no mention beside the rich man's obsequies, and the contrast lies rather in the honour shown to both: to the rich man in this world, to the poor man in the next; to the rich man by his bearers, to the poor man by the angels; to the rich man's body, to the poor man's soul.—Into Abraham's bosom. A figurative expression for the happiness prepared, immediately after death, for pious Israelites, in the society of their beatified ancestor. It is highly probable that the expression is synonymous with paradise (Luke xxiii. 43; Lightfoot). The Jews distinguished Sheol, the general term for the place of departed spirits, into Gehenna, the place of punishment, and Paradise, the abode of the pious. We have to think of the rich man, as in the former; of Lazarus, as in the latter. Both places are represented as so near one another, that their inhabitants can see and speak with each other. See De Wette, Bibl. Dogm. § 178–182.

15. In hell, ἐν τῷ ᾅδῃ.—A general designation of the place of departed spirits; while the immediately following ἐν βασάνοις shows, that he was in that place of punishment which is called the γέεννα τ. πυρός. As this was considered to be in the lowest part of Sheol, he must lift up his eyes (Lange) to be able to perceive the condition of the blessed. The rich man is represented as awaking from a condition of momentary unconsciousness to full perception; and one of the first objects he perceives, is the well-known Lazarus, in Abraham's bosom (κόλποις, a usual plural with the Greeks).

16. Father Abraham, etc.—He knew Abraham then, and recognised him as his ancestor; neither did Abraham subsequently refuse him the name of τέκνον, though this external relationship could avail him nothing. He desired that Lazarus might be sent with a single drop of water to cool his tongue. The epicure feels himself punished in that very part of his body with which he had so long sinned, and only begs for temporary relief. It is worthy of notice that he supposes Lazarus, whom he had so little esteemed in life, to be still at his disposal, and that he subsequently contemns Moses (ver. 30). It is only his external condition, and not his individuality, which has undergone a change.

17. Son, remember, etc.—According to the words of Abraham, it would seem as though Lazarus were comforted, only because he had suffered on earth; and the rich man tormented, only because on earth he had received good things. But to form a correct judgment, we must complete this answer with all that the parable gives us good ground for conjecturing respecting the moral condition of both; while at the same time the contrast between τὰ ἀγαθά σου, and τὰ κακά without a pronoun, must not be overlooked. What the rich man had enjoyed had been really his good, the highest good in his eyes; the κακά, on the contrary, which had happened to Lazarus, were not properly his, but he had humbly borne them as the visitation of God.—Now he is comforted (here). The ὧδε, received into the text, corroborates the locality of the scene; but the νῦν by no means justifies the view, that an irrevocable sentence is not here spoken of (Stier). We must, indeed, still think of the place of torment, without a better future being opened to us by this possibility. Otherwise, must not the παράκλησις of Lazarus be also considered as something merely temporary?

18. And besides all this.—Pointing out the reason why it was impossible for him to grant the request of the rich man, even if he wished to do so. Χάσμα properly means a rent, a fissure, where "two places are so separated from each other, by a torrent or falling in of earth, that either an unfathomable deep or an immeasurable space is interposed between them:" 2 Sam. xviii. 17; Zech. xiv. 4. The idea of an irrevocable separation is comprehensible enough, but the form in which our Lord here expresses it is quite peculiar. The Greeks indeed spoke of a χάσμα in Tartarus: this, however, was not supposed to be a space. The Rabbis, on the contrary, spoke only of a wall of partition between the two parts of Hades, or of a space between them of a hand's or even a hair's breadth. The hope, too, of perhaps passing over this χάσμα is much weakened by the mention that the special purpose for which this abyss has been fixed, is (ὅπως) so that the passing from one side to another may be impossible. In explanation of the figure, compare the well-known passage in Virgil's Æneid, vi. 126: "Facilis descensus averni, noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis sed revocare gradum superasque evadere ad auras, hoc opus, hic labor est."

19. I pray thee therefore.—It almost seems as if the unhappy man were seeking some alleviation of his torment by prolonging this conversation, though he could scarcely hope that his petition would be granted. He applies a second time to Abraham, requesting now that he would send Lazarus to his brethren. Perhaps he remembered that he had, by his words and example, confirmed them in their sinful course of life, and therefore felt the more constrained to make some attempt for their delivery.—Ὅπως διαμαρτύρηται αὐτοῖς, here without a direct object (though it takes one in Acts xx. 21, and other places). Διαμαρτύρομαι: Wahl, per deum hominumque fidem testor vel affirmo; de adhortantibus: graviter moneo. He does not consider that his brethren need any intimation that sin will be thus terribly punished, but he desires all the more urgently, that what they already indeed know, but do not heartily believe, should be corroborated by incontestable evidence.

20. They have Moses and the prophets.—The compassionate τέκνον is now omitted, and the tone of speech becomes more severe, before passing, in the last words of Abraham, into a decided and inexorable denial. Moses and the prophets are here mentioned as a summary of divine revelation, of all that was necessary for Israel in order to their finding the way of life. This hearing naturally means, not merely an outward perception, but an inward obedience of their precepts. It is, of course, self-evident that the Hagiographa is included in this summary designation of the Old Testament.

21. Nay, father Abraham.—The unhappy man represents himself as knowing his brethren better than Abraham did, and at the same time acknowledges, by the very words he makes use of, that he had not repented, and that therefore his condemnation was just.

22. If they hear not Moses and the prophets, etc.—Comp. Isa. viii. 19, xxxiv. 16; John v. 45. It is certainly far-fetched to find in these words an allusion to the appearing of Elias (Baumg.-Crus.). The resurrection of Jesus, however, which was announced to the Jews, without producing faith in them, may certainly be adduced in confirmation of this saying of the Lord. Their enmity against Lazarus, after his raising from the dead (John xii. 10), proves that no extraordinary miracle is capable of bringing the impenitent, who refuse to give heed to the word of God, and to His ordinary messengers, to faith. This conclusion of the parable must, moreover, have the more deeply confounded the Pharisees, as giving them less ground for hoping that their insatiable craving after miracles would subsequently be satisfied. It was quite natural, then, that they should again show how much the Lord's words were an offence to them; a circumstance which would give rise to the warning against σκάνδαλα, immediately following.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The difference which apparently exists between our Lord and St Paul, when the former exalts the utter inviolability and eternal duration of the law, and the latter the abolition of the law by the New Testament, by no means justifies the hypothesis that the Master was of a different opinion from His highly-enlightened Apostle concerning the matter in question, and that Christianity had thus made further progress under Paul than under Jesus. The well-known rule, "distingue tempora et concordabit scriptura," should rather be applied in this instance. The Lord, who was speaking to His contemporaries among Israel, could not but give prominence to the relative truth, that the law and the prophets still remained in force; while Paul, who went forth among the Gentiles, was soon obliged to proclaim that the ministration of condemnation, the ministration of the letter, was abolished. The words of the Lord allude to the spirit, the essence, the eternal principles of the law; the words of the Apostle, on the contrary, to the form, the letter, the external restraints of the Old Testament. Rom. iii. 31 abundantly proves how far removed Paul was in principle from every kind of Antinomianism.

2. "Whosoever putteth away his wife . . . . . committeth adultery."—According to these words, literally understood, it would certainly seem that the Lord pronounced unconditionally against all divorce, and as if the Romish Church were perfectly right in allowing, at most, a separatio quoad torum et mensam, but never quoad vinculum. We must, however, complete this saying from Matt. v. 32, xix. 9, and admit that the crime by which marriage is violated by one party, allows—we do not say obliges—the other party to look upon it as broken also. Whether it is more Christian to make use of this permission, or not, cannot be decided from the letter of our Lord's words; though we believe that it is in accordance with their spirit to infer the negative. They, however, who make use of the liberty of divorce granted them, in the specified case, should not be condemned; nor can the privilege of contracting a fresh union be forbidden to the innocent party, when a divorce has taken place on this just ground. The limitation, μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ, must not then be lost sight of in this passage; for in the case of πορνεία, an actual divorce has already taken place, so that the legal divorce is only the normal continuation; and the injured husband does not, in this case, put away "his wife," but an adulteress, who has ceased to behave as his wife. In short, "Jesus answers in the negative the question, whether a man may voluntarily put away his wife, and pronounces against every one-sided and arbitrary divorce." De Wette.

3. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus presents, in its wonderful contrasts, a most sublime delineation of this world and the next. What is the Trilogy of a Dante, in which he sings of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven, compared with the Trilogy of this parable, which places at once before our eyes, in few but speaking touches, the great whole of Earth, Gehenna, and Paradise? Under the garb of figurative language, taken from the popular eschatology of His times, the Lord here makes the most wonderful disclosures, and lifts the veil which conceals the secrets of the future.

4. The contrast existing on earth, between the rich man and Lazarus, is but an image of the sad reality: comp. Prov. xxii. 2. Like Moses, the Lord is far from abolishing at a stroke the distinction between rich and poor: Deut. xv. 7–9; Mark xiv. 7. He suffers the contrast to exist on earth, and therewith one of the greatest enigmas in the government of a just Providence. But, at the same time, He does away the offence of this contrast, by representing this life as not the whole life, but only the first half of our existence, and casting the light of eternity upon the darkness of this world.

5. Though it was not the immediate object of this parable (see above) to give specific instruction concerning things to come, yet many questions respecting the world beyond the grave find in it a satisfactory solution. Thus much is evident, at the first glance: the life both of the godly and ungodly is uninterruptedly continued after death. Far from teaching the doctrine, that the soul exists in a state of sleep, the Lord declares, on the contrary, that consciousness continues in the other world. The rich man finds, indeed, his external condition altered, but remains in heart the same. He knows who, and where, he is; he recognises Lazarus; can speak of his father's house, and of his five brethren, whose moral condition is not unknown to him. He looks down upon Lazarus as proudly as before, and his character in another world exhibits the same faults it did in this. The punishment which he suffers, consists in a righteous retribution of what he had done amiss here: if the crumbs were denied to Lazarus, a drop of water is denied to him. He shows no signs of true repentance, though many of suffering and despair. He does not call upon God, but on his father Abraham; and is not grieved for his sins, but for their consequences. His natural affection for his brethren makes him tremble lest they also should come into the place of torment; but he also indirectly excuses himself, as if he had not been sufficiently warned during his former life. It is no marvel, that when such an internal difference existed between himself and the blessed, there should also be an external gulf which could neither be filled up nor passed over. Though the Lord is here speaking of the state immediately after death, and not of that after His appearing, still it is apparent, from this representation, that the decided separation of the children of light from the children of darkness, beyond the grave, always becomes a gulf, an abyss. The doctrine of purgatory, as well as that of an apokatastasis, is opposed by this parable; and, according to Abraham's last words to the rich man, we have nothing else to expect for unbelievers, from the other world, but an irrevocable silence.

6. According to this parable, the happiness of the next world consists in the fact, that the redeemed of the Lord are comforted (παρακαλεῖται, ver. 25). The soul, delivered from earthly trials, is carried by angels to a happier place. What the Lord here teaches of the ministerium angelorum is indirectly confirmed by passages such as Luke xv. 10, Heb. i. 14, and others. The paradise, here mentioned as the place appointed for departed spirits, must be well distinguished from the third heaven (2 Cor. xii. 4), the dwelling-place of perfected saints. Paradise is, on the contrary, a place of incipient, but very refreshing rest in the intermediate state, where the Jews imagined all the pious dead of the Old Testament united in happiness. Here, as in Matt. xiii. 11, Luke xiii. 25–29, and other passages, future happiness is represented under the image of a banquet, where the favourite guest is placed so near the master of the feast (in this case, Abraham), that he can rest upon his bosom. The ideas of refreshment and communion are thus intimately united. The poor man Lazarus rests upon the bosom of his rich ancestor Abraham, as if to prove that it is neither poverty nor riches in themselves, but faith and obedience, which are the founda tion of their happiness. This happiness, as well as the misery of the lost, is passed in the society of those of similar character (compare the μεταξὺ ἡμῶν καὶ ὑμῶν); but thoughts of the fate of the lost do not disturb the happiness of the blessed. Abraham can converse with the rich man with the utmost composure; Lazarus can see him without rejoicing, but also without giving him hope. How much more sublime is this delineation than those of the Koran, e.g., where the blessed mock the lost, and take delight in beholding their torments!

7. We must not be so occupied with the chief aim of this parable as to lose sight of the doctrinal importance of its secondary purpose. The Lord here, as also in other passages, bears remarkable and unambiguous testimony to the sufficientia scripturæ V. T. This testimony is, a fortiori, applicable to the New Testament scriptures. These means of grace, united, are so perfectly sufficient for the enlightenment, renewal, and sanctification of sinners, that more powerful calls to amendment cannot possibly be imagined or expected. That the agency of the Holy Spirit is also needed, if this word is to effect its purpose, is by no means denied by our Lord. The word is the seed of the new birth, but the sunshine and rain from heaven must fertilize the field. No agency of the Spirit, however, is to be expected where the power of the word is lightly esteemed; and the narrative very plainly teaches that any extraordinary awakening, which it is endeavoured to effect by any other means than by the living κήρυγμα, is of slight importance, and short duration. No sinner, then, can ever reckon upon God's awakening him by extraordinary means, if he has despised the ordinary means described in God's word; and if even the sign of Jonas could be repeated, it would be ineffectual in the case of him who had despised the preaching of Jonas.

8. By the conclusion of this parable the Lord condemns all those extraordinary attempts, made in our days, to penetrate the secrets of another world by table-turning, spirit-rapping, apparitions, somnambulism, etc. Such superstitions are the less excusable, since they are generally united with secret unbelief of God's word. This shows, moreover, that they who imagine themselves in possession of these extraordinary powers and revelations, often remain unconverted, and so far corroborate the last words which Abraham is here represented as speaking.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Truth acknowledged by the conscience, but opposed by the sinful heart.—The enmity of the covetous against the preaching of the law of love.—The pharisaic mind exists in every natural man: he would be just before God.—"God knoweth your hearts." This truth may be considered as, 1. a certain, 2. a terrible, 3. a consoling truth.—The infinite distance between the judgment of man and the judgment of God, 1 Sam. xvi. 7.—The Old Testament period, a period of preparation.—As soon as the kingdom of God is powerfully announced, it is powerfully opposed.—The inviolability of the law: 1. In what sense, 2. with what justice, 3. for what purpose, does our Lord proclaim the inviolability of the law?—Honour put upon married life by the Spirit of Christ.—Divorce not a relative good, but a necessary evil.

The rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all.—How poor a rich man may be, how rich a poor man may be, 1. in this world, 2. in the world to come.—The rich man poor, a. in true joy, b. in sympathizing love, c. in well-founded hope, d. in eternal happiness.—The poor man rich, a. in misfortunes, b. in pain, c. in eternal consolation.—The comedy and tragedy of earthly life only a few paces apart.—A luxurious life does not soften, but hardens the heart.—The inexcusableness of want of love shown in the rich man: 1. The poor man was alone; 2. close to his door; 3. well known; 4. daily before his eyes; 5. incapable of work; 6. modest enough not to complain; 7. contented with even crumbs; 8. an object of attention to the very dogs, yet neglected by the rich man.—Death, the termination of the inequality existing during life, comp. Job iii. 17–19.—Death, great gain to one, dreadful loss to another.—The care of the angels for dying saints, considered both as a certain and a comforting fact.—What avails it to pay the last honours to departing sinners, when everlasting shame awaits them immediately after death?—The awaking on the morning of eternity: 1. What endures there, of what we were in possession of on each awaking here: a. our consciousness, b. our individuality, c. our memory. 2. What we shall miss there, from what we found ourselves possessed of, on each awaking here: a. the delusive joys of the sinner, b. the mysterious trials of the pious, c. the work of God's grace in both. 3. What begins there, of what we saw drawing nearer, at each awaking here: a. a surprising meeting, b. a righteous retribution, c. an eternal separation.—The mutual vision of the happy and the lost.—Relationship to Abraham according to the flesh, not disowned, but unavailing.—The jus talionis of a future life.—The grief of the lost, at, 1. what they are deprived of, 2. what they see, 3. what they suffer, 4. what they expect.—Woe to the man who knows no higher good than what he receives in this world!—The great gulf: 1. its depth, 2. its duration, 3. its opposite sides.—It is not earthly suffering, but the manner in which it is borne, which smooths our path to heaven.—The terrible remembrance, in the place of torment, of the relations we have left on earth.—If earthly relationship does not become spiritual relationship, it becomes at last only a fresh source of suffering.—If sinners really believed how terrible hell is, they would undoubtedly repent.—The word of God the sole and sufficient means of a sinner's conversion. —He who despises this means needs expect no other.—One risen from the dead would not even bring sinners to true faith.—He who expects or desires any other means of grace than that appointed by God, 1. miscalculates fearfully, and 2. sins grievously.

Starcke, Quesnel: A time is coming when God will mock at those who have mocked at His truth.—The covetous like to adorn themselves with the feathers of hypocrisy.—Cramer: There are two kinds of pride, worldly and spiritual: both are an abomination to the Lord.—Brentius: New Testament times demand New Testament people.—Heathen pomp and luxury forebode no good to Christendom.—Hedinger: Piety often goes begging, but is rich towards God.—Quesnel: Bodily sickness often instrumental in the healing of souls: happy he whom the Good Physician deigns to cure!—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Be ashamed, ye unmerciful rich! Reasonable man is put to shame by the unreasoning animals.—Ah! how the tables are turned after death!—Canstein: False confidence in external covenant with God, exists even among the lost.—Hedinger: There is an end of mercy and consolation in the dreadful hereafter, Prov. xi. 7.—The lost long for the alleviation of their torments, but do not receive it, and vain longing increases their misery.—They who have by their bad example caused others to sin, are in hell tormented by their conscience on this account.—Majus: Every one should be concerned for the conversion of his relatives; but this concern should be early, and at the right time, Jas. v. 20.—Canstein: Wicked men will not be reconciled to the arrangements of God, but despise and seek to alter them, and think they could arrange matters more fitly and beneficially.—Hedinger: God will do no miracle to please atheists, and those who have no relish for His word.—The ungodly are unchanged, and do not fear God, even in hell.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Faith is contented with the word of God, which is full of marvels and proofs; but unbelief cannot be convinced.

Heubner: God will one day destroy all mere appearances.—The higher any one aims, the deeper he falls.—To seek our own enjoyment, and to be without love to others, are enough to ruin a man eternally.—There are many rich, like the rich man, but few poor, like Lazarus.—Death is, to the pious sufferer, a friend who brings deliverance.—How various are the entrances of men upon another world!—Eternal torment follows short enjoyment.—He who seeks his heaven in what is earthly, will one day find that he has lost the true heaven.—We need not be poor and full of sores to resemble Lazarus.—Beware of building your hopes of salvation on natural goodness of heart.—The lost torment each other.—The dead may more frequently be thinking of the living, than the living of the dead.—Faith is contented with the proofs which God gives; unbelief never has enough.—Man has no right to prescribe to God the way of bringing him to salvation.—We have here the reason why Christ did not appear to the unbelieving after His resurrection.

On the whole paragraph, compare four sermons of Chrysostom on this passage, ed. Montfaucon, Tom. I.—The sermon of Mas sillon, sur le mauvais Riche.—Lisco: On the unbelief of pretended members of the kingdom of God.—In what light we are to regard complaints concerning the insufficiency of the means of salvation.—Schulz: The soul retains its consciousness and memory in a future life.—Florey: Four passages of the N. T. which support and corroborate this paragraph: 1. Matt. xix. 23; 2. 1 John ii. 17; 3. Jas. i. 12; 4. 2 Tim. iii. 14, 15.—Wolf: Death changes the condition, but not the mind, of the carnally minded.—Dettinger: Eternity, how it judges, how it separates, how it unites.—Ruling: The abyss between the children of the world and the children of God is not filled up by death, but only reversed and fixed.—Fuchs: 1. Lazarus, a. a poor, but also a rich man; b. a sick, but also a healthy man; c. a pilgrim, but also a citizen. 2. The rich man, a. a rich, but yet a poor man; b. a healthy, but yet a sick man; c. a citizen, yet homeless.—L. A. Petri: The sad life and fate of a worldly man: he is, 1. poor in life, 2. unhappy in death, 3. lost in eternity.—Rautenberg: Death from two points of view: 1. O death, how bitter art thou! 2. O death, how welcome art thou!—Cl. Harms: The broad way.—Von Kaff: What Jesus here teaches concerning the condition of souls after death: 1. Of those who live without God, 2. of those who live in God.—Uhle: A glance across the grave into the world of spirits.—Couard: The pursuit of pleasure: 1. its nature, 2. its source, 3. its results.—Saurin: A sermon sur le suffisance de la Révélation, Serm. Tom. I. p. 404.

6. Parabolical Discourse concerning True Faith which conquers all Offences. (Chap. xvii. 1–10.)

1 Then said He unto the disciples, It is impossible but that offences will come: but woe unto him through whom they come! 2 It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones. 3 Take heed to yourselves: If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. 4 And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him. 5 And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith. 6 And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say unto this sycamine-tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you. 7 But which of you, having a servant plowing or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat? 8 And will not rather say unto him, Make ready wherewith I may sup, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink? 9 Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not. 10 So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do.

Ver. 1. αὐτοῦ is decidedly supported: see Tischendorf in loco.

Ver. 4. With Tischendorf we read ἁμαρτήσῃ, not ἁμάρτῃ, which seems to be a mere mechanical repetition of ver. 3.

Ver. 5. To thee. The more this εἰς σέ is required by the connection of the discourse, the more probable is the supposition that, strong as is the testimony in its favour, it is an interpolation a seriore manu.

Ver. 9. The servant. The ἐκείνῳ of the Receptus is wanting in A.B.D.L.X., and seems to be only an explanatory addition.

Ver. 9. αὐτῷ. The non-authenticity of this word is tolerably certain, and is granted by most modern critics.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Then He said.—It is a difficult question, whether we have in Luke xvii. 1–10 a connected discourse or a collection of dicta, reported without any historical connection, chrestomathically arranged, with but slight mutual relation. We feel almost inclined to view this passage as merely a summary of the instruction which our Lord gave, in a more copious manner, on another occasion. But when we consider that the parable of the servant ploughing, vers. 7–10, is quite peculiar to Luke,—that the parabolic saying concerning the sycamine-tree may have been repeatedly used by our Lord, in a somewhat modified form (comp. Matt. xvii. 20, 21),—that even the precept, vers. 3, 4, is not exactly the same as that of Matt. xviii. 21, 22,—and that the feelings probably entertained by the Pharisees, after what they had heard, chs. xv. and xvi., would naturally give an occasion for the warning against σκάνδαλα,—our hesitation concerning the internal unity of ch. xvii. 1–10 almost disappears. The various attempts to point out the connection of the various parts of this discourse may be found in Stier's Reden Jesu iii. p. 390, compare Lange L. J. iii. p. 466.

2. To the disciples.—Comp. ch. xvi. 1. We must clearly distinguish between these and the ἀπόστολοι, ver. 5, as they were now, partly at least, composed of lately converted publicans, ch. xv. 1, who for this reason are called μικροι, ver. 2, as being still weak in the faith.

3. Offences.—With distinct reference, perhaps, to what had just occurred, ch. xvi. 14. Σκάνδαλον, in the sense in which it is here used, designates anything at which a sincere disciple might reasonably take offence, as bringing dishonour upon the Lord, and harm to His Church. The non-occurrence of these offences is ἀνένδεκτον, useless, or impossible, οὐκ ἐνδέχεται, non usu venit, ch. xiii. 33. It is obvious that the Lord is not speaking of an absolute, but only of a relative necessity, arising from the sinful condition of the world. But though their occurrence is inevitable, this by no means lessens the responsibility of those through whom they happen and increase.

4. It were better for him.—The Perfecta show that the Lord is describing the condition of a man around whose neck a millstone has been hanged, and who has been cast into the sea; He considers this fate, terrible as it is, preferable to living to (ἵνα) cause offence.—A millstone. We read here λιθ. μυλικος, with Lachmann, Tischendorf, and others, instead of μύλος ὀνικός, which seems introduced from Matt. xviii. 16. The meaning of the figure is, in either case, the same; it must, however, be remarked, that not merely simple drowning, but also sinking into the lowest hell, of which the sea is a type, is meant here. Comp. Lange on Matt. xviii. 6.

5. Take heed to yourselves; i.e., according to the context, especially of giving offences, which is threatened with so severe a punishment. Such offence they would surely give by failing in forgiving love. The Lord foresaw that in spite of His efforts, in speaking in behalf of the publicans, the gulf between them and the proud Pharisees would continue to exist. Hence His disciples would need to manifest more than ordinary love, to avoid collision with them at every moment; and, on this account, He gives them the same precept which He had formerly given (Matt. xviii. 22) in another form to Peter. If they lived in concord with each other, and were willing to forgive, they would take many a stumbling-block out of the way.

6. If thy brother.—From the whole context it appears, that the Lord is not speaking of trespasses in general, but of such in particular, as one brother might commit in intercourse with another. For this case, He appoints no judicial reproof, but a gentler and brotherly rebuke (ἐπιτίμησον), a help towards his recovery, in all long-suffering and love. Comp. 1 Thess. v. 14. If such a rebuke should bring him to a humble confession of his fault, forgiveness must not be withheld, even though the transgression had been seven times repeated. Though the Lord here speaks of a sevenfold trespass, He means substantially the same as when He elsewhere speaks of seventy times seven, and expresses in this passage also the qualitative infinity of forgiving love by the use of a symbolical number. Greater moderation, however, prevails in the form of this saying, because He would not repel nor offend the μικροί, to whom He was speaking, by an apparently overstrained requirement. The precept, which He here gives for private intercourse, deserves, moreover, to be compared with that which He prescribed for the regulation of the discipline of the Church, Matt. xviii. 15–18. It is not allowed to the individual brother, as it is permitted to the Church, to treat the offender as a heathen man and a publican. Hence, forgiveness must be repeated as often as the slightest trace of repentance is visible.

7. And the Apostles, etc.—No wonder that the Apostles, on hearing such requirements, which certainly concerned themselves above all, should have felt their need of inward strength, and should have confessed, with shame, how much they were wanting in that high principle, which could alone render them capable of obtaining victory in the war they would have to wage against flesh and blood. They utter, with one voice, the prayer for the increase of their faith; and it is remarkable how they, who were often so sadly severed by pride, and ambition for the highest rank, now so lovingly unite in this humble petition. "The only example, indeed, in the Gospel, of a speech distinguished by such unanimity." Stier. St Luke, in this passage, as in many others, emphatically calls Jesus "the Lord" (comp. ch. vii. 31, xxii. 16, etc.), to point out the light in which He was regarded by the Apostles when they felt themselves constrained to apply to Him with this request.

8. Increase our faith.—Properly, add to us faith, πρόσθες ἡμῖν πίστιν. They feel, with gratitude, that they are not wholly wanting in faith; but at the same time they humbly acknowledge that the intensive power of their faith is not yet great enough to render them capable of such an exercise as was set before them, vers. 3, 4. To understand this of a faith that would work miracles, is entirely arbitrary; nor does the Lord's answer require it. He had been speaking of something much higher than outward miracles, even of victory over self, of that triumph of love which could only be the fruit of increased faith. It can hardly be decided whether, by this prayer, they sought a direct and immediate strengthening of their faith; but it is certain that the Lord granted a direct answer to their request, and strengthened their faith, by giving them first, an encouraging word (ver. 6), and afterwards, a humbling word (vers. 7–10).

9. If ye had faith.—The Lord did not suppose by this answer that they were entirely wanting in faith, but only showed them how very far they were from having attained that high degree of faith, which alone could enable them to fulfil these strict demands.

He pointed out how much faith can effect in the moral world, by showing them what wonderful changes it can effect in the natural world, when these are really necessary.—To this sycamine-tree; δεικτικῶς, perhaps a proof that this discourse was delivered in the open air, while the Lord was pursuing His journey. By a strong personification, the tree is represented as a reasonable being, capable of understanding and obeying such a command of faith. The συκάμινος is a very common tree in Palestine. See De Wette, Archæolog. § 83. Perhaps, however, the συκομορέα, ch. xix. 4, which, like an oak, has a thick trunk and strong branches and roots, is meant; so that it would be, in some respects, as great a matter to command such a tree to remove, as to command a mountain ἐκριζώθητι. Indeed, the Lord here expresses Himself even more strongly than in the parallel passage in Matt. xvii. 21; since the tree is not to sink, but to be actually planted in the sea, where a tree could ordinarily neither take root nor grow; and it is thus clearly shown, that even that which is impossible, according to the usual laws of nature, may be immediately brought to pass according to that higher ordering of things in which faith has the rule. On the question, how far we may expect a literal fulfilment of such promises without falling into absurdities, compare Stier on Matt. xvii. 20.

10. But which of you, etc.—The old complaint of want of connection with the preceding context (De Wette), is entirely obviated by a careful psychological exegesis. The Lord would not have known His disciples, if He had not perceived that the mere prospect of performing acts as great as these was sufficient to render them selfish and ambitious again. He therefore directs their attention to the fact, that, even if faith should strengthen them for the highest deeds, there would still be no special merit on their part. A labourer at the plough, by the roadside, may have given rise to this parable; and the question, Which of you, etc., is the less inappropriate, since the sons of Zebedee at least belonged to a higher class, and might well have δοῦλοι: comp. Mark i. 20.

11. Having a servant ploughing or feeding cattle.—Two kinds of work are here mentioned, to point out the apostolic labour to which they would afterwards be called, both under its easier and more difficult aspect. By the servant, δοῦλος, we must not understand a hired servant, μίσθιος, but a bondman, entirely dependent upon his master, and most strictly obliged to render blind obedience to his commands. "Quid magni facit ad arandum positus, si arat; ad pascendum si pascit?" Grotius.

12. Will say unto him by and by . . . Go and sit down.—Εὐθέως should not be joined with ἐρεῖ (De Wette, and others), but with παρελθών (Stier, Meyer), as plainly appears from the contrast, μετὰ ταῦτα, in the following verse. The work must be assiduously performed; the rest is to follow, but not immediately. When the field work is accomplished, the domestic work is yet to be done; and the repast of the master must, in any case, precede that of the servant. The slave must remain girded till the master has eaten and drunk at his leisure.—Περιζωσάμενος, a figure taken from the long flowing garments of the East, which had to be either girt up or laid aside by those who had either to work or travel.

13. Doth he thank, etc.—A question of holy irony, by which the Lord is not marking His approval of the fact, that so many services of daily life should be performed without receiving a word of thanks, but merely stating what is generally the case. The additional οὐ δοκῶ bears too strongly the mark of originality to allow us (with Lachmann and Tischendorf) to doubt its authenticity. There could be no reason for its interpolation, while its omission is easily explained. See Meyer on this passage.

14. So likewise ye.—The Lord would have His disciples, even after they have faithfully performed the works appointed them, esteem themselves no higher than such servants.—Which are commanded you, both in the field and in the house,—all things, even the most difficult, included. Instead of expecting special thanks in such a case, they were to say, with deep humility, We are unprofitable servants: ἀχρεῖοι, not poor, mean (Rosenmuller), and still less unprofitable in the unfavourable sense in which this word is used, Matt. xxv. 30; but merely such as have done no more than was to be expected from δοῦλοι. If they had done less, they would have been hurtful; if they had done more, they would have been χρεῖοι: but now, as ἀχρεῖοι, they might indeed expect the food bestowed upon servants after their day's work, but not the reward due only to extraordinary service. The Lord does not require His disciples to consider themselves either as despicable or rejected, still less does He say that He considers them unprofitable servants, and least of all does He deny that a rich reward awaits them, as He had promised, ch. xii. 31; but He here denies all meritum e condigno, and emphatically reminds them, that whatever reward they may receive, it is by all means to be regarded as a reward of grace, which can in no case be claimed. How peculiarly this instruction was adapted to the Twelve, and how their faith would increase in proportion as they grew in humility of heart, they perhaps felt at the time, but certainly experienced afterwards.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. What our Lord here says concerning the necessity of offences, shows us how vivid were His convictions of the contrast existing between the holy kingdom of God and the sinful world of humanity. An ordinary teacher of morals would have said, "It is impossible that offences should come." The King of heaven, on the contrary, says, "It is impossible that offences should not happen: even stumblingblocks shall become the instruments of My high purposes." Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 19. But though He brings good out of evil, the moral responsibility of him who causes the σκάνδαλον is terribly great, and far too little considered. We must, however, be careful to apply the Lord's threatening to offences given, and not arbitrarily to offences taken.

2. The prayer for increase of faith occasions, on the part of the Lord, a remarkable blending of injunctions to forgiving love, and unfeigned humility. That love may be manifested, faith must previously exist; that faith may be increased, humility must be more deep and universal. We learn, also, that the Lord strengthens the faith of His people, not in a magical, but in an ethical manner. He leads them through the depths of self-knowledge to the mountain-tops of a more developed faith: "from narrow defiles to extended plains, from depths to heights."

3. The Lord's saying concerning the removal of the sycamine-tree must not be overlooked, when the various opinions concerning the possibility of the continuance of miraculous gifts in the Church are discussed. He connects, without any kind of limitation, miraculous powers with faith; and the assertion, that this promise applies exclusively to the Twelve, or to their immediate successors, is purely arbitrary. The hyperbole of the figure does not justify us in denying that which is essential to the subject; and if history offers us no fully corroborated proofs of a literal fulfilment of the promise, this has rather arisen from the great obstacles, not of a physical, but of a moral nature, which faith has to overcome. So high a development of faith will indeed be a rarity as long as the humility which the Lord here so emphatically inculcates is wanting.

4. The saying concerning the unprofitable servant is a locus classicus for that leading doctrine of the Gospel and of Protestantism—the doctrine of a sinner's justification by grace alone; and it is hence entirely in its place in the Pauline Gospel of Luke. If the existence of a thesaurus supererogationis were possible, the words which our Lord here puts in the mouth of His disciples would be but the expression of a feigned humility. We may rather confidently say, that he who refuses to call himself a δοῦλος ἀχρεῖος, in the sense here intended, makes Christ Himself a δοῦλος ἀχρεῖος: comp. Gal. ii. 21. We cannot possibly agree with the assertion of J. Muller (Christl. Lehre von der Sünde i. p. 48), that the possibility of a virtue which should consist in doing more than is commanded, is at least presupposed; since, otherwise, even Christ would have represented His own holy life under the notion of the δοῦλος ἀχρεῖος. Christ, however, stood in an entirely different relation to the Father from that of a servant, to whom He compares His disciples. Nor is there a single proof for the view, that a limited Jewish obedience, which may be far surpassed in a Gospel point of view, is here intended. It is rather clearly shown that He who thinks he can do more than he is obliged, must have very strange conceptions of that ideal of perfection which the law requires. For the rest, this recommendation of humility does but seemingly contradict the passage, ch. xii. 37, since Christ designed on the one occasion to encourage, on the other to humble, His disciples. De Wette.

5. The parable of the servant ploughing is one of special significance to those who fill the pastoral office. The Lord distinctly teaches that His disciples are to be variously employed in His service: some, indeed, in the laborious task of ploughing; others, in the quiet employment of pasturing cattle;—that they must never be vexed to find their work, in certain respects, never finished;—that all which they can really need, and reasonably expect, even for their temporal support, shall be supplied to them in due time;—but that, even after the most faithful service, they can never entertain a hope of receiving that reward as a right which they have represented to others as a gift of grace. How much less devastation would the cancer of spiritual pride among hierarchs and ecclesiastics have caused, if no minister of the Church had ever sought to occupy higher ground than that of this servant!

6. This teaching of our Lord is rightly applied in refutation of the doctrine of salvation by works, in the Ap. Augsb. Conf. iii.: "Hæc verba clare dicunt, quod Deus salvet per misericordiam et propter suam promissionem, non quod debeat propter dignitatem operum nostrorum Christus damnat fiduciam nostrorum operum, arguit opera nostra, tanquam indigna. Et præclare hic inquit Ambrosius: agnoscenda est gratia, sed ignoranda natura, promissioni gratiæ confidendum est, non naturæ nostræ Servi inutiles significant insufficientes, quia nemo tantum timet, tantum Deum, tantum credit Deo, quantum oportuit. Nemo non videt, fiduciam nostrorum operum improbari."

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

A. Christianity without offences is impossible in this sinful world. —The woe pronounced upon those by whom offences come, is, 1. terrible, 2. just, 3. wholesome.—There is a punishment far more terrible than bodily pain or loss of life.—The high value which the Lord attributes to the little ones in the kingdom of heaven.—The greatest who causes offences, stands below the least who suffers them.—The demand that we should be willing to pardon our brother, in its length, breadth, depth, and height, Eph. iii. 18.—In the Old Testament, sevenfold vengeance, Gen. iv. 23, 24; in the New Testament, sevenfold forgiveness.—Punishment of sin must be combined with pity for sinners.—No riches of love without increase of faith.—All Christians must unite with the Apostles in the prayer for increase of faith.—How far this prayer is necessary, 1. specially for the Twelve, 2. generally for all believers.—What this prayer, 1. supposes: a. that we have faith already, b. but too little, and c. that it is from the Lord alone we can receive more. 2. What it requires: a. more light, b. more strength, c. more community of faith. 3. What this prayer effects: a. the disciple is perfected, b. the kingdom of God increased, c. the Lord glorified by this prayer being heard.—A suitable text for a communion sermon. This prayer the best communion prayer, because, 1. it is faith that is most needed before the sacrament; 2. most required at the sacrament; 3. and exposed to many a heavy trial after the sacrament.—The all-conquering power of faith: 1. How it is manifested; 2. why it is no longer seen.—Faith, like a grain of mustard-seed, has power to transplant a whole tree.—The relation of work to reward in the kingdom of God.—The minister of the kingdom of God like the servant ploughing: 1. He is called to various, and often laborious, work; 2. he can never look upon his work as finished; 3. he receives and enjoys what is needful in his service; 4. but, even after faithful service, can make no claim to well-earned wages.—The unprofitable servant very useful, the most useful servant unprofitable.—How true compensation for work for the kingdom of God does not begin till all notions of meriting reward are given up.—The Lord esteems His servants highly in proportion as they learn to esteem themselves lowly.

Starcke, Quesnel: God, with whom all things are possible, could easily prevent offences; but, for His own holy purposes, He suffers them to exist.—Bibl. Würt.: Beware of causing the least offence to any, even to young children.—Love is never tired of pardoning. —Brentius: Faith does not grow like a weed; having its root in God, it must also grow by Him.—Zeisius: Even weak faith works wonders, saves, and is accepted, Matt. ix. 24, 25.—Let a man examine himself whether he be in the faith, lest he esteem his unbelief a weak faith.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: It is not enough to begin well our spiritual labour and the service of God; we must continue them without intermission, till the Lord Himself shall appoint our time of rest.—Canstein: A true and faithful servant gives his master the glory, and willingly accords him the pre-eminence in all things.—First service, then reward: the first is our duty, the second the gift of grace.—Hedinger: Away with spiritual pride; where is perfection? The true servants of God never think they have done enough; they will always wish they had done more, so great is their desire to serve God and to win souls.—Heubner: As it is faith which enables us to do anything right, so is it also the power which makes us capable of unbounded forgiveness.—Prayer the means whereby faith is increased; hence it is needed daily.—The question is not so much whether faith is strong in its beginnings, as whether it is lively, healthy, and influential.—It is possible, through faith in Christ, to root up even that which is deeply rooted, and which it seems impossible to remove.—Without work, no rest; without conflict, no enjoyment.—He is most worthy who esteems himself most unworthy. —Faith says, Rest always; Love, the daughter of Faith, says, Rest never.—Arndt: The confession of humility with respect to the good we have done: 1. That it was but our duty, 2. that it was only done by God's grace, 3. that it is always imperfect.—Lisco: How necessary humility is in every member of the kingdom of God.

I. Journey in the Borders of Samaria and Galilee, with the Remarkable Events occurring during its course. (Chaps. xvii. 11–xviii. 14.)

1. The Ten Lepers. (Vers. 11–19.)

11 And it came to pass, as He went to Jerusalem, that He passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee. 12 And as He entered into a certain village, there met Him ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off: 13 And they lifted up their voices, and said; Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. 14 And when He saw them, He said unto them, Go show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that, as they went, they were cleansed. 15 And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God, 16 And fell down on his face at His feet, giving Him thanks: and he was a Samaritan. 17 And Jesus answering, said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? 18 There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger. 19 And He said unto him, Arise, go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And it came to pass.—The account of the raising of Lazarus, and the consultation of the inimical Sanhedrim, John xi. 1–53, in consequence, must, in compliance with the exigencies of harmony, be inserted after Luke xvii. 10. After these occurrences, the Lord stayed in a town called Ephraim, till the approaching Passover again called Him to Jerusalem, John xi. 54, 55. The events recorded Luke xvii. 11, etc., happened at the commencement of this last journey. Hence, the healing of the ten lepers was not performed during an excursion from Ephraim (Olshausen, v. Gerlach), but at the very beginning of His last journey to Jerusalem,—a period whose details are communicated by Luke alone. Once more before the close of His public life, would the Lord pass through some of the places which had been the scenes of His earlier ministry, and thus prove, both by word and deed, that He did not shun His powerful foes.

2. Διὰ μέσου.—There is no reason for altering this reading, either into μέσον, διὰ μέσον, or ἀνὰ μέσον; see Meyer on this passage. The expression points out, not that He passed through the midst of both these countries—for in this case Galilee would have been first named—but that He journeyed in the midst of, i.e., between, these countries, keeping on the confines of each, without penetrating into the interior, in confinio. Bengel. So also Lange, Leben Jesu ii. p. 1065. The supposition, that the mention of Samaria was merely the result of the appearance of a Samaritan in the narrative, is one of those frivolities of negative criticism which contribute not a little to render its moral character suspicious.

3. Ten men which were lepers.—Concerning leprosy, see remarks on Luke v. 12–16, and Lightfoot on Matt. viii. 2. In 2 Kings vii. 3, we also find an example of lepers, impelled by necessity, living together. They were obliged, as being unclean, to stand at least four yards from the healthy: see Lev. xiii. 46; Num. v. 2. That the fame of Jesus should have reached them in their retirement, is a striking proof how widely it had spread in these parts.

4. Jesus, Master,—ἐπιστάτα, not κύριε.—Though they did not acknowledge the Lord's Messianic dignity, they yet esteemed Him a prophet, mighty in word and deed. Their faith was sincere, without being perfect; for which reason the Lord did not reject them. In order, however, to prove to His disciples that He was by no means limited by form in His manner of bestowing His benefits, and at the same time to test the faith of the patients, He, this time, performed the cure in a manner quite peculiar. Full of leprosy as they were, they must go to the priests, to get themselves pronounced clean. It is true that this direction was itself an indirect promise, that they should be clean before they came to their priests; but it was no slight demand, that they should set out while still uncured. It seems to have been the Lord's intention, not only to test their faith, but also to avoid giving any reasonable cause of offence, and to show due respect to the representatives of the theocracy: comp. Lev. xiii. 2, xiv. 2. The Israelitish lepers would probably go into the neighbouring villages (the whole scene takes place outside the κώμη); the Samaritan, to his own priests, who probably observed the same form of purification. Their cure took place as they were on their road, in obedience to this command.

5. Turned back.—Not after he had been pronounced clean by the Samaritan priest (Calvin, Luther, Lange); for in this case the Lord could not have been surprised that the other nine had not returned, since they had a much longer journey to take to their priests. No; all were healed, ἐν τῷ ὑπάγειν, and all ought to have returned to thank their deliverer. The supposition, that the nine were prevented by the influence of the priests, who were enemies to the Lord, is entirely arbitrary. Not hours, but minutes, elapsed between the command and the cure—between the cure and the giving of thanks. Or are we to suppose that the Lord passed half a day in inactivity, at the entrance to the κώμη, to see if any would return?

6. A Samaritan.—The other lepers, undoubtedly, returned with joy to their homes, after the priests had declared them clean. The Samaritan, however, is not satisfied with receiving the benefit, he would also thank his benefactor. His gratitude is of the right sort; for it is shown by a glorifying of God (ver. 15), which is well-pleasing to the Lord (ver. 18). But the praise of Him who was the first cause of the benefit, did not derogate from the honour to which the instrument of this cure was entitled. He praised God with a loud voice, and fell down at the feet of Jesus; proceeding afterwards, as is obvious, in obedience to His command, to show himself to the priests.

7. Where are the nine?—To feel the full force of the pathos of this question, we must consider the occurrence in its historical connection. It was not that the Lord was concerned about receiving honour from men; but that He, who knew what was in man, well knew that gratitude to God could be no very earnest feeling, when not a word of thankfulness was expressed to a human benefactor. His complaint, which, considering the extraordinary, the undeserved, the wonderful nature of the benefit experienced, was just in itself, was the more strikingly so, when we consider the time at which it was uttered. Well acquainted with the schemes already formed for His destruction, in Judea, the Lord once more made these borders of Galilee the scene of His healing mercy; but, even at the first miracle during this journey, it was manifest how much the disposition of the people towards Him had changed. Where formerly a miracle, performed on behalf of an individual, had animated hundreds of tongues to His praise, the healing of ten unfortunate beings did not extort a word of thanks from the majority even of those who had experienced this marvel of mercy, much less from the inhabitants of the district. He, on this occasion, rather veiled than enhanced the splendour of the miracle, by its form; learning thereby how soon the worker of it is forgotten: and while He was, during even this later period of His ministry, testifying respect for the law and the priesthood, He was repaid with the most offensive contempt. The perception of this fact pierced Him to the heart; and He, who had just manifested Himself to be the compassionate High Priest, now felt Himself the deeply despised and rejected Messiah. Yet this complaint over the nine, was also a commendation of the one thankful leper, and the words, "Arise, go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole," enhanced, confirmed, and sanctified the benefit he had received.

It was perhaps the perception of the difference between the Samaritan and the Jews, which induced St Luke, from his Pauline and catholic point of view, to insert this occurrence, which the other synoptical Evangelists have, from we know not what special reasons, omitted. The notion is not improbable, that it was his design to exhibit a speaking example of the ingratitude testified throughout by the Jews towards the Lord. (Comp. Schleiermacher, a. a. O. p. 215.) It is, however, sufficiently evident, from ch. ix. 53, that Luke had no undue preference for the Samaritans.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The nature of faith is shown in the history of the ten lepers. Faith recognises in Jesus the sole willing and all-sufficient Saviour, and, impelled by a sense of need, has recourse to Him. Faith is approved by the Lord, tried, but never disappointed by Him, even when its notions concerning the Redeemer are exceedingly defective. It is the only way of salvation, not only in a natural, but also in a spiritual sense, and will, when genuine, manifest itself in sincere gratitude to God, and to the Lord.

2. Nor is the nature of true gratitude less evident. It can neither be required, nor shown, till a man knows himself to be healed and redeemed by the Lord; but then, it cannot, and will not be wanting. As love, so gratitude to God and man, are intimately united. (Comp. 1 John iv. 20.) "Deo ingratus, non erit hominibus gratus." Melancthon. It manifests itself with irresistible power, as in this Samaritan, who, after having lifted up his voice to call upon his Deliverer, immediately after his deliverance, returns to give Him thanks with a loud voice. And as ingratitude not only denies, but also grieves the Lord, so, on the contrary, is true thankfulness rewarded by increased gifts of grace (ver. 19); and the saying, "He that hath, to him shall be given," here receives its full accomplishment.

3. The ingratitude of the nine, contrasted with the gratitude of the one Samaritan, is so far symbolical in its character, as presenting an image of the unfavourable reception which the Lord always experienced among the Israelites, contrasted with the high respect shown Him by the heathen part of the world.

4. The love which the Lord on this, as on other occasions, showed to the Samaritans, was a lesson for the Apostles, which, as appears from the extensive commission delivered to them, Acts i. 8, was doubly necessary, and which subsequently bore fruit, in the zeal with which they preached the Gospel in Samaria, Acts viii.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Increasing enmity does not hinder the Lord from working while it is day.—Leprosy, a type of the defilement and misery of sin.—How the sorrows of life unite and bring men together.—The cry of distress: 1. unanimously raised, 2. graciously heard.—Jesus, a Master who has mercy on them that call upon Him.—Jesus, in the cure of the ten lepers, manifesting Himself as the image of the invisible God (comp. Ps. l. 15).—The mysterious ways and directions of the Lord, are designed to strengthen weak faith.—The divine institutions of the Old Testament were honoured and practised by the Lord during His life on earth.—What is ventured in obedience to the word of Christ, is never without result.—Good and evil are not always found where we might have, a priori, supposed. —Great contrasts in the history of the ten lepers: 1. Great misery on one side, great mercy on the other; 2. great ingratitude of many, great thankfulness of one; 3. Israel blessed with benefits, but rejected through their own fault; the stranger praised and accepted. —Human gratitude and ingratitude towards Christ, and Christ dealing with human gratitude and ingratitude.—How true gratitude to God is manifested by glorifying Jesus.—The melancholy question: Where are the nine? 1. What were they once? 2. where are they now? 3. what will they be hereafter?—The thankful stranger, a true citizen of the kingdom of God.—Of what kind is the faith which saves? A faith, 1. humble in prayer, 2. courageous in approaching, 3. joyful in thanksgiving.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The world is an hospital, full of the sick and infirm.—J. Hall: Like joins with like, clean with clean, unclean with unclean.—O Jesus, give us grace to seek Thee, and to wait for Thee.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: No one can cure us of the leprosy of sin, but One, whose name is Jesus, Matt. i. 21.—No things are more suited to each other than the misery of man and the compassion of Christ.—Hedinger: Let him who would be spiritually whole, show himself to experienced Christians.—Christ is, indeed, the Physician of all men; but He does not heal all men in one way.—O man, if God has graciously heard thy Eleison, do not thou forget to offer Him thy Hallelujah.

Quesnel: Humility is always joined with true gratitude.—Bibl. Wurt.: Ingratitude to our neighbours is disgraceful; much more so ingratitude to God for His many kindnesses.—Learn to suffer, and avoid, ingratitude.—Follow not the multitude; it is better to be with the one than the nine.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Exaltation follows humiliation; departing in peace, true repentance.—Canstein: Faith is so great and glorious, that that which is indeed the gift and mercy of God is often attributed to it.

Lavater: Christ rewards even the thanks which are most justly His due with fresh marks of favour.—Heubner: The true penitent goes, indeed, to meet Christ, but humbly stands afar off.—The spiritually sick, also, should, when they need consolation, show themselves to the priest.—The priests cannot cleanse, but only pronounce clean.—Believers in erroneous doctrines often shame the professors of the true religion.—The multitude of evil and the scarcity of good examples in human society.—Christ still experiences, as ever, the ingratitude of men.—Ingratitude is so frequent, because humility is so rare.—He who prays without giving thanks, closes the door of the audience-chamber against himself.

On the whole paragraph.—Couard: Our life must be a continuous prayer and thanksgiving: 1. Prayer, with respect to our needs; 2. thanksgiving, with respect to God's mercies.—Ahlfeld: Where are the nine? How is it with thee, with respect to thy thanksgivings towards God?—Rautenberg: The design of the divine mercy: 1. That we should acknowledge God's mercy, 2. receive it with thanksgiving, 3. grow in holiness thereby.

Westermeyer: Ps. l. 15: 1. The commanded call; 2. the promised help; 3. the due thanksgiving.—W. Otto: Ingratitude, the world's payment: 1. This is an experience made in the world; 2. a complaint made of the world; 3. a disgrace to be attributed to the world; 4. an evil arising from the world.—Fuchs: Christ makes us clean: 1. From what? 2. by what? 3. for what?—Souchon: Counterfeit and true faith.—Stier: How the Lord, to our disgrace, bewails the ingratitude of man!—J. J. Miville: The piety produced by necessity.

2. Discourse of Jesus concerning the Kingdom of God.
(Vers. 20–37.)

20 And when He was demanded of the Pharisees when the kingdom of God should come, He answered them, and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. 21 Neither shall they say, Lo here! or, lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you. 22 And He said unto the disciples, The days will come, when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it. 23 And they shall say to you, See here! or, see there! go not after them, nor follow them. 24 For as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in His day. 25 But first must He suffer many things, and be rejected of this generation. 26 And as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. 27 They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark; and the flood came, and destroyed them all. 28 Likewise also, as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; 29 But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. 30 Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed. 31 In that day, he which shall be upon the house-top, and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back. 32 Remember Lot's wife. 33 Whosoever shall seek to save his life, shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life, shall preserve it. 34 I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. 35 Two women shall be grinding together; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 36 Two men shall be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 37 And they answered and said unto Him, Where, Lord? And He said unto them, Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together.

Ver. 23. See here! see there! Recep., See here! or, see there! The ἢ before the second ἰδού, though defended by Lachmann, is borrowed from Matt. xxiv. 23, and has been justly rejected by Tischendorf.

Ver. 24. καί, though doubtful, and omitted in many manuscripts, appears in B.D.; and has been, probably on this account, retained by Tischendorf, and inserted in brackets by Lachmann.

Ver. 27. Most probably an interpolation from Matt. xxiv. 24, and therefore rejected by almost all modern critics except Scholz. De Wette only thinks it doubtful.

Ver. 37. Will also. καί is admitted into the text by Tischendorf, on the authority of B.L.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. When He was demanded of the Pharisees.—The motive, occasion, and purport of this question can but be conjectured. The Lord's answer, consisting both of instruction and solemn warning, forbids our supposing it to have proceeded from interested and anxious inquirers. It is probable that these Pharisees were not unacquainted with the increasing enmity of the rulers against Jesus, and were indulging in secret derision at the fact, that the kingdom of God, which had now so long been testified both by Jesus and John, was still invisible; and that the Lord, after so much effort in Galilee, should have obtained no greater a number of followers. But as good often arises out of evil, so are we here indebted to their secret enmity for instruction, which confutes the error of the adversary in its very principles, and possesses an abiding value for all successive ages.

2. With observation (marg., with outward show), μετὰ παρατηρήσεως; properly, with or amidst observation, so that it would be observed and recognised by external signs, and that it would be possible to exclaim, See here! see there! The first idea is not that of external pomp and splendour (μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, Grotius), but generally, that which is outward, which can be seen or touched. This answer gave the Pharisees to understand, that it was vain to inquire concerning any definite period, when it would suddenly appear. The Lord could not well have given them a more striking proof of how unobserved this coming was, than by adducing the fact, that the kingdom of heaven had already made its incipient appearance among them, and that as yet their earthly mind had not perceived it.

3. Within you (margin, among you), ἐντὸς ὑμῶν.—The Lord directed their glance from the future, to which they were looking, back to the present. Inasmuch as the King of heaven was already living and working in their midst, the kingdom of heaven might be said to have potentially come as near to them as possible. The explanation, in animis vestris (Chrysostom, Luther, Olshausen, Heubner, Hilgenfeld, and others; also the late Prof. A. des Amorie van der Hoeven of Amsterdam), may be indeed verbally defended, and finds a faint echo in certain isolated expressions of St Paul (1 Cor. iv. 20; Rom. xiv. 17; Col. i. 13), but is not favoured by the context. In favour of the translation, "among you," may be adduced: 1. That the contrast between the external coming and the already actual presence is thus best preserved; 2. that the kingdom of God did not actually exist in the hearts of these Pharisees; and 3. that in John i. 26, xii. 35; Luke vii. 16, xi. 20, the same idea is expressed in another manner; while, on the other hand, the seemingly deeper, but not very comprehensible view, that the kingdom of God is found within men, receives no support from other sayings of the Lord. It would undoubtedly be better to unite the two significations of ἐντός (Stier, Lange), though the context contains nothing that obliges us to understand ἐντός otherwise, than as simply the opposite of ἔξω, intra vos. Meyer is not certainly entirely wrong, when he designates the idea of the kingdom of God being an ethical condition within its subjects, as a modern, and not a biblical notion.

4. And He said unto the disciples.—The Pharisees are dismissed with the preceding answer, which St Luke alone has preserved; but the Lord, instead of giving up the subject which they had broached, proceeds, perhaps in their presence, to instruct His disciples still further concerning the approaching kingdom of God. In the eschatological discourse, vers 22–37, the same phenomenon is repeated which we have already met with, viz., that Luke here communicates expressions which Matthew reports in an entirely different connection; and again, we cannot avoid the inquiry, which of the two has preserved the most accurate chronological sequence? On comparing the first with the third Gospel, it appears that Luke xvii. 23, 24, and Matt. xxiv. 23, 27; also Luke xvii. 26, 27, and Matt. xxiv. 37–39; likewise Luke xvii. 35–37, and Matt. xxiv. 37, 40, 41, are almost verbally identical. Hence the possibility, at least, that the Lord repeated these sayings on different occasions, can by no means be doubted. On the other hand, however, it can hardly be denied, that many of the sayings, here reported by Luke, appear in a far more suitable and natural connection in Matthew; that it is far more probable, that the Lord should have spoken of these secrets of futurity towards the close of His earthly life, and to His immediate disciples alone, than several weeks before, in the midst of so mixed an assembly as St Luke here represents; and that, finally, it is almost unimaginable that the long eschatological discourse, Matt. xxiv., should consist chiefly of reminiscences of information previously communicated Luke xvii. For all these reasons, we believe that Luke xvii. 22–37 stands in about the same relation to Matt. xxiv. as Luke vi. 17–49, and ch. xii. 22, etc., to Matt. chs. v.–vii. In opposition to Schleiermacher, who awards the preference to St Luke, we think we perceive, with Ebrard, Lange, and others, certain heterogeneous elements in the edition given us of this passage by the third Evangelist, i.e., such as, though in themselves undoubtedly genuine, were only inserted here because an occasion offered itself, and apart from their original historical connection. Our view is that the Lord really did, on this occasion, communicate certain eschatological information, though without then speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem; but that the isolated concluding words of another and later discourse were interwoven in this by St Luke, per πρόληψιν. How much was inserted into one discourse from the other, can but be approximately determined.

5. The days will come.—The psychological connection of these first words to the disciples, and the last to the Pharisees, is self-evident. Scarcely had the Lord uttered the assurance, that the kingdom of heaven was actually among them, than He thought of the privilege of His disciples, who were already received into it; but, at the same time—and how at this period could He avoid it?—of the pain of their approaching separation. It is as though He feared lest His friends, in their joy at the assurance that the kingdom of God was among them, should conclude that the King would continue to abide with them. Far from rekindling even the faintest sparks of those carnal expectations, which He had hitherto so emphatically opposed, He hastens to prepare them for hard times. Under the pressure of various calamities, they would long, and, for the moment, long in vain, to see even one of the blessed and happy days of the manifestation of Christ. The Lord was alluding to one of those days of happiness which the αἰὼν μέλλων should bring. He did not mean that they should look back with regret to the days they were now living, in intercourse with Christ in His humiliation, but that they would long for the manifestation of the glorified Christ, which should put an end to all their sorrow, and fully satisfy all their longings. We must not therefore declare, with Bengel, "cupiditatem illam postea sedavit Paracletus;" but rather, "hanc cupiditatem tantum modo sedare potest Parousia." This natural but impatient desire might expose them to the danger of being seduced by false Christs, against which the Lord warns them in the following words.

6. Nor follow them, etc.—Comp. Matt. xxiv. 23–27, and Lange on this passage. Schleiermacher, without any reason, opposes the notion that false Messiahs are here intended. We need but remember the Egyptian, who, shortly before the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, deceived so many thousands by the promise of miracles, and led them into the wilderness, and to destruction. See Joseph. Ant. Jud. xx. 8, 6; comp. de bello Jud. ii. 13, 4; Acts v. 36, 37, xxi. 38; and Homily 76 of Chrysostom on Matthew.

7. The lightning.—The tertium comparationis between the Parousia and the rapidity of the lightning darting through the darkened sky, is not in its unexpected appearance, but in its undoubted visibility. When a flash of lightning darts from one quarter of the heavens to another, there is no need of asking whether, and where, the light was seen. When once the day of the Son of man is come, there will be no more doubt concerning it, than there is uncertainty as to whether ἡ ἀστραπὴ ἡ ἀστράπτουσα has glanced through the air or not. Ἡμέρα here points to the παρουσία, which the ἡμέραι of ver. 22 do not precede, but follow.

8. First must He suffer many things.—The pre-announcement of suffering and death, so often reiterated, during this latter period, is not omitted on this occasion. "In ver. 25 He makes the great and decisive disclosure, in opposition to every false παρατήρησις, that the Messiah must first, during a previous appearing, suffer and be rejected. See Matt. xvi. 21, xvii. 12." Stier. They must not, then, as the Pharisees were doing, expect this promised appearing too soon, since one sad event must, in any case, precede it. The Lord could not too seriously impress upon the hearts of His disciples, that His path was leading into the depths of sorrow, while they were secretly dreaming of the heights of distinction.

9. In the days of Noe.—Comp. Matt. xxiv. 37–39. Although the coming of the Lord will be the perfect deliverance of His disciples from all calamities (comp. ver. 22), it is here especially represented as a judgment upon the ungodly and unbelieving world, and this judgment is typically described by the fate of Noah's contemporaries. The disjunction of the different verbs, increases the vivid and graphic effect of this description of their careless way of living, in the midst of the most urgent warnings. From the circumstance that it is their dreadful fate which is dwelt upon, while the deliverance of Noah is passed over in silence, there is some probability that the Lord originally addressed these words to a more extensive audience, than that of His faithful disciples.

10. In the days of Lot.—This second example, which St Luke alone reports, is especially remarkable, not merely on account of the peculiar similarity of the period here mentioned to those antediluvian days; but also, on account of the striking application (ver. 32) of the history of Lot's wife. Here also, the account of the destruction of Sodom agrees entirely with that of Gen. xix. and other Scriptures.

11. He which shall be upon the house-top.—The Lord advises instantaneous flight, which necessarily involves the abandonment of all earthly property. According to the context, He had certainly not yet spoken, as in Matt. xxiv. 17, of the destruction of Jerusalem: the admonition, in this passage, is not, however, therefore unsuitable, as De Wette hastily concludes; nor need we understand (with Meyer) a flight for safety to the coming Messiah. This latter explanation betokens perplexity, and is only apparently supported by the example of Lot's wife. We may here imagine a general reference to a besieged city, through the breaches in whose walls the victorious foes are pouring in, and from which the only chance of escaping with life, would be a flight so immediate that it would be impossible to carry off anything. The same would be the case with one surprised in the field, here spoken of in the same general manner as the city. The leading idea plainly is, that no temporal possessions must engage our interest when eternity is at stake. Comp. Matt. xvi. 25.

12. Remember Lot's wife.—We should infer too much from the Lord's words, if we were to conclude from them that Lot's wife was exposed to everlasting misery on account of her temporary transgression. Much more wisely does Luther conclude, "Lot's wife had to bear a temporal punishment for her disobedience; but her soul was saved: 1 Cor. v. 5." The nature of her transgression is evident, from Gen. xix. 26. By an unseasonable looking back, she became the type of that carnal disposition and self-seeking which will secure the less at all risks, and thereby loses the greatest. It is worthy of notice, that the same warning is held out to us in the Book of Wisdom, ch. x. 7; and hence this passage is one of the very few in the Gospels in which, perhaps, an indirect reference to one of the apocryphal books may be found. On the peculiar manner of the death of Lot's wife, and the legends respecting the pillar of salt, see the commentaries on Gen. xix., and especially the remarks of J. W. J. Schroeder, in the First Book of Moses explained, Berlin 1844, p. 373.

13. Whosoever shall seek to save his life, etc.—See the remarks on ch. ix. 24; and compare Matt. x. 39; John xii. 25.—Ζωογονήσει, shall preserve life (the same verb occurs Acts vii. 19), i.e., in the last day, at Christ's appearing. The Lord's words have here a deeper meaning, inasmuch as He is not speaking merely of the danger incurred by those who are utterly careless, but also of that to which such disciples are exposed, as, like Lot's wife, have indeed taken the first steps towards escaping the wrath to come, but, unfortunately, stand still in the midst of the way to life.

14. I tell you.—Comp. remarks on Matt. xxiv. 40, etc. The Lord still further enforces His admonition by referring to the definite and terrible separation, which will take place at the great judgment. At His coming, those who seemed as closely united as possible shall be torn asunder. Luke gives two examples; while the third, ver. 36, seems inserted from Matt. xxiv. 24: see notes on the text. The one is taken from association by day, the other from association at night. Ταύτῃ τῇ νυκτί is not used in the sense of tempore illo calamitoso (Grotius, Kuinoel), but as a simple mention of the time which it is usual to pass in bed, with perhaps a secondary reference to the uncertainty of Christ's appearing, which is to come as a thief in the night, Matt. xxiv. 39, 40. Ταύτῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ might, on the other hand, be supplied at the beginning of the second example, ver. 35. The Parousia takes place unexpectedly, whether by day or by night; and they who are outwardly united.

but really dissimilar, shall be eternally separated. The κλίνη μία does not necessarily imply matrimonial union,—both the pronouns are masculine,—but any union sufficiently intimate to justify association in rest at night; as, in the following example, an association in work by day is spoken of. Two women, on the contrary, appear in this example (μία, ἑτέρα), who, according to the Eastern custom, are grinding with the hand-mills there in use, Exod. xi. 5, and are thus outwardly employed at one and the same appointed task. Whether, then, the Parousia shall take place by night or by day, one of the two is taken, the other left. It is, however, self-evident that the Lord is not here laying down a strict rule: two might be in one bed, and both might be taken; two might, on the contrary, be in one field, and both might be left; but it might happen that the most intimate association would be interrupted. The one is taken, comp. John xii. 26, xiv. 3; the other exposed to inevitable danger, without respect of persons.

15. Where, Lord?—Not an expression of fear (quomodo, Kuinoel), but a definite question concerning the place in which all this is to occur, as the Pharisees had definitely inquired concerning the time of the manifestation of the kingdom of God. Though the Lord, according to Luke, had not been speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, it seems as if the disciples anticipated that the terrible scenes just announced, might perhaps take place in their neighbourhood, in the Holy Land, and were desirous that the Lord should satisfy them on this point. He gives them, however, neither an evasive nor a definite answer, but quotes a proverb, on which compare the remarks on Matt. xxiv. 28.—Τὸ σῶμα; in Matt. τὸ πτῶμα. The animal body is intended, which, as soon as it is deprived of life, becomes a welcome booty to the birds of prey. If we do not accept the view, that we have here a reference to the Roman eagles, who flocked around the unfortunate city of Jerusalem as their prey, we may adopt the general paraphrase of Stier: "Everything in its time and order, and according to that which befits it. Do not inquire too curiously where, how, and when; but remember, wherever the corruption of death is, thither must the eagles come! When it is night, the lightning will bring a terrible light! Only take care to be found among the living, and among the children of light." In no case is there reason for complaining, with De Wette, that this enigmatical proverb loses its significance as St Luke reports it.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS

1. The Lord's answer to the question of the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God should come, is highly important, as confuting all the various gross chiliastic expectations which have from time to time emerged from the bosom of the Christian Church, during the course of centuries. The desire of the Pharisees to be able to say, See here, see there, has lived in the hearts of thousands who bear the Lord's name, and is the natural consequence of that carnality and pride, which, though repressed, are not uprooted from the hearts of the regenerate. The secret power and spiritual aspect of the kingdom of God are still hidden from their eyes; and it is easier to them to understand the parables of the treasure and the pearl, than to appreciate the full force of those of the mustard-seed and the leaven. A seeking after visible signs, which is rather an evidence of weak than strong faith, is still very prevalent among Christians. Opposed to both the coarser and more refined species of Chiliasm, however, there exists a no less one-sided Spiritualism, which has perhaps been propagated in a still wider circle. Not unfrequently has the saying, that the kingdom of God cometh not μετὰ παρατηρήσεως, been so abused and exaggerated, as to make it declare that this kingdom would never come in splendour, or in a manner worthy of its dignity, upon earth. Truly the kingdom of God cometh not with outward show; but when once it is come, we may well say, See here! for the saying of Oetinger is applicable here, "Corporeality is the end of God's ways." Chiliasm, for the most part, overlooks the spirit for the body, and Spiritualism the body for the spirit; while both forget that, in this matter also, man must not put asunder what God has so closely joined together. The motives, then, of the gross Chiliast must be met by the words, The kingdom of God is already within you; and those of the one-sided Spiritualist, by the saying of our Lord to His disciples, "As the lightning . . . so shall also the Son of man be in His day." The kingdom of God comes indeed with gentle and almost imperceptible steps, but not that it may continue invisible.

2. The coming of the kingdom of God is threefold. The Lord first came in humility, in the form of a servant; afterwards, He comes in spirit, invisibly, but with increased power; at length, He will come in splendour and majesty, in the clouds of heaven. The first phase lasted thirty-three years; the second has already endured for more than eighteen centuries; the third will definitely terminate the present dispensation. The first period closed with the death and sufferings of the Lord; the second will not end without the sufferings of His dearly purchased Church; the last will manifest the perfect glory which is to succeed the sufferings and conflict both of the Head and His members.

3. It is a great error, and has given rise to much misunderstanding, to apply what the Lord here says of the kingdom of God, without any limitation, to the Christian Church. So long as the kingdom of God is not fully come, no one is capable of saying, "See here, or see there." But this by no means implies, that there is no decided token by which the true Church of the Lord may be recognised as such, and distinguished from the false and apostate church. The word and sacraments are the signs of the true, outwardly visible Church, to which every believer must unite himself; and hence the Evangelical Church of our days has to strive, not less against a one-sided clericalism, than against a sickly Darbyism which violates the Church order instituted by the Lord and His Apostles.

4. The Lord here condemns the very foundations of that Donatist tendency, which, during the course of centuries, has manifested itself under so many and various forms. Men desire to make a present external separation between believers and unbelievers, in one bed, in one field, at one mill; the Lord, on the contrary, decrees, that the outward union of the unlike, when it has once taken place, shall not be forcibly abolished till He Himself shall appear, with the fan in His hand. Separatism is an anticipation of the great day of final judgment.

5. There is an infinite difference between the eschatological expectations of modern interpreters, and those excited by this teaching of Christ. It is generally supposed, that in the same proportion as the principles of humanity, education, liberty, etc., are propagated, will the world become better, wiser, and happier. The Lord here opens to us a very different prospect of the latter days. There will certainly then, as in the days of Noah and Lot, be no lack of culture, and of the false appearance of external worldly enlightenment. But instead of the masses becoming better and more serious, we must expect, according to the Lord's words, a time of carelessness, hardening and carnal security, such as that which preceded the overthrow of the former world, and the destruction of Sodom. These are the perilous times in the last days, of which St Paul speaks, 1 Tim. iii. 1; and all that is foretold in the Apocalypse, of the great apostasy during the last age of the world, is but an expansion of the present subject.

6. The Lord emphatically teaches us, how human nature is, at all times, like itself, even amidst the progressive increase of God's judgments. The contemporaries of Noah, of Lot, and those of Antichrist, who is to appear before the last Parousia, are men of the same sort. For these reasons, the earlier judgments here mentioned may be regarded as types and symbols of those still to come, and of the last. It is because sin and carelessness had reached their highest degree among the contemporaries of Noah and Lot, that these generations were peculiarly fitted to be types of the generations who should live in the days of the Lord's appearing. It is therefore no marvel that so great importance and significance is attributed, in the Epistles of St Peter and St Jude, to the deluge and the destruction of Sodom. See 1 Pet. iii. 19, 21; 2 Pet. ii. 5–9; Jude 7.

7. There is a sublime parallelism in the manner in which the Lord describes the days of Lot and of Noah, vers. 26–29. This uniformity and rhythm of words, receives, however, a higher significance, when we see in it the exact expression of the wonderful coincidence which exists, between the men and things of the former, and of the latter days. The careless life of the worldly repeats itself, from age to age, in the same stereotyped phases and forms. And just as unexpected as were the deluge and the rain of brimstone, will be the last appearing of the Lord; a day which will begin like other days, and find one in his bed, another in the field, another at the mill, though it will not end like other days.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Lawful and unlawful desire for the manifestation of the kingdom of God.—Coincidence and difference between the inquiry of the Pharisees, Luke xvii. 20, and that of the disciples, Acts i. 7.—The coming of the kingdom of God.—The signs of the coming of God's kingdom are, 1. not so palpable, 2. not so doubtful, 3. not so limited, as short-sighted man may think: ad. a. not with outward show; ad. b. it is among you; ad. c. it cannot be said to be exclusively here, or there.—The silent and secret coming of the kingdom of God, in hearts, and in the world: 1. The Pharisees forgot it; 2. it is accounted for by the nature of this kingdom, 3. confirmed by history, 4. assured for the future.—The kingdom of God is among you: 1. How inestimable a cause of thanksgiving!

2. How great a responsibility!—The kingdom of God among us will not avail us, as long as it is not within us.—The signs of the Lord's second coming: 1. Painful longing (ver. 22); 2. dangerous seduction (vers. 23–25); 3. increasing carelessness (vers. 26–30).—When the Lord's absence gives pain, and His return is longed for, He will not tarry long.—Even the most faithful disciple of the Lord is exposed to the danger of being seduced by false appearance.—The vox populi, in the kingdom of God, by no means the vox Dei.—The lightning, which enlightens the dark sky, an image of the appearing of the Son of man, which terminates the darkness of the world.—The divine necessity of the suffering which precedes the glory of the Lord.—The history of the past, a prophecy of the still hidden future.—"The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be," Eccles. i. 9.—The days of Noah, an image of the days of the Son of man. In both, we see, 1. a terrible sentence pronounced, 2. a long respite granted—a careless security maintained, 3. a righteous retribution exercised, 4. a safe refuge opened.—The unchangeable character of carelessness, 1. in the days of Lot, 2. at the destruction of Jerusalem, 3. at the second coming of Christ.—Careless security in the midst of threatened danger, 1. an old evil, 2. a dangerous evil, 3. a curable evil.—The day of the Son of man, a terrible, and a glorious day.—The right and the pitiable instinct of self-preservation.—Lot's wife, a warning to earthly-minded disciples. We see her, 1. graciously spared, 2. at first saved, 3. wilfully disobedient, 4. perishing miserably.—He who would reach Zoar, must not look back towards Sodom.—No worldly advantage can compensate for harm to the soul.—The unexpected separation of those who were externally united, considered, 1. in its terrible, 2. in its beneficial, 3. in its powerfully awakening and consolatory aspect.—True union is that which survives the last day.—The Lord's coming, the end of, 1. idle rest, 2. slavish work, 3. forced association.—Where the carcase is, thither will the eagles be gathered: a proverb verified in the history of the, 1. heathen, 2. Jewish, and 3. Christian world.

Starcke, Canstein: He who conceives of the kingdom of Christ in a carnal and earthly manner, will never understand it, much less attain it.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: He who seeks the kingdom of God without, loses it within.—Hedinger: The consolation, presence, and light of Christ, are often lost in temptation.—Quesnel: Let us not follow what men say, but what Christ has said in the Scripture, and confirmed with His wounds.—That which now takes place gradually, through faith, will happen in a moment, when Jesus Christ appears to all men, to judge the world. Now is the day of man, then it will be the day of God.—Canstein: The more secure the world is, the nearer is the day of Christ's appearing, 1 Thess. v. 3.—Brentius: It is a grievous evil, and should bring us to serious consideration, that the longer approaching judgments are delayed, the worse do men become.—Like sins entail like punishments: God is unchangeable in His nature.—The end of a thing is better than the beginning; let us, however, strive to continue faithful to the end, in the manner in which we began, lest we tempt God, Rev. iii. 5.—If people are unlike, their departure out of the world is also unlike.—When proverbs have a good biblical meaning, and express a matter shortly and well, they may be well and profitably used.

Heubner: The carnal man values everything according to its outward appearance.—The welfare of the Church is not promoted by encroachments upon the power of the State, but arises from within herself.—Knapp, Zeugnisse evang. Wahrh. iii. p. 1, etc., a sermon on Luke xvii. 20–25: Live more and more within, and deeper into, the kingdom of God.—Chr. Palmer: How the Lord gives different answers to different inquirers, as to when the kingdom of God will come: a. To those who, as yet, know nothing of it, He says, It is here already; b. those who have it already in their hearts, He directs to the future, for which they are to wait, watch, and prepare.—How we may try, whether our hope in the coming of God's kingdom, be a delusive one.—Neander: The kingdom of God cometh not with outward show.

3. The Unjust Judge, and the Importunate Widow. (CHAP. XVIII. 1–8.)

1 And He spake a parable unto them to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint; 2 Saying, There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man: 3 And there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary. 4 And he would not for a while: but afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man; 5 Yet, because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me. 6 And the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith. 7 And shall not God avenge His own elect, which cry day and night unto Him, though He bear long with them? 8 I tell you that He will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?

Ver. 1. They, αὐτούς. See Lachmann and Tischendorf on this passage.

Ver. 3. The reading μακροθυμεῖ seems preferable to the μακροθυμῶν of the Receptus, as well as to the μακροθυμήσει of some codices and copies.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He spake, etc.—Though it is certainly possible that a pause may have occurred between this and the immediately preceding discourse of our Lord (Olshausen, Schleiermacher), yet this supposition is by no means necessary, since the connection of this parable of the unjust judge with the discourse concerning the Lord's appearing, is self-evident. The Lord had long before announced that troublous times were approaching, in which conflict and oppression would surely be the lot of His disciples: what, then, could He do better than exhort them to persevering prayer, that the long-desired ἐκδίκησις, ver. 7, might be at last their happy portion? This parable, then, is specially addressed to His disciples (αὐτούς; comp. ch. xvii. 22); and the earnest exhortation not to faint, does not relate to Christian conduct generally, but to prayer particularly.

2. A certain judge.—According to Deut. xvi. 18, the Israelites were to have judges in all the gates of their towns, who were bound to judge the people with just judgment, without respect of persons. See Exod. xxiii. 6–9; Lev. xix. 15. Such town tribunals existed in our Lord's days (Matt. v. 21, 22); and it is not improbable that the narrative in question was taken from life. The character of the judge, as here described, is such that he gives himself up, without reserve, to the most shameless selfishness. Neither of the motives which usually restrain men from wickedness—fear of God, and regard for the opinions of men—had power to induce him to perform an act of justice. That characteristic of genuine Old Testament piety, the φόβος τ. Θεοῦ, as well as respect for human judgment, was wholly wanting. In this respect he stood even below the ungodly, who generally have at least the latter quality; and, what is worse, his soliloquy shows that he is not even ashamed of his vicious disposition, ver. 4.

3. Avenge me.—The widow not merely desired that he would put an end to her tedious law-suit (Schleiermacher), but that he would effectually deliver her from the hand of a powerful and persecuting adversary. Although every individual, in similar distress, might, in a certain sense, be compared to this widow, yet the context shows that the Lord's words have special reference to His Church, which, before His Parousia, is apparently defenceless, and exposed to the obstinate opposition of the world and of sin, while it often seems as if God were appealed to in vain for victory and protection

4. For a time, ἐπὶ χρόνον, aliquamdiu, Erasmus.—An indefinite intimation of a tolerably long period, during which all supplication seemed in vain—the days of the great tribulation, Matt. xxiv. 21, 22. These days must be lived through in prayer, but will as surely come to an end as the time of the widow's trial. The justice which is wrung from the unjust judge, will be willingly exercised by the just Judge in His own good time.

5. I will avenge her.—Comp. ch. xi. 8. The judge grants the widow's petition, because her endless complaints have become unbearable. It is obvious how greatly the soliloquizing form, in which he records his resolution, enhances the beauty of the parable. The tragic fate of the widow is related in a dramatic form.—Εἰς τέλος, not tandem, but incessant; LXX. = לָנֶצַח;—ὑπωπιάζειν, properly, to give any one a black eye, then proverbially to give any kind of annoyance; comp. 1 Cor. ix. 27. Meyer considers that the judge was actually afraid, or at least jestingly represented himself as afraid, lest the woman, growing desperate, should really attack him and strike him in the face. This is certainly possible, but is hardly a suitable feature in the representation of a defenceless and supplicating widow who, by such behaviour, would be transformed into a fury. Besides, it is apparent, from the whole monologue, that it is simply selfishness which now impels the judge to compliance, as it had before impelled him to injustice. Vulgate: ne sugillet me. Luther's marginal note is, "Lest she annoy and trouble me; as we say of importunate people and beggars: How these people worry me!" The proverbial character of his speech is well expressed in the Dutch version, "opdat zy niet kome en my het hoofd breke."

6. Hear what, etc.—The Lord here makes a sudden transition, taking up the words which He had Himself put into the mouth of this man of violence; and ascending, as in chs. xi. 5 and xvi. 8, from human deficiency to divine perfection,—a circumstance which renders it necessary that we should keep strictly to the tertium comparationis. The force of the contrast in the question, And shall not God avenge, etc.? may be more easily felt than expressed by a laboured description. The elect, who cry day and night unto Him, are not so much to be looked upon as individuals, as a community, though what is here said is naturally applicable to each separate member.

7. Though He bear long with them, καὶ μακροθυμεῖ ἐπ' αὐτοῖς.—

With the reading which we think preferable, it is not necessary to take καί in the sense of καίπερ, quamvis; comp. Acts vii. 5; Heb. iii. 9, etc. Μακροθυμεῖ does not express the notion of long-suffering in general, but of persevering in a delay of assistance; and the second half of the question, ver. 7, may then be paraphrased, "And is it His way, with respect to them, to delay His help?" (Meyer.) Hence it appears that the first member of the question requires an affirmative, the second, on the contrary, a negative answer; and that the μακροθυμία, here mentioned, stands in direct contrast to the ἐκδίκ. ποιεῖν ἐν τάχει, which ver. 8 so assuredly promises. 'Επί points out the ἐκλεκτοί as objects of a delay whose continuance is, according to the Lord's words, quite unimaginable. We have here no assurance that God is long-suffering towards His people—a truth which is obvious, and would be entirely out of place here; nor that, for their sakes, He delays the punishment of His enemies—though this is, indeed, taught elsewhere; but a refutation of the idea, that God can persevere in withholding the assistance for which His elect so earnestly supplicate.

8. I tell you, etc.—The assured announcement of the reverse of the denied μακροθ. ἐπ' αὐτοῖς. Far from being more inexorable than the unjust judge, God will, on the contrary, hasten, after a longer or shorter delay, the triumph of the just cause. The ἐκδίκησις is here parallel with the Lord's appearing, when His enemies will be most deeply degraded. If this παρουσία was represented in the former chapter as the terror of the careless, it is here exhibited as the deliverance of the oppressed, and as the granting of the prayers which rise day and night to Heaven, from the hearts of the elect.

9. Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, etc.—After the Lord had assured His people, that God will, by no means, leave their prayers unheard, He emphatically inquired whether they would exhibit as much patience and perseverance in prayer as the widow, showing, at the same time, that He doubted it, at least with respect to some of them. There is not the slightest ground for supposing this to be any other than the last coming of the Son of man, which indeed presupposes an uninterrupted, and still increasing, manifestation of His glory. The Lord transports Himself, in spirit, to the time of the συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, which is to be preceded by the last conflict and greatest tribulation of His Church, and which His disciples on earth are to live through in faith, prayer, and hope. Will their faith be great and constant enough, even after so long a time of trial, to look for such a deliverance as was granted to this widow? Ἆρα indicates a slight measure of doubt, calculated the more strongly to incite His disciples to persevere in prayer and watchfulness.—Τὴν πίστιν, here, does not denote, generally, a saving faith which recognises Jesus as the Messiah (Meyer); nor the faithfulness elsewhere (ch. xii. 35–48) required of the disciples (De Wette); but faith in God, as the just Judge, which alone could make men capable of prayer so persevering, and which, in His disciples, is most intimately united with personal faith in Himself: comp. John xiv. 1. The Lord manifestly presupposes, that this faith will be exposed to a sharp conflict, through the delay of answers to its prayers, and of the Lord's appearing. There is, however, no necessity for the view of De Wette, that this edition of the parable belongs to a later period: comp. 2 Pet. iii. 3. Other sayings of the Lord give tolerably plain intimations, that the παρουσία would not take place so speedily as some supposed: comp. Matt. xxv. 5, 19.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. This parable, preserved by St Luke alone, may rightly be called a locus classicus in the doctrine of Christian prayer. The promise is here repeated in the form of a parable, which is given directly in John xiv.–xvi. It may, however, be remarked, that praying "always" is not quite the same as the praying "without ceasing," spoken of 1 Thess. v. 17. The latter denotes an unintermitted living and breathing of the soul in communion with God; while the former expresses untiring and repeated supplication for the same thing, when we are convinced that it is according to the will of God. Paul was speaking of the prevailing disposition of the believer; the Lord, on the contrary, of the wrestling in prayer of the oppressed and suffering disciple.

2. The relation between the Church militant and the world, which is so inimically disposed towards her, is strikingly represented under the image of this widow. "The Church, which, according to its nature and destiny, is the bride of Christ, awaiting the festal appearance of the Bridegroom, here appears in the form of a widow. It is as if her betrothed husband has died in a distant land. Meantime she is living in a town, where she is constantly oppressed by a cruel adversary, the prince of this world. As, however, she is continually praying to God for help, it might seem to her, in her weaker hours, as though He were acting the part of the unjust judge towards her, as though His dealings were characterized neither by divine justice nor love to mankind. And when this lasts long, because God has great and heavenly purposes, in accordance with which He educates His children, by severe trials, for a spiritual and eternal life, yet deliverance comes at last with surprising speed." Lange. We must, however, beware of finding in this parable a prediction of any definite period in the history of the Church, as Vitringa, for example, has done, when he explains this parable of the behaviour of the Roman emperors to the Christian Church, which they first oppressed and afterwards protected. The figure has been more or less suitable in every age of the Church, and will be fully realized in the troublous times which she has yet to experience, and of which, St Paul, e.g., speaks 2 Tim. iii. 1, and elsewhere.

3. Another reason why this parable is so fitly placed in the Pauline Gospel of St Luke, may be found in the fact, that the disciples of the Lord are here specially called the ἐκλεκτοί. As such, they are, entirely without any merit of their own, the objects of God's gracious delight, and may look upon their cause as His. Persevering prayer is both the token and pulse of their spiritual life, and all their prayers are resolved into the ἔρχου, which the Spirit and the bride are continually repeating, with respect to the heavenly Bridegroom, Rev. xxii. 17.

4. Before the justice and compassion of the natural man are so excessively extolled, it would be well to make strict search how far they may be caused, as in the case of the unjust judge, by necessity and selfishness. It is the characteristic of those actions which, though externally good, are performed by man, apart from communion with God, that they are wholly accidental, arising from arbitrary choice, and not from firm principle, and rather the fruit of carnal considerations than of willing obedience.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The coming of the Lord must be expected not only with watchfulness, but with prayer.—Christian perseverance in prayer, 1. a holy, 2. a difficult, 3. a blessed duty.—Injustice is not unfrequently practised in this world, under the form of justice, and by those who ought to exercise justice.—The image of the Church militant: 1. The widow, Isa. lv. 1, 2; 2. the adversary, 1. Pet. v. 8; 3. the judge, Ps. xliii. 1.—God, the husband of the widow, and the judge of the fatherless.—God cannot possibly withhold from His elect that which an unjust judge grants to a supplicating widow.—God delays long, in order, at last, to act speedily.—All the prayers of the Church militant at length resolve themselves into longing for the Lord's appearing.—The Lord will come, 1. to cast down His enemies, 2. to redeem His friends, 3. to manifest His glory to both.—How comparatively small will be the number of those whose faith and prayer will endure to the end!—The Son of man will, at His appearing, find not only careless enemies, but also discouraged disciples.—Deliverance, though long delayed, will come certainly, and at length, often, unexpectedly.—The persevering prayer of faith is often, 1. the comprehensive duty of faith; 2. an indispensable support of faith, vers. 2, 3; 3. a painful conflict of faith, ver. 4 a.; 4. a victorious power of faith, ver. 4 b.; 5. a rare fruit of faith.

Starcke, Quesnel: Prayer, the riches of the poor; and sighs, the relief of the wretched.—Canstein: Worldly power often so seduces men, that they fear not God, neither regard man.—Where there is no fear of God, there is also no true regard for man.—Judges ought, according to God's commands, to take widows and orphans under their special protection, Isa. i. 19; Jer. vii. 6.—Brentius: Complaints are annoying, even in a just cause.—God avenges and does justice when He pleases, even by means of an unjust judge. —Canstein: We may profit even by the worst examples.—Hedinger: Beware of impatience; God will not do what we prescribe, but what He sees good for us, 1 John v. 14.—Zeisius: Help is often nearest, when, in the eyes of the believer, all seems lost, Ps. xii. 6.—Heubner: The question, whether prayer is a duty, is as wise, as whether it is a duty to breathe.—Persevering prayer to God, the best resource of widows.—The prayers of the elect must at last be heard; for the redemption of the saints is the eternal will of God.—Prayer is but a mockery, without belief in the fatherly affection of God.—Faith is the chief thing, and that on which all else depends.—Lisco: Motives to persevering prayer for the children of the kingdom.—Zimmermann: Perseverance in prayer: we should be encouraged thereto, by, 1. the consciousness of our dependence on God, 2. the greatness of our need, 3. the so frequently promised assistance, 4. the certainty of at length obtaining our petitions.—Gerok: The progress of Christians in the school of prayer: 1. The need that brings them to the door of God; 2. the faith which knocks at the door; 3. the patience which waits at the door; 4. the experience which enters in by the door.—F. Arndt: Why we ought to persevere in prayer: 1. Reasons in ourselves; 2. reasons in God.

4. The Pharisee and the Publican. (VERS. 9–14.)

9 And He spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others: 10 Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican. 11 The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank Thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. 12 I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess. 13 And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner. 14 I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

Ver. 14. The reading of Elzevir, ἢ ἐκεῖνος, has but insufficient critical authority. That of Tischendorf, ἢ γὰρ ἐκεῖνος, is powerfully supported, but its meaning is scarcely comprehensible. That of Lachmann, παρ' ἐκεῖνον, defended by Grotius and favoured by B.L., is preferable on internal grounds; in which case we must certainly conclude, that by an old and tolerably general error of transcription (γάρ instead of παρ'), the true reading was very soon lost.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He spake.—We do not think (with Meyer) that the parable of the Pharisee and publican was delivered on the same occasion as the preceding. In this case, we must consider the Pharisees as still present (ch. xvii. 20); and it is scarcely possible to imagine, that the Lord would have selected a Pharisee to play the chief part in His parable, in their presence. It seems, then, that a subsequent opportunity was offered to the Lord, in the midst of the wider circle of His disciples, for contrasting pride and humility, under these figures. Perhaps St Luke reported the parable in this connection, because of its relation to the subject of prayer; while its conclusion furnishes a peculiarly suitable transition to the immediately following narrative (vers. 15–17). That it was, however, spoken at this period of the ministry of Jesus, is probable from the circumstance, that both the men are described as going up into the temple to pray; a circumstance doubly fitting, when we remember how many caravans of travellers to the feast were now on their way to the temple, and that Jesus Himself was upon His journey to His last Passover.

2. Unto certain.—Πρός is not to be understood here, as in ver. 1, of the mere purpose of the parable (De Wette, Stier, Arndt), but as denoting the persons to whom it was addressed. We are neither informed whom τινές is intended to designate, nor in what manner their self-righteous disposition was manifested. They certainly were not exclusively Pharisees, since we know how earnestly the Lord warned even His own disciples of the leaven of the Pharisees, and that self-righteousness was not only the prevailing evil of the Jews of His times, but that it is still the innate evil of every natural man. We need not suppose (with Stier), that these proud μαθηταί had perhaps, after the conclusion of the preceding parable, expressed themselves in some such manner as the following: "Pray! O we can already do that better than others; we are not without faith." We may very fitly imagine, indeed, that the Lord read this pride in their hearts, or that He had really seen, in actual life, such a contrast as He here exhibits to us. It is the disposition which the Lord was opposing, rather than the persons intended, which is here described. They believed of themselves, ἐφ' ἑαυτοῖς, that they were possessed of the righteousness required by the law: comp. Phil. iii. 4; 2 Cor. i. 9; of others, they believed exactly the reverse.

3. Two men.—Here also we have two individuals as types of two different principles. The Lord never exhibits any virtue or vice in abstracto, but always in concreto, as it is seen in actual life.—'Αναβαίνειν, a strictly literal expression for visiting the temple, in its elevated position.—To pray. The chief object and summary of the whole of public worship: comp. Isa. lvi. 7.

4. The Pharisee stood.—Σταθείς may be either taken separately, or connected with the immediately following πρὸς ἑαυτόν, in the sense of stabat seorsim (Grotius, Paulus). It would then mean, that he had chosen an entirely separate situation, in order not to be ceremonially defiled by too near vicinity to those whom he looked upon as unclean. It is, however, simpler to connect the words πρὸς ἑαυτ. with the immediately following ταῦτα προσηύχετο (Lisco, Meyer). The expression εἰπεῖν πρὸς ἑαυτ. is a usual one: see ch. xx. 5, 14, comp. ch. xii. 17, iii. 15; Mark xi. 31, xii. 7, etc. The word σταθείς, used alone, graphically depicts the self-confidence of the Pharisee, especially when contrasted with the μακρόθεν ἑστώς of ver. 13.

5. Prayed thus with himself, but loudly enough for others to hear.—His prayer is a thanksgiving; his thanksgiving, a glorifying, not of God, but of himself. With boundless arrogance does he exalt himself, not only above many or most, but above all other men, οἱ λοιποὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων. "Duas classes Pharisæus facit, in alteram conjicit totum genus humanum, altera, melior, ipse sibi solus esse videtur." Bengel. He soon, however, begins to separate the great mass of sinners into different groups. There are the ἄδικοι in the more limited sense; the ἅρπαγες, such as a Zaccheus, for example; the μοιχοί, not in a spiritual and Old Testament meaning, but literally such; and finally, the man who, as the incarnation of all possible faults, stands below them, οὗτος ὁ τελώνης, whom he had indeed seen enter the temple, but of whom he knows, beforehand, that his prayer cannot possibly be acceptable to God. He thus praises himself in order to pass in the same breath to the announcement of his good works.

6. I fast twice in the week.—The law had only prescribed a yearly fast, but he kept, according to the custom of those times, a private fast on two days of the week, viz., Monday and Thursday. Here, as in Mark xvi. 9, τοῦ σαββ. designates a week ending with the Sabbath.—I give tithes of all. Again, more than was required by the law, according to which tithes were only demanded of cattle, and of the fruits of the earth: Lev. xxvii. 30; Num. xviii. 21; Deut. xiv. 22.—Ὅσα κτῶμαι; not, what I possess, which would be κέκτημαι, but what I receive, what comes to me. Not of his possessions as such, but of his annual profit—of what he owed to his own skill and industry, and of which he might, from his point of view, suppose, that he might fairly keep it for himself. Thus his thanksgiving is, in some measure, an intimation, that God is really indebted to him for all that he has the goodness to yield Him, from his lawful property; and as his soliloquy ends with this relation, we may picture him to ourselves, continuing in silence to delight himself with the thought of all the good and great things which he has done, is still doing, and will do in future.

7. And the publican.—In all things a perfect contrast to the proud fool, whose image inspires compassion rather than disgust. The unfeigned humility of the publican is shown first by the place which he chooses. Standing afar off, μακρόθεν: not in the Court of the Gentiles, 1 Kings viii. 41, 42 (Starcke), for he was a Jew; not far from the Pharisee (Meyer), for we do not read (as we do in the opposite case of the Pharisee) that he had remarked him; but far from the Holy Place, to which the Pharisee had probably approached as nearly as possible, while the publican, on the contrary, even on his first entry into the temple, wanted courage to proceed. Secondly, his humility was shown by his position. It was the custom to pray with uplifted hands, 1 Tim. ii. 8, and with the eyes raised to heaven, Ps. cxxiii. 1, 2; but he ventures upon neither the one nor the other,

Ezra ix. 6; because he is thinking of God, and of His unspotted holiness, in His temple. Finally, his humility is shown by his words, ὁ Θεός, κ.τ.λ. He is certainly far from comparing himself with the Pharisee, or with other men: he only beholds himself in the pure mirror of the law, and feels that he has the worst to fear, if God should enter into judgment with him. It is certainly possible, that we have here to picture to ourselves an impulse of first repentance (Stier), if we do not, above all things, forget that the publican's prayer is continually repeated from the depths of the ever contrite, publican-like heart. Due emphasis should be laid upon the τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ. He considers himself the sinner, κατ' ἐξοχήν, as Paul calls himself the chief of sinners, 1 Tim. i. 15; and all that he entreats, is summed up in the one word, mercy. It is quite unnecessary so to force the word ἱλάσκεσθαι, as to make it denote the doctrinal idea of atonement: see Stier on this passage.

8. I tell you.—Such is the high importance of the contrast, that the Lord does not even leave it to His hearers to judge of the two worshippers, but Himself passes the irrevocable judgment, which tacitly implies, that no worshipper can partake of a higher privilege, than to go down from the temple δεδικαιωμένος. In the Lord's view, then, δικαίωσις is a summary of every blessing which a praying sinner can request from a holy God. The only question is, Which has good ground for hoping for this privilege—he who prays like the Pharisee, or he who prays like the publican? The Lord, as is frequently the case, expresses Himself more gently than an abstract logical necessity requires. Though He might have said that the Pharisee went away unjustified, He contents Himself with placing the blessing of the publican far above that of the Pharisee. —Παρ' ἐκεῖνον: see notes on text, and comp. Luke xv. 7, Matt. xxi. 31. To translate the reading ἢ ἐκεῖνος interrogatively, Or did he, the Pharisee, go down justified to his house? seems to us harsh in itself, besides being by no means supported by the immediately following ὅτι. It is, however, in any case arbitrary to conclude (with Stier), from the forbearing judgment which the Lord passes upon the Pharisee, that the consciousness and possession of justification may begin gradually to fail, if a δεδικαιωμένος begins again secretly to trust to his own righteousness.

9. For every one, etc.—See Luke xiv. 11. The repetition of such a saying need the less surprise us, when we reflect, that it expresses the immutable principle of the kingdom of heaven, according to which all men are judged, and, at the same time, the deepest reason, why the justification of the Pharisee, and the rejection of the publican, were impossible.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The parables of the importunate widow, and of the Pharisee and publican, though not perhaps delivered in immediate succession, yet form, taken together, a well compacted whole. Both relate to prayer, yet so that, in the first, believing perseverance at, in the second, humble approach to the throne of grace, is commended. In order to finish like the widow, it is necessary to begin like the publican; and to be able to act as unconscientiously as the judge, a man must have the pharisaic heart within him: comp. ch. xx. 47.

2. The parable of the Pharisee and publican exhibits a remarkable coincidence with that of the prodigal son. The same contrast of unrighteousness and self-righteousness, of humility and pride, is seen in both. As, in the latter, the two sons represent not merely the Pharisees and publicans, but the whole human race, so do the two worshippers, in the former, exhibit the fundamental and chief difference in the relations men occupy towards God. Every natural man more or less resembles the Pharisee: he, on the contrary, who has learned to see himself as a sinner, is like the publican. In saying this, however, we by no means deny that, in the microcosm of a human heart, there may often be found something of the Pharisee imperceptibly mingled with the character of the publican. The question, however, is simply this, Which is the prevailing disposition? It is according to this that God will judge us.

3. As in the former parable the Pauline idea of ἐκλογή, so in this, that of δικαίωσις is made decidedly prominent. "Hic locus perspicue docet, quid proprie sit justificari, nempe stare coram Deo, ac si justi essemus; neque enim publicanus ideo justus dicitur, quod novam qualitatem sibi repente adquisierit, sed quia inducto reatu et abolitis peccatis gratiam adeptus est, unde sequitur, justificationem in peccatorum remissione esse positam." Calvin. It is, however, self-evident, that in this definition the idea of the forgiveness of sin must not be understood only negatively, as release from deserved punishment; but also positively, as restoration to the forfeited favour of God, and all the blessings therein included.

4. The Epistle to the Romans is but the development resulting from the leading evangelical idea laid down in this parable; and the Reformation was the triumph of publican-like humility over the pharisaic self-righteousness, which was systematized in the Pelagianism of the Romish Church.

5. This parable is important, as a fresh proof how constantly the Lord was opposing, in various manners, the pharisaic principle which He first attacked in the Sermon on the Mount, and upon which He was about to pronounce an eightfold woe. Pharisaism and Christianity are not merely relatively, but diametrically opposed. It is, however, worthy of remark, that the Lord considered this admonition necessary for His own disciples, as well as the Pharisees.

6. The prayer of the publican is a short compendium of Theology, Hamartology, and Soteriology, and a striking proof that true repentance and living faith are utterly inseparable: we here find, in another form, the same disposition as was manifested by the prodigal son, ch. xv. 18. We cannot be surprised that this saying should have formed the living motto and dying words of so many. It was the answer of the celebrated Hugo Grotius to an unknown preacher of the Gospel, who directed his attention, as he lay dying at Rostock, to this parable, "I am that publican."

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The danger to which the Lord's disciples are continually exposed, of being defiled by the pharisaic leaven.—Pride and contempt for others are, generally, intimately united.—Duo, cum faciunt idem, non est idem.—Man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart, 1 Sam. xvi. 7.—Pride and humility, before God: 1. The difference of their nature, vers. 10–13; 2. the difference of their fate, ver. 14.—How we may sin in our prayers. —Many a virtue which is great in man's eyes, is rejected by God. —The Pharisee and publican: 1. One so gives thanks as to forget to pray; the other so prays that he afterwards gives thanks. 2. One compares himself with other men; the other observes himself in the mirror of God's law. 3. One counts up his virtues; the other cannot count his sins. 4. One, with all his virtues, still keeps in truth an evil conscience; the other, with all his sins, receives the full assurance of forgiveness.—The fast which God has chosen, and the fast of sanctimoniousness.—The Miserere of the soul, which precedes the Hallelujah of redemption.—The publican-like spirit, the publican's prayer, the publican's lot.—We may give to God the tenth, or even all our property, and yet withhold the heart, which is everything.—The publican's prayer: 1. A prayer as comprehensive as it is rare; 2. a prayer as suitable as it is indispensable; 3. a prayer as full of sorrow as of blessing.—Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, etc., Ps. xxxii. 1.—The way of justification under the Old Testament.—True confession.—The whole parable excellently adapted to days of humiliation, and for communion sermons.

Starcke: An upright teacher seeks to show the hypocrites among his audience the insecure nature of their foundation.—Quesnel: If men knew themselves aright, they would not so easily despise others, Rev. iii. 17.—Cramer: The whole world is full of suppliants, and yet far from all are accepted by God; hence we must not only take care that we pray, but also how we pray.—Quesnel: We must not compare ourselves with abandoned sinners, but with perfect saints.—A self-chosen worship, unsanctioned by Scripture, profits nothing, Matt. xv. 9.—Osiander: O man, deny not that thou hast sinned, etc. How many have said, God be merciful to me a sinner, with their mouths, but not with their hearts! —Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Repentant and believing humility brings life and salvation.—Humility belongs to heaven, pride to hell, Isa. lvii. 15.—Bibl. Wurt.: Man cannot be justified before God, by his own works and piety.

Lisco.—True and pretended piety in their most striking contrasts.—Arndt: How humility expresses herself with respect to the evil committed: 1. She acknowledges her sin, 2. and acknowledges it in its full extent, 3. and as her own fault, 4. and seeks pardon from God.—H. Muller, The Graves of the Saints, Frankfort, 1700, p. 365, on ver. 13: He who would die happily must die as a sinner, and yet without sin.—Schmid, Zeugnisse evang. Wahrh. iii. p. 632: The Gospel way of salvation, how it leads, 1. down into the depths, 2. up into the heights.—Heubner: Prayer, a test of the heart.—Tremble at having only the appearance of virtue, and being proud. —A strict and abstemious life is often united with secret self-complacency.—Let us try ourselves, whether we go home from church as new men or not.—A. Monod, Sermons, 1er Recueil, p. 201, la peccadille d'Adam, et les vertus des Pharisiens.

On the paragraph.—Heubner: False and true devotion: 1. Their nature, 2. their effects.—Justification before God: 1. How it does, 2. how it does not, take place.—Couard: The sincere churchgoer.—Jaspis: Your prayers, your judges.—Ulber: The confession of man that he is a sinner: 1. It is difficult when the mouth has to say it, 2. more difficult when it has to come from the heart, 3. yet easy when we really know ourselves.—Rautenberg: We must plead before God, not our righteousness, but His mercy.—Ahlfeld: That man is justified before God by grace, is, 1. a true saying, 2. a precious saying.—Steinmeyer: As is the devotion, such is the reward.

K. Towards Jericho, in Jericho, from Jericho, and towards Jerusalem.—(Chap. xviii. 15–xix. 27.)

1. Jesus and the Children. (Vers. 15–17.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xix. 13–15; Mark x. 13–16.

15 And they brought unto Him also infants, that He would touch them: but when His disciples saw it, they rebuked them. 16 But Jesus called them unto Him, and said, Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. 17 Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And they brought.—From this point, the narrative of Luke again runs parallel with those of Matthew and Mark: he leaves the sources from which he had derived the particulars concerning the journey, and now takes his materials from the common apostolic tradition. Hence there is not the slightest reason for supposing that the history of the journey, specially narrated by Luke, extends to ch. xix. 48. His reason for proceeding coincidently with the other synoptical Evangelists, especially with St Mark, from this period, can only be matter of conjecture. He passes over in silence the conversation between the Lord and His Apostles concerning divorce, Mark x. 2–12, Matt. xix. 1–12, perhaps, because he had already given, on another occasion, a remarkable decision on this subject, ch. xvi. 18. Nor does he definitely mention the place where the children were brought to Christ, though it is evident, from Matt. xix. 1, that we have to picture this to ourselves as taking place during the Lord's last journey to Jerusalem, and on His final departure from Galilee.

2. Infants, τὰ βρέφη, little children; sucklings therefore, ch. ii. 16; while Matthew and Mark only speak generally of παιδία.—They were, in any case, the children of the Lord's hearers, who, not content with receiving a blessing themselves, now entreat one for their little ones also. This scene is the more touching from its being also a farewell scene; and this act of the parents seems to have arisen from a vague apprehension, that they should see His face no more in Galilee. Their mothers request that He would bestow His parting blessing upon their little ones. It was, indeed, customary in Israel, to solicit such a benefit at the hands of the Rabbis and chiefs of the synagogue; but that this request should have been made to Jesus, even during this later period of His public life, proves how deep and favourable was the impression made by His ministry in that neighbourhood.

3. Called them, αὐτά, the children themselves,—comi voce et nutu. Bengel. The contrast between the friendly look of the Master, and the frowning countenances of the disciples, is very beautiful. The disciples reproved these mothers, from a serious persuasion that it was unfitting to trouble the great Prophet about such trifles, when they were now especially desirous that He should continue His interesting explanation of marriage and divorce. Scarcely, however, had Jesus learned who were desirous to approach Him, and who were seeking to hinder them, than He was much displeased, and rebuked His disciples on this account. If they thought that children were less fitted to approach Him than others, He gives them to understand that He more desires to have them near Him than many others. If the Twelve were thinking that these children must become what they themselves were, before they could engage the Lord's interest, He, on the contrary, assures them, that they must become like the children, to obtain His approbation.

4. Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God, etc.—Comp. Matt. xviii. 3, and Lange on this passage. Mark also gives this saying of Christ, on this occasion; while Luke had passed it over at ch. ix. 47, 48, and hence records it here. By the injunction to receive the kingdom of God as a little child, the Lord points to that aptness for receiving the Gospel which exists in the mind of a child. The disciples would soon lose this disposition, if they listened to those voices of pride and selfishness, which had just induced them to repel these children. Thus they would themselves be in danger of losing the blessing of that heavenly kingdom, whose subjects they had already become. It must not, moreover, be overlooked, that the threat, οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃ, κ.τ.λ., at least according to Luke, may be viewed as addressed to the larger circle of hearers—parents, etc.—who were at this time, as well as the twelve disciples, surrounding the Lord.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The desire of these mothers, to see their children blessed by Jesus, arose from the same felt necessity from which infant baptism afterwards arose. The Lord, who granted this first desire, would not surely have forbidden the latter, if He had been consulted about it.

2. It is just when Christ appears surrounded by the little ones, and holding intercourse with children, that He is the image of the invisible God, whose majesty is never more glorious than when He humbles Himself to the least and lowest: Ps. cxiii. 5, 6. Such a High Priest became us, who could bear the whole world upon His heart, and yet press little children to His loving bosom. In the prosopography of the Redeemer, this feature must not pass unnoticed, that the only time we read that He was much displeased, was on the occasion of the children being repelled. After what had just been said, concerning sin and misery in married life (see Matthew and Mark), this occurrence gives the impression of a beam of sunshine breaking through a thickly obscured sky.

3. The way to true greatness, for the King, as well as for the subjects of the kingdom of heaven, led through deep humiliation. He who required the childlike disposition, manifested Himself as the perfect Son: Heb. v. 8.

4. To become as children, and ἄνωθεν γεννηθῆναι, John iii. 3, are correlative ideas. It could not have been more plainly shown than on this occasion, how indispensable was the requirement of humility, and a childlike disposition. Scarcely did the children leave the hallowed scene, than the rich young man entered, who failed to find admission into the kingdom of heaven, solely through his lack of this childlike humility.

5. See the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark; and observe the internal connection between this occurrence and the immediately preceding parable.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The blessing of the children, 1. earnestly requested, 2. hastily denied, 3. graciously granted, 4. abidingly confirmed.—It is evident, by what we desire for our children, how we ourselves esteem the Lord Jesus.—Christ and the world of children.—The mistaken zeal of disciples is not unfrequently at direct variance with the designs of the Master.—What the Lord found in little children, which was more welcome to Him than the sight of many grown persons.—How a truly childlike disposition teaches us, 1. to find, 2. to receive, 3. to prize the kingdom of heaven.—The Lord's disciples called to be children in malice, but in understanding men, 1 Cor. xiv. 20.

Starcke: Rashness and over-haste, still the characteristics of beginners in Christianity.—Hedinger: The state of childhood, a holy state.—Alas! few become as children; hence there may well be more children than grown persons in the kingdom of heaven.—Brentius: Children compose, as it were, the heart and noblest part of the kingdom of Christ upon earth: who then would not love and prize them, and delight in intercourse with them?—Consider this, ye that are parents and teachers!—Heubner: Even love may be much displeased from loving motives: this is no selfish displeasure, but a holy affection.—Love for children, a feature in the character of every genuine Christian.—Arndt's Sermons on the Life of Jesus, iii. p. 145: Jesus the unequalled Friend of children.—See also on Luke ix. 46–48.

2. Jesus and the Young Ruler. (Vers. 18–30.)

Parallel Passages: Matt. xix. 16–30; Mark x. 17–31.

18 And a certain ruler asked Him, saying, Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? 19 And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou Me good? none is good, save one, that is, God. 20 Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother. 21 And he said, All these have I kept from my youth up. 22 Now, when Jesus heard these things, He said unto him, Yet lackest thou one thing: sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow Me. 23 And when he heard this, he was very sorrowful: for he was very rich. 24 And when Jesus saw that he was very sorrowful, He said, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! 25 For it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 26 And they that heard it said, Who then can be saved? 27 And He said, The things which are impossible with men are possible with God. 28 Then Peter said, Lo, we have left all, and followed Thee. 29 And He said unto them, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, 30 Who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting.

Ver. 22. Distribute, διάδος. The simple δός of A.D.L.M.Δ. and some others, as also of Lachmann, is taken from the parallel passages.

Ver. 23. According to B. and D. ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς. The singular of the Receptus is from Matthew and Mark.

Ver. 24. When Jesus saw him, He said. See Tischendorf.

Ver. 24. How hardly do they that have riches. See Tischendorf.

Ver. 28. Τὰ ἴδια (without πάντα), according to Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tischendorf, after B.L. 157. Πάντα is derived from the parallel passage.

Ver. 30. Ἀπολάβῃ. B.D.L., cursive manuscripts, and Lachmann, have the simple λάβῃ, which seems, however, to be a correction from Matthew and Mark.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And a certain ruler, ἄρχων.—A closer definition than the indefinite εἷς of Matthew and Mark; perhaps the ruler of a neighbouring synagogue, who, concealed among the crowd, might have heard the admonition of Jesus, have witnessed His blessing of the children, and have been impelled by both to apply to the Lord Himself, with his important question. He did not come, according to any of the Evangelists, πειράζων, as so many before and after him; but, on the contrary, with an honest intention. The comparative copiousness with which the three Evangelists detail this circumstance is worthy of remark; it is evident that it left a deep impression in the circle of the disciples.

2. Good Master, etc.—It is not difficult to form a tolerable conception of the youthful applicant. Impulsive and ardent, he is neither deficient in words nor in reverence for the Lord Jesus. Though among those who were expecting salvation by their works, he far surpassed the generality of them, hypocrisy being not unfrequently combined with their self-righteousness; while he may rather rank among those who feared God under the Old Testament, and in whose hearts, together with the strictest conscientiousness, a feeling of the need of an atonement seems always to have existed. What he seeks, is not grace, but reward: he desires to inherit eternal life—which shows him to have probably belonged to the sect of the Pharisees—by his own virtue. Yet an obscure feeling is always telling him, that the store of his good works is not great enough; he wants to add something extraordinary to his righteousness, in order to attain more perfect assurance of his salvation. Before the Lord departs, he desires to have His answer to this vital question. Hence he appears before us as a man full of good intentions, but with slight self-knowledge,—who has delight in the law of God, but also much self-complacence,—whose words not only express his thoughts, but in a certain sense outstrip them,—deserving our love rather than our envy,—a strange mixture of sincerity and pitiable self-deception. It is not till he is observed in this light that it is possible to appreciate the wisdom and love with which the Lord treated him. He is, in some respects, the Nicodemus of the synoptical Gospels, comp. John iii. 2; though his history, alas! concludes less satisfactorily than that of this master in Israel.

3. Why callest thou Me good?—Luke simply follows Mark, in his report of the Lord's answer. On the well-known various reading of Matthew, see Lange on this passage. For our part, we are of opinion that the reading of the Receptus must be maintained in Matthew also; that of Lachmann and Tischendorf having no higher value than that of being an ancient interpretamentum. Our reasons for this conviction would be out of place here. With respect, however, to the Marcionite reading of the second part of the answer in Luke, ὁ γὰρ ἀγαθὸς εἷς ἐστιν ὁ Θεὸς ὁ πατήρ, it is a mere gloss, not bearing even a strongly Marcionite character. It need, moreover, scarcely be remarked, that the Lord, by this answer, οὐδεὶς ἀγαθ., κ.τ.λ., neither indirectly asserts His own divinity (the old Dogmatists), nor decidedly denies it (the modern Rationalists). He contents Himself with declining an eulogy, which had no meaning from such an individual, just as He had formerly refused to be greeted as the Messiah by every one. Thus, on the one hand, He exhibits an example of modest humility, strongly contrasting with the self-praise of the young ruler; while, on the other, He directs him, if he would really do good, to the highest ideal of perfection.

4. The commandments.—The Lord cites the commandments of the second table; because, if once the young man should see his deficiency in love to his neighbour, it would not be difficult to conclude that he was deficient in love to God also. According to Mark and Luke, μὴ μοιχεύσας stands first. In Luke's report, the Lord quotes only five commandments, the μὴ ἀποστερήσῃς of Mark, and the ἀγαπ. τὸν πλησ. σου ὡς σεαυτ. of Matthew, being deficient.

5. All these.—The Lord had hitherto vainly endeavoured to direct the attention of the young man to the distance between his duty and his own power. The latter was, however, so prepossessed with his own virtue, that he could confidently look back upon the whole of his past life: though (according to Matthew), at the same time, he added, as if with some dim perception that he might, after all, have come short, τί ἔτι ὑστερῶ; the Lord's answer did not confirm the truth of his assertion, but merely told him what he had to do further, if this were indeed his case.

6. Distribute, Διάδος.—See notes on text. The peculiar form of this direction shows the wholesome strictness of the command. He must not only sell his possessions, so as never to see them again, which might perhaps have been possible in a moment of heroic exaltation; but he must distribute his highly-prized property, piece by piece, with his own hand, to the poor, and thus see the source of all his earthly joys dry up, as it were, drop by drop. "Distribue, ipse id magnam lætitiam afferre solet piis." Bengel. Not till he has thus utterly extinguished his selfishness, can he regard himself as perfect in love; and then will the Master be ready to bestow upon him, as a reward, His discipleship, His cross, His heavenly treasure.

7. Very sorrowful, περίλυπος.—Matthew, λυπούμενος; Mark, στυγνάσας, λυπούμενος. All these expressions show how great an impression had been made upon the young ruler by the answer of Jesus. And no marvel: it was also well calculated to cure him for ever of his foolish delusion. Till this moment he had thought, that the external observance of the various commandments would open heaven to him, while he had hitherto neglected the commune vinculum, the leading and highest principle of all God's commandments. And now it is seen, that his selfishness was more powerful than the love which seemed so conspicuous, and that all his life he had been breaking the first commandment, by joining in the base worship of mammon. He was made aware, that the very foundation was deficient in that edifice of virtue, to whose completion he had hoped that only the finishing strokes were wanting. The gulf which exists between knowing and willing, between willing and doing, was now made manifest to him. He departed, and it is not impossible that he may have subsequently returned; but, even if he saw the Lord Jesus no more, he had received a lesson which, during his whole remaining life, he must have been incapable of forgetting. He now knew what was his deficiency; and, even if the look of sorrow which the Lord cast upon him, as he departed, were indeed an irrevocable farewell look, yet the lasting loss of this disciple would have been the gain of the others, on account of the striking instruction and warnings which Jesus combined with the occurrence.

8. How hardly, etc.—See on Matt. xix. 17–19; Mark x. 18–30. The fact that the Lord here teaches, not the absolute, but only the relative, difficulty of the salvation of the rich, is another proof how far He was, even according to St Luke's Gospel, from an Ebionite contempt of riches. It is only when money possesses us, instead of our possessing money, that it excludes us from heaven. Comp., besides the well-known golden book of Clem. Alex., quis dives salvetur, the Pædagogus, lib. iii. cap. 6. The double form in which Mark (ch. x. 23, 24) reports this saying of Christ, is peculiarly adapted to explain its true meaning.

9. A camel.—See Lange on Matt. xix. 24, and Lightfoot on this passage. The thought present to the Lord's mind was, surely, the multitude of rich and mighty, whose earthly-mindedness prevented their receiving Him; while in the rich ruler He beheld a type of thousands, to whom His disciples, in their chiliastic dreams, would have accorded places of honour in the kingdom of heaven, but who would soon manifest, by their love for their earthly possessions, that they were not fit to be admitted there.

10. Who then can, etc.—This occurrence with the ruler, as well as the earnest words of their Lord, would teach the disciples to search more deeply into their own hearts. They now learn, that it is not earthly possessions, in themselves, that close the entrance into heaven, but the heart's dependence upon them; and that it is possible to be excluded as a rich man, without actually possessing riches. With a lively conviction, that even the poorest might have somewhat of that earthly mind which had caused the ruler to depart so sorrowfully, each now feels concern for himself, instead of surprise at others; and they venture to ask the great question, which the Lord answers with His compassionate look and consoling words. Comp. Job xlii. 2; Jer. xxxii. 17; Zech. viii. 6.

11. Then Peter said.—According to all the three Evangelists, Peter was the disciple whose concern was first exchanged, not merely for composure, but for self-complacency. It is very characteristic of Peter, and at the same time very amiable, that he does not state this exclusively of himself, but pronounces, as the general conviction of the apostolic circle, that they had all, more or less, done what the ruler had found too difficult. The peculiar form of his expression, in Luke, We have left τὰ ἴδια (what was ours), enhances the difficulty of the sacrifice. Instead of the fear of not being saved, the hope of extraordinary reward is now excited; and an egotistical and mercenary spirit, of which it is easier to understand that it should have arisen in Peter's heart, than that it should be tolerated by the Lord, is unmistakeably manifested in the whole of this speech. Before thinking this suspicious, however, we should consider, first, that the assertion of Peter was no mere boasting, but simple truth; that the Lord Himself had just united the possession of heavenly treasure with the renunciation of earthly possessions; and that, in Peter's case, the desire of reward did not exclude love, but was most intimately connected with it. And, secondly, that the Lord not only sanctioned the hope of reward, by promising it the richest fulfilment, but also restrained and hallowed it, by the parable immediately following, Matt. xx. 1–16.

12. Verily I say unto you.—Luke reports the Lord's answer less copiously and exactly than Matthew and Mark, yet the leading idea is the same in all; while, at the same time, it is worthy of remark, that the strictly Israelitish form in which the hope of a hundred-fold compensation is expressed by Matthew, ch. xix. 18, is wanting in the Hellenistic Gospel of Luke.—Receive, ἀπολάβῃ. See notes on text. A stronger form of expression than in Matthew, and better adapted to point out that he would receive his due reward. The Lord subsequently expressed the same thought in another form, Luke xxii. 25–30. The "many that are first shall be last," etc., added on this occasion, by both Matthew and Mark, had been already given by Luke, ch. xiii. 30. As a proverb, its frequent repetition is quite natural.

13. In this present time, and in the world to come everlasting life.—This passage is one of those, in which the difference of the word ζωὴ αἰώνιος in the synoptical, and in St John's Gospels, is most prominent. Here, as also, e.g., in Matt. xix. 29, xxv. 46, and elsewhere, it relates absolutely to the world to come.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the remarks on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

2. The history of the rich young ruler occupies a prominent position in the Pauline Gospel of St Luke, as offering a palpable proof of the absolute impossibility of being justified by the works of the law. If the Lord says to a sinner, with regard to the requirements of the law, This do, and thou shalt live, it is for the very purpose of awakening conviction of sin, and the slumbering feeling of his need of grace, by the despair which such demands should produce. In this respect, also, the history offers an almost inimitable specimen of the Lord's aptness to teach, and a key to the saying of St Paul, Rom. vii. 7–24.

3. In defending the Gospel narratives, it is very important to compare the form in which this narrative is related in the Gospel of the Hebrews. Comp. also the suitable remarks of Neander, L.

J., on this passage, and the treatise on this subject of K. Wimmer, Stud. und Kritik. 1845, i. p. 116.

4. The Gospel idea of the sinlessness of the Lord Jesus, is by no means compromised by the negative τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν. "These words are the expression of that humble subordination to God, penetrated with which, Jesus, though knowing Himself to be one with the Father, designates the Father, as Him who sends, who teaches, who sanctifies Him,—in a word, as greater than Himself. The Father is always the source, as of all existence, so of all goodness, the absolute Good, eternally like Himself in His holiness; while, contrasted with Him, even the Son of man is one progressively developing in goodness and holiness, and being made perfect by trials, conflicts, pains, and sufferings." Ullmann.

5. The whole history of the young ruler is a powerful attestation to the spirit of the first commandment. Evidently, it was not about the property of the ἄρχων that the Lord was concerned—for any accident might easily have freed him from his possessions—but He wished to separate him from the idol to which his heart was chained. Had his idol been any other—ambition, for instance—the Lord would not have given him this command, as he would then have obeyed it without difficulty, and perhaps have boasted of his beneficence. His weak point being, however, the love of money, the command of self-denial was given in this relatively accidental form, to teach him, that only he who can renounce what he most highly values, is in the way of attaining the chief good. The demand was a severe one, but it was the severity of love.

6. The promise of a manifold greater reward, for what was sacrificed for the kingdom of God's sake, had been already given to the disciples in another form, ch. vi. 23, xii. 35–37. It must here be especially remarked, how the Lord, after having promised more than the most glowing imagination could expect, hastens to oppose all the narrow selfishness and false security of their minds. He promises the hundred-fold reward quite generally, and to all succeeding ages. They are not to think that they shall be without fellow-sharers of that reward, which they desired above all things. But, that they may not prematurely rest upon their laurels, they are rather made uneasy by the thought, that they, who are now the first, may afterwards be the last. That the Lord seriously intended His promise of the hundred-fold reward, even in this life, is apparent from the history of the kingdom of God in all ages. Compare, for instance, what Paul sacrificed for His cause, and what he subsequently gained; or think of the French refugees, who left their native land for the cause of truth and of the Reformation, and are still evidently and wonderfully blessed in their descendants.

7. This teaching of the Lord, both concerning riches, and the rich compensation bestowed for what has been sacrificed for Him, acquires special significance when we remember that it was delivered in the presence of Judas, only a few days before the development of his dark and treacherous plot.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Sacrifices for the kingdom of God are demanded, vers. 18–22; 2. refused, vers. 23–27; 3. offered, ver. 28; 4. rewarded, vers. 29, 30.—The ruler of the synagogue at the feet of Him who was Lord of the temple.—Jesus, with respect to the young ruler, really the Good Master, though He refused the title.—The rich young ruler an image of the man who would give much, but not all, for salvation: 1. His image, 2. his fate.—How little does a knowledge of the commandments avail!—The Lord's strictness towards the virtuous, His gentleness towards the deeply-fallen sinner, His heavenly love in both cases.—The advantage of a peaceful retrospect upon a well-spent and unpolluted youth: 1. A rare, 2. an inestimable, 3. a dangerous advantage.—One thing thou lackest: 1. A well-meant congratulation, because he lacked but one thing; 2. a serious warning, because in the one thing all was lacking.—What the young ruler really lacked, was supreme love to God.—He who would teach others to acknowledge their sins against God, will do well to begin with those against their neighbours, 1 John iv. 20.—Treasure in heaven: 1. Its high value; 2. its great price.—A true care for the poor must be a personal one.—The rich youth: 1. Trebly rich, a. in possessions, b. in virtues, c. in delusion; 2. trebly poor, a. in self-knowledge, b. in love, c. in heavenly treasure.—The ruinous power of a single darling sin, Eccles. x. 1; Matt. v. 29, 30.—How a carnal disposition, 1. is mistaken concerning the King of heaven, 2. despises the fundamental laws of the kingdom, 3. forfeits the happiness of the kingdom.—How the Lord would cure a man of worldly-mindedness, by leading him into the way, 1. of self-knowledge, 2. of self-denial, 3. of self-surrender.—The love of Christ in the presence of the power of the Ego: 1. How deeply it looks; 2. how much it requires; 3. how richly it rewards.—Why is it so much more difficult for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven than others?—"How hardly," etc.: 1. A word of terror to the worldly-minded rich; 2. a word of consolation to the heavenly-minded poor; 3. a word of thanksgiving for the rich and poor who have really overcome the difficulty, and entered the kingdom of heaven.—Salvation, 1. in its humanly impossible, 2. in its divinely possible aspect.—How far the question, "What shall we have therefore?" is allowable or blameable in a Christian point of view.—Compensation in the kingdom of heaven: 1. Its extent, a. in this, b. in the future life. 2. Its conditions: a. we must really forsake all; b. and this not from a mercenary spirit, but from love.

Starcke, Canstein: Our first and chief inquiry should be concerning everlasting life.—The law is spiritual, and requires inward as well as outward obedience.—In Christianity, nature and grace must be carefully distinguished.—Hedinger: Woe unto you, ye rich! Luke vi. 24; 1 Tim. vi. 9; Jas. v. 1.—Bibl. Wurt.: Let not temporal possessions make thy mouth water too much, since they rather hinder than promote salvation, Prov. xxx. 8.—Concern for salvation should be regarded and welcomed as a messenger from heaven.—Hedinger: The loss of all, the gain of all.—Brentius: A mercenary spirit cleaves even to the best dispositions.—Every good thing of the kingdoms of grace and glory belongs to the children and servants of God; what can they want more? 1 Cor. iii. 21–23.

Palmer: What lack I yet? 1. What answer our own heart would willingly give; 2. what the Lord answers.—The unhappy inconsistency with themselves, into which so many are seduced.—W. Hofacker, Predigten, p. 303, on Matt. xix. 27–30: Good work receives good wages.—C. J. Nitzsch, Predigten, 6, Auswahl, p. 1, etc.: None is good save one, that is God: 1. In what sense this saying is true; 2. how Jesus Himself appears in its light; 3. whether, then, confidence in others is well-founded.

3. Jesus and the Blind Man. (Vers. 31–43.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xx. 17–19, 29–34; Mark x. 32–34, 46–52.

31 Then He took unto Him the twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. 32 For He shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: 33 And they shall scourge Him, and put Him to death; and the third day He shall rise again. 34 And they understood none of these things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken. 35 And it came to pass, that, as He was come nigh unto Jericho, a certain blind man sat by the wayside begging: 36 And hearing the multitude pass by, he asked what it meant. 37 And they told him, that Jesus of Nazáreth passeth by. 38 And he cried, saying, Jesus, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me. 39 And they which went before rebuked him, that he should hold his peace: but he cried so much the more, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me. 40 And Jesus stood, and commanded him to be brought unto Him: and when he was come near, He asked him, 41 Saying, What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee? And he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight. 42 And Jesus said unto him, Receive thy sight: thy faith hath saved thee. 43 And immediately he received his sight, and followed Him, glorifying God: and all the people, when they saw it, gave praise unto God.

Ver. 37. The ἂν which Lachmann has after τί, is probable on internal grounds, but not sufficiently accredited by external evidence.

Ver. 41. Λέγων (Origen, εἰπών) at the beginning of this verse is expunged by Tischendorf on the authority of B.D.L.X. It is at least doubtful.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Then He took unto Him.—Comp. Lange on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark. Both the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, which, in Matt. xx. 1–16, precedes the reiterated announcement of the Lord's sufferings, and the request of the sons of Zebedee, which follows it, and is given by both Matthew and Mark, are passed over by Luke. According to all the Synopticists, the journey to the Passover was now regularly continued, in the direction of Jericho. That the Twelve were not, however, the only travelling companions of the Lord, appears from His calling them to Him κατ' ἰδίαν, Matt. xx. 17–19, to make an important communication to them. Perhaps the women, Luke viii. 2, 3, were also with Him; and Salome might have left their circle to proffer her petition. The evident difference between the Lord's frame of mind and that of His disciples, is graphically portrayed by Mark, ver. 32. It seems as if the determination which Thomas so resolutely expressed, John xi. 16, had at this time taken possession of all the disciples. Perhaps the Lord considered this melancholy mood suitable to their reception of an announcement which He had already twice repeated to almost deaf ears. The more their expectation of a hundred-fold reward had been excited by His late discourse, the more needful does it seem to the Lord to suppress the carnal expectations with which they were following Him on His way to death; and He specially severs them from the wider circle of His followers, the better to prepare them, by the privacy of His communication, for the importance of its contents.

2. Τελεσθήσεται, κ.τ.λ.—The reference to prophecy, on this occasion, is peculiar to Luke. The Lord emphatically speaks of πάντα τὰ γεγρ.: comp. ch. xxii. 37. The announcement of the sufferings of the Messiah is present to His mind as one great whole, appointed τῷ υἱῷ τ. ἀνθρ., for the Son of man, a dativus commodi, pointing out the peculiar destination of the word of Scripture to be fulfilled in Him. We have here an indirect proof that a hint, at least, is given in the writings of the prophets, of each separate feature of His sufferings, specified in vers. 32 and 33.

3. Delivered unto the Gentiles.—In this short summary St Luke silently passes over His first delivery to the high priest and scribes, and His condemnation by the Sanhedrim. On the other hand, he narrates, with Matthew and Mark, the previous announcement, by the Lord, of the mocking, scourging, and spiteful treatment He should receive; and, with Mark, that He should be "spitted on." The closer coincidence than usual of the three Evangelists, in these details, is a strong proof of the credibility of this prediction, which cannot be weakened by any doctrinal doubts (De Wette, and others). Finally, according to each of the synoptical Gospels, the Lord, on this occasion, also expressly spoke of His resurrection on the third day. Thus the gradually attained climax, καί, καί, καί, is at once resolved into a surprising contrast.

4. And they understood none of these things, etc.—"Emphatic prolixity." Meyer. It is obvious, that this want of understanding in the Apostles was by no means wilful, though in a certain sense self-incurred, and that it related, not to the meaning of the words, but to the matter itself: comp. ch. ix. 45. How little they understood their Master, appeared, moreover, from the request of the sons of Zebedee. The completeness of this want of understanding is made very prominent in Luke, by the words οὐδὲν συνῆκαν; its reason, by ἦν τὸ ῥῆμα κεκρυμμ. κ.τ.λ.; and its natural result, by οὐκ ἐγίνωσκον. Because their hearts obstinately rejected the only comprehensible meaning of the words, their understanding sought in vain to find, whether they would not bear another and more tolerable one. They were as blind spiritually, as the now approaching Bartimæus was bodily.

5. As He was come nigh unto Jericho.—On the locality of the city of palm-trees, on the differences between the accounts of the several Evangelists, and on the question whether the miracle were performed on entering or leaving the city, see Lange on this passage. On the various attempts at solving this difficulty, and their refutations, see Meyer, De Wette, and others. If the different accounts must at any cost be reconciled, Lange's supposition, that the Lord entered and left the city by the same gate, and that the miracle must be split into two periods, is preferable to the view, that a second blind man had associated himself with Bartimæus, and still more so to that unhappy expedient of harmonizers, by which this miracle is made to take place twice. We believe, however, that a wise and candid consideration of the Gospel narratives will constrain us freely to own the existence of such little discrepancies, and to make every attempt to reconcile them, but by no means to put a forced interpretation upon them. Compare the excellent remark of Olshausen, Comm. i. p. 28, and that of Chrysostom, Præf. in Matt., with respect to the variations of the Evangelists in their narration of secondary incidents: αὐτὸ μὲν τοῦτο μέγιστον θεῖγμα τῆς ἀληθείας ἐστίν· εἰ γὰρ πάντα συνεφώνησαν μετὰ ἀκριβείας, οὐδεὶς ἂν ἐπίστευσεν τῶν ἐχθρῶν, ὅτι μὴ συνελθόντες ἀπὸ συνθήκης τινὸς ἀνθρωπίνης ἔγραψαν, ἅπερ ἔγραψαν, κ.τ.λ. All things considered, we think it probable, (1) that only one blind man was restored to sight, and that, when Matthew uses the plural, as frequently happens with him, he intends rather to designate the sort than the number of persons healed; and (2) that the miracle took place not before (Luke), but after, Christ's entrance into Jericho (Matt. and Mark). Two narrators, one of whom was an eye-witness, are in this matter opposed to each other; and it is not probable that the ill feeling of the people (ch. xix. 7) would have been so soon, and so openly manifested, if so much enthusiasm had been excited by this miracle but a few minutes before, as we read in ch. xviii. 43. It is more probable that the Lord performed this miracle at His departure from Jericho, and for the purpose of leaving a permanent impression behind Him. Only a mechanical theory of inspiration can take offence at this want of diplomatic exactness in St Luke's narrative. They who take a candid survey, however, of His Gospel, can scarcely deny that, with regard especially to the later period of our Lord's public ministry, and the history of His passion, strict chronological order is not to be expected from him, and that he is, in this respect, often inferior to Matthew and Mark. An inquiry into the causes of this phenomenon would be out of place here.

6. That Jesus of Nazareth passeth by.—The multitude bestowed upon the Lord His usual appellation. The blind beggar, however, who already hailed Him as the Son of David, showed that his faith had attained a higher degree.

7. Jesus—commanded him to be brought unto Him.—Luke tells us, indeed, that the Lord gave this command, but not that the blind man was, upon this command, brought to Him by others. Hence, his account is not at variance with those of Matthew and Mark, which mention his casting away his garment, and hastening to Him. We must probably picture to ourselves, that the blind man gave the bystanders no time to execute the exact orders of the Lord. Neither are the narratives contradictory concerning the manner of the cure; for the circumstance, mentioned alone by Matthew, that Jesus on this, as on so many other occasions, touched his eyes, is neither directly nor indirectly opposed by either Mark or Luke.

8. What wilt thou?—"Interrogat Christus, non tam cocei privatim causa, quam totius populi. Scimus enim, ut mundus Dei beneficia sine sensu devoret, nisi stimulis excitetur. Ergo Christus voce sua turbam adstantem ad observandum miraculum erigit." Calvin.

9. And all the people, etc.—This communication, concerning the impression made upon the people by the miracle, is preserved by Luke alone. It seems as if he desired to let us hear, at the gates of Jericho, the prelude to that Hosanna which was soon to resound so much more powerfully at the gates of Jerusalem: comp. ch. xix. 37. That the Lord was no longer anxious to restrain these jubilations, is apparent from the fact, that He did not impose silence on the blind man concerning his cure, nor even enjoin him, like the demoniac (Mark v.), to return to his house, but freely permitted Bartimæus to follow Him, together with the enthusiastic crowd. The mention of the doxology to which the miracle gave rise, is, moreover, peculiar to Luke (comp. ch. v. 26, vii. 17, ix. 43, xiii. 17), and entirely in the spirit of St Paul (comp. Rom. xi. 33–36).

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

The Lord's third announcement to His disciples of His approaching sufferings, is richer in details than either of the two former. We may conclude from this circumstance, that His own consciousness of His approaching fate progressively increased in clearness, and that even the so-called contingencies of the future—for instance, the spitting on—were already present to His mind. This will the less astonish us, when we remember that even this peculiarity was no strange feature in the prophetic portraiture of the Messiah and His sufferings; see, e.g., Isa. l. 6; Ps. xxii. 8. Such phenomena can give offence to those only who admit no higher basis of prophetic insight into the future than that of human anticipation, and would account for all phenomena of this kind from within, instead of from above. "In the midst of human instrumentality and assistance, the proper and internal nature of prophecy is that of an ever new discovery, by the omniscient Spirit, of things hidden, an anticipation of the future beyond the intimations and embryo of the present,—in short, a word of God, from which again prophetic narrative can alone be formed and understood. We have therefore no right to forbid, and explain away, on principle, every prediction, although it stands there, merely because we are unable to make it accord with our views of history, or because it seems to us a soothsaying prediction." Stier. If these words apply to the predictions of the Old Testament, they are applicable in a much higher degree to Him who was conscious of being the end of the law, and the centre of all prophecy, and whose capability of knowing all, even the most minute particulars of what was needful for Him to know, for the fulfilment of His commission as founder of the kingdom of God upon earth, cannot be disputed.

2. It is impossible to direct too much attention to the close connection between the Lord's consciousness of His coming sufferings, and the prophetic Scriptures. He, the Heir, looks upon the law and the prophets as the Magna Charta of the kingdom of God, by which He Himself is no less strictly bound, than its meanest subject. As if He had foreseen that the time would come when, in the name of wisdom, it would be denied that the prophets of Israel had very decidedly pointed to a suffering and dying Messiah, He directs us to their testimony, as to a clear mirror, as well of His sufferings, as of His glory. It is of great importance to all who would penetrate deeply into the sanctuary of the history of the passion, not to let themselves be deprived of the key furnished by the prophetic Scriptures. The truth of the saying: titubante scriptura, simul titubat fides, is very evident.

3. In the inquiry, what it was that gave the Lord strength and courage so undauntedly to tread the path of suffering, it must by no means be lost sight of, that He was continually looking beyond His passion to His resurrection on the third day. To him who really believes in the Lord's humanity, even the high courage with which He encountered death is a proof that the pre-announcement of His resurrection, in the Gospels, is by no means a mere vaticinium post eventum. On the other hand, it is quite natural that, in proportion as suffering pressed more and more heavily upon Him, the heart-cheering view of the resurrection should, though by no means shaken, yet temporarily occupy the background, in His consciousness.

4. The incapacity of the disciples for understanding the Lord's pre-announcement of His sufferings, is a new proof of the truth, that in Christianity the heart is the organ of all true spiritual understanding. If the heart revolts at a plainly spoken truth, the understanding becomes incapable of comprehending its matter and importance. The well-known saying of Pascal is applicable here, that human things must be known, in order to be loved; but divine things must be loved, in order to be known. Compare Vinet's beautiful essay, L'evangile compris par le cœur.—At the same time, however, this very incapacity of the disciples is an unequivocal proof of the indispensable necessity as well as of the beneficial influence of the Holy Spirit, through whom they were afterwards taught to regard as necessary, and as worthy of God, those very sufferings which were at first so repulsive, and therefore so incomprehensible.

5. Each account of the healing of the blind, in the Gospels, presents us with a striking symbol of the manner in which the Lord also opens the eye of the soul to discern the heavenly light: the history of Bartimæus, especially in its beautiful gradational development, may be called an instructive image of this spiritual benefit. At first, only the report of Jesus reaches him, awakening slumbering remembrances, longing, and anticipation; then, it becomes manifest to the crowd who are following, that a higher necessity impels him than those who are but outwardly pressing around Jesus. As usual, they are unwilling that the sufferer should receive any individual benefit from the Lord Jesus, and seek to drown his cry of misery, as a discord in the sounds of rejoicing. But the very reaction excites his begging faith to a higher degree of courage, and the sufferer cannot cease till every impediment that still keeps him from Jesus is overcome: faith triumphs; and the first object that he sees is Christ Himself, before whose presence He stands, and in whose light He now beholds the whole surrounding creation clothed as in resurrection glory. "A type that in spiritual enlightenment Christ is the first, the loveliest, the best object that is beheld, and that upon which the mind's eye remains fixed during the remainder of the life." And at length ensues the following of Jesus, the example to others, and the joining with them in glorifying God. The whole order of salvation, whether regarded in its divine or human aspect, lies here in nuce before us, if, that is to say, our eyes have been opened.

6. "O what cannot the prayer of faith effect! Joshua prayed, and the sun stood still in heaven, till he could entirely overcome his enemies. Jesus, the Sun of righteousness, who was about to set at mid-day, here also stood still." Bogatsky.

7. Even this last miracle in behalf of a human being, communicated to us in the public life of the Lord Jesus (Matt. xxi. 14 containing only a general notice), strikingly places before us the high purpose of His appearing: comp. Isa. xxxv. 5; Ps. cxlvi. 8; and the homage which was offered Him at the gate of Jericho, is a prophecy of the universal homage of the redeemed, which will one day be offered Him, especially in His character of Light of the world.

8. It was quite in accordance with the Lord's aptness to teach, that, as His public life draws nearer to its close, He should rather seek than avoid opportunities of performing miracles, and accept the homage of those who had received miraculous benefits. This would also be a counterpoise to the offence of the cross, for His weak disciples.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Jesus, the light of the world, as well for the spiritually (the Twelve), as for the bodily blind (Bartimæus): 1. He creates the light for the eye (vers. 31–34); 2. He opens the eye to the light (vers. 35–42).—How the Lord labours to make His servants, friends and confidants (John xv. 15).—Jesus contrasted with His disciples: 1. His clear knowledge, with their utter ignorance; 2. His high courage, with their timid fear; 3. His voluntary advance on the way of humiliation, with their forced, constrained following.—The Lord's sufferings, the fulfilment of a divine prophecy.—The relation of the sufferings to the glory.—The courage with which Christ met death, and the cowardice of so many Christians at suffering.—Slowness of heart, the deepest reason why so many of the Lord's sayings are not understood.—Jesus and Joshua before the gates of Jericho: 1. What both found; 2. what both brought.—He who feels himself spiritually blind, cannot do better than pray.—Where the spiritual eye is still closed, the bodily ear must be sharpened.—The report which still always precedes the Lord, when He comes with His salvation, 1. to a country, 2. to a family, 3. to a heart.—It is well with him who does not conceal from the blind, that Jesus of Nazareth is passing by.—How differently the Lord appears in different eyes! 1. To the superficial multitude, He is Jesus of Nazareth; 2. to Bartimæus, who is craving a cure, He is the Son of David; 2. to the believing disciples, He is the Son of the living God.—The soul's Kyrie Eleison, preceding its Hosanna.—The Lord, who will not be delayed on His path to death by the representations of His friends, will tarry at the cry of distress.—"What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" We must earnestly desire to be healed by Jesus.—What kind of faith is it, which will really heal the spiritually blind?—To follow Jesus, we must see Him; to follow Him aright, we must praise God.—The good example of one healed sinner will be followed by others.—Blind Bartimæus an instructor in a truly Christian celebration of the Lord's Supper. His history shows us, 1. the disposition suitable to the Lord's supper: a. a real feeling of our misery; b. a hearty longing for deliverance; c. a voluntary approach to the Lord Jesus;—2. the consolation to be derived from the Lord's Supper: that the Lord, a. knows, b. calls, c. hears us;—3. the result to be obtained from the Lord's Supper: a. that our eyes may see Him, b. our feet follow Him, c. our tongues praise Him.

Starcke, Quesnel: We do not know, like the Lord Jesus, the time of our offering up and death; but we know well that we are continually drawing nearer to it, and that it is, hence, highly necessary to reflect on and prepare for it, 2 Tim. iv. 6.—Jews and Gentiles both shamefully outraged the Lord Jesus; why should we then accuse each other?—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: As God treated His holy child Jesus, so must it fare with all believers: suffering must precede, joy will follow.—Bibl. Wurt.: It is useless to judge of Christ's kingdom according to worldly maxims.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: A blind man is a poor man.—Hedinger: Would to God we were blind, then we might see.—The Lord is nearer to us, in the time of need, than we think.—Canstein: Can anything be more pleasant to a sinner to hear, than that Jesus, the great Physician, the source of light, is drawing near to him?—He who lets Jesus pass by, without approaching Him in prayer, is left helpless.—We often meet with most hindrances, and the greatest temptations, from those who have preceded us, and who have an appearance of piety.—Faith cannot be silent: he who believes, speaks.—Canstein: How often does a believing soul dwell in an afflicted body!—God does not lead all men in the same way.—The kindness of the Lord Jesus, in His intercourse with all kinds of men, and especially with the poor and needy, an example for our imitation.—Osiander: Let us rejoice with all our heart, when God bestows a benefit upon our neighbour.

—J. Muller, Sermons, 3d edit. p. 105: The history of the blind man of Jericho, an image of spiritual healing.—Lisco: Ask, and ye shall receive.

On the whole paragraph.—Our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem. —F. W. Krummacher: The stations on the road to the cross.—Fuchs: The Saviour on His last sad journey to Jerusalem: 1. Submissive in His own sufferings; 2. compassionate towards the grief of others.—Ahlfeld: True evangelical fasting: 1. The fasting temper; 2. the fasting prayer.—Couard: How we may celebrate Passion-week to the profit of our heart and life.—Stier: The present blindness of many Christians, in the right understanding of the death and sufferings of Christ: 1. What is the nature of this blindness; 2. how it may be healed; 3. what we then see and experience. —Braune: The light breaking forth from the wounds of Christ: From Christ's sufferings we learn rightly to estimate, 1. the sufferings of Christ, 2. the sufferings of time.—Burkhardt: How it happens, that what is said concerning the cross is, for a time, hidden even from well-meaning and inoffensive people.—The happy blind beggar.—Bomhardt: What the passage of Christ to His sufferings teaches us.—Staudt: The prayer, Jesus, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me: 1. Its necessity; 2. its power; 3. its nature.—Steinhäuser: What is it that we see, when the eyes of our mind are opened by Christ?—Van Oosterzee (from a missionary sermon): A groaning creation appears before our eyes, like Bartimæus at the gate of Jericho. His eyes were not yet opened; but the footsteps of the Lord were resounding in the distance. He has been told who is approaching; he has cast away the garment which encumbered him, to hasten towards his Deliverer. Yet a little while, and he receives sight, and follows the Lord; and heaven and earth give thanks, at the sight, to God and to His only-begotten Son.

4. Jesus and Zaccheus. (Chap. xix. 1–10.)

1 And Jesus entered and passed through Jericho. 2 And, behold, there was a man named Zaccheus, which was the chief among the publicans, and he was rich. 3 And he sought to see Jesus who He was; and could not for the press, because he was little of stature. 4 And he ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree to see Him: for He was to pass that way. 5 And when Jesus came to the place, He looked up, and saw him, and said unto him, Zaccheus, make haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house. 6 And he made haste, and came down, and received Him joyfully. 7 And when they saw it, they all murmured, saying, That He was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner. 8 And Zaccheus stood, and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold. 9 And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham. 10 For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Zaccheus.—Hebrew זַכַּי, pure: Ezra ii. 9; Neh. vii. 14. This Hebrew name, with a Greek termination, shows him to have been of Jewish descent: comp. ver. 9. According to Clement, he afterwards became a disciple of Peter, and Bishop of Cesarea. See Homil. 3, 63; Recogn. 3, 65. Later Jewish traditions with respect to his extraction, may be found in Sepp's Leben Jesu iii. p. 166. He was ἀρχιτελώνης, an administrator of taxes, to whom the superintendence of the other publicans was entrusted, perhaps the agent of one of the Roman knights, who often filled the office of publicanus. The collection of customs at Jericho, which at that time produced and exported a considerable quantity of balsam, was undoubtedly an important post. That Zaccheus was rich, is apparent, not only from the importance of the place whose taxes he farmed, but also from the liberality with which he endeavoured to repair his former acts of injustice. His ardent desire to see Jesus, however, shows that his riches had not yet satisfied his heart.

2. He sought to see Jesus.—Undoubtedly, the fame of Jesus had reached him, though as yet he had not beheld Him. Herod, also, had formerly expressed a similar desire (ch. ix. 7–9); but it can scarcely need remarking, that the curiosity of Zaccheus arose from a nobler source. We are rather justified in presupposing, in his case, a disposition similar to that of the Greeks who desired to see Jesus, John xii. 21. Having heard the marvellous and somewhat contradictory reports which were in circulation concerning Him, a vague desire after better treasures—a desire which he could not exactly account for—was excited within him. It is a circumstance very much contributing to our favourable estimation of Zaccheus, that he should have left his dwelling, and placed himself on the road by which caravans to the feast must pass. In vain, however, did he seek for a place which would afford him a quiet standing and a good view: his stature was as little as his interest was great; and at length he climbed a tree, where he obtained both rest and an uninterrupted prospect of the road. He now felt so happy in the hope of attaining his ardent desire, that he was indifferent to the raillery of the rejoicing multitude, to which he, the smallest, and yet in certain respects a great man, was exposed on account of his strange behaviour.

3. Into a sycamore-tree, συκομορέα.—See Lachmann and Tischendorf; the ficus Ægyptia of Pliny, "arbor moro similis folio, magnitudine, adspectu: see Winer in voce. According to the descriptions of travellers, its fruit is agreeable and sweet to the taste. This sycamore, however, bore fruit of the noblest and rarest kind, which was to ripen for the satisfaction of the Lord Jesus.

4. He looked up and saw him, etc.—It is unnecessary to explain the Lord's acquaintance with Zaccheus in a supernatural manner (Olshausen); or to have recourse to the supposition (Meyer) of some relation, unknown to us, having existed between the two; or the conjecture, that one of the multitude had evidently named him to the Lord (Paulus). The difficulty disappears if we mentally transport ourselves to the scene of this occurrence. Through the very strangeness of his position, Zaccheus would be observed by every one, his name would go from mouth to mouth, one would point him out to another; while ill-will towards the certainly unpopular publican would, here and there, be expressed (comp. ver. 7); and thus the Lord's attention would be most naturally directed towards him. That which is truly divine in the circumstance, consists in the manner in which the Lord fathomed the man's heart, with that glance which once penetrated the solitude of Nathanael, John i. 49; and in His satisfying the craving of Zaccheus, in a manner which granted him far more than he sought. "Nomine se appellari, Zacchæus non potuit non et admirari et lætari." Bengel.

5. To-day I must abide at thy house.—Remain quiet for some time: comp. ver. 7, and Matt. x. 11. "Δεῖ is said from consciousness of the divine purpose." Meyer. If this word points out, on the one hand, the haste of one who knows that he has no time to lose, and will never come to Jericho again, it certainly expresses, on the other, the joy with which the Redeemer finds the sinner, as the sinner had sought his Redeemer. "There was an internal necessity why the Lord should enter no other dwelling than that of the publican; His heart commanded, the constraint of pity impelled Him." As the desire of Zaccheus to see Jesus arose from preventing grace, and was a beginning of faith, such a spark of faith would be much strengthened by the visit of Christ.

6. And when they saw it, they all murmured.—It is obvious that these were not the disciples (Calvin), but the Jews, who had been witnesses of the joy with which Zaccheus had received the Lord into his dwelling. With greater haste than he had ever applied to the reception of the most considerable profit, did he open his house to the eminent guest, to whom his heart was already attracted. Yet the circumstance which was the most delightful of surprises to him, was an offence to others; and the muttered complaint soon arose, that "He was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner." Παρά must not be connected with εἰσῆλθεν, but with καταλῦσαι, the latter having no other meaning than ξενίζεσθαι. We need not, however, conclude from these words, that Zaccheus was a sinner beyond many others—publican and sinner being, indeed, in the mouths of many, words of one and the same signification—nor that Jesus really passed the whole night in his house, and did not depart till the following morning. Καταλῦσαι is usually so explained, as, for instance, by Meyer, De Wette, and Schleiermacher, a. a. O. p. 174; but the example, John i. 39, does not prove this; and the concluding words of the Lord, "This day is salvation come to this house," would be deprived of their natural reference to "Today I must abide at thy house," if the two sayings were not uttered on the same day. We must, therefore, conclude that the Lord, who was now hastening to Jerusalem, probably spent only a few hours, the rest of the day, at the house of Zaccheus, and that even this was sufficient to give offence to many. If every publican were hated by a people desirous of paying tribute to Jehovah alone, they would surely have learnt, from the many priests dwelling at Jericho, to look down with twofold contempt upon an ἀρχιτελώνης. The circumstance also testifies to the unfavourable disposition entertained towards the Lord, which had so increased in Judea, that He could scarcely take a step without incurring fresh blame. If, however, the view be entertained, that the Lord really spent the night in the house of Zaccheus, we must, in this case, imagine that the incident related, vers. 8 and 9, took place, not on the next morning, but soon after the Lord's arrival, and under the first and fresh impression of His personal appearance.

7. Zaccheus stood, and said.—Not as if the admonitions of his guest had just produced such an influence upon the character of the chief publican (Kuinoel), and still less as if he were convinced that no one could accuse him of the slightest fraud, because he was the very soul of honour (Fr. Schneider, Gesch. J. Chr. ii. p. 84); but because he was desirous of giving, in this manner, an unquestionable proof of his gratitude for the undeserved honour shown him. The liberality of the chief publican strikingly contrasts with the narrow-mindedness of the multitude (ver. 7); and if ever it were proved that, though difficult, it is still not impossible for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven, it was so by this saying of Zaccheus. He desired to show his sense of the honour done to his house, in a peculiar manner; and he already knew enough of his guest to feel that this kind of sacrifice would be far more pleasing to Him than the most sumptuous entertainment. In the presence of the holy and unpolluted One, he deeply felt his accumulated guilt; but the mercy which had been shown him, encouraged him to lift himself up from the depths into which he had fallen. He voluntarily began to speak of the wrong principles, by which he had been hitherto led, whether consciously or unconsciously, to defraud others; and he desired to make restitution beyond what the letter of the law required. The hypothetical form of his promise, εἴ—τι, was not a milder form of self-accusation (Meyer); but was rather quite natural in the mouth of a man who had so long, and so often offended, according to the dishonourable practice of men of his class, that, at the moment, he did not himself know what he had fraudulently obtained. It is enough that he was willing, in every case of dishonest gain, to make the compensation which Moses had appointed only in the special case of robbery (Ex. xxii. 1). And if, according to later Jewish authors, one who had destined the fifth part of his income to benevolent purposes, was esteemed an excellent Israelite, Zaccheus gave no less than the half of his goods to the poor. Indeed, "hæc est sapiens illa stultitia, quam de sycomoro, tanquam fructum vitæ, legerat, rapta reddere, propria relinquere, visibilia contemnere." Beza. Zaccheus evidently showed that he was no stranger to the old saying, "Peccatum non remittitur, nisi ablatum restituatur." We do not know whether John the Baptist's former requisition of the publicans, "Exact no more than that which is appointed you," had ever reached his ears; but, at all events, he had not hitherto acted in accordance with it. Now, however, it seems as if not only a new light had arisen upon his eyes, but a new life had sprung up in his heart. The day of Jesus' entrance into his house was the birthday of the new and better man; and while, of his own free choice, he became poor in earthly possessions, he so increased in heavenly riches, that to-day must, in his consciousness, have been separated from yesterday by a well-defined boundary line. He expressed this consciousness in a surprising manner, and the ingenua confessio and voluntaria restitutio excellently complete each other.

8. This day is salvation come to this house.—The Lord addresses these words directly to Zaccheus (πρός), and does not merely utter them concerning him (De Wette and others). That He speaks in the third person, arises from the fact, that this expression is intended to contain both a justification of His own entrance into the house, and a well-deserved eulogy of Zaccheus. He says that salvation is come to the house of the publican, not because the honour of His visit has been bestowed upon it, but because its owner has shown himself to be a different man from what he appeared in the eyes of the multitude. If they had called him an ἀνὴρ ἁμαρτωλός, the Lord now calls him a υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ,—not because he had hitherto been a heathen, but had now manifested the character of a true Israelite (Maldonatus and others); nor merely because he had become a true Israelite by his conversion (ἐστέ, in the sense of ἐγένετο, Kuinoel); but because it was evident that, much as the people reviled him, he also was one of the chosen people. His uncharitable detractors had forgotten that, as a son of Abraham, he was their kinsman according to the flesh. Jesus bestows upon him the praise of being also a son of the friend of God, according to the Spirit: comp. Luke xiii. 16.

9. For the Son of man, etc.—An intimation of the reason of the former saying: It is just when a son of Abraham, according to the flesh, is lost, that My appearance is necessary; and just where a lost one becomes a spiritual son of Abraham, that the end of My appearing is attained. Ἦλθε does not mean quite the same as the ἔρχεσθαι εἰς τὸν κόσμον of John, where the subsidiary idea of pre-existence unmistakeably exists: used absolutely, it denotes the public appearance of the Son of man, and His public entrance upon His ministry.—To seek, like the shepherd, ch. xv. 4; comp. Matt. ix. 13, xviii. 11.—To save, i.e., to deliver. The σωτερία of the New Testament is the deliverance of one who would otherwise have been the certain prey of an irreparable ruin, as Zaccheus would, if this hour had never dawned upon him. His subsequent history is unknown. He probably remained in his office of publican; at all events, the Lord, who was conscious of the approaching termination of His own course, did not call upon him, as formerly upon Matthew, to forsake it. He knew that such a man would henceforth be an honour to the condition of publican, and would continue to behave himself as a genuine son of Abraham. He left Jericho, then, with the consciousness that, in this city at least, there was one house upon which He had already bestowed the gift, which He was so soon about to earn for a whole lost world.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. A terrible curse was pronounced upon Jericho in the days of Joshua, Josh. vi. 26; and this curse was ratified, in a no less terrible manner, in the days of Ahab, 1 Kings xvi. 34. With the entrance of Jesus, a day of inestimable blessing arose upon at least one house in this city; and many more might, with Zaccheus, have partaken of this blessing, if they had known the time of their visitation.

2. The coming of the Lord into the city of palm-trees, in the midst of the tumult of an innumerable multitude, the quiet seeking of a soul desirous of salvation, the kind address of preventing grace, the entrance of Jesus and His peace into the favoured dwelling, and the grateful sacrifice of its surprised owner, have all a beautiful symbolical meaning, making this the most suitable Gospel for a consecration service, especially when combined with the inexhaustibly rich epistle, Rev. xxi. 1–5.

3. "And must not a tree have grown up for thee, O soul, little of stature, which thou also mayest ascend, and from which thine eyes may see Him who is bringing salvation to thy heart?" Gossner.

4. The variety of ways in which God leads sinners to repentance, is seen by a comparison of the history of Zaccheus with those of many others; for instance, of the penitent thief, Saul, Cornelius, the jailor, etc. The history of the chief among the publicans reminds us of the parable of the treasure hid in the field, and, still more, of that of the pearl. The acceptance of the publican, by the Lord Jesus, is a striking commentary on His own words, Rev. iii. 20.

5. The connection of πίστις with μετάνοια is made very evident in the history of Zaccheus. On the one side, there is no susceptibility of faith in the Lord, unless a previous secret and incipient, but powerful, conversion has taken place; on the other, there is no true faith which does not lead to an entire alteration in the tendency of the life and the nature of the actions. It is absurd to suppose that Zaccheus could, by restitution, atone for his sin in God's sight; but it would be impossible to imagine his repentance sincere, if he had felt no need of thus repairing his faults. It is impossible that the happy consciousness, that the guilt of sin is atoned for, can ever cheer us, unless it is, at the same time, our supreme wish to be delivered from its defiling power.

6. The Pauline doctrine of justification by faith is both explained and confirmed by this narrative. Zaccheus was the precursor of many Gentiles who, though they followed not after righteousness, yet attained to righteousness: Rom. ix. 30–33. The Jews, on the other hand, who, in the midst of their exalted notions of their own righteousness, murmured against the manifestation of free grace, were then, and still are, excluded.

7. In conclusion, it may be mentioned, in behalf of future apologists, that the whole history of Zaccheus bears a character of freshness, truth, and absence of fiction, which is beyond all doubt, as even Strauss, Leb. Jesu i. p. 613, has allowed. But with this, its historical truth, is closely connected its ideal and eternal truth, according to which, this journey of the Lord may be viewed as a symbol of His constant method of procedure throughout the course of this world's history, according to which He is ever manifesting His saving power to individuals, while the masses are deriding or ignoring Him.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The time of blessing for the once accursed city.—When Jesus passes by, He cannot be hid.—The rich Zaccheus, in all his poverty; the subsequently impoverished Zaccheus, in all his riches.—The desire to see Jesus: 1. Whence it arises; 2. how it is manifested; 3. in what manner it is satisfied.—How the bustle of this world still hinders us from closely seeing and hearing Jesus.—To get a good view of the Lord Jesus, we must ascend; to receive Him aright, we must descend.—He hath filled the hungry with good things, but the rich He hath sent empty away.—The courage of a poor sinner. —The looking up of Jesus to Zaccheus, no less a proof of His mercy than His looking down upon others.—When a sinner's salvation is concerned, a halt upon the way to death is no loss of time to the Lord.—Make haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house. Text for a communion sermon: 1. Whom this saying concerns; 2. what it proves; 3. what it promises; 4. what it demands.—Jesus, a Saviour, 1. who must come into our house, 2. who may come to-day, and 3. who comes for our salvation.—Jesus invites Himself, when we dare not invite Him.—The Good Shepherd calleth His own sheep by name, John x. 3.—The world still takes offence when the Saviour visits a sinner.—The parallel between this incident and that of Luke vii. 36–50: here also we find, on one hand, the disdain of Simon, and, on the other, the penitence of the sinner.—Zaccheus desiring to see Jesus, is, 1. graciously beheld, 2. inwardly cheered, 3. much despised, 4. highly honoured.—Zaccheus, little of stature, but great in courage: 1. How longingly he waited! 2. how willingly he came! 3. how liberally he showed his gratitude!—Restitution for former transgression: 1. A natural necessity, 2. a certain sign, and 3. a blessed fruit of true faith.—To-day is salvation come to this house: a text for baptism sermons.—The day of true repentance, the most memorable day of our life, 2 Cor. v. 17.—When Jesus gains disciples, Abraham acquires true sons.—The Son of man is come to seek, etc.: 1. An extremely humbling, 2. an indescribably consoling, 3. a powerfully saving word.

Starcke, J. Hall: A great sinner may become a great saint.—Osiander: God has chosen some of the rich, as well as of the poor, to eternal life.—Hedinger: He who by faith desires to see Jesus, is already on the road to enjoy Him.—Many do things apparently unsuitable to their condition, but grace judges otherwise, 2 Sam. vi. 16.—Christ willingly looks upon the repentant sinner, Luke xxii. 61. —Quesnel: God gives us the desire to know Him; and, when that is not neglected, He gives more.—The Lord Jesus will come in unto us, in a spiritual manner, John xiv. 23.—Majus: We may have intercourse with sinners, if we do not intend to share their sins.—Pity to the poor does not contribute to salvation, yet must be exercised by those who are partakers of salvation, Deut. xxv. 7.—Langii Op.: How many resemble Zaccheus in riches and unrighteousness; how few are like him in true repentance and liberal restitution!—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Happy the house into which Jesus enters! —True repentance brings about great changes in houses, towns, and countries.—The farther from the world, the nearer to God.—Heubner: Jesus is accessible at all times.—He must still abide with them who long for Him.—What an honour to entertain the Lord Jesus! —The blessed days of our life, when Jesus draws nearer to us.—By faith we have communion with all the saints of ancient times.—The visible Church leads to the invisible.—Our churches, the abodes of the Lord Jesus: 1. They remind us of Him, vers. 1–4; 2. are the scenes of His gracious visitations, vers. 5–7; 3. they summon us, on the part of Jesus, to a conscientious fulfilment of duty, ver. 8; 4. and awaken us to care for our own souls, and the souls of others, vers. 9, 10.—Palmer: The day of grace: 1. How it comes (unexpectedly, but not without preparation); 2. what it brings (Christ, and salvation by Him); 3. what marks it leaves (the willingness of repentance and love).—Arndt, Sermons on the Life of Jesus, iii. p. 92, etc.: Jesus, the friend of mankind: 1. To whom He manifests His love; 2. what induces it; 3. how it acts; 4. what result it produces; 5. how He completes and crowns His work.—J. Diedrich, Evangelien Predigten, vol. iii. p. 215: How the souls of men unite with Christ in the work of salvation.—W. Hofacker: The beautiful development which the noble plant of faith attains under the influence of divine grace: 1. The tender germ, 2. the beautiful blossom, 3. the genuine fruit of the plant.—Gerok: The concurrence of the human will with divine grace.—Knapp: The abundant blessedness of a true personal acquaintance with Christ.—Harless: Jesus receives sinners.

5. Jesus dealing with the sanguine Hope of some of His Disciples. (VERS. 11–27.)

11 And as they heard these things, He added and spake a parable, because He was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. 12 He said therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. 13 And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come. 14 But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us. 15 And it came to pass, that, when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading. 16 Then came the first, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds. 17 And he said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities. 18 And the second came, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds. 19 And he said likewise to him, Be thou also over five cities. 20 And another came, saying, Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin: 21 For I feared thee, because thou art an austere man: thou takest up that thou layedst not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow. 22 And he saith unto him, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow: 23 Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? 24 And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds. 25 (And they said unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.) 26 For I say unto you, That unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him. 27 But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me.

Ver. 14. Ἐν ᾧ. So A.B.D.K.L. and others; Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf.

Ver. 20. Ὁ ἕτερος, B.D.L., cursive manuscripts; Lachmann, Tischendorf.

Ver. 22. Δέ is not sufficiently accredited.

Ver. 24. Τήν. The article, which is wanting in many manuscripts, seems originally to have been omitted by mistake, from the following word commencing also with τ.

Ver. 26. The γάρ of the Receptus is probably derived from Matt. xxv. 29.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And as they heard these things.—The instruction communicated by Luke, in the parable immediately following, may indeed have been delivered by the Lord in the house of Zaccheus; but we doubt that it was spoken at His first entrance, and in presence of the murmuring multitude, ver. 7 (Meyer). It might, perhaps, be more correctly inferred, from ver. 28, that He pronounced this parable immediately before His departure from Jericho. But, however this may be, it evidently stands in direct connection with His declaration in ver. 10. Perhaps the mention of the coming of the Son of man had served to rekindle carnal expectations; though we can hardly specify the connection between this declaration and the idea that the kingdom of God should immediately (παραχρῆμα) appear. But we know that many were looking forward with the liveliest interest to the approaching Passover, when it was probable that the difference between Jesus and His enemies would be brought to a public decision. Besides, they were now in the neighbourhood of the metropolis; and might not even the slightest word revive the hope of that which was so ardently desired? We need by no means deny that the parable was addressed to the disciples also. Ch. xviii. 34 plainly shows that they were not yet cured of their carnal views of Messiah's kingdom; and in this, as in so many cases, their error had a foundation of truth. That the kingdom of God should be manifested (ἀναφαίνεσθαι), was, in itself, an undoubted truth; but that it should appear immediately and sensibly,—in other words, that Christ should be glorified without a previous separation from His disciples,—was the delusion which must be dispelled, and which the following parable was designed to refute.

2. A parable.—Lange, in his remarks on Matt. xxv. 14–30, has abundantly proved that this parable, while coinciding in many respects with that of the talents, is by no means identical with it, but is more or less modified in this edition. The assertion (Strauss), that this parable arose from a but partially successful fusion of two others,—viz., of the talents, and of the ungrateful husbandmen,—is entirely unfounded. Certainly, the idea of a king delivering to his servants money instead of arms, seems, at first sight, somewhat strange; but if this is sufficiently justified by the design of the parable, it by no means proves anything against the authenticity of Luke's edition of it. It was in this manner that the Lord sought to instruct His disciples, that His faithful subjects were not, like the subjects of other kingdoms, to contend with weapons in their hands, but to profit with the gifts entrusted to them; while it would not be till after His return (ver. 27), that they would be called upon to share in His victory over His irreconcilable foes.—On considering the mutual coincidences between this parable and that of the talents in Matthew, we can scarcely avoid the question, Which of the two was first delivered, and is consequently to be regarded as the foundation of the other? Contrary to the usual view (Schleiermacher, Neander), we believe that the parable of the talents is to be regarded as an expansion of the present one; in other words, that the previously delivered parable in Luke is the simpler, the subsequently spoken one in Matthew, the more complicated in character. In the present instance, the work given to each servant is equal; in Matthew, the talents are various. Here, a reward only is bestowed on each servant; there, abundant praise is combined with the reward. In this, only a disgraceful loss is incurred; by the other, a terrible punishment is inflicted upon the idle servant. Sufficient reasons these for concluding that the talent of the pounds must really have been the precursor of that of the talents. Some of the details, indeed, are less elaborated in the latter than in the former parable; but this phenomenon is sufficiently accounted for by the consideration, that, in any case, the one was delivered very shortly after the other, and that the parable of the talents can only be called a variation, or, if it be preferred, a short resumé of ours, so far as the leading idea is therein modified, and more clearly laid down, in accordance with the need of the disciples. Again, since the parable (Matt. xxv.) was delivered exclusively to true disciples, and not, like this, in the presence also of secret enemies, it was unnecessary to describe the fate of the rebellious citizens, and the more so, since the parable of the talents, instead of loosing in completeness by the omission of this trait, rather gains in unity. Hence the two parables may be considered as entirely independent, though nearly related; that of the pounds having the peculiar characteristic of depicting the King of Heaven dealing, on one hand, with His friends, on the other, with His enemies. The internal unity of the representations is founded on the prospect of righteous retribution at His coming, which both place before us.

3. A certain nobleman.—A figurative designation of the royal descent and dignity of the Lord, and, at the same time, a prophecy of His departure from earth, and to His Father, as the appointed means for His attainment of His kingly rank and glory. Finally, a definite assurance that the period between the departure and reappearance of the Lord, was to be regarded only as a temporary condition.

4. Ten pounds.—Δέκα μνᾶς. It is not probable that the Hebrew mina of one hundred shekels is here intended; it is, perhaps, rather the Attic mina of one hundred drachmas, equal in value to about one-sixth of the talent (Matt. xxv. 15). The difference between this sum and that of the parable of the talents is satisfactorily explained by the fact, that the lord there leaves his whole property in the hands of his servants; while here, on the contrary, he delivers to them only a small gift, by which their faithfulness in small things was to be proved (comp. ch. xvi. 10). In comparison with the great reward which will one day be bestowed upon the faithful servant in another world, even the five talents are an ὀλίγον, compared with which the ten pounds deserve to be called ἐλάχιστον (ver. 17). Πραγματεύεσθαι is used also by the Rabbis in the sense of ἐργάζεσθαι (Matt. xxv. 26 = negotiari). They are to trade thus, not till the king returns, but while he is on his journey. Ἐν ᾧ; (see notes on the text): a general definition of the period allotted to them for trading. He is about to pass the time in travelling, they in trading.

5. A message.—An appropriate incident, derived from the political history of the times, for indicating the obstinate enmity of the Jews, especially as manifested after the Lord's departure from this world. The arbitrary character of their enmity is shown by the fact, that their messengers say not a word in justification of their refusal, while they give vent to the contempt they entertain for the king by the scornful τοῦτον. That their efforts were unsuccessful, since the king, notwithstanding, received the kingdom, and returned with full judicial powers, appears from the sequel. Before, however, punishing his enemies, he required an account from his servants.

6. How much every man had gained by trading.—Τίς τί, a contracted form for two distinct questions. He would know what trading each had transacted, and with what results. By the pounds, we must understand generally, whatever the Lord entrusts to His servants, that they may labour for and promote the cause of His kingdom, whether as regards external position or inward gifts and power. His servants, with deep humility, acknowledge that these gifts are not theirs, but His. "Lord, thy pound."

7. Gained ten pounds.—Prominence is here given to the idea, that faithfulness, even with one, with the least χάρισμα, may become a source of inexhaustible blessing. In Matthew, emphasis is laid more upon the proportion of the capital to the profit and the reward. Here, fidelity is rewarded merely with a more extensive sphere of operation ("I will make thee ruler over many things"), and with the participation of the joy of the Lord. Finally, the praise here bestowed upon the first servant is withheld from the second, who, with the same pound, had gained but half that the former had done, in order to point out that the reward is to differ according to the proportion in which the gain, by labour, is greater or less. Moreover, the governorship over five cities is distinction enough, especially when we remember that the cities are situated in the midst of the country of the rebels, which has now become the king's dominion, and from which the enemies will now soon be extirpated.

8. In a napkin.—The behaviour of the third servant had been in direct opposition to his vocation. Without personal fidelity or personal affection towards the king, he had quietly calculated, that if he should gain much, his master would reap the fruits of his labour; while if, on the contrary, he should lose, the loss and responsibility would be his own; since he must, in any case, restore the sum entrusted to him. Hence, he had listened to the voice of selfishness; suffered himself to be confirmed in his natural indolence by slavish fear; and, instead of labouring in the sweat of his brow for the interest of his employer, had uselessly hidden the money in a napkin. Any excuse of his words and character (Olshausen) seems to us to militate, not only against the letter, but against the spirit of the parable. It is plain that the Lord intended to portray the indolent egotist, who abstains, from carnal considerations, from what was, in any case, his duty, and who thinks to excuse his own mean behaviour, by appealing to the harsh character of his master. His amazement must, therefore, have been the greater, at finding the very reasons of his defence made the ground of his condemnation.

9. Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee.—"Marvellously acute ex concessis." Lange, comp. Matt. xii. 37. His own words are retorted upon the slothful servant, and a question founded upon them, beginning καὶ διὰ τί, which convicts him of self-contradiction. The lord does not concede that he really is an austere man, but merely answers the shameless servant on the ground which he had himself voluntarily taken up. "Ne dicas te invenire non potuisse, quibus pecunia esset opus. Argentarii ab omnibus pecuniam summit fœnore. Sensus est: non est etiam, quod in collocanda pecunia periculum obtendas; mea erat; ego jam exegissem non tuo, sed meo periculo." Grotius.

10. Unto them that stood by.—Not to the other δοῦλοι (Kuinoel), who had already given in their accounts, but to the royal guards who surround him when he appears in his glory: comp. Matt. xxv. 31. The astonishment which these manifest (ver. 25 may be placed in a parenthesis, Lachmann and Ewald), gives the king occasion to state the reasons of his firm determination. Without regarding the contradiction involved, he reiterates the great principle: "Unto every one that hath," etc. See ch. viii. 18, and the excellent remarks of Neander, L. J., on this passage. The positive retribution with which the slothful servant is threatened, Matt. xxv. 30, is omitted here; probably, because sentence has yet to be passed upon the enemies. The unfaithful servant is, however, sufficiently punished by his impending loss, while he who gained the ten pounds receives a pleasing surprise, besides his gracious recompense.

11. But those mine enemies.—This command is issued to the guards, to whom the words of ver. 24 are also addressed. The enemies are contemptuously designated τούτους (see Tischendorf on this passage), as they had formerly called their lawful king τοῦτον.—Slay them: a strong expression of the severity and hopeless nature of the retribution which the Messiah will apportion to His opponents. The abrupt termination of the parable much enhances its beauty.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The parable of the ten pounds is, far more than any other of our Lord's parables, a picture framed, as it were, in the political history of that unquiet period. The hereditary rulers of petty kingdoms were frequently obliged to visit Rome, in order to be there elevated to their lawful rank. This had been the case in Judea, both with Herod I. and Archelaus; and it is among the too little regarded traits of the deep humility of the Son of man, that

He should, though even distantly, compare His ascension to the journey of a Herod to Rome. A μείωσις, and at the same time an accommodation without a parallel.—But another feature of the parable was also taken from life—the embassy of the inimical subjects who sought to hinder the dreaded coronation. Witness the eighty Jews who followed Archelaus for this purpose, and the eight thousand who afterwards followed them, and urgently entreated Augustus, in the temple of Apollo, to free them from the Idumæan princes, and rather, if necessary, to unite them to Syria. In Jericho, where perhaps the royal palace, which Archelaus had built with princely magnificence, might not be far from the dwelling of Zaccheus (see Josephus, A. J. xvii. 13, 1), such a reference would be doubly fitting, and, at the same time, easily comprehensible. The sanguinary vengeance, with which the parable terminates, was often exercised in those days, when policy had triumphed over its opponents at Rome. Our Lord's auditors might still well remember how Archelaus, on his return as Ethnarch of Judea, had bestowed cities upon his faithful servants as a reward, and had, on the other hand, put his enemies to death. See A. J. xiv. 14, 3; xv. 6, 7; xvii. 9, 3. It scarcely needs remarking how much freshness and life this historic background bestows upon this parable; and how naturally the questions, Who is the king, who are the servants, who are the enemies here spoken of? are suggested.

2. The parable of the ten pounds was well adapted to serve as an antidote to a fourfold error. It might be imagined that the kingdom of Messiah would very shortly appear; that it would be immediately visible upon earth; that every one would willingly and joyfully submit to it; and, lastly, that it would bestow upon its subjects no higher vocation than one of inactive enjoyment. The first idea is opposed by the fact, that a long journey has first to be made, and, hence, that a proportionately long period must first elapse. The second expectation is refuted by the remark, that the rightful prince must receive elsewhere, and not here, the reins of government, before he could exercise his authority within his own dominions. To destroy the third delusion, the Lord thought it necessary to depict the open, unfounded, and obstinate, yet unsuccessful enmity which arose against the king. Contrasted with the fourth opinion, is the sketch of the calling of the ten servants,—the participation of all his servants in the duty of labouring for and advancing his cause. At his departure, he leaves them not in the capacity of proud warriors, but in that of humble traders with a very small capital; an image calculated to disperse, for the moment at least, all the Utopias of their imagination, before the demands of the most sober-minded reality.

3. This parable is a powerful testimony to the sublime self-consciousness of the Lord, with respect to His heavenly origin and high destination. At the same time, it affords a proof of the high courage and quiet dignity with which He approached Jerusalem. It is as if the roaring of the Lion of Judah were once more to be heard, before the Lamb would suffer Himself to be led to the slaughter. On one hand, the Christology of this parable is an echo of many of the royal psalms of the Old Testament, especially Psalms ii. cx.; on the other, we have here a hint of the ampler eschatological revelations which were to be subsequently made in the Apocalypse.

4. The promise of extended and more honourable activity, as the appropriate reward of the Lord's disciples, is quite in accordance with the Hellenistic and Pauline spirit of St Luke's Gospel: comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 9–12. It is, however, worthy of remark, that the promise of a personal reappearance of the Lord upon earth (ver. 15, comp. Acts iii. 21), is found, not only in the Gospel of Matthew, and the speeches and epistles of Peter, but also in Luke. A proof, surely, that this doctrine is something more than the mere product of a narrow Judaistic theology; and, therefore, an important hint to all who reject every hope of a personal Parousia as grossly chiliastic, not to root out the wheat while gathering up the tares.

5. The parable of the pounds places before our eyes, not merely the vocation of the Apostles, but also that of all believers. In the circumstance that ten servants are here represented as each receiving the same sum, variety is made to yield to uniformity. As their Lord's vassals, they are all bound to await His return, and that not in indolent ease, but in zealous activity. They are not called upon to oppose His foes with carnal weapons, but quietly to continue their labour in the midst of opposition. In the lowly office of witnesses to the faith, they must strive, by word and deed, to extend the kingdom of God, and expect to take a part in the government of the world, not before, but after their Lord's personal return. The success of their efforts is various, according to the variety of their talents, opportunities, and abilities, while their reward is proportioned to their several deserts. It is, however, always very large, when compared to what has been required and accomplished. The ten pounds, the gain of the best among them, would scarcely have purchased a house, and he who gained them is placed over ten cities. No reward, however, is bestowed upon the slothful servant, who contented himself with doing no positive harm. To gain nothing, is the way to lose everything; and the injury which unfaithfulness incurs, is represented as irreparable. Certainly, the words, γίνεσθε, δόκιμοι, τραπεζῖται, which some represent the Lord as having actually uttered on this occasion, are very suitable. (According to Dionysius, Cyril, and others, the warning, 1 Thess. v. 21, originated with the Lord, and belongs to the context. See Lardner, Probab. ii. p. 38.) In the concluding words of this parable, the Lord was undoubtedly contemplating the dreadful fate of Jerusalem, which He soon so pathetically lamented, vers. 41 and 42. Hence it was the more magnanimous that He should, so immediately after these words, set out to die the death of a slave for enemies, whose malice He foresaw, and who were to be condemned to such a punishment.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Carnal expectations concerning the kingdom of Messiah, a weed, 1. deeply rooted, 2. difficult to uproot, 3. soon shooting up again.—The Lord, upon the point of consummating His priestly sacrifice, speaks, as a prophet, of His kingly dignity.—The notion, that the Lord will never return, no less erroneous, in its way, than that of the Apostles, that He would never depart.—The parable of the ten pounds lays before us a picture, 1. of the King of heaven: a. His origin, b. His destiny, c. His departure and return; 2. of His servants: a. their calling, b. their responsibility, c. their recompense; 3. of His enemies: a. their hatred, b. their impotence, c. their punishment.—The Christian life, a trading: 1. The capital; 2. the income; 3. the profits.—The absolute refusal to acknowledge the royal authority of the Lord: 1. The height it reaches; 2. the depths in which it ends.—We must all be manifested, 2 Cor. v. 10.—Upon what depends the varying amount of gain for the kingdom of God, and according to what rule will the various rewards be computed? —They who suffer with Christ, will be also glorified with Him, 2 Tim. ii. 12.—The Lord esteems faithfulness in little things not a little.—The slothful servant, condemned by his own words.—If we have wilfully neglected doing good, it will but little avail us to think we have thereby avoided greater evil.—Sins of omission are no less deserving of punishment than sins of commission.—The small sum, a pound, hid in a napkin; the great one, a talent, buried in the earth. —Even the angels do not immediately penetrate the πολυποίκιλος σοφία of the Lord's judgments.—No earthly or heavenly power can alter a sentence once passed.—The greater the Lord's long-suffering towards His enemies, the more dreadful will be their sentence.—The crime of high treason, punished in the King's presence.—The happiness of the redeemed, consummated by the extirpation of all the enemies of the kingdom of God.

Starcke: This parable, the testament, as it were, of Christ, wherein He shows the nature of His kingdom, etc.—Quesnel: There is no one who has not received gifts to profit withal from the Lord.—Brentius: Even the wisest governors do not satisfy the populace.—Unfeigned humility of heart, the chief characteristic of all the true servants and children of God.—The growth of grace within, involves an increase of glory.—Canstein: Not only labour and diligence, but also wisdom and prudence, needed as well in our spiritual calling as in our worldly traffic, Eph. v. 15.—There are definite degrees of eternal glory.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: It is terrible to see how skilful sinners are in laying the blame of their own wickedness upon God.—The ungodly are never wanting in absurd excuses.—God is just in His judgments; let us lay our hand on our mouths.—God will punish ungodliness, not in secret, but in the judgment of the whole world.—Up, ye Christians who die in the Lord; He is setting out for Jerusalem.—Heubner: It is not the number and greatness of our deeds, but their faithfulness, which obtains a reward.—There is no need of being an eminent genius.—The selfish heart, always at enmity with God.—All that is derived from God has an internal power of bearing fruit, if it be but rightly used.—Divine love knows no limits; it gives in infinitum.—Lisco: The great responsibility laid upon the Christian, by the possession of gifts from God.—The rule by which the King of heaven will, one day, judge His subjects.—Palmer: He that hath, to him shall be given, etc. Text for sermons on confession of sin, and the Lord's Supper.—F. W. Krummacher, Sabbath-Glocke ii. p. 105, etc.: "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee," the test of apostasy.—Beck: How our time here below should be viewed in the light of eternity.—He that hath, to him shall be given.—F. Arndt: Faithfulness in the employment of the gifts entrusted to us.

THIRD PART.

FIRST SECTION.

THE LAST CONFLICT, AND HIGHEST GLORIFICATION OF THE SON OF MAN.

CHAPTER XIX. 28–XXIII. 56.

A. The Entry into Jerusalem, and the Occurrences therewith connected. (CHAP. XIX. 28–48.)

1. The Entry itself. (VERS. 28–40.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxi. 1–9; Mark xi. 1–10; John xii. 12–19.

28 And when He had thus spoken, He went before, ascending up to Jerusalem. 29 And it came to pass, when He was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount called the Mount of Olives, He sent two of His disciples, 30 Saying, Go ye into the village over against you; in the which, at your entering, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat: loose him, and bring him hither. 31 And if any man ask you, Why do you loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him. 32 And they that were sent went their way, and found even as He had said unto them. 33 And as they were loosing the colt, the owners thereof said unto them, Why loose ye the colt? 34 And they said, The Lord hath need of him. 35 And they brought him to Jesus: and they cast their garments upon the colt, and they set Jesus thereon. 36 And as He went, they spread their clothes in the way. 37 And when He was come nigh, even now at the descent of the Mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice, and praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works that they had seen, 38 Saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; peace in heaven, and glory in the highest. 39 And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto Him, Master, rebuke Thy disciples. 40 And He answered and said unto them, I tell you, that if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.

Ver. 29. Of the disciples: see Tischendorf.

Ver. 30. And loose him, etc. According to the reading of B.D.L. which insert a καί before λύσαντες.

Ver. 34. We agree with Lachmann and Tischendorf in receiving ὅτι. Evidence in its favour is too abundant to allow of our supposing it, with Meyer, to be merely an interpolation from ver. 31.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Definition of time.—From the beginning of Passion-week we are enabled to follow the Lord from day to day, and at last almost from hour to hour. According to John xii. 1, He came to Bethany six days before the Passover. As this took place on the fourteenth Nisan, the Lord must have appeared among His friends in Bethany on the eighth, that is, on either the Friday or Saturday before His death. When we consider, however, that the Lord certainly made no long journey on His last Sabbath; that we read of no other town before or near Bethany where He could have passed the day of rest; that, on the contrary, the latter town seems to have been the last halting-place of His journey; it is highly probable that He entered the town of Lazarus before the Sabbath, and therefore on the Friday. After the close of the weekly public worship, the supper was given at which Mary anointed the Lord, but which Luke passes over in silence. And if the entry into Jerusalem, John xii. 12, took place the day after, there is then no reason for supposing it to have been on any other day than Palm Sunday. The view of those who, on account of some slight discrepancies between the four Evangelists, maintain that two separate entries took place, may already be considered obsolete: it will be enough to comp. v. Baur, Kanonische Evang. p. 196.

2. Bethphage and Bethany.—This definition of locality is not strictly that which would be used by a traveller from Jericho, in which case Bethany would have been first mentioned, since Bethphage was almost a suburb of Jerusalem. Since, however, the two places were so near together as to be scarcely separate, the history of the approach to Jerusalem first mentions, in the popular manner, the more distant place, which was also the nearer to the city. This would be sufficiently accounted for, if the Lord, at the moment of despatching the two disciples, had Bethany behind and Bethphage before Him, and were indicating the latter when He said, δεικτικῶς, Go ye into the village over against you.

3. Two of His disciples.—According to the graphic detail of Mark xi. 4, that they "found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met," we might almost conjecture that Peter, his authority, was an eye-witness, and therefore one of the two. But that John was his companion on this occasion, as on that of ordering the paschal supper, is less probable from the tone of his account of the entry, which is, in descriptive power at least, inferior to that of the Synopticists.

4. Whereon yet never man sat.—"A new period, a new prince, a new animal." Lange. Compare the new grave, "wherein never man before was laid," ch. xxiii. 53; and the two milch kine of the Old Testament, on which there had come no yoke, and which drew the new cart upon which the ark was placed, 1 Sam. vi. 7.

5. And if any man ask you, etc.—It is not certainly impossible that the Lord may have had friends in Bethphage, and have made arrangements with them, which He thought it unnecessary to communicate to His disciples. When we consider, however, the mysterious form of the direction, and remember how little it was in accordance with the spirit of our Lord to give the appearance of the extraordinary to that which was usual; when we compare the preparation of the paschal supper, and keep in mind the peculiar significance of His entry and its connected occurrences; it is certainly most natural to see, on this occasion also, an intimation of that foreknowledge which, as soon as it was necessary, could penetrate even that which lay beyond the reach of the senses or of ordinary calculation. Undoubtedly, however, the owners of the colt were among the many secret friends of the Lord; and He foresaw in spirit, that a command addressed to them in His name, would not be in vain.

6. They that were sent went their way.—The purport of this direction was not so much to obtain possession of a beast of burden, as to exercise the disciples in unreserved obedience even to what was still incomprehensible, and to confirm their faith in the superhuman foreknowledge and Messianic character of their Master. Foreknowledge was one of the properties especially looked for in the Lord's perfect servant, comp. John xvi. 30; hence Jesus most suitably manifested just this feature of His Messianic character, at the very time when He suffered homage to be paid to His Messianic dignity.

7. The owners thereof.—In Mark, "certain of them that stood there." What the Lord had foreseen, actually took place. Objections were made; but, upon the explanation which had been commanded being given (ὅτι, the definite answer to the question διὰ τί), all opposition ceased. "Non potuere, Domino huic obsequentes, frustrari." Bengel.

8. And they cast their (own) garments.—"Ἑαυτῶν gives colouring to this act of respect." Meyer. A like hearty homage is manifested by their setting Jesus upon the colt, according to Luke (ἐπεβίβασαν); while the other Evangelists only speak generally of His sitting thereon (καθίζειν). Besides the disciples, who thus testified their reverence, others are mentioned, ver. 36, who spread their clothes as a carpet in His path; while ver. 37 tells of a rejoicing multitude, who must be carefully distinguished from the disciples.

9. At the descent of the Mount of Olives, πρὸς τῇ καταβάσει τοῦ ὄρους, κ.τ.λ.—According to Luke, who more distinctly separates the various acts of homage than Matthew and Mark, the enthusiasm began to reach its climax just as the destination of the peaceful procession was in sight. When, on the point of descending the Mount of Olives, it reached the height whence the whole city lies extended like a panorama before the spectator, the rejoicing increased, and the path began to lead downwards.—The mighty works. Materials for their praise were by no means wanting. Bartimæus himself was personally present among the multitude, ch. xix. 43; the sight of the capital awakened recollections of similar miracles; and the name of Lazarus was upon every tongue; comp. John xii. 17. The narrative of Luke, although he is silent concerning the miracle of Bethany, nevertheless contains, so far, an indirect proof of the truth of John xi., as clearly showing that the Lord had, without doubt, recently performed some great miracle, which was still fresh in the memory of the people, and which raised their enthusiasm to such a height. What this miracle really was, we are told by St John.

10. Blessed be the King.—It is worthy of remark, that the edition of this hymn, as given by Luke, is of a less specifically Old Testament character than those of Matthew and Mark. In this respect also, the Pauline Evangelist is consistent. The parallelism requires us to understand εἰρήνη, not in its literal signification of pax, since this always prevails, and is never disturbed in heaven; but in the sense of laus or gloria. Thus honour is given to God the Lord in heaven, and glory in the highest.

11. Some of the Pharisees.—This detail also is peculiar to Luke, and bears marks of the highest probability. In their eyes, the Lord was nothing more than a Rabbi of Israel, who was riding to the capital on an ass, and who had it in His power, at any instant, to restrain the enthusiasm of His disciples within the limits of the most apathetic silence. They regarded Him as more or less responsible, if the pious zeal of His followers should go too far, and thought He would do well to give no just cause of offence to the elders of the nation. We cannot surely fail to recognise the same men who had so frequently sought to make the Lord responsible for whatever displeased them in His friends, and who despised the people as knowing nothing of the law. No one was at liberty to resound a higher note of praise, than Pharisaism considered consistent with decorum.

12. If these should hold their peace, etc.—A proverbial expression, showing that it was, in some cases, more difficult to impose silence on men, than to hinder that which was in itself speechless from speaking: comp. Hab. ii. 11. A figurative reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, when the very stones of the city and temple would proclaim the majesty of the Lord. A reference the more striking, if we consider that the echoes to the Hosannas were perhaps given back from the walls of the temple, and the cries of the people were thus resounding from the heights of Zion. "The Lord here expresses a vital law of the kingdom of God. If men cease from praising God, and, especially, if a dark despotism imposes this silence, and the Gospel is suppressed, the stones begin to cry out: they announce the judgments of God, whose glory can know no end." Lange.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the remarks on the parallel passages in Matthew, Mark, and Luke.

2. Even in His entry into Jerusalem, the Lord was set for the fall of some, and the rising of others. This circumstance of history has always been a cause of offence and opposition to some. We may instance the unbelieving heathen who, in the time of Tertullian (see the Apol. advers. Gentes, cap. x.), derided the Christians as asinarii; the mocking Jews, who demanded: If your Christ is a God, why did He ride on an unclean animal? (Lippmanus, in his almost forgotten Nizachon); and, especially, the English Deists, the Wolfenb. Fragmentists, and so many modern heroes in the field of negative criticism. The saying, Luke vii. 35, is applicable here.

3. The Lord's purpose, in this public entry, was nothing less than that of manifesting Himself as the King of a spiritual kingdom. He designed, before His death, to announce, by an unequivocal act, that great truth which He had hitherto concealed, as the holy mystery of His life, from the uninitiated, and only, as it were, whispered in the ear of the few whom He deemed its fit recipients. Once in His life did He permit His followers publicly to express the conviction of their hearts, and intentionally fulfil a prophecy which was, in His days, universally applied to the Messiah. If He formerly considered the avowal of His dignity dangerous, He now considered its concealment a thing not to be thought of. It was the day on which He, who came to His own, and His own received Him not, yielded to the affection of those who so heartily honoured Him, and manifested Himself to the eyes of those who were looking up to Him with reverence. This was needful not for His cause alone, but for the whole nation of Israel. It must not afterwards be said that He had never spoken unambiguously. When Jerusalem should be hereafter accused of the crime of slaying the Messiah, she must not be able to say that the Messiah had omitted giving a sign which all might understand. The Lord would prove that He is something more than a prophet, mighty in deed and word,—that He is, in short, a king, in the fullest sense of the word. But could He have shown more plainly that His kingdom is not of this world? His garb, His animal, His attendants, His whole demeanour announced it. It is no wonder that neither Herod nor Pilate should subsequently have made this entry a proof of guilt. The Roman garrison might quietly remain in Fort Antonia, while this peaceful procession entered the gates of Jerusalem.

5. We shall, however, fail to appreciate the deep significance of this act of our Lord, till we bring it into direct connection with the history of His Passion. Now that the time of slaughter is really come, the Lamb willingly presents Himself to His murderers. By so public a step, He, on the one hand, prevents assassination, and, on the other, rather hastens His sufferings and death. For it was by this very act that the malice of His enemies was increased; by it, Judas was again disappointed at finding the Lord again suffering an opportunity of ascending an earthly throne to pass by; and since Jesus did nothing to keep up the enthusiasm of the multitude, by dazzling miracles, it died away, and resembled only the last flashing rays of the setting sun, before sinking beneath the horizon.

6. This hour may be looked upon as a decisive and irrevocable turning-point, in connection with the fate of Israel. We are certainly justified, especially when we consider the words and tears of Jesus, in regarding this entry as a carefully prepared and last attempt to preserve Israel as a nation; since Jerusalem, by resting satisfied with these passing Hosannas, brought upon herself the fulfilment of the sentence, that her stones should one day cry out. The entry gave to all the opportunity of manifesting their undisguised opinion: the people were not now under the influence of the priests; tongues were not tied by an enforced silence; it was the day that decided whether Jerusalem should become the blessed centre of all nations, or the terrible monument of God's righteous judgment. What would have happened, if Jerusalem had, on this day, really known the things that belonged to her peace, cannot be ascertained, and is therefore a vain inquiry. It is enough for us to know, that as they were now hidden from her eyes, the die was cast; and, since the hen had vainly sought to gather her chickens under her wing, the eagles would not, forty years afterwards, be vainly gathered together round the carcase.

7. This occurrence is of importance to all succeeding ages. By preparing for the death of Jesus, and the destruction of Jerusalem, it led to the reconciliation of the world, and the reception of the Gentiles. At the same time, it affords a proof, that though the kingdom of God comes not with observation, yet, when it comes, it cannot remain concealed for ever. What now took place, was by no means at variance with the parables of the leaven and the mustard-seed. "When the kingdom of God has secretly worked, for a time, in its mustard-seed and leaven-like manner, the effect must be recognised in great results, such as facts which force themselves on the perception of every one; and it is this silent working which brings about the great crises of the world's history. We should fail to recognise the force of the mustard-seed and the leaven, if we thought that all could ever remain in this state of gradual and secret development. It would be just such an error, as to suppose that great and striking results must be the first part of the process. These can only be rightly understood in connection with that power, working in secret, whose manifestation they are. The kingdom of God is also a city set upon a hill, and a light which must enlighten all men." Neander (Christ's Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem, a sermon for Palm Sunday. Berlin 1848, p. 10).

8. The Lord's entry into Jerusalem was the fulfilment of a prophecy of the Old Testament, Zech. ix. 9; and is, in its turn, a prophecy of His return in glory, when He shall again descend to earth, surrounded by thousands of His saints, whose Hosannas shall have been exchanged for Hallelujahs, 1 Thess. iv. 16; comp. Zech. xiv. 4.

9. There is a striking contrast between the reverence and honour wherewith the Pharisees and members of the Sanhedrim received the earthly conqueror, Alexander the Great, and the cold reception bestowed upon the Prince of Peace, when He, three hundred years after, made His entry into Jerusalem. No homage then seemed great enough; now, the least is too much. A no less striking contrast than that between the receptions of the Lord Jesus and of the earthly king, is pointed out by Erasmus (in his Paraphr. N. T.

ad h. l. Opera, edit. Basil, vii. p. 186), as existing between the entry of the High Priest of the New and of the Old Testament. Outwardly, Erasmus is speaking of the high priest of Israel; but he undoubtedly means the Pope of Rome, the so-called Vicar of Christ, whose external pomp presents so evident a contrast to this lowly entry of the heavenly King.

10. The stones of the temple of Jerusalem have not been the only ones which have, in the most literal sense of the word, proclaimed the glory of God and of His Christ. The testimonium lapidum has acquired a constantly increasing value in the defence of Christianity; and the superscription of the door in the rock at Salzburg, te saxa loquuntur, is confirmed before our eyes and ears by events which come within the province of history. Witness the latest excavations of Nineveh, Babylon, etc., and compare the interesting paper of Otto Strauss, Nineveh and the Word of God, Berlin 1855.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

On this, as on other occasions, when anything important is to be done, the Lord sends His disciples by two and two.—The obedience of faith, 1. not easy, 2. never ashamed.—He who executes the Lord's orders, must reckon upon frequent opposition.—"The Lord hath need of him:" an answer which should silence all opposition.—In the service of the Lord, the unclean becomes clean; the contemptible, inestimable; the unoccupied, useful.—Even our earthly possessions must be employed in the service of the King of heaven.—There is, for the Lord's friends, a time to speak, when they are relieved from the time of silence.—Even a mean homage, if sincere, is well-pleasing to the Lord.—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God," Isa. xl. 3; Ps. xxiv. 7, 8; Ps. lxviii. 5.—The Lord's miracles, the joy and boast of His friends.—Rejoicing in Jesus must end in glorifying God.—The Hosannas of the multitude: 1. The echo of so many notes of the Psalms of the Old Testament; 2. the beginning of the songs of praise in the New; 3. a prophecy of the perfect praises of heaven.—The enmity of the flesh, against the revelation of the life of the Spirit.—The voice of the stones in honour of Christ: 1. How loudly it cries; 2. how powerfully it preaches.—The entry into Jerusalem, a manifestation of the threefold character of the Lord: 1. Of His prophetic dignity; since He, a. knows what is hidden, b. performs what is unexampled, c. foretells what is future;—2. of His priestly dignity: He is, a. the undefiled, b. the compassionate,

c. the faithful High Priest of the New Testament;—3. of His royal dignity: He manifested Himself at this entry as, a. the promised Messiah, b. the King of a spiritual kingdom, c. the future conqueror of the world.—The question, "Who is this?" Matt. xxi. 10, answered by the history of His entry into Jerusalem.—A threefold example set before us in the entry into Jerusalem: 1. that of the people, 2. that of the disciples, 3. that of the Lord.—We must imitate the first, up to a certain point; the second, exactly; the third, at a distance.—Our Hosannas and Hallelujahs should be, 1. more highly pitched, 2. as voluntary, 3. less transitory, than those at the gates of Jerusalem.—At the entry to Jerusalem there is no neutrality towards the Saviour, but enthusiasm on the one hand, and hatred on the other.—The vanity of the praises of a world in which Hosanna is so speedily exchanged for "Crucify," Acts xiv. 8–20.—"Lo, I come to do Thy will, O my God," Ps. xl. 7, 8.

Starcke: Christ exercises His divine authority as Lord and Heir of all things, and sends for what is His own.—Brentius: The kingdom of Christ introduces the greatest glory, together with the greatest lowliness. Lord, open our eyes, 2 Kings vi. 17.—Jesus would have nothing of His own.—If things often happen very differently from what men think, they always happen as God has said.—The servants of Christ appeal, in all difficulties, to their Master's orders.—The Lord has, in every place, His hidden friends, who will show themselves when the time to do so comes.—Heaven and earth have been reunited by Christ.—Quesnel: The praise of God is annoying to the ears of the world.—Mistaken enthusiasts must be answered with forbearance and gentleness.—God gives a tongue, even to the inanimate creatures, when He chooses.—The power of Jesus over the hearts of men.—To obey is better than to reason.—The kingdom of the Messiah brings in a spiritual spring.—The inanimate creatures testify against the blindness and ingratitude of men.

For Advent Sermons.—Harless: 1. The character of the King; 2. His coming; 3. whom He comes to; 4. whom He abides with.—Tholuck: The advent cry, Thy King cometh (Predigten über religiöse Zeitfragen, Halle 1846, p. 76).—W. Hofacker, Sermons for the Sundays and Festivals of the Christian Year, Stuttgart 1857, p. 1, etc.: How Jesus, who once came in the flesh, continually comes in the Spirit: 1. To whom does He come? 2. for what purpose? 3. with what results?—F. Arndt, L. J. iv. p. 165, etc.: The entry of the King of kings into the city of cities: 1. Inconsiderable to the outward sense, 2. majestic in the eye of faith, 3. greatly desired by needy souls.—F. W. Krummacher, Passionsbuch, p. 49. How this Gospel strengthens our faith, 1. in the divine and Messianic dignity of the Lord, 2. in the blessedness of His future kingdom.—Couard: "Thy King cometh:" 1. He is come; 2. He is always coming; 3. He will come.—Stier: 1. To whom does He come? 2. why does He come? 3. how ought we to receive Him?—How lowliness and majesty are ever united in the life of Jesus.—Fuchs: The cry of Palm Sunday, a welcome to young Christians on their confirmation day.—Niemann: Blessed be the King, etc.: 1. How this cry was once raised, 2. how it is still raised, 3. how it shall one day be raised.—Rautenberg: The various receptions the Lord meets with.—Kraussold: Behold, thy King cometh to thee.—Dittmar: The advent of Jesus and the necessities of the present time.—Thomasius: The right preparation of the Church for the Lord's coming: 1. Its aim; 2. its conditions.—Hauschild: Blessed be He that cometh, 1. to suffer, 2. to rule, 3. to bless eternally.—Florey: What makes the Lord's entry into Jerusalem so elevating.—Brandt: Christ's last entry into Jerusalem a blessed sight.

2. The Glory of the King manifested in Word and Deed. (VERS. 41–48.)

Parallel passage to vers. 45 and 46: Matt. xxi. 12–14; Mark xi. 15–17.

41 And when He was come near, He beheld the city, and wept over it, 42 Saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. 43 For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, 44 And shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation. 45 And He went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold therein, and them that bought; 46 Saying unto them, It is written, My house is the house of prayer: but ye have made it a den of thieves. 47 And He taught daily in the temple. But the chief priests and the scribes, and the chief of the people, sought to destroy Him; 48 And could not find what they might do: for all the people were very attentive to hear Him.

1. Above it. The reading, ἐπ' αὐτήν, of Schulz, Lachmann, and Tischendorf, seems preferable to the usually received ἐπ' αὐτῇ. A.B.D.H.L.Δ., and some cursive manuscripts, are in its favour. This graphic expression is best explained by the consideration, that the Lord wept while descending the Mount of Olives.

2. We think that both καίγε and σου, which Lachmann considers doubtful, must be retained.

3. To cast out them that sold. The longer reading of the Receptus, τοὺς πωλοῦντας ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ τοὺς ἀγοράζοντας, seems inserted from the parallel passage.
4. See Tischendorf on this passage.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. He wept.—Not merely ἐδάκρυσεν, like John xi. 35; but ἔκλαυσεν, with loud voice, and words of lamentation. The cause of these tears is shown by ἐπ' αὐτήν, and the words immediately following. Again, it is Luke alone who has preserved this touching trait; and it scarcely needs remarking how entirely this circumstance is in its place, in that Gospel which, especially, makes us acquainted with our Lord as the true and holy Son of man. And yet we cannot be surprised, that this very trait of pure and genuine humanity has ever been a stone of stumbling to many. With regard to this circumstance, it is remarkable that the words ἔκλαυσεν ἐπ' αὐτ. are wanting in certain old copies. Epiphanius, however, says that, ἐν τοῖς ἀδιορθώτοις ἀντιγράφοις, the words are read. "Mutarunt homines temerarii et delicati quibus flere Christo indignum videbatur."

2. If thou hadst known.—"An affecting aposiopesis, and, at the same time, the expression of a fruitless desire." Meyer.—Even thou, thou also, G. V., contrasts the unbelieving inhabitants of Jerusalem with the disciples of the Lord, who really had considered τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην. Perhaps we have here a remote allusion to the meaning of the word Jerusalem, the city of peace (Salem). The ἡμέρα, here spoken of, can be no other than that which the Lord designates τὸν καιρὸν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, ver. 44; comp. ch. i. 67. The whole period of our Lord's public ministry at Jerusalem was a gracious respite, which had been arranged for more than twenty centuries, and was now, as it were, concentrated into that one day, on which the Lord entered Jerusalem as her King. Jerusalem would have known (ἔγνως) this, if she had unanimously done homage to the Messiah; but though the Lord had indeed found even here some believing hearts, yet Jerusalem, as a city, rejected her King: the Ἰουδαῖοι did not acknowledge Him—who He was, and what a blessing He would have bestowed, was hidden from their eyes. Ἐκρύβη, according to the righteous counsel of God, Matt. xi. 25, 26; but not without their own fault.

3. The days shall come.—Vers. 43, 44 are the text of that striking sermon on the destruction of Jerusalem, which the Lord preached, two days afterwards, to His disciples (ch. xxi. 5, etc.).

The ἡμέραι which are now threatened, are the dreadful results of the ἡμέρα, ver. 42, passing by in vain. Ὅτι does not depend upon ἐκρύβη, so that the thing which is hidden is pointed out by it (Theophylact); nor is it a corroborative particle in the sense of profecto, utique (Starcke); but must here retain its usual sense, "for," and be understood as declaring the reason of the wish expressed, ver. 42; as, if the Lord would say: I could indeed wish that, etc.; for now the things that belong to thy peace are hidden from thine eyes, now there are days coming, etc.

4. A trench, χάρακα, masc. gen.—It is worthy of notice, how the Lord not only foretells the destruction of Jerusalem in general terms, but also minutely describes the manner in which, and the means by which, this judgment should be executed. He announces a regular siege, in which all the means, then in use, should be employed, and all the cruelties practised, which conquerors are accustomed to exercise towards the conquered. He first mentions the χάραξ, a camp fortified with palisades, a line of circumvallation,—in short, a wall such as, Josephus informs us (de bello Jud. v. 6, 2; v. 12, 2), was actually raised around Jerusalem, but burned by the Jews. Afterwards, as the result of this building, περικυκλώσουσίν σε, καὶ συνέξουσίν σε πάντοθεν,—an indication of the walls, 39 stadii in length, which Titus erected round the city in three days, in the place of the destroyed χάραξ. The consequence of these measures would be the entire destruction of Jerusalem, and her children within her (ἐδαφιοῦσι). The word is used in a twofold sense,—to level to the ground, and to dash against the ground (Ps. cxxxvii. 9): the first describing the fate of the city, the second that of its inhabitants, which are here coupled together. And finally, the conclusion of all this, not one stone left upon another, so that the stones now begin to cry out (ver. 40). This last part of the prophecy was not completely fulfilled till after the revolt of Barcochba, in the reign of Hadrian. And this continues to the present day, the terrible result of this one blindness, because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation. In these closing words, and especially in the continuous gradation, καὶ, καὶ, καί, there is a δεινότης orationis, better felt than described.

5. And He went into the temple.—Comp. the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark. Luke entirely passes over the cursing of the fig-tree, and but briefly describes the purification of the temple. Indeed, he really gives only the beginning of this symbolical action (ἤρξατο), while Matthew relates also its success (ἐξέβαλεν). It seemed to him peculiarly worthy of remark, that the Lord should begin His last visit to the sanctuary with so stringent a measure. We have also to refer to Matthew and Mark, both for a more detailed description of the persons expelled, and of the means and manner of their expulsion. The quotation from Isa. lvi. 7 is found as well in Luke as in the other Evangelists; while, with Matthew, he omits the πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, probably for the sake of brevity. On the inquiry, whether the purification of the temple took place once or twice, compare Lange on the parallel passage in Matthew. For our part, we are decidedly in favour of a repetition of this transaction, since the opposite view offers far more numerous difficulties, and must accuse either St John or the synoptical Evangelists of the grossest inaccuracy. It is entirely in accordance with the typical and symbolical character of this transaction, that the Lord should have both commenced and closed His public ministry therewith; the circumstances, too, are so different, that they make identity improbable. With respect to this second purification of the temple, they who consider it doubtful that the Lord should have repeated, a few days before His death, a transaction which would prejudice or embitter the whole temporal power against Him, must, for the same reason, consider His censures (Matt. xxiii.) wholly fictitious. That the Lord did not perform this act at the second Passover also, is to be attributed simply to the circumstance that He was not then at Jerusalem: John vi. 1–4. Who knows whether, perhaps, after the first purification, the abuse then censured might not have diminished or even ceased, and have been revived, by the priestly party, for the very purpose of calling forth renewed opposition? This would account for the fact of His reproofs being more severe at the second than at the first purification. The brevity of the account in all the synoptical Gospels, may account for our not finding, either in the words of our Lord or the behaviour of the expelled parties, any reminiscence of the former transaction. Perhaps, however, it was the remembrance of the first which lessened the opposition at the second purification.

6. And He was daily, etc.—A graphic and striking representation of circumstances at this critical period. On the part of the Lord, we perceive undaunted courage, tranquillity of spirit, and vigour of mind, so that He daily showed Himself in public. These were, however, united with a proper care for His own safety, which caused Him to pass the night at a short distance from Jerusalem, so long as His hour was not come. On the part of His enemies, implacable malice and constant desires for His death, especially among the secular aristocracy, who considered themselves mortally offended by Him. On the part of the people, an undiminished desire to hear Him, on which account the treacherous designs of His enemies could as yet effect nothing. The people hung upon His words; the more they heard, the more they longed to hear (ἐξεκρέματο cum gen.). "As bees to the flowers whence they suck honey, or as young birds to the mouths of the parent birds from whom they expect their food." Meanwhile His enemies were evidently perplexed: they could not find what they might do. The Lord was, for the present, as great an impediment to their plans as the people: a testimony both to the power of unarmed innocence, and the impotence of armed and determined wickedness.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. "Never man spake like this man" (John vii. 46),—a saying verified not only in the temple, but also in the gates of Jerusalem. The eloquence of Christ's words is great, that of His silence perhaps more so, but that of His tears surpasses description. The tears of Jesus at the grave of Lazarus, and those which He shed over Jerusalem, are so similar, and yet so different, that the comparison of them furnishes an important contribution to the knowledge of the Lord's person and character. The contrast between the jubilant multitude and the weeping Saviour,—between the deepest delusion on the one hand, and unerring knowledge on the other,—is so speaking, and yet so entirely taken from life, that the words, "this trait could not have been invented," are as applicable on this as on so many other occasions. Justly said Augustine, Lacrymæ Domini, gaudia mundi.

2. This prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, delivered on the very spot where the Romans afterwards set up their first camp, has been, in all ages, rightly regarded as one of the strongest proofs of the unerring and divine foreknowledge of the Lord Jesus. A comparison of the prediction with the accounts of Josephus, is still advisable to the defenders of Christianity. At the same time, the unsuccessful issue of the Emperor Julian's impious attempt to rebuild Jerusalem should not be forgotten. See Chrysost. Oratio 3 adv. Judæos.

3. "The holy tears of Jesus show the feelings of God's heart towards men when they fall into sin and ruin. The existence of a compassionate sorrow, though always allayed by infinite love, wisdom, and holiness, is to be conceived, even in our notions of God. The tears of Jesus over Jerusalem, being at the same time the tears of the priestly Intercessor and Mediator, belong to all mankind; comp. Heb. v. 7." Von Gerlach.

4. Our admiration of the Lord's majesty is but the more increased when we see how He, who surely knows that He must give up Jerusalem for lost, perseveres, even to the last days of His earthly life, in labouring in Jerusalem with untiring and holy zeal. Even when He knows that the multitude will not let themselves be saved, He continues to show compassion on individuals. It is for this very reason that His love is so much the more adorable; that there is never, for a moment, any weakness in it; and that, while He weeps over the fate of sinners, He preserves His righteous indignation against sin,—seeking, however, in this indignation, not His own, but His Father's honour. At His entry, Jesus weeps over the fate of Jerusalem; at His departure, He says, Weep not: Luke xxiii. 28.

5. The purification of the temple is one of those acts of our Lord which have been, at one time, unduly exalted, at another, unduly depreciated. The first has been the case when it has been looked upon as a miracle, in the ordinary sense of the word, and even greater than, for instance, the miracle of Cana. See Origen in voce; Hieronymus ad Matt. xxi. 15; Lampe in comment. In opposition to this view, due allowance must be made for the moral influence which such a person as the Lord Jesus must have exercised upon minds so weak and low as these, and for the similar triumphs of truth and justice over the slaves of falsehood and injustice, which we meet with in profane history. On the other hand, occasion has sometimes been unreasonably taken, from this act, to call in question the moral purity of the Lord, and to turn, so to speak, the scourge of small cords against Himself. We have here, however, to consider, not the right of a zealot, but the right of a Son in His Father's house, and especially to notice the union of righteous indignation and pitying love which irradiates this whole transaction. In short, He no sooner wields the scourge than He stretches forth the saving hand, which has just driven out the defilers, to the "blind and the lame," and Almighty Love heals those afflicted ones whom compassion had brought into the temple. Comp. Matt. xxi. 14; and, with respect to the first purification of the temple, the interesting section, das Panier auf dem Berge, in Baumgarten's Geschichte Jesu, Braunschweig 1859, pp. 99–111.

6. The purification of the temple, a symbol of the whole life of Jesus, as also of the purpose of His appearance upon earth. See Cyrill Alex. ii. 1; Origen, tom. x. p. 16; Augustinus, Tract. in Evangel. Joh., and others. Compare Mal. iii. 1 and Luke iii. 15.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

"Behold, thy King cometh to thee." How the Lord manifested His kingly character at His entry into Jerusalem: 1. By His tears, 2. by His words, 3. by His deeds in the temple.—The love of Jesus to an unthankful people, and to His native country, though doomed to destruction.—Wrath against sin and love for sinners, united in the Saviour.—The King of Israel also the compassionate High Priest.—The accepted time, the day of salvation (2 Cor. vi. 2).—He who refuses the one day of grace, has many evil days to expect.—The Romans at the siege of Jerusalem, witnesses for the truth of Christ's words.—Great grace, great blindness, great retribution.—The contrast between the Lord's last entry into Jerusalem and His last departure.—The Son in the desecrated house of His Father: 1. How earnest is His anger! 2. how dignified His words! 3. how gracious His blessing!—Scripture, the rule by which everything must be done in the worship of God.—The Lord is still purifying His temple, 1. of the heart, 2. of the family, 3. of the Church, 4. of creation.—"My house is the house of prayer." This text points out, 1. inestimable privileges, 2. holy obligations, 3. high expectations.—The temple of the Lord: 1. Its original destination, 2. its subsequent desecration, 3. its final consummation.—It is just that which is best which is most defiled by human wickedness.—Passion-week, a striking proof of the Lord's fidelity to the principle He had once enunciated (John ix. 4).—The remarkable spectacle which the temple presented after the Lord's entry and purification: 1. A numerous audience, desirous of benefit; 2. a multitude of impotent enemies; 3. the Lord in the presence of both, undefiled, indefatigable, undaunted.—Jesus triumphant, even before His apparent overthrow; His enemies conquered, even before their apparent victory.

Starcke, Langii Op.: The nearer and the greater grace is, the nearer and greater is judgment, if grace is despised.—Zeisius: Consider, O man, what the tears of Jesus mean, and let them soften thy heart to true repentance.—There is nothing more lamentable than the spiritual blindness of man.—Hedinger: Blindness precedes destruction.—Canstein: There is a limit even to the time of grace.

—Osiander: When God's indignation is kindled, it rages most terribly against the impenitent.—Luther: Contempt of the Gospel brings towns and countries to destruction.—Holiness, the beauty of God's house, Ps. xciii. 5.—Severity against open wickedness is becoming.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: How many are there in the temple, who are the voluntary slayers of their own souls!—Quesnel: The church not only a house of prayer, but a house of teaching.—Obdurate sinners would rather injure pious preachers, than amend themselves.—Zeisius: No harm can happen to God's faithful servants against His will.—Jesus has more friends among the common people than among the upper ranks.—It is well, but not enough, to be very attentive to hear Jesus.—Heubner: The different value of many tears.—If thou hadst known! may be said to every blinded sinner.—Every one has his day of grace.—The sinner has a bandage over his eyes.—The interests of our posterity ought to urge us to repentance.—The invincibility of love.—Beware, above all things, of anything that may interrupt the devotions, or ruin the souls of others.—Churches, the asylums of truth.—Truth always finds some friends.

The grief of Jesus on His last view of Jerusalem: 1 Its source; 2. its effects.—How the tears of Jesus still speak to us.—Great cities, the seats of corruption.—The value of Christ's tears.—Couard: Jerusalem and the Jewish people: 1. Jerusalem's day of grace; 2. Jerusalem's obduracy; 3. Jerusalem's fall.—The tears of Christians below: 1. Tears of joy; 2. tears of repentance; 3. tears of grief.—Souchon: The knowledge of the time of visitation.—Palmer: The blindness of Jerusalem: 1. Ruin is at hand, but no one anticipates it; 2. deliverance is at hand, but no one recognises it.—The Saviour: 1. His tears; 2. His zeal; 3. how, by both, He calls us to repentance.—Rautenberg: The tears of Jesus over Jerusalem, 1. compassionate, 2. terrible, 3. persuasive, 4. consoling tears.—Tholuck: These tears, 1. a shame to our cold hearts, 2. a reproof of our levity, 3. a shock to our security.—Von Kapff: The judgments of the Lord: 1. The judgment of wrath; 2. the judgment of purification; 3. the judgment of hardness; 4. the judgment of condemnation.—Arndt: Jesus, a lover of His native land.—Von Oosterzee: Christ's tears over Jerusalem: 1. Jerusalem's shame; 2. Jerusalem's honour; 3. our joy.—The purification of the temple, an image of the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It reminds us of, 1. the history of the Reformation, 2. the glory of the Reformation, 3. the warnings of the Reformation. Ad. 1. The abuses which the Reformation opposed, the principle it honoured, the spirit it manifested, the reception it experienced. Ad. 2. The Reformation, like the purification of the temple, was a restoration of the spiritual service of God, a revelation of the glory of Christ, the commencement of a new development in the kingdom of God upon earth. Ad. 3. The Reformation warns those who desecrate the temple, to repent; those who honour the temple, to be zealous; those who know the Lord of the temple, to be continually remembering His deeds. Comp. John ii. 22.

B. Disputes with His Enemies. (Chap. xx.)

1. The last Dispute with the Pharisees and Elders of the People, concerning the Authority of Jesus. (Vers. 1–19.)

Partly parallel with Matt. xxi. 23–27, 33–46; Mark xi. 27–33, xii. 1–12.

1 And it came to pass, that on one of those days, as He taught the people in the temple, and preached the Gospel, the chief priests and the scribes came upon Him, with the elders, 2 And spake unto Him, saying, Tell us, by what authority doest Thou these things? or who is he that gave Thee this authority? 3 And He answered and said unto them, I will also ask you one thing; and answer Me: 4 The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men? 5 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; He will say, Why then believed ye him not? 6 But and if we say, Of men; all the people will stone us; for they be persuaded that John was a prophet. 7 And they answered, that they could not tell whence it was. 8 And Jesus said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. 9 Then began He to speak to the people this parable; A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to husbandmen, and went into a far country for a long time. 10 And at the season he sent a servant to the husbandmen, that they should give him of the fruit of the vineyard: but the husbandmen beat him, and sent him away empty. 11 And again he sent another servant: and they beat him also, and entreated him shamefully, and sent him away empty. 12 And again he sent a third: and they wounded him also, and cast him out. 13 Then said the lord of the vineyard, What shall I do? I will send my beloved son: it may be they will reverence him when they see him. 14 But when the husbandmen saw him, they reasoned among themselves, saying, This is the heir: come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. 15 So they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. What therefore shall the lord of the vineyard do unto them? 16 He shall come and destroy these husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard to others. And when they heard it, they said, God forbid. 17 And He beheld them, and said, What is this then that is written, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner? 18 Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. 19 And the chief priests and the scribes the same hour sought to lay hands on Him; and they feared the people: for they perceived that He had spoken this parable against them.

Ver. 1. Ἐκείνων, which is wanting in B.D.L.Q. cursive manuscripts, and is rejected by Lachmann and Tischendorf, is perhaps only an unauthentic definitive addition.

Ver. 1. Ἱερεῖς. The ἀρχιερεῖς of the Receptus seems to be derived from the parallel passage.

Ver. 4. The ἵνα before λόγον of the Receptus is wanting in B.L. cursive manuscripts, and is rejected by Griesbach, Tischendorf, and Lachmann.

Ver. 9. The τις, after ἄνθρωπος, of the Receptus is decidedly unauthentic.

Ver. 14. This is the heir, let us kill, etc. The come of the Recep. is taken from Matthew and Mark.

Ver. 19. The scribes and chief priests. The Receptus reverses this order, in accordance with the usual order of precedence, but is not critically supported. See Lachmann and Tischendorf.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. On one of those days.—A general indication that the time was about that, during which the entry into Jerusalem and the purification of the temple took place. On a comparison of Matthew and Mark, it appears that we have specially to refer it to the last Tuesday. The cursing of the fruitless fig-tree is passed over by Luke: that which the fig-tree typified, the nation of Israel with its abundant foliage, barren of fruit, and about to decay, is strikingly portrayed in the narrative of our Lord's last dispute with the elders of Israel. And though he omits two main elements in this connection,—viz., the parable of the two sons, Matt. xxi. 28–32; and that of the marriage of the king's son, Matt. xxii. 1–14 (the latter, probably, because he had already given, in ch. xiv. 16–24, a very similar one),—yet, even from his account, we derive a very lively representation of the history of this very remarkable day. Together with Matthew and Mark, he acquaints us with the external dealings of the Lord with His enemies during the last days of His life; while John, who is silent concerning these disputations, narrates the history of his Master's private life within the circle of His Apostles, during the same period. All that Luke relates in ch. xx. took place within the walls of the temple, while the Lord was teaching the people, and (according to the peculiar, and truly Pauline expression of Luke) preaching the Gospel.

2. Came upon Him, ἐπέστησαν; comp. ch. ii. 38; Acts iv. 1. —Pointing out, not the sudden and unexpected, but rather the deliberate and solemn nature of their appearance. It was a well organized and deliberately selected deputation of the Sanhedrim, the component elements of which were carefully represented on this occasion. Though they do not say that they speak in the name of the whole council, we may certainly take this for granted, from the well-known enmity entertained towards the Lord by the majority, and may so far compare this deputation with the similar one sent to John at the beginning of our Lord's public ministry, John i. 19–28. Perhaps the perception of this similarity determined the form of the Lord's answer. The highest authority in Israel was certainly entitled to institute an inquiry into the authority of every public teacher; and the Lord, by entering into discussion with them, shows that He recognises the theocratic character of the speakers, and is not disinclined to answer their inquiry, at least upon certain reasonable conditions, to which they, however, very soon show themselves resolved not to agree. The very fact that, after Jesus had performed so many undeniable miracles, and two years after a candid Nicodemus had visited Him with a full conviction of His divine mission, they could come to Him with such an inquiry, testifies against them, and produces an almost ludicrous impression.

3. Tell us, etc.—They thus commence that series of captious inquiries which were this day submitted to the Lord. "These discussions are truly genuine passages, being carried on so entirely in the spirit and tone of the rabbinical dialectics of the time." Strauss. More than one attempt had been previously made to entangle Him in His own words, but this is now undertaken in a more deliberate and subtle manner, and with a combination of forces. This effort of enmity was, at the same time, a test, since it was expected of the Messiah that He would know all things. (John iv. 25, xvi. 30.) It was therefore natural that one who appeared in this character should be involved in a web of intricate questions. And the Pharisees, in the confident expectation that they shall come off conquerors from the conflict, lose no time in commencing this public interrogation of our Lord.

4. By what authority, etc.—or who is he, etc.—The two questions do not express the same thing in different words (De Wette); but are rather so far different, that the former seeks to elicit a declaration of His heavenly mission, the latter to ascertain what divine messenger had been the medium of ordaining Him to this office. Ταῦτα here, not only signifies the Lord's single act of purifying the temple (Meyer), but His whole manifestation of superiority and authority in the temple during these latter days, which, in their opinion, was entirely unauthorized.

5. The baptism of John,—here specially represented as the sum and centre of his prophetic agency. The Lord by no means avoided the conflict; and the very fact of His replying by a counter inquiry testifies to His divine wisdom. It must be seen whether, besides a right to interrogate, they possess the capacity of appreciating a reasonable answer; and this could only be ascertained by their giving some proof of their candour. This counter inquiry was by no means an arbitrary one: He who had never separated His ministry from that of His forerunner, could not tell them who had given Him His authority, until they, as representatives of the nation, had definitely expressed their opinion concerning John. If they recognised the divine mission of the Baptist, who had done no miracles, much more must they respect His. If they rejected the former, they deserved the reproof, that they were incapable of deciding upon the credentials of Jesus. If they were silent, this would give Him an undoubted right to send them away unanswered. In any case, He could thus wait with the greatest tranquillity to see what position they would choose to occupy.

6. And they reasoned with themselves.—They stepped aside for a moment, to make the matter one not of individual, but of common consultation (συνελογίσαντο). It is evident that it was not the question just proposed to them which was the subject of their deliberation, but that they were merely consulting on the means of honourably withdrawing from the dilemma. All the synoptical Evangelists notice the perplexity into which they were thrown, in the midst of the temple,—a difficulty which must, inevitably, soon come to the knowledge of many. The testimony extorted from them, that many among the people believed in the propnetic character of the Baptist, is worthy of notice. According to Luke and Mark, they speak of the λαός, yet certainly in the sense of ὄχλος, as Mark has it: comp. John vii. 49.—Will stone us, καταλιθάσει, peculiar to Luke; perhaps a later form of the tradition (Meyer), but quite as probably the original and pregnant form in which they expressed the fear which Matthew and Mark both speak of. "Non erat populi, sacerdotes et scribas, prophetam quamlibet verum rejicientes, lapidare: sed sæpe etiam perversum multitudinis studium per accidens subservit bonæ causæ." Bengel.

7. That they could not tell whence.—This declaration was doubly criminal, when compared with the οἴδαμεν (as, for instance, in John ix. 24–34) which we are continually hearing from them. Luke has only the indirect form of the answer, which was undoubtedly as brief and indefinite as possible. The worst thing for them, however, was, that they thus gave the Lord a right for His decided Neither tell I you, etc. Both parties were now silent,—the Lord, because He had a good reason for not speaking; they, because, by their own fault, they could not speak; while not one of the bystanders could, for a moment, doubt which of the combatants had come off conqueror.

8. To the people.—According to Matthew and Mark, this parable was addressed to the Pharisees and elders, to whom it directly relates; while Luke says that the Lord spoke πρὸς τὸν λαόν. The two accounts are not, however, contradictory; for, even according to Luke, the scribes and Pharisees formed the chief part of our Lord's auditors; while, by the accounts of Matthew and Mark, He was speaking in a place and among a circle which makes it, a priori, possible that He was heard, not by them only, but also by the people. The μὴ γένοιτο, too, which Luke alone gives, ver. 16, only suits the mouth of the chief priests, who would certainly perceive, more quickly than others, the intention of the parable. The circumstances seem to have been these:—The Lord, after the answer, ver. 8, turned from the Pharisees to the more docile multitude, yet in such wise, that the former inquirers, who had not yet departed, might hear His instructions, and be constrained to apply them to themselves. It was not enough for the Lord that He had repelled the attack; He also pursued His retreating foes, and would have them know the real nature of their pretended ignorance (Matt. xxi. 28–32). When He had thus unmasked their hypocrisy, He brought their guilt to light, and, ranking them beneath the lowest of the Jews, He showed them how their rejection of the Messiah would lead to the reception of the Gentiles.

9. A vineyard.—A favourite image of the nation of Israel. See Isa. v. 1–6; Ps. lxxx.; and elsewhere. Compare Lange on the parallel passages in Matt. and Mark, and the treatises of Ruprecht and Stephensen in the Theol. Stud. und Krit. of 1847 and 1848.

10. At the season.—Referring to the period when prophetic agency, properly so called, began in Israel. As this took place long after the foundation of the theocratic state, the fruit, to continue the image of the parable, had had abundant time to ripen. The wine-press and tower are not mentioned by Luke. That it is impossible to view these two objects as representing the Mosaic law and the temple (Euthym., Theophylact, Calvin, Melancthon, and others), is evident from the circumstance, that the vineyard, assuredly including the tower and wine-press, was afterwards given to the Gentiles.

11. A servant.—The different Evangelists are here faithful to their own peculiarities. Matthew speaks, according to his custom, of servants and other servants, while Mark and Luke individualize. The former mentions, besides the three also spoken of by Luke, many others, ver. 5; the latter represents none of the three servants, however severely they may have been treated, as actually put to death; for the sake, probably, of enhancing the climax of wickedness which at last destroys the lawful heir. According to all three, the labourers begin with dishonesty, and end with open wickedness, without our being able to apply each separate act of violence to any particular individual.

12. What shall I do?—Matthew and Mark relate this highest effort of love. Luke, by representing the lord of the vineyard as deliberating with himself, places this act in a still clearer light. He will send his son, his well-beloved, to the ungrateful husbandmen, not with the secret hope that they would perhaps still honour him, but with the reasonable expectation that they would not, at all events, carry their wickedness so far as to do him violence.

13. When the husbandmen saw him.—Evidently referring to the τοῦτον ἰδόντες of the lord of the vineyard, ver. 13. The very sight, which he hoped would fill them with reverence, excites in their hearts the most terrible designs of assassination. The last trait, that the inheritance may be ours, is by no means added merely by way of embellishment, but is a plain indication that the most shameless selfishness was manifested in the death of the Messiah. It was expressed in almost the same manner by the words of Caiaphas, John xi. 50; while the coincidence with Gen. xxxvii. 19, 20, is very striking.

14. Out of the vineyard.—A striking prophecy of the crucifixion outside the city: comp. Heb. xiii. 12, 13.

15. He shall come, etc.—According to Matthew, they were themselves constrained to pass the sentence which, according to Mark and Luke, was spoken by Jesus. Perhaps the circumstances may thus be reconciled: that some among them became, in this manner, their own judges; while others, shocked at their words, which were regarded as a malum omen, uttered a μὴ γένοιτο. Even if we allow that there is a slight discrepancy in the narrative, the subject loses nothing by it. The general result, from all accounts, was this, that the Pharisees were confounded, and very well understood the Lord's meaning.

16. 'Εμβλέψας.—Here, as frequently, e.g., ch. xxii. 61, indicative of the penetrating and eloquent glance of the Lord.—What is this then, etc. He would have them understand that, if their deprecation should hold good, the prophecy of Scripture would not be fulfilled,—a thing absolutely impossible: comp. Matt. xxvi. 54.

17. The stone, etc.—Comp. Ps. cxviii. 22, 23. This psalm, which Luther prized so far above others, was probably a composition of more modern times, after the long intermitted temple services had again been performed in the now purified sanctuary. Its contents and connection forbid us to attribute to the whole of this rejoicing strain a direct Messianic interpretation; but the abasement and elevation, whether of Israel or the sanctuary, which are celebrated in this passage, serve as the type and symbol of Christ's. What was originally said in another sense, was fulfilled in its highest signification by the rejection of Messiah.

18. Whosoever shall fall, etc.—Instead of continuing the quotation, "This is the Lord's doing," etc., Luke gives this threat spoken by Jesus, which Tischendorf omits from Matt. xxi. 44. See Lange on this passage. "Cadere super Christum dicuntur, qui ad eum opprimendum ruunt, non quod ipso altius conscendunt, sed quia eo usque abripit eos sua insania, ut Christum quasi e sublimi impetere conentur." Calvin.

19. And the chief priests . . . . sought, etc.: comp. Matt. xxi. 45, 46.—An account so much the more remarkable, in this place, as furnishing a proof that the increasing exasperation of His enemies did not arise from misconception of the Lord's words; but, on the contrary, from the very fact of their understanding them but too well, and feeling themselves mortally injured and offended by them. The more light was before their eyes, the more hatred was in their hearts. It is evident that they are on the road to the commission of the sin against the Holy Ghost. Their fear was associated with hatred (καί is not appositive, but purely copulative); but, at the same time, it prevented their doing all that they wished. —Πρὸς αὐτ.; comp. ver. 9. They themselves well see that, though they were indeed the hearers, they were not the principal characters of the parable, and their conscience exclaims, "mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur."

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

2. The hardness of heart manifested by the enemies of Jesus, is as evident from their own behaviour as from His parable. Even the sanctity of the temple does not restrain them from laying their deadly snares for Him; and their conduct is rendered the more revolting by the assumed appearance of earnest inquiry, when they had beforehand resolved not to let themselves be by any means convinced. There is, nevertheless, something tragic in the terrible blindness with which, at the very same moment in which they show that they but too well understood the parable of the unthankful husbandmen, they yet prepare to fulfil this prophecy, and to reject the stone which is soon to grind them to powder.

3. This whole epoch, in the last week of our Lord's public ministry, may be, in fact, looked upon as a continuous purification of the temple. What He at first effected by the scourge of small cords, He now continues to do with the sword of His mouth,—He sweeps away His enemies before His face, and thus purifies the sanctuary. The manner in which He constrains His foes, first to pass judgment upon themselves, and then to be silent, is prophetic of what will take place, on a greatly enlarged scale, at the day of His appearing.

4. While in the parables of Matt. xiii. the idea of the kingdom of God is kept more in the foreground, it is the image of the King Himself which is made more prominent and distinct in those with which the Lord closes His ministry as prophet and teacher. The manner in which He here bears testimony to Himself, as the only and beloved Son of the Father, differing both in rank and origin from all the former messengers of God, directs our attention to a point of coincidence between the synoptical Gospels and that of St John.

5. Only a total misconception of our Lord's purpose could make it possible to conclude from the words, "It may be they will reverence him when they see him," that God did not send His Son into the world for the express purpose of dying and suffering; but that, on the contrary, He seriously expected that He would experience a more favourable reception than had been given to His former messengers. The Lord simply expresses what God might have expected, if the Omniscient had been in all respects like a human vineyard owner. The terrible and almost inconceivable crime of Messiah's rejection is thus brought, κατ' ἄνθρωπον, into clearer light. Calvin was certainly in the right when he said, concerning this passage, "Hæc quidem cogitatio proprie in Deum non convenit, sciebat enim, quid futurum esset, nec spe melioris eventus deceptus fuit, sed usitatum est, præsertim in parabolis, ad eum transferri humanos affectus. Neque tamen hoc abs re additum est, quia voluit Christus tanquam in speculo repræsentare, quam deplorata esset illorum impietas cujus hoc nimis certum fuit examen, contra Dei filium, qui ipsos ad sanam mentem revocaturus venerat, diabolico furore insurgere. Hic scelerum omnium cumulus fuit, filium interficere, ut regnarent quasi in orbata domo, etc. Conf. Act. 4, 27, 28."

6. The work of grace exercised for Israel, the enmity shown, and the threatened judgment, that the kingdom of God should be taken from them and given to other nations, are all repeated on a larger scale in New Testament times, since the Theocracy has become the Christocracy. Witness, e.g., some of the churches of Asia Minor, whose lights once burned so brightly in their candlesticks.

7. "Whosoever shall fall upon that stone," etc.—The two members of this threat by no means present, as might at first sight appear, a mere tautology, but a description of the different fates which the Lord's enemies have to expect, first from the rejected, and afterwards from the exalted corner-stone. Whoever falls upon this stone, is to be understood of him who is offended at the as yet lowly Saviour, to whom the rejected stone is a λίθος προσκόμματος. Thereupon follows the judgment of retribution: συνθλασθήσεται; exemplified, for instance, in Judas Iscariot, the impenitent thief, and others. In spite of this offence, the Lord would be exalted to become the chief corner-stone; and then he upon whom this exalted stone should fall, would be ground to powder (λικμήσει αὐτόν): in other words, when the glorified Messiah shall come again to judgment, the most dreadful punishment await His enemies. To appreciate the full force of this pregnant saying, we must compare not only Ps. cxviii. 22, 23, but also Isa. viii. 14, 15, xxviii. 16, and Dan. ii. 44, 45. The evident preference with which the same image is frequently introduced and dwelt upon by the Apostle Peter, in his discourses and epistles, may, perhaps, lead us to infer how deep a personal impression this instruction of Christ made upon His faithful disciples.

8. The hatred, whose increase is so perceptible in the Pharisees, after they knew and understood the truth, affords us a fresh discovery of one of the depths of Satan in sinful hearts, and is well calculated to open the eyes of those who, with well-meaning Pelagian shallowness, look upon sin as a weakness, an excessive sensitiveness, etc. If ever it was plainly shown that the belief of the heart is impossible without the submission of the will, and that, at the same time, a power from above is indispensable to produce this submission of the will, by which alone the word of the Lord can find access to the mind, it was in the case of these first enemies of the truth, the types and forerunners of so many in later times.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

After completing the purification of the temple, the Lord remains upon the field as conqueror.—After administering the law, He proceeds to announce the Gospel.—The apparently very necessary, yet really quite superfluous, question of the Pharisees.—The use and abuse of the tongue.—How the enemies of David, as described in Ps. xi. and elsewhere, are evidently typical of Christ's enemies.—The continual restlessness of the wicked.—If the Lord's enemies cannot answer Him one question, what will they do when He puts a thousand to them? Job ix. 3.—The divine mission of John, always recognised and defended by Christ.—He who cannot understand and believe John, incapable and incompetent of judging rightly of the Lord.—The untenable nature of their point of view, who would remain the disciples of John, exposed by the Lord.—When interest is concerned, arguments are of no avail.—The uncertainty of the stand-point a tutiori.—The people are often nearer to the truth than their spiritual leaders.—The Lord's silence a beginning of judgment.—Right must remain right, and all pious hearts will assent to it, Ps. xciv.—His enemies would show the people the defeat of Jesus; but the Lord makes them witnesses of His victory and retaliation.—The parable of the unthankful husbandmen, an echo of the song touching the vineyard, Isa. v. 1-7.—The history of centuries related in a few minutes.—The dealings and counsel of God concerning Israel, mistaken and despised by Israel: 1. The gracious choice, ver. 9; 2. the prolonged work of grace, vers. 10-12; 3. the fulness of the time, ver. 13; 4. the fearful crime, vers. 14, 15; 5. the just punishment, vers. 16-18; 6. the curse turned into a blessing to the "other" husbandmen, ver. 16.—The various forms under which enmity against that which is of God, has been manifested from old times, and is still continually manifested.—The fearful climax of sin.—The riches of the mercy and forbearance of God despised, Rom. ii. 4.—The sending of God's Son, 1. the highest, 2. the last manifestation of His grace.—Sin cannot be manifested in its full power till grace has reached its climax.—God does not cease from His demands, even when His messengers are treated with increasing ingratitude. —Let the Son be reverenced, Ps. ii.—What is least expected, often happens first.—False security in the presence of threatened judgments.—When the light is not heeded, the candlestick is in danger of being removed from its place, Rev. ii. 5.—The greater the privilege, the heavier the responsibility; the stronger the delusion, the deeper the fall.—The Church may learn, from the Lord, in what light to regard the prophecies of the Old Testament.—The history of the corner-stone, 1. an old, but 2. always new history.—Conscious hatred of truth.—How little does unbelief understand the Lord, even when it perfectly comprehends the meaning of His words!—Behold the goodness and severity of God! Rom. xi. 22.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The devil cannot bear the preaching of the Gospel.—How dangerous to occupy an office which we abuse! —Brentius: The wicked are, by the righteous judgment of God, ensnared in the work of their own hands.—He who maliciously opposes the truth, falls from one lie to another.—Hypocrites hold the truth in unrighteousness, Rom. i. 18.

Osiander: They who do not yield to truth, but are only inclined to slander, are not worth disputing with.—Hedinger: God makes use of many means and many people to convert mankind.—Quesnel: Much as the world may dislike to hear of the punishment of the ungodly, it will surely come, and be all the more terrible.—It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.—Brentius: Truth indeed entails hatred, but has the protection of God.—Heubner: The world is not so much opposed to the abstract truth, as to its concrete witnesses.—The judgments of God always increase in severity.—The Jewish nation, a monument of divine goodness and human ingratitude.—Christ and His enemies, 1. typified in the Old, 2. fulfilled in the New Testament.—Eylert: The goodness, forbearance, and severity of God, in His dealings with the unthankful and disobedient.—Zimmermann: God and Israel.—Lisco: The relation in which sin and error stand to each other.—Arndt, Predigten über die Gleichnisse, 1842, i. p. 117: The history of Israel, an epitome of the history of mankind.—Al. Schweizer, Predigten 4 Samuel, 1851: The rebellious tenants considered, 1. in their evil dealings, 2. in the judgment to which they are condemned.

—W. Hofacker: The ordinances of God's kingdom in the Old Testament, an encouraging type for the children of the New Testament. We stand, 1. upon the ground of rich and divine blessings, 2. upon a scene of perversion and delusion, 3. before the judgment-seat of impartial justice and holiness.

2. Disputes with the Pharisees and Herodians concerning the Tribute-money. (VERS. 20–26.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxii. 15–22; Mark xii. 13–17.

20 And they watched Him, and sent forth spies, which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of His words, that so they might deliver Him unto the power and authority of the governor. 21 And they asked Him, saying, Master, we know that Thou sayest and teachest rightly, neither acceptest Thou the person of any, but teachest the way of God truly; 22 Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar, or no? 23 But He perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, Why tempt ye Me? 24 Show Me a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? They answered and said, Cæsar's. 25 And He said unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's, and unto God the things which be God's. 26 And they could not take hold of His words before the people: and they marvelled at His answer, and held their peace.

Ver. 22. According to the highly probable reading of Tischendorf, ἔξεστιν ἡμᾶς, instead of the ἡμῖν of the Receptus.

Ver. 23. In B.L., cursive manuscripts, these words are omitted. Perhaps they have been inserted from the parallel passage, Matt. xxii. 18.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And they watched Him.—After the defeat they had experienced, nothing was more natural, than that the Pharisees should look about them both for other allies and other weapons. Since they had hitherto failed to prevail by authority, they had now recourse to stratagem; and the old combatants for the law, having been driven from the field, conquered and confounded, it was chiefly new recruits who were despatched to occupy their places. After what had occurred, the Pharisees themselves remained on the look out (παρατηρήσαντες), and sent the Herodians to Jesus (see Lange on Matt. xxii. 15), with their disciples (Matt. xxii. 16). We have already met with a similar temporary coalition of heterogeneous forces (Mark ii. 18), and shall afterwards find the same carried to a greater extent. It is easy to conceive that two enemies would suspend their mutual hatred for a time, for the sake of opposing a third who was dangerous to both. The change of weapons, too, is as easily accounted for. After the public overthrow they had suffered, they would continue the warfare in a more concealed manner, which, while it would render a fresh repulse less disgraceful, would not be less conducive to the victory they so ardently desired. They therefore selected messengers who were to assume the appearance of strict keepers of the law, bringing before Him a case of conscience on their own account, and by no means prompted by others; they were also to endeavour to gain their end by flattering words.

2. That so they might deliver Him to the power and authority of the governor, etc.—This mention of their design is peculiar to Luke, and also highly probable on internal grounds. They were desirous of going to such lengths as would enlist the civil authority on their side, in their desire to get rid of this man, against whom the ecclesiastical authorities had vainly striven. They confidently reckoned upon this support in case He should give, as they supposed He would, a negative answer, in order to please the people, with whom He now seemed to be making common cause, in opposition to the authorities (ver. 9). If, however, He should, on the contrary, take the side of the foreign oppressor, He would lose the favour of the people. After mature deliberation, then, they came forward transformed, like Satan himself, into angels of light.

3. Master, we know, etc.—There is something naïve, and at the same time corroborative of the incurable self-sufficiency of the pharisaic party, in the fact that, even after the elders of the people had just been forced (ver. 7) to a public acknowledgment of their ignorance, they should begin with the customary "We know." The aim of this eulogy was comprehensible enough. We believe we have found in Thee—they would say—an independent man, from whose point of view we may expect an impartial answer to our inquiry. They seem not to have the slightest idea that they could scarcely utter a sharper satire on themselves, than this eulogy upon the Lord. The inquiry whether, and how far, they themselves really believed the favourable testimony which they here publicly gave to the Lord, can only be answered conjecturally.—Neither acceptest Thou the person (the countenance), οὐ λαμβάνεις πρόσωπον, comp. Gal. ii. 6: a stronger expression than the οὐ βλέπεις εἰς πρόσωπον of the parallel passages, and a term denoting judicial impartiality.

4. Is it lawful.—See the emphatic and more categorical form of this question in Mark. Luke makes use of the Greek expression φόρον δοῦναι, while the others employ the Latin term κῆνσον: "used to distinguish between the poll and land taxes, and τέλος, the indirect tax (upon goods)." Meyer. The inquiry was one of peculiar difficulty. It seemed forbidden by Deut. xvii. 15, that a foreigner should govern Israel, as was now the case. The malcontents, with Judas of Galilee at their head, who insisted on the imposition of no other taxes than that for the temple service, had thus the letter of Scripture on their side. If Jesus, however, should declare their principle correct, He would be opposing that order of things which had been brought about by higher intervention, and bringing Himself into collision with the temporal power of the governor.

5. But He perceived their craftiness, κατανοήσας.—Matthew uses the stronger expression γνούς, and Mark εἰδώς, enhancing the directness of His knowledge, which was by no means the result of long and deliberate reflection. It was not for the purpose of gaining time that He desired a penny should be shown Him. The question, Whose image and superscription hath it? really decided the matter. A collection of rabbinical sayings, explicative of the immutable principle, "He whose coin is the currency is the lord of the land," may be found in Wetstein and Lightfoot, on this passage.

6. Render therefore.—The wisdom of our Lord's answer will not be fully appreciated till we observe the premise which the inquiry tacitly supposes. The "absurd question," as the Wandsbeeker Bote not unjustly calls it, could not have arisen in their hearts, unless they had previously laid down the principle, that this civil transaction militated against a higher religious duty. The Lord resolves this opposition into a higher unity, and separates the political from the religious, where these two spheres encroach upon each other. By their use of the coins of Cæsar—the official title of the Emperor, not the individual name Tiberius is employed, because it was a principle, and not a person, which was here in question—they showed that they considered themselves his subjects, and would thus be inconsistent with themselves if they should now refuse to fulfil the civil duties. Without expressing the slightest predilection for the Roman government, the Lord was yet too well acquainted with the condition and prospects of the Jewish nation, not to esteem any outward effort for the recovery of civil freedom —which, as such, would at that time have proceeded not from theocratic, but from merely worldly motives—as prejudicial and superfluous. But He, at the same time, refuted the opinion, that such obedience was in conflict with their religious duties. The denarius was never collected as a temple tax; hence they might also still continue the payment of the shekel of the sanctuary. The summa cuique applies here, in the higher sense of the words; and they had only to see that they fulfilled their twofold obligations with equal conscientiousness. The excellence of the Lord's answer consists in His showing, 1. that the alternative proposed was quite inadmissible in the present state of affairs; 2. that they who had appeared before Him with the assumption of knowing, were condemned before the tribunal of their own conscience, which must plainly tell them that they did not duly obey either the one or the other part of its twofold requirements; and 3. finally, by His laying down a principle for all future ages, by which, on the one hand, the independence, and, on the other, the social and practical tendency of religion were abundantly secured.

7. And they could not take hold of His words.—All the synoptical Evangelists speak of the astonishment of the inquirers, which must, therefore, have been very visibly manifested. Luke especially notes the completeness of their overthrow, by stating that οὐκ ἴσχυσαν ἐπιλαβέσθαι αὐτοῦ ῥήματος ἐναντίον τοῦ λαοῦ. This hint shows how critical was the present juncture, with respect to the views entertained of Jesus by the people, if He had not succeeded in escaping from the snares laid for Him. 'Εσίγησαν. Not only these speakers, but, in and with them, the Pharisees, who now ventured upon no more attacks, but stood by in silence, for a moment, before their departure.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the remarks on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

2. The principle laid down by the Lord, on this occasion, does not militate against the manner in which He formerly expressed Himself to Peter, concerning the tribute-money, Matt. xvii. 24–27. The former was an ecclesiastical, the present a civil impost: here, He is confirming the rule which subjects have to observe toward the temporal authority; there, defending the liberty which the Son might claim with regard to the house of His Father.

3. The answer of the text has encountered, on the one hand (e.g., Gfrörer and others), no small amount of opposition, and been greeted, on the other (e.g., by the Wandsbeeker Bote), with the warmest praise. "What meaning there is in everything that proceeds from His mouth! It is like those nests of boxes, in which we always find one within another," etc. That this praise is not exaggerated, is evident, when we reflect that the Lord here says not a word too much, and, at the same time, not a word too little; and consider how excellently His answer was calculated, not only to extricate Himself from all difficulty and perplexity, but also to turn the shaft which His enemies had aimed at Him against their own consciences. If they had always rendered to God the things that were His, they would not now have had to pay tribute to a foreign ruler; so that, even supposing there had been here a conflict of opposing duties, this would have arisen from their own faults. If they truly gave to Cæsar what was his—τὰ τοῦ Καίσ. signifies first the coin, but also, latiori sensu, civil fidelity and submission, which were, so to speak, concentrated in the tribute-money—they would not have so ardently desired to throw off the imperial yoke, nor to make common cause with its enemies. Thus does the Lord co-ordinate and subordinate the different duties which were, in their opinion, irreconcilable.

4. "Unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's."—The fulfilment of the actually incurred civil obligation was partly allowed, partly commanded, and partly restrained within sacred limits, by the Lord's answer. He plainly shows that it was not within His province arbitrarily to interfere with social arrangements (comp. ch. xii. 14); that the fear of God entailed the honouring of the power ordained by Him; that the obedience due to the temporal ruler might only be refused in one case, viz., when it was decidedly opposed to the demands of the heavenly King. The principle here laid down is carried out entirely in the Lord's spirit, Acts iv. 20, v. 29; Rom. xiii. 1–7; 1 Pet. ii. 13, and elsewhere. Compare also the writings of the earliest apologists, and Calvin's preface to his Institutio, etc. The divine right of the temporal authority is as definitely asserted, as freedom of conscience is defended by the Lord and His first witnesses; and neither political despotism, nor radicalism and the morbid desire of revolution, find any support from His words. The independence both of Church and State, within the spheres pointed out to each, is secured by the principle here expressed; and every attempt prematurely to absorb the one in the other, condemned, as being in opposition to the spirit of the Gospel.

5. And unto God the things which be God's.—A universal rule, of which the former injunction is only a particular application. To Cæsar, that which is his, so far as it is required; but to God, thyself, since thou wast made in His image. It is not till we perceive that this was the idea the Lord had in view, that we learn to appreciate the depth and beauty of His answer. The soul of man is, in His view, a coin, which originally bore God's image and superscription (regeneration cannot be here intended), and which, for this reason, belongs entirely to its heavenly Proprietor. Hence, the Lord here demands not merely repentance, but also faith, obedience, unreserved submission and fidelity to God: comp. Prov. xxiii. 26. He who understands this demand, will, even for God's and for conscience' sake, render also to Cæsar that which is his, and be truly free, to whatever earthly master he may owe service and obedience. The τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ τῷ Θεῷ may be called a short summary of the laws of the first table, and thus be regarded as a fresh proof how the Son, to the last, and on every opportunity, sought not His own, but His Father's glory.

6. Quesnel: The image of the sovereign, impressed upon the coin, denotes that temporal things belong to their own sphere; the image of God, impressed upon our souls, that our hearts belong to Him.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The conflict between error and truth; the triumph of truth over error.—The unnatural coalition of ecclesiastical or political parties, which are essentially opposed.—Craft as powerless as force, with respect to the Lord.—The end sanctifies the means, a rule not first discovered by Ignatius Loyola.—Even His enemies are obliged to announce the Lord's praise.—The ideal of a teacher, as represented by the Pharisees, should be cherished by every servant of the Lord: 1. He teaches the way of God in truth; 2. he regards not the person of men; 3 he is true in himself, and without caring for any one.—The masters in Israel, not the only people who remain far behind their own ideal.—What is allowable in every sphere, must be settled by the Lord Jesus.—The inmost recesses of the deceitful heart, naked and open to the eyes of the Almighty, Jer. xvii. 10, 11.—Render unto Cæsar, etc.: the fundamental law of the kingdom of God; determining, 1. on one hand, the relation of the Christian to the world; 2. on the other, his vocation for heaven.—Our responsibilities towards God, the natural consequence of our relation to God.—Render to God the things that are God's; 1. a simple, but comprehensive, 2. a natural, but needful, 3. a difficult, but blessed injunction.—How many are put to shame and condemned by this saying of the Lord: 1. There are some who render his due neither to Cæsar nor to God; 2. some to Cæsar, and not to God; 3. some to God, and not to Cæsar; 4. some to both God and Cæsar, but either too weakly, too late, or too little.—How the impotence of sin is repeatedly manifested.—His enemies refused willing tribute to Messiah, and, therefore, most justly had to pay a forced tribute to Cæsar.

Starcke: When an ungodly man represents himself as pious, he is worse than wicked.—Bibl. Wurt.: The ungodly are always tormenting themselves.—Brentius: To be able to feign and mimic, is a restless evil; the godly perceives and abhors it.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Even the ungodly may speak the truth, and God may use them as instruments of His glory.—The children of the devil are very like their father.—Let us take time in all things, and answer after due consideration.—It is an uncommon proof of wisdom, to confute the enemies of truth by their own words.—Luther: Fear God; Honour the king: two principles of the Christian religion indissolubly united.—Hedinger: To every one his due: to God, obedience; to our neighbour, love; to the authorities, honour; to the devil, sin (? resistance).—The spiritual and temporal powers must neither abolish nor distrust one another.—Brentius: Divine truth imposes eternal silence on all sophistry.—Heubner: The true Christian ought to be above political partisanship.—The truly pious inspire even their enemies with respect.—The pious are not stupid. —The best Christian, the best subject.—Fuchs: Render to God the things that are God's: 1. a penitent, 2. believing, 3. patient, 4. obedient heart.—Couard: The avowal of His enemies, that Christ teaches the way of God in truth, obliges us, 1. faithfully to receive His instruction, 2. willingly to follow it, 3. to labour with joyful courage for His doctrine.—Westermeyer: The truth of the Lord gains the victory.

On the paragraph.—Ahlfeld: The cunning of the world, shattered by the simplicity of the humble Christian.—Gabler: What will be our best defence against the falsehood of the world?—Stier: Why, and how, we ought, as Christians, to be subject to every temporal power.—Seubert: The true Christian also the freest citizen.—Steinmeyer: In all doubtful cases, only say, Show me the coin! Consider narrowly whose image and superscription it bears, and then give to every one his due. If you hesitate, on the Lord's day, whether you shall employ it in worldly business or in joining in the worship of God, only look at the coin: the image and superscription of this day is God's. He has hallowed it; therefore we must give Him what is His, etc.—Arndt, Predigten über das Leben Jesu iv. p. 223: The repulse of the Pharisees: 1. The abundant intelligence, 2. the far-reaching application of the Lord's ingenious answer.—By this precept, to give to every one, not what we please, but what is due, the power of selfishness, which caused the attack and coalition of the Pharisees and Herodians, is broken.—By this principle, the Lord appeals to the natural feeling of justice, existing even in fallen man.

3. Dispute with the Sadducees concerning the Resurrection. (Vers. 27–40.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxii. 23–33; Mark xii. 18–27.

27 Then came to Him certain of the Sadducees, which deny that there is any resurrection; and they asked Him, 28 Saying, Master, Moses wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, having a wife, and he die without children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. 29 There were therefore seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and died without children. 30 And the second took her to wife, and he died childless. 31 And the third took her; and in like manner the seven also: and they left no children, and died. 32 Last of all the woman died also. 33 Therefore in the resurrection whose wife of them is she? for seven had her to wife. 34 And Jesus answering, said unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage: 35 But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: 36 Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. 37 Now, that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. 38 For He is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto Him. 39 Then certain of the scribes answering, said, Master, Thou hast well said. 40 And after that they durst not ask Him any question at all.

Vers. 30 and 31. According to the reading of B.L. 157: "And the second, and the third took her, and in like manner the seven also; and they left no children, and died." The greater detail of the Receptus seems to have been derived from ancient glosses, and from a desire of completeness. See further in Tischendorf.

Ver. 32. At last, ὕστερον, according to Tischendorf. The Receptus is from Matthew.

Ver. 33. The most accurate construction seems to be that of B.L.: ἡ γυνὴ οὖν ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσ. κ.τ.λ.

Ver. 34. The ἀποκριθείς of the Receptus is only an addition from the parallel passage.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Then came to Him, etc.—The attempt to ensnare the Lord, in the case of conflicting religious and political obligations, having entirely failed, an attempt was now made, within another but not less dangerous department, to entangle Him in the conflict between the purely sensuous and strictly religious views of the world. In none of the synoptical Gospels do we read that the Sadducees brought forward their well-known question, tempting Him; on which account, it is, perhaps, not imperatively necessary to conclude that they really proposed it for the purpose of bringing the Lord into personal trouble, however He might answer it. But they certainly designed, under the conviction that He, in common with the Pharisees, believed in the resurrection of the dead, to expose the absurdity of this doctrine, and consequently of His teaching; and, in case they should succeed in extorting from Him a word contrary to this hope, they would have regarded and used it as an advantage gained over their pharisaic adversaries, and one by no means to be despised. Perhaps, too, the attitude He had assumed with regard to the Pharisees, induced them to ascertain whether He, who had expressed Himself in so anti-Pharisaic a manner, were also equally opposed to Sadducean opinions.

2. Sadducees.—Rightly to judge of their behaviour, and to appreciate Christ's treatment of them, we must remark, first, that when they speak of the resurrection, they mean not merely the immortality of the soul after death, but also the revivification of the body, which the popular belief expected at the παρουσία of the Messiah. They do not imagine the seven brothers as successively raised after death, but as rising contemporaneously with the woman, who died after them all, ἐν ἐσχάτῃ ἡμέρᾳ; and cannot think to which she will now unite herself. Secondly, that they knew this doctrine only in the disguised and coarse form in which the pride and sensuality of the times had clothed it; and that, together with this form, they rejected also the truth upon which it was founded. The case supposed had been often employed by them, or by kindred spirits, to expose the absurdity of this article of the popular faith. Finally, that they had hitherto less publicly and maliciously opposed the Lord than the Pharisees, on which account He treated them less severely than the latter. As light-minded worldlings, they had also, till now, felt themselves less annoyed and offended than the proud Pharisees. Before the end of His life, however, it was necessary that it should be made manifest, as was done in this conversation, that the King of heaven abhorred and opposed unbelief and worldliness, no less than the hypocrisy of the Pharisees.

3. Moses wrote unto us, etc. See Deut. xxv. 5–10.—"Thus do they begin, and endeavour to prove (though they afterwards, with an almost ironical smile, affect only to propose a question), that Moses could not possibly, in this or in any of his laws, have taken the resurrection for granted." Stier. By a demonstration of the absurdity of belief, they would offer an indirect defence of their own unbelief. As the whole point of the supposed case depends on the fact of no children being left, we need not be surprised that this is repeated, ver. 31, before ἀπέθανον.

4. And Jesus said.—That the Lord should deign to give any answer to a question so absurd, and proposed with so equivocal a design, may be considered a proof of His condescending kindness; but the matter and manner of His words are also a striking manifestation of His love and wisdom. On this occasion He answers, not, as on the former, by pronouncing a decision, but by copious argument. Matthew reports his answer simply and definitely. Mark gives a more vivid and dramatic representation (comp., e.g., Mark xii. 24 with Matt. xxii. 29). Luke gives a freer version, and has some singularia of extreme importance: vers. 34–36, comp. with Matt. xxii. 30; Mark xii. 25. On the other hand, however, he passes over the beautiful commencement of the Lord's speech, in which Jesus discloses the twofold source of their blameworthy error.

5. The children of this world.—Not with reference to the moral character of the men here described (De Wette), as in ch. xvi. 8, but denoting generally all who lived in the pre-Messianic ages.—Marry, and are given in marriage: not mentioned here, as in ch. xvii. 17, as a proof of their carelessness and worldliness, but as a consequence of their present condition, which, however, is to cease at the commencement of the new era. Καταξιωθέντες, they who shall be esteemed worthy to inherit the future world (comp. 2 Thess. i. 5), are those possessed of the moral qualifications for the attainment of future happiness.—To obtain that world (æon). The Messianic αἰών is represented as coincident with the resurrection of the just, ch. xvi. 14, which is here exclusively spoken of. It is a privilege which shall not be shared by all, but only by the ἐκλεκτοῖς; while nothing further is here said of those who shall not have died, but shall be found alive at the παρουσία. Of those, however, who shall share this highest privilege, and be raised to a new life, the Lord here declares that they will then, neither marry nor be given in marriage; in other words, that the whole inquiry of these Sadducees rests upon an erroneous conception of the future life.

Marriage is here simply represented, according to the proposed case, as the summary of all sexual and sensual relations; and the same truth is taught as by St Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 50.

6. Neither can they die any more.—A reason why there shall be no more need of marriage or propagation: death shall then have ceased to rule, and shall then become even a physical impossibility, while now it may be called a law of nature.—They are equal to the angels, ἰσάγγελοι; in Matthew and Mark, ὡς ἄγγελοι οἱ ἐν τοῖς οὐραν. With masterly tact does the Lord here defend, by the way, the belief in the existence of angels as personal beings (Acts xxiii. 8), against the Sadducees. At the same time, it is manifest that the holy angels are beyond not only the danger, but the possibility of death. Finally, they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. This last particular leads to the notion of divine sonship, not in a moral (as Matt. v. 9), but in a physical sense (as Luke iii. 38). God is the source of the new life communicated to them; and they may, on this account, be termed His children; while other children, and consequently marriage, will then be out of the question. So purely spiritual a representation of the resurrection was, at the same time, opposed to the notions of the Pharisees, who loved to indulge in dreams of repasts in the bosoms of their ancestors. "Jesus teaches that both the pharisaic and sadducean parties were in error, and had neither comprehended the higher sense of Scripture, nor formed a just conception of God." V. Ammon, Leben Jesu iii. p. 216.

7. Now, that the dead are raised.—So firmly rooted is this hope, in our Lord's view, that He speaks not in futuro, but in præsenti; which latter mode of expression cannot justify us in supposing, that He taught a resurrection occurring immediately after death.

8. Even Moses showed.—"Note the choice of ἐμήνυσεν, denoting the announcement of something secret. Καὶ Μωϋσῆς. Even Moses, to whom you have just appealed in support of the contrary doctrine." Meyer. Concerning the question, how far this appeal of the Lord to the Pentateuch is a proof that the Sadducees recognised the canonicity of only this part of the Old Testament; and on the demonstrative force of the argument for personal immortality, here used by the Lord, see Stier in loco. If nothing had been perceived on this occasion but dialectic skill and rabbinical hermeneutics, the Lord's answer would not surely have produced so deep and so powerful an impression. It is true that by the words, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, is primarily intended—The God who was the protector of these men during their lifetime; and it would not necessarily follow that this protection was to last for centuries after. But the God of providence was also the God of the covenant: by the institution of the covenant a personal communion between the creature and the Creator had taken place; and as He thereby called Himself their God, He therewith assured them of the enjoyment of His favour and communion. And was this enjoyment to be limited to the present life? Was a being who had lived in communion with God, soon to become nothing more than a handful of dust and ashes? Would it not be a reproach to God to be called, a few centuries after their decease, The God of decayed corpses? Impossible! In such a case He would have said, I was the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. "God enters into covenant with men as a personal God, and calls Himself after them; they must therefore be immortal, because they are the covenant children of the eternal God."

9. For all live unto Him.—Luke adds this one word of explanation, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living," which he has in common with Matthew and Mark: a sublime expression, especially if we do not limit the πάντες to the νεκροί, but refer it to all the creatures of God, whom we usually distinguish into living and dead. This distinction is entirely abolished in the divine view; to Him, αὐτῷ, all are living, whether they have breathed their last breath or not. A proof also that the death of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was no obstacle to God being still called their God. The visible world of men and the invisible world of spirits are both present to the eye of God as one community of living beings. The Lord says nothing more definite on this occasion, of the connection between the uninterrupted life of the soul after death, and the future resurrection of the body.

10. Then certain of the scribes.—Perhaps some of these were also Sadducees who thus expressed a better feeling. It is, however, more probable that this refers to Pharisees who had not, as yet, left the scene, and who certainly could never be more disposed to forget the overthrow they had just suffered, and freely and openly to accord praise to the Lord, than now, when He had publicly humbled their mortal enemies. Luke emphatically points out to us (ver. 20) how this extorted praise took the place of further questions, which no one henceforth ventured to propose to Him. In order not to be entirely inactive, they paid homage to the victor, whom they no longer dared to challenge as an enemy. From Matt. xxii. 34–40, and Mark xii.

28–34, it is, however, manifest that, after the answer to the Pharisees, one of the scribes came forward with an inquiry respecting the chief commandment. See Lange on the passage.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the remarks on the parallel passages in Matt. and Mark.

2. To do full justice to the proof adduced by the Lord, in favour of the resurrection, we must recognise that it turns not on the ab stract grammatical meaning (significatio) of the words, independently considered, but upon the full sense (sensus) of the whole expression; and that the Lord does not assert that in this dictum the resurrection is taught, but only that it silently takes it for granted. By a legitimate conclusion, He deduces the hope of everlasting life from a saying in which, without this hint, it would certainly never have been discovered. What He finds in it is scarcely anything more than the germ of the belief which they came forward to ridicule; but a germ which, to His penetrating and heavenly glance, it necessarily and perfectly contained. He thus shows how the very oldest records contained expressions which, when duly considered, would necessarily lead to a belief in immortality, though He does not thereby say that He could not have adduced still stronger proofs, from the Psalms and the prophets. It is not surprising that modern Rabbis should also have frequently repeated, in various forms, the proof here adduced by Jesus, and have thereby furnished indirect corroboration of its utility. See Schöttgen, Horæ Hebr. in loco. The unique manner in which the Lord here supports the doctrine of the resurrection, particularly deserves our attention. Far from occupying the standing-point usually occupied by philosophers, who are wont to take their notions of immortality from the nature of the human soul, and consequently to prove what is doubtful by what is unknown, He finds the firmest ground for the hope of everlasting life in the personal communion of man with God. He thus, however, indirectly gives us to understand that we cannot attain full persuasion of our own immortality till we have the assurance and consciousness of individual communion with God. The hidden reason of their scepticism was thus pointed out to the Sadducees, as being none other than the alienation of their inner life from Him; while the true foundation of hope for the future, and the only way to perfect certainty, was, at the same time, shown them. Religious philosophers and apologists of ancient and modern times would certainly have lost nothing if they had more closely imitated this example, and had not attempted to demonstrate the immortality of the soul to those even who did not believe in the living God, and had not the slightest notion of personal communion with Him. The deepest experience of our own heart teaches us that, without these premises, a belief in immortality is partly uncertain, partly uninfluential; and that, as long as we have not found God, we have really lost even ourselves. Believers, under the Old, and even under the New Testament, have all walked in this way; and not till after they were assured of the favour and presence of God, have they felt sure of eternal life. See Ps. xvi. 10, 11, lxxiii. 25, 26, lxxxiv. 12; Rom. viii. 38, 39. But this foundation within, on which this divine hope is built, is also utterly immoveable, so long, at least, as a single nerve of the inner religious life remains undestroyed.

4. The inquiry whether, and how far, the immortality of the soul is taught in the Old Testament, is sufficiently answered by this saying of Christ. Certainly this doctrine is not presented in the Old Testament in a developed form, as a dogma which can be proved from a number of loci classici. A reference to the rewards and punishments of a future life would have been rather an obstructive and heterogeneous, than a desirable element in the Mosaic dispensation. It was by the Gospel, and not by the law, that light and immortality were to be brought to light: 2 Tim. i. 10. The immortality of the soul was therefore no such dogma of the Old Testament as was, for instance, the unity of the Godhead: comp. Hävernick, Vorlesungen über die Theologie des A. T. pp. 105–111. This, however, does not exclude the conviction that it opened a wide field, and offered a firm foundation, for the individual hopes of believers. If any one were conscious that God was his God, he knew also that He would always remain so; and if any knew, by experience, what it was to hold communion with God, he might fall asleep in the stedfast hope of one day beholding His face in righteousness: Ps. xvii. 15. All things considered, it may be said that the hope of a Jacob, a David, an Asaph, and others, was as sure, though not as clear, as that of the saints of the New Testament. "We must further consider what kind of immortality is to be understood. The rationalistic doctrine of immortality is no better than a doctrine of Hades. Everything depends on our attaining a conception of life after death, not of mere existence. The latter has no religious interest at all."

5. The conception of God from which our Lord proceeds, viz., that God is no dead unity, but the living God, is not only the doctrine of the Old, but also of the New Testament, and the metaphysical foundation of the doctrine of the Trinity. A relation, similar to that existing between God and His creatures, exists also between the Lord and His people, since His life in them is the inmost reason of their imperishable life. See John xiv. 19.

6. From this instruction of the Lord, it appears that the Christian idea of angels is not only of æsthetic and ontologic, but also of practical importance. As the angels stand in personal relation to mankind (see ch. ii. 14, xv. 10), we shall also be called upon to share in their joy. And they who maintain that there are no such beings, make the prospect opened to them by the Lord, of being one day ἰσάγγελοι, a vain delusion.

7. The saying, that they who rise from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are equal to the angels, has often been cited as an indirect objection to the hypothesis of Kurz and others, on Gen. vi. 2. On the other hand, however, it must not be forgotten that the Lord speaks indeed of what the angels do not do, but not of what they never could have done, and that the present purely spiritual life of the angels may have been preceded by a fall of some of their number.

8. An indirect depreciation of marriage has often been unjustly inferred from what the Lord here says of marrying and giving in marriage. In opposition to such a view, however, the history of celibacy affords proofs of what results may be expected to public and individual morality from an anticipation of the state here depicted. "Grace and the Holy Spirit do not abolish natural inclinations, nor cause their decay, as the monks dreamed; but where nature is disordered, the Holy Spirit heals, raises, and restores her to her proper state." Luther. It may be indirectly inferred, from the Mosaic levirate marriages, that second marriages cannot possibly be looked upon as immoral. This teaching, however, contains an earnest warning against those marriages by which no higher union than a merely sensual one is formed. The redeemed will meet each other again not as man and wife, but as ἰσάγγελοι; and that alone is eternal, in married love, which is spiritual in its foundation. It is from this point of view that we can understand the advice of the Apostle, 1 Cor. vii. 29–31.

9. Our Lord's example gives an important hint to apologists, how best to defend revealed truth against the Sadducees of our days; viz., by planting themselves on the immoveable foundation of Holy Scripture; by showing that the incomplete form in which truth is presented, does not justify its rejection as absurd; and by exposing those inner reasons of ignorance, which are concealed beneath the shield of much so-called and highly extolled learning. In this way, even the most simple Christian may have a right to say to the apostles of unbelief, πολὺ πλανᾶσθε!

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The leaven of the Sadducees, no less pernicious than the leaven of the Pharisees, Matt. xvi. 16.—The difference and resemblance between the Jewish Sadducees and the heathen Epicureans.—The denial of the resurrection in its various forms: 1. Complete materialism, 1 Cor. xv. 32; 2. partial spiritualism, 2 Tim. ii. 18.—The authority of the law, even over those who view it from a sceptical point of view.—The eternal germ within the temporal form of the levirate law.—Childless marriage.—Long and repeated widowhood.—The danger of too-sensuous an idea of the future life.—The future life, 1. a continuation of, 2. but also a contrast to the present life.—Marriage is honourable in all, Heb. xiii. 4.—The highest inheritance: 1. Wherein it consists; 2. who are worthy of it.—No other marriage in heaven than the marriage of the Lamb, Rev. xix. 7.—Propagation and mortality in their indissoluble connection.—In what respect the happiness of the redeemed may surpass that of the angels. Angels are, 1. entirely spiritual, 2. perfectly pure, 3. immortal, 4. and very happy beings.—The Son of God made a little lower than the angels, that He might make His redeemed ones equal to the angels.—The children of the resurrection, brothers to the inhabitants of heaven.—The resurrection of the dead, a mystery first disclosed by Moses.—The burning bush itself, a proof that the omnipotence of God can preserve and renew that which is destroyed by nature.—The happiness of a soul to whom the Lord has said, I am thy God.—The covenant faithfulness of God, the highest pledge of the eternal life of His people.—God, the God of the living: 1. The majesty which He displays as such; 2. the happiness He imparts as such; 3. the glory He must receive as such.—The absolute opposition between life and death, a natural result of our limited notions of the universe.—Death has no reality in God's view.—The great gulf between the stand-point of the Sadducees, and that of the Lord: they see nothing but death, He sees nothing but life.—The involuntary homage which even enmity to our Lord's divine pre-eminence brought forth.—He who is silenced, is by no means thereby won over to the truth.

Starcke, Cramer: The word of God is to many a savour of death unto death, 2 Cor. ii. 16.—Brentius: The successors of the Pharisees and Sadducees have, at all times, done much hurt to Christianity, and still worse must be expected in the last days, 2 Tim. iii. 1.—The devil, a special enemy to matrimony.—Bibl. Würt.: Human reason seeks for inconsistencies in religious matters, in order to overthrow thereby the truth of the divine word.—Let us be content with what Christ has revealed concerning the world to come.—Quesnel: The memory and the reward of the righteous cannot be lost.—When a man's ways please the Lord, He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.—The silence of opponents not always a sign of their conversion.

Heubner: Objections against the facts of Christ's life, are as absurd as this objection of the Sadducees.—The obscuring or restricting of the Scriptures always results in either religious anarchy or religious despotism.—Belief in angels penetrates the innermost and holiest relations of mankind.—It is very comprehensible why Scripture should, even here, reveal so much to us concerning the angels.—The conclusion of Christ no fallacy κατ' ἄνθρωπον, as the partisans of accommodation represent.—Arndt, Pred. L. J. p. 238, etc.: The repulse of the Sadducees: 1. The attack; 2. the defence; 3. the results.—W. Hofacker, Pred. p. 720: Christ dealing with the Sadducees of His and our days. Let us direct our attention, 1. to the Sadducees, 2. to the position taken up by the Lord with respect to them.—C. Palmer: God, not a God of the dead, but of the living: 1. Thereon depends the hope of eternal life for them whose God He is; 2. he who would have this hope must become spiritually alive.—Tholuck, for a funeral sermon: All the dead are alive before God. (Pred. ii. p. 264.)—Another in the Sechs Pred. über religiöse Zeitfragen, 1845 to 1846, p. 60: How can our belief in eternal life be made stedfast?—Dr B. ter Haar. Theo. Prof. of Utrecht: All live to Him: 1. They live; 2. they live to God; 3. they all live to Him, therefore, an imperishable, a holy and blessed, a common life.—Van Oosterzee: In heaven they are equal to the angels: 1. What will therefore cease? All that is opposed to angelic perfection. The Lord says the angels marry not, sin not, die not; we shall therefore cease to be, a. sensual, b. sinful, c. mortal beings. 2. What will remain? All that is consistent with angelic perfection: a. The angelic purity here striven after; b. the angelic love here cultivated; c. the angelic joy here tasted. 3. What will commence? What arises from angelic perfection:

a. Higher development, b. more perfect communion with, and c. more unlimited delight in God than the pious have enjoyed on earth.—To conclude: The importance of this instruction of the Lord, 1. for the light-minded Sadducees, 2. for the proud Pharisees, 3. for sincere though weak disciples at present.

4. Direct Conflict of Jesus with the Pharisees. (Vers. 41–47.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxii. 41–xxiii. 36; Mark xii. 35–40.

41 And He said unto them, How say they that Christ is David's son? 42 And David himself saith in the book of Psalms, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit Thou on My right hand, 43 Till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. 44 David therefore calleth Him Lord, how is He then his son? 45 Then, in the audience of all the people, He said unto His disciples, 46 Beware of the scribes, which desire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts; 47 Which devour widows' houses, and for a show make long prayers: the same shall receive greater damnation.

Ver. 45. The πρὸς αὐτούς, which Tischendorf prefers, has no other authority than Q.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He said unto them.—The contest between our Lord and His adversaries had now evidently arrived at a turning-point. Long enough had He been employed in answering their inquiries; He now took the initiative, lest the prolonged silence which He also had observed, should wear the appearance of perplexity. We learn from Matthew, that His question was directed collectively to the Pharisees then present (Matt. xxii. 46); from Mark (xii. 35), that He thus de facto answered all their former invectives against Himself; from Luke (comp. ver. 45), that the Lord treated the questionable point with the greatest possible publicity. He had already put His enemies to flight, He now turned to pursue them.

2. How say they.—Not in the sense of, How can they possibly say? but, In what sense is this name bestowed upon the Messiah? There is a difference between the question addressed (Matt. xvi. 13) to the disciples, and that which is here addressed to the Pharisees. There, the Lord was inquiring respecting their views of His own person; here, He speaks generally and objectively concerning the Christ, the object of their expectation. Luke, whose account is as condensed as possible, passes over the answer, The son of David, in order to make the second question, καὶ αὐτός, etc., immediately follow the first.

3. And David himself saith, etc.—That the Messiah was to be the son of David, was indeed the prevalent, though not the universal opinion (John vii. 27). It would, however, be a gross perversion of His meaning, to suppose that He intended, by this quotation from David, to confute this idea as indifferent or unfounded, and to declare that the Christ ought rather to be looked upon as David's Lord. No, He rather proceeded e concessis with His enemies: The Messiah is the son of David,—a homage whch He often accepted without contradiction. But He now proposed this enigma for their solution: How is it that David can, at the same time, be speaking of his Lord and of his son? With a truth which was universally recognised, He would connect a still higher one, as universally forgotten.

4. In the book of Psalms.—We miss in Luke the very important hint of Matthew and Mark, that David was speaking ἐν πνεύματι. Yet, even according to his report, the Lord distinguishes the hundred and tenth Psalm as both Messianic and Davidic. With regard to the latter circumstance, critical research need not be restrained by the form of the quotation: it was evidently not the Lord's primary intention to pronounce a critical judgment; while, at the same time, a modest criticism would not certainly venture to deny the Davidic authorship of this Psalm, except on very sufficient grounds. With regard, however, to the former point, we willingly acknowledge that it requires more daring than we possess, to dispute the Messianic interpretation of this Psalm, after so decisive a declaration. The inquiry, what idea its author himself connected with the shebl-limini, does not fall within the sphere of our inquiry. But that he was, in spirit, greeting the Messiah as his Lord, can be opposed by such theologians only as would, like the Jews, place their own authority above that of the Lord.

5. How is He then his son?—The question, how David could, in his son, and therefore his inferior, honour at the same time his Lord, and therefore his superior, is scarcely a question any longer to us Christians, who are initiated into the mystery of the divine nature of the Messiah. To the Jews, on the contrary—who were expecting a Messiah endowed indeed, with heavenly gifts and powers, and an earthly king, but the Son of God only in a theocratic, and not in a metaphysical sense—the matter was by no means so plain. It seems that the dead monotheism to which they had been given, especially since the captivity, had closed the eyes of the majority to the significant hints, occasionally given, even in the Old Testament, with respect to the superhuman origin and divine dignity of the Messiah. The Lord would therefore show them that their whole Christology was incomplete and inconsistent, so long as this integral element was wanting. He silences them by directing them to a sanctuary whose key they had lost. He would bring them to reflect upon a truth, which either they had never understood, or had treated as blasphemy. In this way He would cure them, once for all, of their carnal expectations, and at the same time show them that He was utterly resolved not to direct His proceedings according to their egotistical wishes. Even at the present day, the Jews are not in a position to give a satisfactory answer to the question proposed by the Great Master. Compare the Ebionite notion of the Messiah, as ψιλὸς ἄνθρωπος, and the Christologic confession attributed to Justin by the Jew Tryphon.

6. Then in the audience of all the people, etc.—Matthew (xxii. 46) and Mark (xii. 37) tell us of the impression made by this question of the Lord. Luke evidently hastens rapidly onward, relating but very briefly the detailed warning pronounced by the Lord, with respect to the scribes and Pharisees, before His departure from the temple: comp. Matt. xxiii. 1–36. In the few words which he does say of it, he faithfully follows Mark, having himself already reported (ch. xi. 37–54) many a terrible "woe unto you," in another connection.

On the historical accuracy of this arrangement, see vol. i. p. 400, etc. Meanwhile, thus much is certain from his compendious account, ch. xx. 41–47, viz., that the Lord, after having proposed to the Pharisees the question which, to this day, they are not clear about, turned from them for ever, to address Himself to the people who were more susceptible of instruction, and to warn them once more against these blind leaders. Luke mentions (ver. 45) more specially, that the Lord addressed these warnings to His disciples (not the Apostles exclusively, but the wider circle of His followers), yet coram populo.

7. Beware of the scribes.—The scribes here take precedence of the rest of the Pharisees as the worst corrupters of the people, and are described from life,—not, however, according to their inner nature, but according to their outward appearance. The Lord depicts their behaviour, 1. in social life—the self-complacence with which they go about in long robes (ἐν στολαῖς), by which the wide Tallith reaching to the feet is chiefly intended, the value they put upon greetings in the market-places, as well as upon ceremonious titles; 2. in the synagogues, where they aspire to the highest seats (πρωτοκαθεδρίας), which were appropriated according to office and privileges; 3. at home, where they transferred the struggle for the places of honour, from the synagogue to the festal board, and contended for the chief rooms; 4. in the department of philanthropy—they devoured widows' houses, and forbore to espouse their cause. Thus hypocrisy, pride, and covetousness, are the three chief features of which this picture is composed. The last reproach relates to the parasitical nature of their ostentatious piety: they sought to gain influence with widows and females of property by the length of their devotions. The kindly disposition of the weaker sex has ever been a subject of attention to world-loving religionists, and has as yet lost nothing of its attractive power.

8. Greater damnation.—This word affords indirect proof that the Lord, on this occasion, brought forth more than these few accusations against these corrupters of the nation. It was, however, more in accordance with the character of the Hellenistic and Pauline Gospel of St Luke, that it should speak less specially and copiously, than that of St Matthew, of the terrible judgment with which the Lord, as it were, cast off the dust from His feet at leaving the temple. The observation, made on St Mark's Gospel, is applicable to St Luke's also, that "the great castigatory sermon was partly incomprehensible, and partly too strong meat for young converts from heathenism."

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The last question which the Lord proposed to His enemies, was the first step, on His part, towards His irrevocable departure. He concluded the instruction He had bestowed upon them, by putting before them once more the great problem of His manhood and divinity. Any words which He addressed to them afterwards were no longer the utterances of a prophet to instruct them, but the sentences of their High Priest and King.

2. The inquiry with which Jesus departed from His enemies, affords convincing proof that, in true Christianity, everything depends on a right judgment concerning His adorable person. If notions of faith were really matters of secondary importance; and if the assertion of Rationalism, that it is not the Lord's person, but His teaching and example, which are of primary concern, were indeed well founded, He would scarcely have given Himself the trouble to excite the Pharisees to an inquiry which would, in this case, have been merely one of dry exegesis and abstract dogmatism.

3. It is evident that our Lord, on this occasion, finds direct Messianic prophecies in the book of Psalms; that He represents David as received into a region of the Spirit, in his visions of futurity; that He regards the prophetic Scriptures as inspired and infallible. So long as we view the Old Testament with His eyes, neither the nomistic over-valuing nor the gnostic contempt of the first and larger division of the Scriptures, has a prospect of finding much acceptance in His Church.

4. There was no book in which the Lord so lived, during the last week of His life, as in the book of Psalms. A hint which should not be lost upon Christians in times of suffering and conflict.

5. A palpable similarity exists between the sketch which the Lord here gives of the scribes and Pharisees, and clericalism, especially that of the Middle Ages. Ver. 47 naturally reminds us of the sums which the Church and the monastic orders obtained by the sale of masses for the departed, and by the unhappy influence of the confessional. Even the value set upon pompous garments and places of honour, the love of ceremonious titles, and the system of mutual idolatry and homage, were all revived, under different forms, and are not yet extinct. It would, however, betray a very short-sighted view, to find no traces of these errors except within the Church of Rome.

6. The tone with which the Lord leaves the temple is severe, but not too severe. We may even rather wonder that He said no more, than that He said so much. Neither must it be overlooked, that it is not the persons of His enemies, but their extremely pernicious principles which He opposes; that He by no means denies the existence of better-minded individuals among the scribes, but has in view more especially the spirit which prevailed among them; and that the salt of His words needed to be even more than usually pungent and penetrating if it were to be in any measure instrumental in averting corruption. And may we not add, that even on His own account the Lord would feel constrained to expose once more, in one terrible picture, all the wickedness of His enemies (Matt. xxiii.), that He might, with the more power and dignity, come forward to take that farewell of the temple which was so indescribably painful to Him?

7. Infinite is the difference between our Lord's first and last visits to the temple. Nevertheless, we must carefully observe that the child Jesus, who once astonished the masters of Israel by His questions, and silenced them by His answers, and the Messiah, who in this later period still came off a conqueror both in questions and answers, manifest, in fact, but one and the same character. His divine origin, then faintly shadowed forth, is now decidedly acknowledged.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

On His last visit to the temple, as well as at the marriage-feast of Cana, the Lord kept the best wine till last.—The mystery of the divinity and humanity of Christ, 1. revealed to David, 2. hidden from the Pharisees, 3. corroborated by Jesus, 4. brought to light for us.—The apparent discrepancies of Scripture can only be reconciled by Jesus.—Sit Thou on My right hand: 1. The power, 2. the justice, 3. the result of this saying.—The devil in the garb of a theologian.—The holy duty of calling evil by its right name; comp. Isa. v. 20.—Esse quam videri.—How hypocrisy infests, 1. social, 2. married, 3. ecclesiastical life.—The danger of an unspiritual formalism among the ministers of religion.—Sanctimoniousness, a sin always very severely punished.

Starcke: Let him whom the people are fond of hearing, take care to use the opportunity of doing them good.—Quesnel: Proud, ambitious, and covetous teachers are more dangerous than the greatest sinners among the multitude.—Hedinger: Pride, a sure sign of hypocrisy: if an angel were to come, and to be proud, he would be a devil, Ps. cxxxi. 1.—Widows may be easily misled and persuaded; they should, therefore, be upon their guard; but woe to him who misleads them! 2 Tim. iii. 6.—Brentius: It is a crime of crimes to deceive people under the appearance of piety, in order to deprive them of their property.—Heubner: Jesus here proposes, not a merely scholastic, but a vital question of the highest importance.—It is a serious duty to acquire clear views of Jesus.—Christ is Lord absolutely of the whole human race, and thus also David's Lord.—His rule is the holiest and happiest; Christocracy would be the best government for us.—Arndt, Pred. über das Leben Jesu iv. p. 251: "The most important article of faith in the Gospel. The Pharisees, by their answer, 'The son of David,' only said, in effect, that Christ was a man like other men, but of royal descent. It was but half the truth. They were like those of our own contemporaries, who indeed acknowledge Jesus to have been a distinguished, gifted, and virtuous individual, but yet esteem Him only a man like themselves. If Jesus had really been nothing more, He would have commended the answer of the Pharisees, and replied: Perhaps you are right; and I see that you are well acquainted with Moses and the prophets. But the Lord was by no means satisfied with their answer; He requires, when the Messiah is the subject, a deeper research into the declarations of Scripture and into the nature of His person. Must not therefore He, whom God called Lord even before He was born, be infinitely more than David's son, than a mere man?"—Palmer: There is, according to this question, but one truth for our belief; for a lively faith in God, in Providence, in immortality, etc., is impossible, without an acknowledgment of Christ.—Fuchs: What think ye of Christ? His name implies that He is, 1. the great Prophet, 2. the true High Priest, 3. the eternal King.—Otto: Christ, the son and Lord of David.—Moll: What think ye of Christ? whose son is He? 1. A vital question, forming the pivot of all moral teaching; 2. a question for conscience, penetrating to the roots of individual character; 3. a question of faith, which can only be solved by revelation.

C. Revelations of the Future, and Farewells to Friends. (CHAP. XXI.–XXII. 36.)

Departure from the Temple. Prophecy of the Destruction of Jerusalem, and the Final Consummation.

1. The Widow's Mite. (CHAP. XXI. 1–4.)

1 And He looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. 2 And He saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. 3 And He said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all. 4 For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had.

Ver. 1. A certain and poor widow. Καὶ must neither be expunged nor parenthesized (Tischendorf), but placed after τινα, as a further description of the woman.

Ver. 2. Probably an explanatory addition, wanting in the B.L.X. cursive manuscripts, Copt., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He looked up, ἀναβλέψας.—To obtain a just idea of the course of this short but charming narrative, we must connect the account of Mark with that of Luke. And, first, it is worthy of remark, that we find the Lord thus quietly seated in the temple (καθίσας, Mark), so soon after His terrible "Woe unto you" had been pronounced. He would avoid even the slightest appearance of having departed in irritation, or through fear of further attacks. The place where He is now found, opposite the treasury, is known to us from John viii. 20. The thirteen chests for offerings, marked with the different letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and standing open to receive contributions to various sacred and charitable purposes, concerning the distribution and regulation of which many interesting particulars have been collected by Lightfoot, Decas Chorograpt. in Marcum, cap. iii., are perhaps intended. It may be, however, that we are to understand this of the special treasury chest, spoken of by Josephus, Ant. Jud. 19, 6, 1; comp. 2 Kings xii. 9. Uncertain as this matter is, it is over-hasty to accuse the Evangelists of inaccuracy in their accounts of this occurrence, as is done, for instance, by De Wette.

2. A certain poor widow, τινα καὶ χήραν; see notes on the text. —Perhaps one of those whose tragic fate Jesus had just depicted, ch. xx. 47. We are not, however, therefore obliged to assert that He distinguished this widow thus honourably for the purpose of enhancing the contrast with the proud and unloving Pharisees. He had now done with the latter. The comparison was not drawn by Him, but arose in actual life.

3. Two mites, δύο λεπτά.—On their value, see the remarks on the parallel passage in Mark. It is a comparatively indifferent question (answered in the negative by Meyer), whether the rabbinical direction, nemo ponat λέπτον in cistam eleemosynarum, really applies here, and whether a less sum than two pence might therefore in no case be put into the γαζοφυλάκιον. It cannot, however, be proved that this direction applied to the δῶρα τοῦ Θεοῦ. In any case, necessity could know no law, and Bengel's remark, quorum unum vidua retinere poterat, is a true one.

4. Πλεῖον πάντων.—It is worthy of notice that the Lord neither blamed nor despised the gifts of the rich. Not another "Woe unto you, ye hypocrites," escaped Him; after what He had just said in the temple, He would utter no further censures. He only extolled the gift of the poor widow as far surpassing theirs. The rich had indeed, of their abundance, cast in εἰς τὰ δῶρα, i.e., not ad monumenta preciosa, ibi in perpetuum DEDICATA (Bengel), but ad dona, in thesauro asservata. The woman, on the contrary, had given of her poverty, ἅπαντα τὸν βίον ὃν εἶχε; comp. ch. viii. 43, xv. 12 (Mark has, more strongly and briefly, πάντα ὅσα εἶχεν). The value of her gift was not, therefore, to be computed according to its financial greatness, but by the amount of sacrifice therewith connected. We know not how the Lord became acquainted with this widow's poverty; perhaps it might have been generally known. There is, however, no reason why we should not refer this to the divine knowledge, which so thoroughly knew Nathanael and the Samaritan woman. He abundantly showed that He had observed her labour of love, and that He praised it because He knew the source whence it proceeded. He did not, indeed, directly compare the motives, but only the possessions of the various givers; but He would not certainly have set so high a value upon the trifling gift, if He had not, at the same time, estimated its moral worth. He would by no means have praised the widow, had she, like most of the Pharisees, brought her offering from unworthy motives. He would not now withhold His approbation, since, in His eyes, her heart was richer than her gift. He did not inquire whether this gift would be in vain; whether it were well to contribute to the treasury of the temple and to its abuse by such offerings; whether that service ought now to be supported by widows, which was, a few years later, to be destroyed by the sword of the enemy. He only regarded the motive, character, and purpose of her deed; and the poor woman, who had offered all in good faith, and had preserved her faith, obtained for her two mites a possession of imperishable honour.

5. A glance at certain isolated parallel expressions in the sphere of secular ethics, shows how the Lord's judgment concerning this widow finds an echo in every human heart. According to a Jewish legend (see Wetstein on Mark xii. 43), a high priest, who had despised a handful of meal which a poor woman had brought as an offering, is said to have received a revelation, directing him not to contemn this small gift, because the giver had at the same time offered her whole soul. According to Seneca de Benef. i. 8, the poor man Æschines, who, instead of a contribution in money, devoted himself to Socrates, offered to the latter a greater gift than the rich man Alcibiades, and others, when they bestowed their abundant offerings. An action similar to that of the poor widow is reported by Hoffmann, Mission Stunden 1, 5 Vorlesung.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The history of the widow's mites, recorded in this connection, gives an impression like that made by the cheerful sunbeam darting from a dark and stormy sky, or by a single rose in a hedge of thistles and thorns. The divine nature of our Lord is manifested by the fact that, at the very moment when the fate of Jerusalem, and with this the coming of the kingdom of God in the whole world, were so filling His mind, He could find an eye and a heart for so obscure and insignificant an individual, and feel inclined to adorn so lowly a head with its crown of honour. We need no other proof of the pure and heavenly frame of mind in which He left the accursed temple after such words of wrath. It is as though He could not thus depart, as though His last word, at least, must be one of blessing and peace; so that we scarcely know in which character most to admire the King of the heavenly kingdom, in this the hour of His departure from the temple, whether as the righteous requiter of hidden evil, or the gracious rewarder of hidden good.

2. Even in the judgment which He pronounces, the Son is the image of the invisible Father (comp. 1 Sam. xvi. 1–13). Men judge of the heart according to the deeds, the Lord judges the deed according to the heart. Therewith is also united the phenomenon, that sacred history very often records what profane history would consign to oblivion, and vice versâ. Heroic deeds and world-famed occurrences are passed over in silence; but not so the cup of cold water, the widow's mite, and Mary's box of ointment.

3. The history of the two mites is a fresh proof of the power of small things in the kingdom of God, and of the favour with which the Lord regards even the smallest offering which bears the stamp of a sancta simplicitas. Hence this text has always been justly considered an excellent one for missionary sermons, and many a contribution has the missionary treasury received from widows' mites, over which a "Be fruitful and multiply" has been pronounced.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Lord's last look upon His audience in the temple.—"The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all," Prov. xxii. 2.—The liberality of the rich and poor compared.—How one may be liberal without giving much, Acts iii. 6.—The true art of computation: 1. No sacrifice is too great for love; 2. in God's eyes, no sacrifice of love is too little.—The Lord's judgment, 1. different from the judgment of man, 2. better than the judgment of man.—How really little a rich man does, when he only gives.—The heart, the measure of the deeds.—The desire of making some sacrifice, inseparable from inward religious life, 2 Sam. xxiv. 24.—How the history of the poor widow teaches us, 1. circumspection in our judgment of others, 2. strictness in our judgment of ourselves, 3. watchfulness with regard to the approaching judgment of the Lord.

Starcke: The eyes of the Lord are upon His treasury; let those who preside over it take heed to their doings.—Canstein: It is a comfortable and happy reflection for the poor, that they can give more than the rich.—Cramer: As God is no respecter of persons, so is He no respecter of gifts and offerings, but of faith and simplicity of heart.—Let no one despise widows indeed; there are heroines of faith among them, 1 Tim. v. 3.—Heubner: Every gift ought to be a sacrifice.—What once happened too often, now happens too seldom.—Even small offerings are of importance: the Lord can give His blessing with them.—Religion enhances the value of all offerings.—Liberality, reverence, love to the temple, contempt of earthly things, and trust in God, the principal characteristics of the widow.—Carl Beck, Homil. Repertor. 1854, ii. p. 151: The heavenly Judge's standard for estimating our good works, a standard calculated, 1. to exalt the lowly, 2. to bring down the proud.—W. Hofacker: The observant and approving look of Jesus resting upon the widow's gift: 1. A look full of salutary power and consoling grace; 2. a look full of solemn inquiry for all.—Knapp: The standard by which our Lord and Saviour estimates the value of our gifts and works.—Kapff: The exercise of beneficent compassion.—N. Beets: The work of love, and its testimony.

2. The Mysteries of Futurity. (Vers. 5–36.)

Part I.—Vers. 5–24.

Parallel passages: Matt. xxiv. 1–21; Mark xiii. 1–19.

5 And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, He said, 6 As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 7 And they asked Him, saying, Master, but when shall these things be? and what sign will there be when these things shall come to pass? 8 And He said, Take heed that ye be not deceived: for many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ; and the time draweth near: go ye not therefore after them. 9 But when ye shall hear of wars and commotions, be not terrified: for these things must first come to pass; but the end is not by and by. 10 Then said He unto them, Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: 11 And great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven. 12 But before all these, they shall lay their hands on you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for My name's sake. 13 And it shall turn to you for a testimony. 14 Settle it therefore in your hearts, not to meditate before what ye shall answer: 15 For I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist. 16 And ye shall be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends; and some of you shall they cause to be put to death. 17 And ye shall be hated of all men for My name's sake. 18 But there shall not an hair of your head perish. 19 In your patience possess ye your souls. 20 And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. 21 Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. 22 For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. 23 But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck, in those days! for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. 24 And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.

Ver. 8. The οὖν of the Receptus to be omitted, with Lachmann and Tischendorf.

Ver. 11. According to the order of Tischendorf: σεισμοί τε μεγάλοι καὶ κατὰ τόπους λοιμοὶ, κ.τ.λ.

Ver. 15. Resist or gainsay.

Ver. 19. With Griesbach, Rinck, Lachmann, and Tischendorf, we prefer the reading of A.B., κτήσεσθε. See Critical Notes.

Ver. 23. Δέ must be omitted.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. The eschatological discourse with which our Lord, according to all the Synopticists, concluded His public teaching, has been rightly regarded, in all ages, as one of the chief cruces interpretum. It is far easier to raise a greater or less number of objections against every exposition hitherto offered, than to furnish an interpretation which shall be free from difficulties. The principal literature on the subject has already been mentioned in Lange on Matthew and Mark; to which may be added an interesting essay, by E. Scherer, on the prophecy of Jesus concerning The End, in his contributions to the Theol. Wissenschaften von Reuss und Cunitz, ii. pp. 63-83, Jena 1851. Comp. the critical commentary on the eschatological discourses, Matt. xxiv. and xxv., of C. J. Meyer, Frankfurt, A. D. O. 1857; and an exegetical discussion of H. Cremer on the eschatological discourses of Christ, Matt. xxiv. and xxv., Stuttg. 1860. Thus much may be premised, as now almost universally allowed, that the views of those who consider the destruction of Jerusalem to be exclusively intended (Michaelis, Bahrdt, Eckermann, Henke, and others), as well as of those who consider this event not even alluded to (Baur, Kan. Ev. p. 605), are utterly untenable. It is, therefore, certain that both the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world form the subjects of this discourse, and our only inquiry must be concerning the relative connection in which these two events stand in the prophetic statements of the text. For the solution of this enigma, it is of the last importance that we should rightly understand the questions addressed to Jesus by His disciples, and most accurately reported by Matthew in their original form. They first inquired when these things (ταῦτα) should take place; a question which, for psychological reasons, could refer to nothing else than the destruction of the city and temple, the foretelling of which by their Lord had but just now been so great a shock to their minds. They inquired, besides, concerning the signs of the Lord's coming, and of the end of the world, thereby contemplating, not two separate events, but only two aspects of one and the same occurrence. Mindful of the Lord's saying, Matt. xxiii. 37–39, they connected the fall of the temple, His παρουσία, and the conclusion of the present epoch (αἰών) of the world's history. As genuine Jews, they had hitherto imagined that the temple would always remain, and that Jerusalem would be the centre to which all nations would resort, in order to participate in the blessings of Messiah's government. The assertion of Ebrard, Ev. Krit. p. 611, that the Jews expected a violent conflict, and consequent destruction of the temple, in the times of the Messiah, is at least unproved: more light is thrown on the matter by De Wette on Matt. xxiv. 3. They had, however, during the few last days and hours, heard that which had overturned all their expectations. They had thought that the Christ would always remain on earth, and that the temple would survive time itself. Now, they have heard that the Christ is to die, and the temple to become a heap of ruins! How could they, as born Israelites, imagine a continuance of the present dispensation after such an event? And yet they still continued to expect a glorious παρουσία of the Messiah, which was to be, in all respects, the reverse of His present lowly appearance upon earth. Hence, they naturally looked for this, not after, but contemporaneously with, the fall of the temple; and desired to know by what tokens they might recognise the approach of the catastrophe, in the midst of which the great double event would take place.

How, then, must the Lord reply so as to meet at once both their need of instruction, and their capacity for receiving it? If He had told them, that one event would be separated from the other by an interval of many centuries, He would have acted entirely in opposition to His own principle, expressed in John xvi. 12. With deep wisdom, therefore, He placed Himself upon the inquirers' point of view, and began with the destruction of Jerusalem, in order to connect therewith a description of the συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος. From our point of view, however, we cannot but regard as very inconclusive, the various attempts that have been made to fix upon a definite point in this discourse, where the Lord quits the first subject, and proceeds to speak exclusively of the latter. Matt. xxiv. 29 has, for instance, been fixed upon as such a point; but ver. 34, impartially interpreted, plainly shows that He subsequently spoke of occurrences which were to be witnessed by the then existing generation. Unless, then, we hold, either that the Lord Himself was mistaken in this important matter, or that the Evangelists did not understand, or inaccurately reported, His eschatological discourse—opinions utterly repudiated by Christian consciousness in a believing point of view—we must inevitably conclude, that the Lord was indeed speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, regarded as a type of the last judgment; in other words, that He was speaking prophetically of an earlier event as a type of a later one. The destruction of Jerusalem, therefore, considered in its ideal signification, is the theme of this discourse; yet in such wise that, from this point of view, He at the same time contemplates and foretells, generally, the end of the present terrestrial dispensation. Here, also, we must bear in mind that peculiarity of prophetic vision, which makes the idea of time subordinate to that of space, and makes successive events appear contemporary. "Prophetia est ut pictura regionis cujusdam, quæ in proximo tecta et colles et pontes notat distincte, procul valles et montes latissime patentes in augustum cogit: sic enim debet etiam esse eorum, qui prophetiam legunt, prospectus in futurum, cui se prophetia accommodat." Bengel. The two events are so connected in His representation, that the intervening period is almost lost sight of, and the signs of His coming, which are to be preliminarily manifested even before the destruction of the city and temple, are to be repeated, in ever increasing measure, the nearer the world's last judgment approaches. Interpreters must, therefore, be satisfied with being able to point out, that all the tribulations here threatened, received a preliminary fulfilment in the period immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem,—a fulfilment which bore within itself the germ of subsequent fulfilments, as the fruit lies hidden in the bud.

In this view, then, the eschatological discourse gives a definite answer to the question of the disciples, and offers a sufficient explanation of the expectation of the Lord's speedy return, expressed in the apostolic epistles; as, for instance, in 1 Thess. iv. 15; 2 Cor. v. 4, where St Paul supposes the possibility of his living to witness it. They saw the signs of the destruction of Jerusalem drawing nearer and nearer, and had not yet learnt, from the Lord, that even after this event, the present dispensation was to last for centuries. The attentive reader will not, however, overlook the hints, occasionally given in this discourse, that the Lord's coming was not to take place so soon as many believed, and that the last page of the world's history would by no means have been written with the destruction of Jerusalem (comp. Matt. xxiv. 48, xxv. 5, 19; Luke xxi. 24).—With respect, finally, to the relative positions occupied respectively by the different Synopticists, we cannot agree with those expositors who award the praise of greater accuracy either to Mark or Luke. It is Matthew who certainly deserves the preference in this respect; while we meet, in Luke, with a freer and more fragmentary report of the entire discourse. Many a saying of special importance is more copiously given by Matthew and Mark; while, on the other hand, we meet in Luke with certain isolated sentences peculiar to this Gospel, which are not only worthy of the deepest attention in themselves, but which, in many respects, facilitate the understanding of the whole subject. (For the locality of this discourse, comp. Matthew and Mark.)

2. And as some spake of the temple, etc.—This evidently took place, not after, but during the departure from the temple. It seems as if the disciples, deeply struck by the Lord's farewell to the temple, now sought to become intercessors for the condemned sanctuary. They pointed to the buildings (Matthew), which, but just completed, seemed to promise a longer continuance to the sanctuary; the stones (Mark), which might still defy centuries; the gifts (Luke), with which piety and ostentation had adorned the Lord's house. These ἀναθήματα had been mostly contributed by Gentiles; as, for instance, sacred vessels by the Emperor Augustus, and others by Ptolemy Philadelphus, and especially the golden vine presented (according to Josephus, de bello Jud. 6, 5, 2; A. J. 15, 11, 8) by Herod the Great. When we consider that, according to the words of the prophets (e.g., Ps. lxxii.; Isa. lx.), even the heathen were to bring their gifts and presents to Zion, it is doubly comprehensible that the Apostles should find, in these very objects, one reason the more for their hope that the sanctuary was destined to continue.

3. These things which ye behold.—Nomin. absol., denoting the subject which is to be further sufficiently distinguished in the Lord's discourse. This form makes the contrast between the light in which things existing were still seen, and the fate which lay before them, the more striking. "It is very remarkable that the Hellenistic Gospel, which, according to the words of Christ, specially contemplates the relation between the fair appearance and the naked reality, should immediately connect His prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem and the judgment of the world, with a reference to the beauty and rich magnificence of the temple.

4. There shall not be left one stone upon another: comp. ch. xix. 43, 44.—In order to appreciate the full force of the contrast, we must picture to ourselves the magnificence of that temple, concerning which more modern Jewish scholars have exclaimed, "He who has not seen the temple of Herod, never saw anything glorious." See remarks on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

5. When—and what sign?—Their question is then a double one: they want to know the exact time, and to learn what shall be the signs of the approach of this catastrophe. The Lord answers their last question; while, with respect to the first, He gives only general intimations (comp. Matt. xxiv. 34–36). The signs which He mentions are, at the same time, of such a nature, that they were in effect only preliminarily seen before the destruction of Jerusalem, and will not be seen in their full signification before the end of the world.

6. Take heed, etc.—The warning against false Messiahs is made as prominent in Luke as in Matthew and Mark. It cannot be denied that, so far as we know, no impostors playing the part of Messiah appeared before the destruction of Jerusalem. Barchochba, the first of more than sixty seducers, did not appear till some time after. See Eusebius, H. E. iv. 6. The germ of such deception, however, was certainly present in the attempts of Jonathan, Theudas, Dositheus, Simon, Menander, and others, to mislead the people, a germ which was subsequently developed into false assumptions of Messiahship. Witness the deceivers who, by promises of miracles, tempted so many thousands into the wilderness, and thereby to destruction: comp. Acts v. 36, 37, xxi. 38; and Homily 76 of Chrysostom (on Matthew). Thus the general signs of the end of the world really began to receive their accomplishment with the destruction of Jerusalem.

7. Then said He unto them.—The warning against seducers, as Luke reports it, was merely preliminary, and, as it were, an introduction, after which the Lord proceeded to deal specially and successively with the questions proposed.

8. Nation shall rise against nation, etc.—The tumults, earthquakes, famines, and other calamities, here mentioned, were by no means so unimportant before the destruction of Jerusalem as some (for instance, De Wette) have maintained. If we consider the massacres at Cæsarea of Syrians and Jews, in which twenty thousand of the latter perished, while in Syria almost every city was divided into two parties, who opposed each other as mortal enemies; the quick succession, within a few years, of the five Roman emperors, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, and the more or less extensive disturbances connected with their accessions; the famine in the reign of Claudius, Acts xi. 30; the earthquakes in Campania and Asia Minor, whereby whole cities were destroyed; in Nero's, the strange and terrible signs in Judea spoken of by Tacitus and Josephus; we shall find, in the history of those times, an adequate solution of the Lord's enigmatical expressions. Nevertheless, special emphasis must be laid on the expression, in Matthew and Mark, that all these things are but ἀρχαὶ ὠδίνων, forbidding us to apply these words exclusively to the wars, etc., which occurred during an interval of forty years, and authorizing us to extend them to all the calamities of the kind which should, in continuously increasing measure, precede the end of the world, an event of which the destruction of Jerusalem was but the type. The same thought is rather hinted at than expressed, in another form, in the words immediately succeeding ver. 12.

9. But before all these, etc.—The assertion of Meyer, that this definition of time is perhaps a subsequent modification of the original, ex eventu, proceeds from the dogmatic assumption, that the Lord could not even have foretold to His Apostles that their personal persecution would precede these last calamities. The farther, however, the last words of ver. 11 extend beyond the destruction of Jerusalem, the more natural was it that the Lord should warn His disciples of what awaited them before that event.—They shall lay hands on you, ἐπιβάλλειν: naturally, with inimical purpose. There is a remarkable climax in the persecutions here mentioned. The slightest form was, in a certain sense, the delivering up to the synagogues, for the purpose of scourging: comp. Matt. x. 17. A heavier conflict would await them, when they should be brought before rulers and kings to bear testimony to the faith: comp. Matt. x. 18. The most painful trial, however, would befall them, when they should be betrayed by parents, friends, and relations. Meanwhile they would have, in all these afflictions, a threefold consolation. First, all this would happen for His name's sake (ἕνεκα): comp. Acts v. 41. Secondly, it should turn to them for a testimony, ἀποβήσεται: denoting a salutary result, as in Phil. i. 19; the persecutions should afford the Apostles occasion of bearing testimony to their Lord—here, as also Acts xxiii., represented as something both great and glorious. And, finally, at such times they should be more than usually conscious of their Lord's presence.

10. Settle it therefore in your hearts.—See remarks on ch. xii. 11, and Matt. x. 19, 20. So highly important a promise might be most suitably reiterated. What they were, in conformity with their Lord's injunction, to settle in their hearts, was, as it were, an antidote against the cares which would hereafter fill their hearts. "Id unum laborate, ne laboretis." Bengel. Their ground of encouragement is the ἐγὼ δώσω of the Lord, which involuntarily reminds us of the promise made by God to Moses, when He spoke to him from the burning bush: Exod. iv. 12.—A mouth and wisdom. Mouth: a concrete reference to the words themselves, which they were to speak. Wisdom: the gift of uttering them in the right manner, at the right time, place, etc. Thus, everything needful both for the matter and manner of their defence, was promised them,—a circumstance which would render it extremely difficult to their enemies to persevere in their opposition. It is self-evident that it is not an absolute, but a relative impossibility, which is here spoken of; and that we must compare not only Acts vi. 10, but also vii. 51, xiii. 8–10, and other passages.

11. And ye shall be betrayed, etc.—The accounts in the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles, are too short to allow of the mention of special instances of the fulfilment of this prophecy, which, moreover, was not addressed to the Apostles as such, but as representatives of the first believers.—Some of you shall they cause to be put to death: a more definite expression than the ἀποκτενοῦσιν of Matthew. Among our Lord's four hearers was James, who was to be the first martyr; and Peter, in whom the subsequent prophecy, John xxi. 18, was fulfilled. These were, however, to be but the first-fruits of an abundant harvest of martyrs, who were, during the course of centuries, to die for the Lord's cause; and the Apocalypse affords us some glimpses of the overflowings of ungodliness which, in this respect, still lie hidden in the dark bosom of the future.

12. Hated of all men.—In the apostolic epistles—e.g., Rom. viii. 35–37; 1 Cor. iv. 9, 10; 2 Cor. xi. 23–29; Heb. x. 32–34—we find abundant proof of the strict fulfilment of these words, even in the first ages of the Church. Witness the dangers incurred by the early Christians in their flight to Pella; and especially the fact that this hatred rises, in its various phases, to still higher degrees in proportion as the development of the kingdom of God hastens towards its consummation.

13. Not an hair: comp. ch. xii. 7; Matt. x. 30.—Naturally, no assurance that they should in no case be put to death, but only that they would be invulnerable so long as they were needed for the Lord's service; as also, that even their death would turn εἰς σωτε-ρίαν, and to the glory of Christ: Phil. i. 19. And with this promise of absolute preservation in a negative sense, absolute preservation in a positive sense is also assured: Through your patience, etc. (Through your patience you shall gain your souls. German version.)

14. Possess (gain) your souls.—Κτήσεσθε. Though the κτήσασθε of the Receptus is powerfully supported by external authority, yet the internal proofs in favour of the reading of A. and B. are, in our opinion, overwhelming. "The Receptus is an interpretation of the imperatively understood Future." Meyer. Thus we have here the reverse side of the promise, ver. 18: far from a hair of their heads being hurt (comp. Acts xxvii. 34), they should rather, by their patience, preserve their life, their souls, in the midst of all these persecutions. Ὑπομονή is not to be understood as patience, but, as in Rom. v. 4 and Jas. i. 3, 4, as perseverance; and κτᾶσθαι is not used (De Wette) in the sense of εὑρίσκειν, Matt. xvi. 25, but rather signifies to defend, to keep possession of (1 Thess. iv. 4). It is, besides, self-evident that by keeping possession of the soul is not meant our natural, but our true life, whose loss or preservation is the vital question for the Lord's disciples. It was by perseverance that they were to preserve this their true life, even though, in so doing, they should lose the life of their bodies. We thus find here the same promise as in Matt. xxiv. 13; Rev. ii. 10; and elsewhere; while the usual rendering of this verse, which would make it a precept to maintain patience of mind (comp. Heb. x. 36), has arisen from an incorrect reading, and should undoubtedly have been otherwise expressed.

15. And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies. Comp. Lange on Matt. xxiv. 15.—This mention of armies in Luke takes the place of the mention of the abomination of desolation in Matthew and Mark; and the prophecy of Daniel, which was so highly significant to Jewish Christians, is omitted by St Luke in his report of this discourse. The very uncertainty of so many interpreters with respect to the proper meaning of the βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως, is but another proof that so much was done to desecrate the Holy Land, that it is scarcely possible to know which desecration was specially intended. According to the report of St Luke, the appearance of the hostile armies before Jerusalem was itself a fatal sign; and the disciples were given to understand that, even with the most courageous defence, its deliverance was not to be expected.

16. Then let them which are in Judea, etc.—Speedy flight is recommended as the only means of safety. In Judea they would be in the midst of the population, and must, for this reason, endeavour to reach the lonely mountainous regions. At any cost, the city must be left; and if any were so fortunate as to have left it at this critical juncture, they must, under no pretence, re-enter it.—Ἐν ταῖς χώραις, not in regionibus (Bretschneider, De Wette), but in agris, where the chief among the Jews often had country houses. Further directions concerning this flight are to be found in Matthew.

17. Days of vengeance; i.e., not days in which one nation takes vengeance on another on account of its disobedience and contumacy, but in which the Lord God executes His judgments upon His enemies. The saying of Moses (Ps. xc. 11) finds an application here. —That all things which are written may be fulfilled, etc. According to the Lord's emphatic expression therefore, the fall of the city and temple had been already foretold in the Old Testament. Witness Deut. xxviii., which, in certain respects, may be called the original theme, subsequently developed in the writings of the prophets. Those of Daniel may also be included, yet they are by no means specially or exclusively intended. Instead of a quotation from the prophetic Scriptures, we have, in Luke, a general reference which, however, plainly shows that this whole prophecy of the Lord is nothing else than a continuation and prolongation of the series which had been drawn out ages before. It is further remarkable, that the stamp of divine vengeance was impressed upon the fate of Jerusalem and the temple, even in the eyes of the heathen. Witness the expression of even a Titus: "That God was so angry with this people, that he should even fear His wrath if he were to show favour to the Jews;" and how he repelled every honour offered him on account of the victory he had obtained, with the assertion, that he was only an instrument in the hand of God to punish this obstinate nation. Compare the well-known expressions of Josephus on the excessive wickedness of his contemporaries.

18. Woe unto them that are with child, etc.—A woe, not of imprecation, but of bitter complaint, expressive of the mercy and compassion of the Lord: comp. ch. xxiii. 29. Such women would be less capable of speedy flight, without finding mercy on account of their condition. The reasons of this phenomenon are twofold: one, great distress upon earth (in general), and wrath upon this people. Hence there would be no place of refuge either in or out of Judea: comp. Isa. xxvi. 20; Rev. vi. 16, 17.

19. And they shall fall, etc.—An accurate description of the fate of the Jews, most terribly verified by the result. According to Josephus, the numbers of the slain amounted to 1,100,000; while 97,000 were carried away captive into Egypt and other provinces: comp. Deut. xxviii. 64.—Ἔσται πατουμένη. Jerusalem shall be a city trodden under foot by the Gentiles; referring not only to its desecration by a Gentile garrison (De Wette), but to all the contemptuous ill usage to which the capital should be exposed: comp. Lam. iv. There is no reason for applying this general mention of the ἔθνη exclusively to the Romans. We have here rather an announcement of that period of centuries during which Jerusalem should be trodden under foot, by nations most diverse the one from the other, in almost uninterrupted succession. Titus, Hadrian, Chosroes, the Mussulmen, the Crusaders, the more modern rule of Islam, etc., are included in this period, which still subsists, and which shall not be terminated till the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled.

20. The times of the Gentiles, καιροὶ ἐθνῶν.—Not the times of the calling of the Gentiles (Stier), which explanation would introduce an idea foreign to the subject, but the times before appointed to the Gentiles for the fulfilment of this divine judgment. It is not the use of the plural alone which shows that καιροὶ applies to an extended period, but the whole connection, according to which these καιροὶ are to continue till the end (comp. Matt. xxiv. 29), and to be finally concluded by the last act of this world's history. This expression is remarkable, first, as containing a hint that a period of indefinite duration is to be expected after the fall of Jerusalem; and, secondly, as affording a glimpse of the restoration of Jerusalem, —a fact elsewhere more plainly expressed.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Offence has unreasonably been taken at the manner in which the Lord here speaks of His appearing; and an attempt has been made to discover an irreconcilable discrepancy between the synoptical Gospels and that of St John. But St John was also acquainted with an ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, and a personal παρουσία of the Lord, though, in his spiritual Gospel, less prominence is given to these subjects; while, on the other hand, the synoptical statement contains nothing which favours coarse and carnal conceptions of the mysteries of the future. We should indeed find just cause for astonishment at the eschatological notions found, for instance, in the Epistles to the Thessalonians and Corinthians, unless they had the historical foundation which we find in this discourse of Christ. The account of the Synopticists will naturally give offence to all who consider it incredible, according to their views of doctrine, that Christ should have accurately foreseen and foretold the fall of Jerusalem so long before the event. But a purely historical criticism will never suffer itself to be guided or intimidated by so entirely arbitrary a conclusio a non posse ad non esse. And they who attentively compare the prophecy with the fulfilment, will soon discover that it is utterly impossible on this occasion to entertain a notion of a vaticinium post eventum. So intimate an intermingling of two events so heterogeneous as the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world, was, in the very nature of things, only possible before, and not after the first had taken place. Besides, it would have been psychologically impossible for an inventor, composing and putting this discourse into our Lord's mouth after the fall of Jerusalem, to give so simple, so general, so brief, and so incomplete a picture of its destruction; since that event would have offered him abundant material, and therewith an irresistible temptation, to enrich his picture with far more vivid colouring, and to make his prophecy far more striking. If the Synopticists had not written till after the destruction of Jerusalem, it would have been easier for them to be entirely silent concerning this event, like St John, than to represent it in such a light that the result should apparently be that of convicting them of falsehood.

2. It was not without design that the Lord so closely connected the destruction of the temple and the end of the world. On one side, it is historically proved that the fall of the Jewish polity was the indispensably necessary condition for freeing infant Christianity from the trammels of a narrow nationality, and raising it to its proper situation as the religion of the whole world; and also for effectively preparing for the manifestation of the glory of the Lord in the triumph of His kingdom over the heathen nations. On the other, Jerusalem and the temple had already borne a typical and symbolical character in the prophetic scriptures of the Old Testament. Zion had there been spoken of, not merely as the local seat, but also as the type of the theocracy in its permanence and beauty; and the whole Christian world may, in certain respects, be called a spiritual new Jerusalem. Is it, then, to be wondered at, that the fate of Jerusalem should serve as a mirror of the world's last judgment? The destruction of the city and temple was to be the first of those great events which were to promote the glorious, triumphant coming of the Lord,—a coming which would ever be increasing in power. With it would commence that series of events which were, during the course of centuries, to work together for the coming of the kingdom of God upon earth. More and more gloriously would Christ appear amidst the ruins of annihilated temples and thrones; while the tokens of His coming here pointed out—seductions, persecutions, rebellions, etc.—would be repeated in continually increasing measure. At length the kingdom of light would celebrate its highest triumph immediately after the power of darkness had concentrated its utmost power, and the fall of the whole earthly dispensation would be but the continuation and consummation of the fall of the ancient seat of the Israelitish theocracy. They who shall, one day, look back upon the end of the world, as the Lord here looked forward to it, will discover that the long period of time between the destruction of the temple and the end of the world was nothing else than a long interval of increasingly rich manifestations of grace, and increasingly severe judgments.

3. "The history of the world, the judgment of the world." Schiller. The eschatological discourse of the Lord is peculiarly adapted to display both the relative truth and superficial partiality of this celebrated quotation. That events such as the fall of Jerusalem are divine judgments, and that the history of the world may therefore be called the striking manifestation of an inexorable fate, had been here said by Christ, centuries before. But it must be as little forgotten that all these divine judgments are but preliminary, typical, and prophetic of those which will one day take place, in the sight of heaven and earth, at the expiration of the present dispensation. The notion of κρίσις in St John, finds its complementum in the ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα of the synoptical Gospels; and hence the poetical saying, concerning the judgment of the world in history, must be completed in the same manner: it is, therefore, not the last judgment.

4. The fall of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews are here represented not merely as an unexampled calamity, but as a divine judgment, whose cause can be hidden from no believing Christian. The present condition of Israel is the great proof of the authority of the Prophet who foretold it eighteen centuries ago, and whom they, on that very account, ungratefully rejected. It is this very circumstance which so clearly manifests the unchristian nature of such an emancipation of the Jews as is advocated, in these days, under the motto of liberty and civilisation. The rights of the exiled of Judah to hospitality can never be too urgently insisted on, nor hospitality too liberally exercised; but it is actual injustice that Christians should in any manner allow the enjoyment of Christian privileges, and the exercise of Christian duties, to be obstructed by the Jews, who are but temporary sojourners among them. This modern fashion of denying Christ will be none the less severely punished than the Jewish rejection of the Messiah. When Christians sacrifice their Christ to the Jews, Jews begin to lord it over the Christian state by their material and moral power; and latitudinarianism, specially supported by the deistic influence of Judaism, leads the way to indifferentism, which at length terminates, though still bearing the euphonious name of candour and enlightenment, in atheism. In this case also, our Lord's saying, βλέπετε μὴ πλανηθῆτε, is both needful and suitable.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Appearances are deceptive.—The temple, in the time of Christ, a beautiful appearance without life.—Earthly pomp, 1. in its external splendour, 2. in its essential transitoriness.—With the Lord's disciple, the perception of the senses must be exchanged for a beholding with the eye of faith.—In the life of faith, the desire for an apocalypse is neither condemned nor opposed, but satisfied and sanctified.—The peculiar dangers to which the Lord's disciples are exposed in looking into the future.—The false Christs who precede the appearing of the true: 1. The judgment which precedes them; 2. the glory which accompanies them; 3. the shame which follows them.—Diabolus simia Dei.—How the Lord's disciple must tremble when every one goes on carelessly; 2. and must not be alarmed when every one is seized with alarm.—The end is not yet: 1. The saying of a true Friend; 2. a saying of holy earnestness.—Seasons of new development in the kingdom of grace, united with violent commotions in the kingdom of nature: 1. It has always been thus; 2. it still is thus; 3. it will one day be thus, in the highest degree. —The persecution of His disciples, a sign of the Lord's coming, which will, 1. take place first of all; and, 2. last longest of all.—How the losses of the Lord's servants may profit themselves and the interests of the kingdom of God.—Persecuted, but not forsaken, the lot of Christ's disciple.—"I will give you a mouth and wisdom." How this promise was fulfilled, 1. to the Apostles, 2. to the first apologists, 3. to the martyrs, 4. to the Reformers, 5. to the heroes of faith of all times, past and present.—The struggle between the ties of blood and the demands of the Spirit.—The security of the Christian, in the midst of the most threatening danger.—How endurance preserves the life of the soul.—No effort to preserve external things avails, when God has decreed their ruin.—The destruction of Jerusalem, 1. the fulfilment of Old Testament prophecy, 2. the test of New Testament prophecy.—Jerusalem considered at various periods: 1. The seat of Melchizedec; 2. the royal city of David; 3. the dwelling-place of God; 4. the slayer of the prophets; 5. as desecrated by the abomination of desolation; 6. as trodden under foot of the Gentiles; 7. as one day to be the Salem of another Melchizedec.—The past, the present, the future of Jerusalem.—The fall of Jerusalem, an event announcing, 1. the shame of Israel, 2. the greatness of the Lord, 3. the glory of the kingdom of God, 4. the calling of Christians, 5. the future judgment.

Starcke, Hedinger: Great sins, great judgments.—Let us not look only at things seen and temporal, but also at things unseen and eternal.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: To set forth the name of Christ, to come in the name of Christ, to be called a Christian, will not profit; deceivers can do as much as this.—Disorder in the constitution of State and Church, but especially persecution of truth, a forerunner of ruin.—One ungodly man is made use of to punish another.—How holy, righteous, and terrible are God's judgments!—It is truly terrible that, when God's judgments draw near, men do not grow better, but worse.—When a just man has a just cause, he need fear nothing.—Osiander: Though many a confessor of Jesus has lost his life by persecutions, yet the Gospel cannot be extirpated.—Cramer: Let no one be astonished if he suffers unjustly.—Bren- tius: A patient spirit is better than a high spirit.—Woe to the land, the people, and the town from which God has departed! there is nothing else to do but to hasten and save thy soul: Gen. xix. 22.—Luther: The day of vengeance follows the day of grace—Bibl. Wurt.: As often as we contemplate the dispersed Jews, we should tremble at, sigh over, and deprecate God's wrath, Rom. xi. 20.

Heubner: God solemnly proclaimed the abolition of the Mosaic law, when He destroyed the temple.—Let not the true Christ be taken from thee; there is but one.—God decrees gradually increasing trials, yet the period of suffering is fixed by Him.—Continuance in the faith, in the midst of tribulations, is the condition of the soul's salvation.—The vengeance of God is a holy vengeance, and the fall of Jerusalem a visible monument of His penal justice.—Ahlfeld: The destruction of Jerusalem, an essay in Piper's evang. Kalender, ii. p. 97.—Arndt, Pred. Leb. Jesu iv. p. 282: The future of Jerusalem, and of the world.—Inquiries concerning the future: 1. When are they allowed? 2. how are they answered by the Lord? 3. how will the answer profit us?—Vinet, Etudes Evangéliques, p. 265, les pierres du temple.—Schleiermacher, Pred. am 24 Januar. 1808, on Matt. xxiv. 1, 2: Right veneration for the native greatness of the ancient times.—J. J. L. ten Kate, Zeugnisse des Evangeliums aus der hollandischen Kirche, Elberfeld 1855, No. 5: The wandering Jew, 1. an unprecedented miracle in the chronicles of the world, 2. a living testimony to the truth of Christianity, 3. a future manifestation of the glory of God, 4. the lawful creditor of every believer.

PART II.—VERS. 25–36.

Parallel passages: Matt. xxiv. 29–41; Mark xiii. 24–37.

25 And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; 26 Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. 27 And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory. 28 And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh. 29 And He spake to them a parable; Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees; 30 When they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. 31 So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. 32 Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. 33 Heaven and earth shall pass away; but My words shall not pass away. 34 And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. 35 For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. 36 Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.

Ver. 25. In perplexity at the roaring of the sea and waves. According to the reading of Tischendorf, ἐν ἀπορίᾳ ἤχους, adequately supported by A.B.C.L.M.X. cursive manuscripts.

Ver. 36. With Lachmann and Tischendorf, we read δέ instead of the οὖν of the Receptus; according to B.D. Ital.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And there shall be signs.—The Lord does not now return to the destruction of Jerusalem, but states what was to take place after the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. The consecutive nature of this statement is plainly pointed out by the καὶ of Luke; and it is a mere assumption to say that our Evangelist avoids the εὐθέως of Matthew (De Wette), because he wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem. This variation is caused simply by the freer form in which he reports this discourse; to which, and to the circumstance that he wrote for Gentile Christians, must also be ascribed his omitting to mention the flight on the Sabbath-day, the shortening of these days, and the false Jewish prophets; while he also details less accurately than Matthew and Mark, the other σημεῖα which were to take place.

With respect, moreover, to the signs themselves, there is as little reason for supposing the sun to represent Antichrist, and the moon and stars antichristian teachers (Starcke), as, in the absence of any hint to this effect, to understand the stars as signifying, in a metaphorical sense, powerful princes, and the roaring of the sea, the revolutions of nations (Besser and others). Other views are stated in Lange on the parallel passage in Matthew. Why should we not rather simply believe the Lord's own assertion, that His παρουσία shall be accompanied by cosmical convulsions whose peculiar nature can be as little calculated, as their possibility can, à priori, be denied? It was, already, generally admitted that, according to Old Testament predictions, the day of the Lord would be distinguished by terrible signs in the kingdom of nature: see, e.g., Jer. iv. 23; Joel ii. 30, etc. Such statements are often ascribed to the poetical language of prophecy; and it would certainly augur little taste, and little acquaintance with the phraseology of Scripture, to endeavour to found upon such dicta, a definite theory concerning the future destiny of the heavenly bodies. On the other hand, however, the extension of natural science, in our days, will make us aware of the limited nature of human knowledge, and prevent the true theologian and cosmogonist from too rashly uttering the word "impossible." We have no certain hermeneutical rule for distinguishing, proprio marte, between what is here to be understood literally, and what figuratively, and the event alone can determine, in this case, the limits between imagination and reality.

2. Upon the earth distress, etc.—This statement of the inexpressible distress which would be felt by mankind, is peculiar to Luke. The same idea is further developed, Rev. vi. 12–15, and is, in itself, psychologically probable, without even entirely excluding believers. As important changes in the atmosphere are instinctively perceived by the brute creation, and as an unaccountable foreboding of some terrible calamity often makes the bravest tremble, so does the Lord give us reason to expect that a fearful anticipation of great and terrible events will, just before His appearing, oppress the hearts of many. Luke speaks of ἀπορία ἤχους (see notes on the text) as a hint of what the distress and perplexity of the nations refer to. The roaring of the sea and waves, that is to say, will remind even those who are not living in the expectation of the Lord's coming, of the terrible things which are to come upon the earth, while their guilty consciences will testify that they have the worst to expect. Allegorical expositors naturally refer this to the sea of nations, probably because they think it somewhat apocryphal that the ocean should rage more than usual on the approach of the final catastrophe of this visible creation. For our part, we cannot see that physical signs are more improbable in the sea than in the moon and stars.

3. Men's hearts failing them, ἀποψύχειν; i.e., not only to be benumbed (De Wette), or to faint, but, as Hesychius interprets it, = ἀποπνευματίζεσθαι, spiritu destitui. That which has occasionally happened, from very great degrees of heat, anxiety, or grief, viz., that the tension of the moment has resulted in loss of life, will then be no rare occurrence; and no marvel, since even the powers of heaven shall be shaken: perhaps "the preserving and efficient powers of the heavenly edifice, with their influences upon earth; so that the Lord, summing up everything, would say, Everything shall totter, and at length be dissolved, 2 Pet. iii. 10–12." Stier. According to De Wette, this expression is imitated from Matthew; but any interpretation which does not feel that this very saying furnishes the adequate explanation of the distress just depicted, seems to stand on an insecure foundation.

4. And then.—Here, as also in Matthew and Mark, we have the personal appearing of the Messiah, at the very time when the whole visible creation is threatening a return to Chaos. According to Matthew, the sign of the Son of man is first to be seen, then Himself; according to Mark and Luke, on the contrary, the appearing of the Messiah is to be seen at once in the clouds (plural in Mark, singular in Luke), while both are silent respecting the σημεῖον. For the principal views respecting the latter, see Lange on Matt. xxiv. 30. It may well be supposed that the cloud which conveys, and the glory which accompanies Him, may constitute this sign. Compare the saying of the angel at the ascension, reported exclusively by Luke, Acts i. 11, that the Lord should so (οὕτως) come again, as (ὃν τρόπον, i.e., ἐν νεφέλῃ, ver. 9) they had seen Him go into heaven. Mention of the appearance and agency of angels at the last day, is found only in Matthew and Mark in loco. Luke, on the contrary, lays the chief emphasis upon the practical side of the matter, viz., the expectation and joy with which the Lord's disciples, who are to be conceived of, then as now, as living upon the earth, will perceive the approach of these events. A truly Pauline idea: comp. Rom. viii. 19–23.

5. When these things begin.—There is not the slightest reason for understanding τούτων exclusively of the last-mentioned circumstance, i.e., of the coming of the Son of man in glory. This appearing will be, in a certain sense, the work of a moment; and when it takes place, the redemption of His people is not merely drawing nigh (ἐγγίζει), but will actually have arrived. We rather understand it of all the preliminary signs, mentioned vers. 25 and 26, and which must, of necessity, last for some time (hence also ἀρχομένων). The same events which would plunge the world into helpless distress, would be to believers a summons to hope and joyous expectation; since these very ὠδῖνες would prove that the birth-time of their deliverance was drawing nearer and nearer. The heads which had so often sunk at various sorrows and persecutions are now to be lifted up: comp. Rom. viii. 19; Jas. v. 8.

6. And He spake to them a parable.—Here, as in ver. 10, Luke reappears as the narrator, while in Matthew and Mark the discourse proceeds without interruption. The latter is internally probable, while the former is another proof of the greater freedom of Luke's report. The mention, too, of all the trees, with and besides the fig-tree, is also peculiar to him. Perhaps the Lord thus specially mentioned the fig-tree, because He had repeatedly used it as a symbol of the Israelitish nation: Mark xi. 12–14; Luke xiii. 6–9. But that He was here speaking of this symbolical fig-tree, and pointing out the restoration of Israel as a sign of His coming (Stier), seems to us as unproved as that He intended to refer to the amarum et venenatum quiddam in the sap of the fig-leaves, and thus to denote the incrementa malignitatis, as a token of His coming. In either case, the mention of all the trees would be entirely unsuitable; and we therefore prefer the view, that He thus made separate mention of the fig-tree as distinguishing this peculiar kind of tree from others.

7. When they now shoot forth.—Luke here designedly expresses himself less definitely than Matthew and Mark, because he did not intend to give prominence to the specific peculiarity of the fig-tree, whose leaves are developed at the time of the setting of the fruit, but was only contemplating that which is common to all trees. The appearance of leaves on trees of all kinds, is a sign of the approach of summer. He who sees the one, is aware that the other is at hand. —Ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν, "etiamsi nemo vos doceat." Bengel.—The kingdom of God is to be understood, according to the whole context, as the regnum gloriæ.

8. This generation shall not pass away, etc.—For a statement of the various views of ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη, see Lange on Matt. xxiv. 34. That which supposes that the Lord thereby intended the generation then living, is the most natural; every other giving rise to the feeling, that it has arisen from perplexity in making the prophecy and its fulfilment agree with each other. The question, however, is, whether the words ἕως ἂν πάντα γένηται may not be taken in such a sense, as to make the opinion, that γενεά referred to the then existing generation, at least, possible. By πάντα, we have no longer to understand the destruction of Jerusalem alone, since this already lay behind in the Lord's view, nor His παρουσία only, for in the subsequent verses a passing away of the heaven and earth is again spoken of, but of the signs of His coming, which He had already figuratively pointed to, when, for instance, He spoke of the putting forth of leaves by the trees. These signs would necessarily occupy a certain period (ἀρχομένων, ver. 28, and γίνεσθαι, applied to such matters, present an elastic idea, expressing not only that which is not momentary, but also that which is successive). We are thus at liberty to understand: till all things begin to be fulfilled, as all things that were to serve as signs of His coming. And this was really the case during the lifetime of our Lord's contemporaries, who saw in the destruction of Jerusalem the type of the approaching end of the world. Thus He would seem to say: This generation will not pass away till the end of the world, which has been announced to you, shall have begun with the actual destruction of Jerusalem. The Lord, by no means, says that all that is to take place before the τέλος, will be omnibus numeris absolutum atque ad finem perductum, before a generation shall have passed. The question, then, is not merely what is meant by γίνεσθαι, but what is meant by it in this connection? As yet, we unfortunately know of no explanation of this verse which clears up all difficulties, and, at the same time, avoids all appearance of arbitrary assumption.

9. Heaven and earth shall pass away.—After the discourse has reached this altitude, it would be, indeed, a deplorable anticlimax to see in these words only a figurative description of the fall of the Jewish nation. The Lord is plainly pointing to the overthrow of this earthly dispensation, which is to follow the appearance of a new heaven and a new earth, 2 Pet. iii. 8–14; and, at the same time, assuring us, that, even when an entirely new order of things shall have been introduced, His words, and especially the promises of His coming, which will not till then be understood and fulfilled, shall not cease to be the words of life to all His people. "They will be preserved as eternal, in an eternal and eschatologically-minded Church." Lange.

10. Take heed to yourselves.—In Matthew and Mark, the eschatological discourse concludes with a description of the unexpected arrival of the Parousia, and a parabolical exhortation to watchfulness, already given by Luke in a somewhat different form in chs. xii. and xvii. In place of this, he has another conclusion, giving rise to the inquiry, whether our Evangelist here sums up in a freer form the exhortations of Matt. xxiv. 53–51, or whether the Lord spoke these very words on this occasion. However this may be, his report is the more valuable, as, in some measure, replacing the missing parable of the ten virgins, delivered, according to St Matthew, on the same evening, but omitted by St Luke. With deep wisdom does the Lord conclude His eschatological discourse by leading the disciples back to their own hearts, since their thoughts being thus involuntarily directed to the distant future, they might easily, in the contemplation of the foretold occurrences of a world's history, have lost sight of the close connection in which this Parousia stood to their own personal salvation. With a faithful and serious προσέχετε, does He now begin to make the expectation of His coming conduce to their sanctification, as He had before employed it, ver. 28, for their consolation. He warns them lest their hearts should be overcharged, as with a spirit of deep slumber. This might happen in three ways: by κραιπάλη, crapula, nausea and giddiness caused by the excess of yesterday; μέθη, drunkenness, which would render them unfit for maturely considering their highest interests to-day; and μερίμναις βιωτικαῖς, which would torment them concerning to-morrow, and make them carry their anxiety for the bread which perisheth too far. Either would deprive them of that clearness and sobriety of mind with which they ought to be waiting for the Lord's coming. Not only must they carefully avoid what is absolutely forbidden, but also make a wise use of what is relatively allowed, in the consciousness that they can in no case reckon upon a long period. The great day would be even to themselves, the Lord's own servants, an unexpected one, αἰφνίδιος ἐπιστῇ (comp. 1 Thess. v. 3); while to the other inhabitants of the world, especially to such as lived in careless security, and without communion with Christ, it should come as a snare. The tertium comparationis lies as much in the unexpected as in the ruinous nature of the snare, which is generally used for wild animals. Ἐπὶ πάντας τοὺς καθημένους: here emphatically used to point out a quiet and convenient settlement (comp. Amos vi. 1–6), by means of which they are easily caught as soon as the snare is thrown over them. See also Jer. xxv. 29; Rev. xviii. 7, 8.

11. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, etc. (comp. Mark xiii. 37).—Ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ may be referred to ἀγρυπνεῖτε or δεόμενοι. The first is probable, on account of the contrast with the uncertainty of the Parousia, ver. 35, which demands uninterrupted watchfulness. Watching and praying are here, as also ch. xxvi. 41, 1 Pet. iv. 7, 8, joined together. Δεόμενοι, ἵνα, κ.τ.λ., shows the disposition in which they must be found watching and praying; καταξιωθῆτε (comp. Luke xx. 35; 1 Thess. i. 5), not to be worthy, sensu morali, but to be accounted worthy sensu forensi digni habiti atque declarate se a Deo. The word is used in the same sense, Acts v. 41.

12. To escape all these things, etc.—Πάντα ταῦτα, here, as ver. 32, to be understood specially of the signs of Christ's coming, considered exclusively on their alarming side; for, to escape the Parousia itself (to which the expression immediately following refers), is impossible for either friend or foe. They escape τὰ μέλλοντα, who are neither swept away by the persecutions, nor led to apostasy by the seductions, nor discouraged by the trials. (The genuineness of ταῦτα is doubtful; it is rejected by Tischendorf, and received by De Wette. It has little effect upon the sense, since, in any case, the Lord could mean no other future things than those of which He had just been speaking.) On the contrary, they must desire above all things to appear before the Son of man, σταθῆναι ἔμπροσθεν, κ.τ.λ. This word may certainly be used in the same sense as in Rom. xiv. 4; but it is very probable that here, at the end of this dis course, the Lord would express something higher, even that willing appearing, that tranquil standing before His throne, to behold, to serve, and to glorify Him. "It is the ἐπισυναγωγή of the faithful which is intended (and, indeed, of the living, since the condition of escaping all tribulations is named), 1 Thess. iv. 17; 2 Thess. ii. 1; Matt. xxiv. 31." De Wette. This σταθῆναι is, then, not the beginning, but the consummation of supreme happiness: its reverse is described, Ps. i. 5; Nah. i. 6; Rev. vi. 16, 17.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. It is highly significant that the Lord should, immediately before His last sufferings, close His prophetic office with such a discourse as this. The course which His teaching had taken during His public ministry, presents us with an image of the natural progress of development incident to Christian doctrine. As He began with the preaching of faith and conversion, so must practical subjects always have the precedence. But as He did not leave the world without having also disclosed the mysteries of futurity, any system of doctrine which manifests either indifference or scepticism concerning the ἔσχατα, is incomplete, and resembles a mutilated torso. It is in accordance with the very nature of things, that the more the progress of time advances, the more will Christian eschatology occupy a locus primarius, and the less will it become an unimportant appendix.

2. They who maintain that the expectation of the Lord's personal, visible, and glorious return, to put a decisive end to the present condition of things, is only a Jewish delusion, upon which those who occupy the higher ground of Christian spirituality may look down with a certain kind of superiority and contempt, offer the most decided opposition to the Lord's own words.

3. The facts which the Lord here announced, with respect to the course of this world's history, are only drawn in their largest and broadest outlines. We do not find here a painting containing a perfect copy of every feature of futurity, but a sketch for a more detailed portrait, which might be afterwards worked up by the hands of the Apostles. They who believe in the oneness of spirit of our Lord and His first witnesses, cannot fail to seek for an answer to the many questions which this discourse raises in the apostolic Epistles and in the Revelation. Nor will it be easy to point, in these latter writings, to a single statement whose fundamental idea is not contained in this discourse, and which might not therefore be justly called its further development and completion. Hence the Pauline doctrine of the restoration of Israel is only the development of the germ found in Luke xxi. 24, and the apocalyptic picture of the convulsions in the kingdom of nature which will accompany the Lord's coming, but the development of the fundamental eschatological notions here laid down. The eschatology of the Apostles bears the same relation to the Lord's, as the fully-developed flower does to the bursting and promising bud, and not that which the subsequently obscured sun does to that luminary in its former brightness.

4. "The mind works upon the body; and there is not a limb, or part of the body, which does not sympathize with the mind. So will the Lord, at His coming, work upon all creatures, and none will be able to escape His influence. Even before His visible appearing, the creature will be aware that the time of His coming is at hand. The inanimate creation which (passively) obeys His will, and men who oppose their impotent wills to His omnipotent will, shall both be seized with the terror which will precede His coming. The sky, the sea, and man upon earth, will have forebodings of what is about to happen. There is, in our Lord's prophecies concerning the end of all things, threatening and terrible as they are, an obscurity which still more increases the terrible impression they produce. As yet, they await their literal and most striking explanation, their fulfilment. Till this takes place, the hand of God Himself has encompassed them with an obscurity which yields to no human efforts; but, when their accomplishment takes place, it will be fully acknowledged, not only how entirely it agrees with the prophecy, but also how fitly the prophecy was suited to the accomplishment—how they fit, as it were, into each other." Löhe.

5. Though the Lord, in this eschatological discourse, does not speak directly of His own divine nature and dignity, it yet contains a self-testimony, on the part of Christ, so powerful and incomparable, that it is utterly impossible to forbear ascribing a superhuman character to Him who could thus speak. There is nothing that can be compared with the tranquil majesty of the saying, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away." Mockers think exactly the reverse, namely, that heaven and earth will remain, but the words of the Lord will be forgotten and found false: 2 Pet. iii. 3. But the Lord, who apparently delays His promise, will not rest till it is entirely fulfilled: Patiens, quia æternus.

6. The eschatological discourse is also remarkable, as showing the connection which, according to the Lord's view, exists, and must exist, between πίστις and γνῶσις. The example of the Apostles and the teaching of the Master show afresh that it is impossible for πίστις to exist till γνῶσις has preceded. Non intelligere, ut credas, sed credere, ut intelligas. Where faith, however, exists, there is a necessity for knowing, to a certain extent, even the secrets of the future. The Lord provided for this necessity, as far as the receptive powers of His hearers allowed; and while the σημεῖα of His coming are but bugbears and enigmas to the unbelieving, believers are, at the same time, the γνωστικοί who know what these things signify, and whither they tend. Their faith thus becomes knowledge; and this knowledge, which is always limited and partial, leads again to faith, and must terminate in increasing faith, hope, and expectation. Per fidem ad intellectum; per intellectum ad firmiorem fidem.

7. The Lord's eschatological discourse may be considered as a model of a suitable and edifying method of discussing things to come, for all preachers. We may remark, how strictly even this teaching adheres to the prophetic Scriptures; how the principal features of the future are placed in a clear light, while matters of subordinate importance are left in comparative obscurity; how, above all things, this teaching is not delivered to satisfy a vain curiosity, but for the warning, consolation, and sanctification of His people. There can be no doubt that, if the approaching end of this world's history had been always discussed and written of in such a spirit, much less offence would have been taken, and also, much less given.

8. It is not impossible that the Lord may, on this occasion, have employed the so-called unwritten expression, mentioned by Justin Martyr, with the simple words, διὸ καὶ ὁ ἡμέτερος Κύριος 'Ι. Χρ.

εἶπεν, and which has all the internal marks of genuineness: "In the state wherein I find you, I will judge you."

9. On this paragraph, compare the dies iræ, dies illa, solvet sæclum in favilla, etc.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The visible creation must perish, before the new heavens and the new earth appear.—The joy of the world departs, even before the end of the world.—If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? 1 Pet. iv. 18.—The day of Christ a terrible and a glorious day.—The different states of mind in which this day will be seen and encountered: 1. While unbelief is still mocking, faith is mourning; 2. when unbelief is fearing, faith is hoping; 3. when unbelief is despairing, faith is rejoicing.—The usual course of nature will be suspended, when the kingdom of grace celebrates its highest triumph.—The coming of the Son of man, 1. seen by all eyes, 2. surrounded by celestial glory, 3. joyfully welcomed by the redeemed.—Even nature prophesies the approaching summer of the kingdom of God.—How much a Christian may learn from an attentive observation of the kingdoms of nature and grace.—The knowledge of what hour it is now, in the kingdom of grace: 1. Its motives; 2. its degree; 3. its limits.—Our Lord's contemporaries, even during their lives on earth, witnesses, 1. of the most glorious, 2. of the most dreadful occurrences ever seen on earth.—What is temporary, and what is enduring.—Heaven and earth shall pass away, etc.: 1. The sublimity, 2. the truth, 3. the consolation, 4. the solemnity, of this saying.—What the Lord's words will be to His people, even to the end of the world.—What is the greatest danger to which the disciples of the Lord are exposed, when the day of His coming draws nigh.—He who is full of wine cannot be filled with the Spirit, Eph. v. 8.—The day of the Lord will come suddenly: woe to those whom it finds unprepared!—The best preparation for the day of His coming consists in, 1. courage, 2. activity, 3. circumspection.—They who sit down in idleness and unconcern, will be no less surprised by the end, than they who pass the night in wine.—The Lord's coming must be waited for with prayer and watchfulness.—The praying Christian can desire nothing higher than, 1. to escape the ruin which others incur, 2. and to stand, with all dear to him, before the Son of man.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Their hearts will fail for fear at last, who have not feared God during their lives.—Many important things have taken place on earth, but the most important is still to come.—Quesnel: They who despised Jesus in His humiliation, will see Him, against their will, in His majesty.—The time will come, at last, when we shall be released from every burden, 2 Tim. iv. 18.—The earthly-minded look upon spring as the time most adapted to their pleasures; true Christians look upon it as a type of the glory and resurrection of God's children.—Summer, a beautiful image of eternal happiness.—God will not suffer the generation of the wicked to pass away till all things are fulfilled, which may afford a proof of His righteousness and their punishment.—True Christians, who seek the things that are above, resemble the birds of heaven, which, because they are not on earth, have no reason to fear the snare of the fowler.—Brentius: Though man does not know his time, he must learn wisely to prepare himself in time.—It is God alone who can make us fit for, and capable of, eternal glory.—Watching and praying must go together.

On the paragraph.—Fuchs: On the return of Christ at the time of death: 1. How terrible to the ungodly! 2. how joyful to the believer!—Lift up your heads, 1. in good times, and thank the Lord; 2. in bad times, and trust Him; 3. in the last times, and be joyful in hope.—Herberger: On the second advent of Christ, and the bud dings forth of the last day.—Otho: The last judgment.—Fresenius: The redemption of Jesus Christ, in its various phases: 1. The acquisition of salvation, 2. the appropriation of salvation, 3. the full manifestation of salvation.—Ahlfeld: Behold, thy King cometh in power and glory.—Couard: The mind of a Christian in evil times.—Kuntze: The Lord's second advent.—Palmer: The Lord's coming to judgment.—Petri: What the day of the Lord warns us of.—Souchon: The consolation and the warning, contained in Christ's prophecy of His coming.—Stier: The day of the Lord's return: 1. How, and 2. why, is it brought before us?—Ranke: How we ought to receive the Lord's prophecy concerning His coming: 1. With deep reverence, 2. with great joy, 3. with holy seriousness.—Rautenberg: The progress of the Gospel, amidst the terrors of the time.—Gaupp: The Lord's return, a powerful attraction to a godly life, because it, 1. awakens the spirit to a lively hope; 2. it inspires all believing hearts with sweet consolation, even when the cause of God's kingdom is in its saddest condition; 3. it impressively warns us to prepare, by prayer and watchfulness, to stand before the Son of man.—Cl. Harms: The representation of the Lord's coming, calculated, 1. to awaken the slumbering, 2. to alarm the bold, 3. to bring the wavering to decision, 4. to strengthen weak believers.—Kraussold: The Lord's coming at the last day: 1. a coming to judgment, and therefore, 2. a coming both terrible and glorious; 3. an undoubtedly certain coming, and therefore, 4. a coming which we should anticipate with joyful faith.—Standt: How believers behave with respect to Christ's second coming: 1. As attentive observers of the signs of this coming; 2. as joyful spectators of the changes of this world; 3. as saved from all judgments.—Dr A. Bomhard: The stedfast heart of the believing Christian.—B. Steger: Of the blessed and glorious liberty of the righteous.

General concluding Account. (VERS. 37 and 38.)

37 And in the day-time He was teaching in the temple; and at night He went out, and abode in the mount that is called the Mount of Olives. 38 And all the people came early in the morning to Him in the temple, for to hear Him.

1. Some cursive manuscripts have the paragraph de adultera, John vii. 53–ch. viii. 11, after ver. 38. The admission of this occurrence, in this connection, is defended, upon internal grounds, by Lange, Leb. Jesu, on this passage; comp. his Gospel of St Matthew. In his commentary on St John, the author has modified this view.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And in the day-time He was teaching in the temple, etc.—St Luke by no means intends to say, that the Lord, even after the delivery of His eschatological discourse, continued to teach in the temple, but briefly states the manner in which He passed these latter days of His ministry, with reference also to ch. xx. 1. This is apparent both from the expressions ἦν διδάσκων and τὰς ἡμέρας, which refer generally to the Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday of Passion-week. His aim is, not to state that the eschatological discourse also was delivered in the temple, but only to point out that, so long as He stayed in the temple, He was teaching, and being heard by the people with undiminished interest, so that He was by no means constrained to forsake the sanctuary for want of auditors. The account of St Luke, however, must be completed from those of the other Evangelists. We shall then perceive, as Luke gives us reason to conjecture, ver. 5, that the prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem did not take place till after His departure from the temple; while we learn from John xii. 36, that, after leaving the temple, He hid Himself from the Jews (ἐκρύβη),—a circumstance which seems to imply a retirement of perhaps some hours, or even a whole day, before the commencement of the last conflict. Unless we are mistaken, it must have been on the Tuesday in Passion-week that all related, Matt. xxi. 20–xxvi. 5; Mark xi. 20–xiv. 2; Luke xx. 1–xxi. 36, took place; so that there is no other day in the whole public life of Christ, of which the synoptical Gospels furnish so copious details. The occurrence with the Greeks in the temple, John xii. 20–36, may have taken place on the Monday. An impenetrable veil is drawn over the Wednesday, which the Lord appears to have spent entirely at Bethany. It has been conjectured (Lange), that on this day He made the larger circle of His followers acquainted with the fact of His approaching death. The supposition (Wieseler), that John xii. 44–50 is to be regarded as part of a concluding address which the Lord then delivered to the people, seems to us less probable. These concluding verses, after the general statement of John xii. 37–43, seem rather to bear a chrestomathic character, and to contain a summary of what had been at all times, but especially during His last days, the chief matter of the Lord's discourses.

2. All the people came early in the morning, etc.: ὤρθριζε πρὸς αὐτόν.—Sought Him zealously (De Wette), according to Ps. lxxviii. 34, lxiii. 2, lxx. Better in the sense of: mane veniebat; see Luther, the Vulgate, Meyer, and Ewald. A reference to the undiminished desire of the people, who could scarcely wait for day, to betake themselves to Him, and who thereby showed that, so long as they were not yet entirely seduced and blinded by the Pharisees, they were able to appreciate their Prophet. A few days later, and we see all changed (see ch. xxiii. 18). This statement of St Luke is also remarkable, as showing that the few last days which the Lord spent in the temple must have been very long days, in which, therefore, there must have been sufficient time for as much as happened, for instance, on the Tuesday. We would, therefore, abide by the translation of Tertullian, diluculo conveniebant; though it was a less happy thought of Grotius to conclude, from the early concourse of so many auditors: apparet, non caruisse fructu monitum illud Christi ἀγρυπνεῖτε. So insufficient a proof of interest would by no means have been a fulfilment of this pregnant admonition: besides, it had been specially addressed to the Twelve, and not to the multitude.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the Critical Notes.

2. The intrepid tranquillity with which the Lord remained, as long as He chose, at the post assigned to Him, and continued to the end His daily custom, presents a striking contrast to the ever increasing restlessness and helplessness of His enemies. On this occasion also was the truth of the ancient scriptures, Prov. xxviii. 1, Isa. lvii. 21, manifested.

3. The undiminished audience which the Lord's discourses gained, even in His last days, is a fresh proof how voluntary and unconstrained was His surrender to the power of His enemies.

4. The secret of the undiminished power which the Lord displayed, during the last hours of His public ministry, is to be sought in His night on the Mount of Olives.

5. It is worthy of remark, that the Lord, so far as we know, performed no miracles on the last Tuesday and Wednesday of His life. The time for them was now past.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world: John ix. 5.—The Lord does not leave the temple till it is evident, to all eyes, that He leaves it a conqueror.—The hen is not tired of enticing her chickens, even when she already sees the distant approach of the eagle.—The Mount of Olives, the Lord's sanctuary for secret prayer.—The nightly consecration to the sufferings of Gethsemane.—The chief mountains of the Holy Land, highly important in the history of our Lord's life and passion. At the present juncture there lay behind Him the Mount of Temptation, where He overcame the evil one; the Mount of Beatitudes, where He announced the principles of His kingdom; the Mount of Transfiguration, whence He obtained a distant view of His sufferings and glory. Before Him still lay the Mount of Crucifixion, where the hardest battle was to be fought; and the Mount of Ascension, where the most splendid crown was to be acquired.—The last period of tranquillity before the last conflict.—How remarkable, yet how little to be depended on, is the undiminished interest felt by the people, to the last, in the teaching of Christ!—Ora et labora.

Starcke: When God's servants perceive that the end of their life is approaching, they must especially seek to be faithful in the discharge of their duty, and to conclude it in a laudable manner: 2 Pet. i. 13 and 14.—The servants of Christ must serve their Lord early and late, till their life's end: Acts xiii. 36; Isa. xl. 31.—Efforts for the salvation of others must be combined with prayer.—Quesnel: Oh, how happy and flourishing is the Church, when a people hungering after God's word have a faithful minister equally desirous of dispensing it! 1 Thess. iii. 6, 10; Rom. i. 11.—To neglect the worship of God and the hearing of His word, from regard to ease or convenience, cannot be excused before God: Ps. xlii. 5. —The love of a people for the word of God, and their thronging to hear it, encourage the shepherd; the diligence and zeal of the shepherd encourage the people: 1 Thess. ii. 8, 13; Prov. xxvii. 17. —Arndt, Predigten über das Leben Jesu iii. p. 182: The threefold elevation of Jesus: 1. The elevation of His body; 2. the elevation of His soul; 3. the elevation of His spirit. "If Jesus needed to recruit His strength and activity for His daily work, by retirement and prayer, we need it still more; and the unhappy ones, whose lives know no quiet hours, know not how much they lose. It is not in vain that the old proverb joins labour and prayer together, to show that prayer, though itself a work, is at the same time the highest joy, yea, the joy of joys,—the highest relaxation from work, and the highest consecration to it. They truly have done most who have prayed most; and hence the contents of the little rhyme—

> Halt dich rein
> Acht dich klein,
> Sei gern allein
> Mit Gott gemein—

are very suggestive.

THE HISTORY OF THE PASSION.

The Lord's private and familiar Farewell of His disciples, on the approach of the last Conflict.

1. The last preparatory Conspiracy of His Enemies, assisted by Judas. (CHAP. XXII. 1–6.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvi. 3–5, 14–16; Mark xiv. 1, 2, 10, 11.

1 Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Passover. 2 And the chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill Him; for they feared the people. 3 Then entered Satan into Judas surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve. 4 And he went his way, and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray Him unto them. 5 And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money. 6 And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray Him unto them in the absence of the multitude.

Ver. 3. Σατανᾶς, according to the reading of Tischendorf. The Receptus has ὁ σατανᾶς.

Ver. 4. After ἀρχιερεῦσι, Lachmann has καὶ τοῖς γραμματεῦσιν, according to C.P. cursive manuscripts.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. On the history of the Passion generally, and the literature concerning it, see Lange on Matt. xxvi.

2. With respect to the form of the history of the Passion, in Luke, it may be remarked, that, while there is much in it that is common to all the Evangelists, it yet contains not a little that is peculiar to itself. As well as Matthew, Mark, and John, he also narrates far more copiously this part of the history of Christ's life; for, while at the beginning of his Gospel he communicates the events of years in a few lines, he enables us, towards its conclusion, to accompany the Lord almost step by step upon His path of suffering. Like his predecessors, he gives the most decided prominence, on the one hand, to the innocence and greatness of the Lord, as displayed even in the presence of His enemies; and, on the other, to God's adorable control of events, in which, nevertheless, free agency is left to man. In the choice of what he relates or omits, he coincides more with Matthew and Mark than with John, who, even in his account of the Passion, has followed a course of his own. And yet we by no means find, in our Evangelist, a mere tame repetition and completion of what the two former Evangelists had already communicated; although it is undeniable that his narrative is, in some respects, inferior to theirs. His sequence of events is less chronologically accurate (as remarked by Bynäus, de morte Christi ii. pp. 12, 13): compare, e.g., his account of the celebration in the paschal chamber with those of Matthew and Mark. How much less complete, too, is his narrative of the sufferings of Gethsemane than those of the others; and, again, how brief and general are his notices of what took place in the house of Pilate! Nevertheless, it is to him that we are indebted for a number of incidents and hints, either casting light upon, or extending our acquaintance with, the last hours of our Lord's life. It is he alone who gives the names of the disciples who prepared the Passover (Peter and John, ch. xxii. 8), and the striking words with which the Lord commenced the repast. None of the Synopticists but himself mentions the strife of the disciples, ver. 24, which was probably the occasion of the Lord's washing of their feet, nor the remarkable speech, vers. 28–30. In the account of the agony at Gethsemane, it is he alone who mentions the strengthening angel and the bloody sweat, vers. 43, 44; preserving at the same time some remarkable sayings of the Lord. All the Evangelists relate Peter's denial, Luke alone tells of the look of the Lord; all relate the examination at night, he alone the official sitting of the Sanhedrim in the morning, vers. 66–71, which must not be confounded with the former. But for him, we should have remained ignorant of the first special accusation brought to Pilate by the Jews against Jesus, ch. xxiii. 2; the Lord's treatment at the hands of Herod, ch. xxiii. 5–16; His address to the women who were bewailing Him, vers. 27–31; His first saying on the cross, ver. 34; His words to the dying thief, vers. 39–43; His last dying cry, ver. 46; the behaviour of Joseph of Arimathea in the Jewish council, ver. 51; and many minor details. The special mention of the women who came in contact with the suffering Saviour, ch. xxiii. 27–31, 55, 56, is as peculiar to this Evangelist as his former communication respecting the ministry of the Galilean women, ch. viii. 2, 3. All these circumstances combined show that, in his history of the Passion, as well as in the previous parts of his Gospel, Luke is faithful to his character as a physician, a Hellenist, and a disciple of St Paul; and that the freshness and originality of his narrative demand that we should devote special consideration to it, even after the remarks that have already been made on those of Matthew and Mark. With respect, however, to such subjects as are common to the two last-named Evangelists, and especially to matters of chronology, archæology, and topography, we must, in order to avoid too great prolixity, refer our readers to Lange's excellent exposition of the passages in question.

3. Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, etc.—In the commencement of the history of the Passion, Luke agrees most with Mark, though he is less chronologically accurate than that Evangelist. The distinct transition in Matt. xxvi. 1, from the now concluded prophetic to the commencing priestly office of the Lord, is not so marked in Luke, though it is very plain that he also is beginning to narrate a fresh period of his history: "The feast of unleavened bread . . . called the Passover." An accurate paraphrastic reference to the whole period of the approaching festival (and not to its first evening alone), requisite for readers who were not acquainted from their own experience with the Israelitish Passover.

4. Sought how they might kill Him.—Here, especially, St Luke's account needs to be completed from Matt. xxvi. 3–5. It then appears that we have not to understand this of a mere indefinite and aimless ζητεῖν, but of a special assembling of a part of the Sanhedrim, probably the first ad hoc, after that recorded John xi. 47–53. This, being held in the palace of the high priest, was probably of a more private nature, and, for the most part, composed of such as were like-minded, the subject of discussion being generally πῶς ἀνέλωσιν αὐτόν. That they were desirous to be rid of Him at any cost, is already silently implied; but the subject of consultation at the present moment, was the ways and means by which it would be advisable to carry out their wishes; and that this required deliberation, as well as effort, is very evident: for they feared the people (comp. Mark xiv. 2; Matt. xxvi. 2). It was by no means their intention to get rid of Him before the feast (Neander); but they wanted to let the Passover go by, in order to seize upon a favourable opportunity immediately after. The execution of their murderous plan was, however, hastened, and the fulfilment of the Lord's prophecy secured (Matt. xxvi. 1, 2), by the base offer of Judas.

5. Then entered Satan.—Not referring to the completed resolve of the traitor (De Wette), but to a preliminary influence of Satan upon him, which by no means excludes a subsequent and definite possession (John xiii. 27). It was not all at once that Satan overcame the soul of the unhappy traitor; but his success was the consequence of repeated attacks. The plan was diabolical, and its execution not less so. For further details on the subject, see Matt. xxvi. 14–16. The anointing at Bethany, related by Matthew and Mark, is omitted by Luke; perhaps, because he had already (ch. vii. 36–50) related a somewhat similar occurrence. The offer of Judas probably took place on the Wednesday, after the Jewish council had broken up on the Tuesday evening, with the decision: Not on the feast-day.

6. Being of the number of the Twelve.—It is remarkable that this very circumstance is so emphatically announced by all the Evangelists. But the question is all the more natural, how one of the Twelve could have committed such a crime. That Judas was a man of distinguished talents, but more filled with carnal expectations than even the other disciples, cannot be seriously doubted. He only could be a devil to whom it had once been possible to become an angel. He now saw himself more and more deceived in his expectations, as he perceived Jesus refuse to make the use he desired Him to do of the enthusiasm of the people, and even suffer the Hosannas of the multitude to terminate in the praises of children.—This thwarted hope must have made him doubly susceptible of the feeling of wounded self-lové, when his covetousness was exposed, and himself humbled, in the eyes of all at Bethany. A Judas would naturally resent any severe words from a Nazarene, who would not be a Messiah, but merely a Rabbi. Perhaps, also, the pre-announcement of the σταυρωθῆναι of Matt. xxvi. 2 had given form and permanence to his thoughts of revenge, while his covetousness at the same time induced him to indemnify himself by treachery, for the loss he considered himself to have suffered by the anointing at Bethany. He seems scarcely to have reflected on the consequences of this step, but to have hurried on, as one intoxicated, along the dark pathway of crime, till his eyes were subsequently opened to his guilt in the most terrible manner. There is no foundation whatever for the notion, that he was desirous of forcing the Lord to deliver Himself from the hands of His enemies by force, or to manifest His dignity by a miracle. "What a mean nature must his have been, which could thus have exposed his holy Master to a danger, as so much capital capable of producing interest is risked in a speculation. This view does not give a more favourable character to Judas; but, instead of a diabolically desperate man, we have a rascal, of whom it is difficult to imagine that Jesus could have numbered him among His disciples." Ebrard. On the contrary, two among the Evangelists give us a very significant intimation, that the betrayal of Jesus, psychologically considered, cannot be quite understood, without the admission of direct satanic influence, an influence exerted not without the traitor's own fault, who willingly and obstinately opened his heart to it.

7. And the captains.—These were very closely interested in the matter, as forming the ecclesiastical police of the temple, which must have been sufficiently numerous for arresting and securing Jesus as a prisoner. They constituted the lower order of officials, under the command of the high priest, and were a Levitical body of officers, under the conduct of a στρατηγός; while the commanders of single posts are called στρατηγοί.

8. And they were glad, not only at the prospect of seeing their most ardent desires fulfilled, but also (Euthymius) because, even among the disciples of Jesus, a spirit of unfaithfulness and dislike was now beginning to be manifested. In this spirit they bind themselves (συνέθεντο) to give him money; and Judas, who enters into the bargain (ἐξωμολόγησεν), now immediately seeks for a convenient opportunity. Luke, as well as Mark, only speaks of money generally, without a nearer mention of the sum, which is named by Matthew. It is, however, entirely unfounded to see in the number of the pieces of silver, the result of a traditional construction of the history, in accordance with the prophecy of Zechariah; and even more so to regard this sum as a mere instalment of a far more considerable amount.

9. Without tumult (margin), ἄτερ ὄχλου, without a tumult of the multitude arising. See Acts xxiv. 18.—The poetical word ἄτερ is only used here and at ver. 35. Undoubtedly a quiet execution of his plan would be considered as desirable by Judas for his own sake, as it was necessary for the interests of the chief priests. Wickedness is always cowardly.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The hatred of the chief priests towards Jesus reached its climax at the last Passover. It is evident, especially from the fourth Gospel, that this hatred increased with every celebration, by the Lord, of the festivals at Jerusalem. His enemies themselves destroy the paschal joy of the Old Covenant, and unwittingly set about slaying the paschal victim of the New. There was no fear of God, only the fear of man, in their hearts; hence, their impotence was so great, that they would have been unable to carry out their plan, unless they had found an accomplice within the circle of Christ's own disciples.

2. With the mention of the treachery of Judas, the veil is lifted from the spirit-world, and the folly of those who refuse to believe in the personal agency of Satan made manifest. The evil one, having vainly endeavoured to vanquish the Lord in His own person, now sought to destroy His work, and to inflict on Him a mortal wound by means of one of His own disciples. The manner in which he now overcame Judas, after he had been for some time numbered among the disciples, affords a fresh proof of the truth of the serious words, ch. xi. 24–27. "Dicitur in reprobos intrare Satan, cum, reverso Dei metu, extincta rationis luce, pudore etiam excusso, sensus omnes occupat." Calvin.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The approach of the last Passover of the Old Covenant. The different manners in which the Lord and His enemies prepare for the celebration of the festival.—Daring and cowardice united in the Lord's enemies.—Two meetings: that of the Lord and His disciples, and that of the chief priests and scribes: 1. In the one, the tranquillity of innocence, in the other, the anxiety of wickedness; 2. in the one, certainty concerning what is to be suffered, in the other, uncertainty concerning what is to be done; 3. in the one, courageous expectation of danger, in the other, abject fear of the people.—The divine and human plan of suffering.—The first steps on the path of treachery: 1. Its preparation; 2. its carrying out; 3. its consummation.—The unusually great importance of a first step.—Satan about to overthrow, 1. Judas, 2. the Lord, 3. himself.—Hellish joy of the associates in crime.—The terrible power of money.—The cunning alliance of Judas with the enemies, contrasted with the simplicity of the faithful disciples, a fresh proof of the truth of the saying, Luke xvi. 8, etc.—Craft and covetousness allied against the Redeemer of the world: 1. The terrible nature of this alliance; 2. the impotence of this alliance; 3. the instruction to be derived from this alliance.—The greatest crime ever committed, the means of the greatest benefit ever bestowed upon the world.—The power and impotence of sin: 1. Its power: it has, a. powerful servants, b. strong weapons, c. willing allies. 2. Its impotence: it is unable, a. to cover its own shame, b. to shake the tranquillity of Jesus, c. to frustrate the counsel of God.—Judas, an example of the insufficiency of a merely external union with Christ.—Nothing is by chance, nothing without an end.—The manner as well as the hour of death, fore-appointed.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Sin may be omitted or postponed from the fear of man, while mortal designs against Jesus exist in the heart.—Like meets like.—Sin has its degrees.—Woe to avaricious priests!—Cramer: There is much unfaithfulness in the world, and a man's foes are often those of his own household.—Quesnel: He who has once yielded his heart to Satan, is capable of the greatest sins.—He who loves sin, soon finds an opportunity of practising it. —He who sins wilfully, seeks an opportunity; he who sins from infirmity, is overtaken by opportunity.—An evil promise is a great sin; but it is a greater, to keep the evil promise.—Heubner: Christ prepares to give Himself as a sacrifice, and His enemies to sacrifice Him to their hatred.—Judas, a type of those who estimate all religion, Christianity, and the virtue of mankind, by the profit they bring.—Jesus had value even for Judas.—Ask thyself whether thou wouldest be ready to surrender Jesus for anything that might be offered thee, whether there is a price at which thou wouldest sell thy faith, thy virtue.—Fr. Arndt: The sudden appearance of Judas before the council: 1. His coming; 2. his departure.—Tholuck, Predigt. iv. p. 326: Passion-week shows us, by the example of Judas, of what degree of obduracy the heart of that man is capable, who has once known the way of righteousness, 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21.

2. The Preparation of the Passover. (VERS. 7–13.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvi. 17–19; Mark xiv. 12–16.

7 Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed. 8 And He sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat. 9 And they said unto Him, Where wilt Thou that we prepare? 10 And He said unto them, Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water; follow him into the house where he entereth in. 11 And ye shall say unto the good-man of the house, The Master saith unto thee, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with My disciples? 12 And he shall show you a large upper room furnished: there make ready. 13 And they went, and found as He had said unto them: and they made ready the passover.

Ver. 11. See Critical Remarks 4.

CRITICAL REMARKS.

1. The Passover must be killed, ἔδει θύεσθαι.—It is truly an enigma how any could have found grounds in this definition of time given by Luke, and in the Lord's words as recorded Matt. xxvi. 18, for the notion that He partook of the Passover, one day earlier than other Israelites. The impression which the opening of this paragraph is calculated to make upon any unprejudiced mind, is rather that Luke is here speaking of the appointed day on which, according to the appointment of the law, the paschal lamb was to be slain. It would only be on this day that the question of the disciples, Matt. xxvi. 17, would be quite natural, while the manner in which the Lord opened the conversation at table (ver. 15), and which Luke alone has preserved, also shows that the Lord attributed a very high importance to this Passover. This, however, is not the place for discussing, at length, the old question concerning the day on which Christ suffered. We may be permitted merely to state, in few words, our own conviction, the result of special and repeated research, that both the synoptical Gospels and that of John teach us that the Lord ate the Passover on the fourteenth of Nisan, the day appointed by the law, contemporaneously with the other Jews, and that He suffered death upon the fifteenth. We believe that the reasons for this view given in Wieseler's Chronolog. Synopse, p. 339, etc., though opposed by Bleek, Tischendorf, and others, have not been refuted; and that there is also as little ground for regarding the repast, John xiii., as taking place on Wednesday evening, as for speaking of two repasts, and transferring them to the twelfth and thirteenth Nisan. We are not unacquainted with the objections made from an entirely different point of view, even after the convincing arguments of Wieseler; but we believe that these are, at all events, of infinitely less importance than the difficulties in which we should be involved by accepting an irreconcilable discrepancy between the Synopticists and St John. On the Easter controversy of the ancient Church, and its relation to the chronology of Passion-week, compare Riggenbach, a. a. O. p. 635, etc., where also the most modern literature on this subject is mentioned. See also Der Tag des letzten Paschenmahles Jesu Christi, a harmonistic essay by Serno, Berlin 1859.

2. And He sent Peter and John.—According to the more detailed account of Matthew and Mark, it was the disciples who first spoke to the Lord concerning the paschal supper, and probably on the Thursday morning at Bethany. Perhaps their Master might have been, at this time, more than usually silent; He certainly did not speak of the festival; and this enigmatical phenomenon, as well as the sight of the numerous frequenters of the feast, naturally gave rise to the question of the disciples: ποῦ θέλεις, κ.τ.λ. They silently took it for granted that their Lord would eat the Passover on the day on which it must be killed, and had perhaps, as yet, refrained from speaking of it, because their hearts were fuller of the announcement of His approaching death than of thoughts of festivity; or because they already had a dark foreboding that this Passover would be a very different one to them from any other they had partaken of; or because they were waiting for a direct indication from Jesus, before again betaking themselves to the capital, whence He had yesterday for the first time absented Himself. On comparing Luke with the other Synopticists, we may thus connect the accounts: that upon a preliminary ποῦ of the μαθηταί, the Lord gave Peter and John a direct commandment to set out; whereupon these latter naturally reiterated the ποῦ, and then received the mysterious direction concerning the man with the pitcher of water, which Matthew carries on no further. It is still simpler, if, with Tischendorf and others, we read εἶπαν, and so understand the matter, that the question, given in ver. 9, should, strictly speaking, stand before the command of ver. 8.

3. There shall a man meet you, etc.—A more circumstantial account of the condition in which they would find the prepared upper chamber, is given by Mark and Luke, without contradicting the more general one of Matthew. The Lord gave His disciples a sign, similar to that formerly given to Saul by Samuel, 1 Sam. x. 2–5. A man, who, although here mentioned as engaged in a lowly employment, need not on that account be supposed to be a slave (Sepp, iii. p. 390, even affirms that he was the slave of Nicodemus), but merely a person belonging to the lower orders. The fetching and carrying of water point, perhaps, to the domestic preparation for the approaching Passover, and would, in this case, so far serve as a subsidiary proof, that it was the usual Passover-day with which we are now concerned. Luke more accurately uses συναντήσει for the ἀπαντήσει of Mark: He will so meet you, that you shall be going the same way as he.

4. And ye shall say unto the good-man of the house.—Not a prophetic, but an imperative Future—Οἰκοδεσπότης τῆς οἰκ.; a pleonasm, not uncommon among the Greeks, in familiar diction.—The Master saith, etc. The remarkable words (Matt. xxvi. 18), "My time is at hand," are omitted by Mark and Luke, while they, on the other hand, give the message to the householder in the form of a question.—Τὸ κατάλυμα, place of resort, lodging-house, diversorium (Luke ii. 7); then, also, cœnaculum (see LXX., 1 Sam. ix. 22). Μου is here unauthentic, and is also superfluous in the parallel passage in Matthew.

5. And he, ἐκεῖνος; according to Mark, αὐτός, he himself.—The man with the pitcher having now enacted his part, the master of the house himself comes forward. The direction which the disciples received was so exact as to leave no uncertainty about the matter. They should find an upper room, ἀνάγαιον (which reading seems preferable to the ἀνώγεον of the Receptus, and the ἀνώγαιον recommended by Tischendorf, after B.M.S.) = ὑπερῷον, an upper floor, often used as a place of prayer, or meeting (comp. Acts i. 13). This large room (μέγα) is, besides, ἐστρωμένον, provided with cushions, stratis tricliniis; and thus, according to Mark, already ἕτοιμον, so that no time need be spent in preparing it.

6. And they went, etc.—We may suppose that the Apostles' path lay through the water-gate (Neh. viii. 1), by the pool of Siloam, which supplied almost the whole city with water, and that it was there that they met the man with the pitcher. There was, however, a spring in the neighbourhood of Cedron; hence, it is remarkable that the Lord should not have given them any direction concerning the road they were to take, but should only tell them what they would meet with on the way. It appears, from Mark xiv. 17, that the two disciples, after an exact fulfilment of their Master's commands, returned to Him, and that He entered the upper chamber with all the Twelve.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. It was consistent with the divine decorum of the history of the Passion, that the Lord should celebrate the Passover at Jerusalem at the time appointed by the law. If this had not been the legally appointed evening on which every Israelite was bound to partake of the paschal lamb, there would have been no reason why He should have entered the metropolis at the very time when He well knew His enemies were laying snares for Him. But now the path of obedience was literally the path of death; and the last solemnization of the Passover of the old dispensation was blended with the ordination of the Lord's Supper. By celebrating it in this manner, He for ever abrogated the old Passover, as He had abrogated circumcision, by submitting to it Himself on the eighth day, ch. ii. 21.

2. There are five possible answers to the inquiry, how we are to understand the announcement concerning the man with the pitcher of water. We have here either fiction, accident, preconcert, revelation, or superhuman knowledge. That it was fiction (De Wette, Strauss, Meyer), is entirely unproved. The analogy with Samuel proves nothing. The purpose, also, for which so seemingly unimportant a trait in the history of the Passion could have been invented, is also incomprehensible. The precision of the previous announcement, as well as its exact fulfilment, forbids our attributing it to accident. Previous agreement (not only Paulus, but also Olshausen, Kern, Krabbe, Neander, Braun, and, in a measure, even Lange) is certainly not impossible in itself. It is, in any case, imaginable that the Lord might have made a previous arrangement with some secret friend about the matter. The tone, however, of the command, the analogy with 1 Sam. x. 2–5, and the similarity to the occurrence with respect to the she-ass on our Lord's entry into Jerusalem, seem rather to indicate that we have here to deal with the supernatural. In the case of an ordinary prophet, we might here suppose a momentary revelation, annihilating the restraints of time and space before his enlightened glance; but, in the case of the Lord, we can see nothing less than the acting of that divine knowledge by which He was capable of fathoming all that it was necessary to His holy purpose to investigate. It cannot appear surprising that we should meet with a manifestation of this knowledge on this occasion, when we consider the singular importance of this celebration of the Passover, both to the Lord and His disciples. Undoubtedly the Lord became acquainted by natural means with His highly-honoured entertainer; it was, however, by His divine knowledge that He was assured of his readiness and willingness to receive Him, and that his servant would, on that very day, go to the spring before the town to fetch water. Thus the Lord, in the manner in which, like the shepherd, He spreads a table for His disciples in the presence of their enemies, manifests divine knowledge of a human heart, of a definite locality, and of a seemingly accidental occurrence. The idea that the Lord gave this command in so mysterious a form for the purpose of keeping Judas in ignorance of the place of celebration, and of thus uninterruptedly passing the evening with His friends (Theophylact, Neander, and others), cannot indeed be mathematically demonstrated, but is yet very probable on internal grounds. The result also shows that, in consequence of this arrangement, the traitor was not able to carry his design into execution till later in the night. In any case, this errand was an exercise of faith and obedience for Peter and John. They were taught thereby blindly to follow the Lord, even when they could not perceive the reason of His command; and for the future to trust unconditionally for the supply of their temporal necessities to Him, under whose leading they could lack nothing: Luke xxii. 35. At the same time, such manifestations of the Lord's hidden greatness would be a counterpoise to the depths of humiliation, into which He was soon about to fall. In the subsequent hours of darkness, they would undoubtedly cast many a retrospective glance at this mysterious journey and its satisfactory result.

3. This whole occurrence is a speaking proof of the Lord's greatness in small and apparently trifling matters. The arrangement now made shows the unshaken tranquillity which He maintained, in spite of the most certain foresight of His approaching death; His perfect obedience to the law till the moment of the abolition of the old dispensation; the holy presence of mind with which He encountered the secret attempt of the traitor; but, above all, the wisdom, love, and faithfulness with which He provided to the end for the education of His disciples, giving them, even in a little command, a great lesson of faith for the future. Thus did

He remain to the last, both in silence and in speaking, in frame of mind and mode of action, equal to Himself, going intrepidly and quietly as a lamb to the slaughter, at very nearly the same hour in which the paschal lamb was bought and slain.

4. According to the allegorical interpretation of this narrative by the Fathers, the water-pitcher is an image of the insipid and heavy law which was borne by the Jews; and the large upper room, of the abundant room for all whom the Lord invites to His spiritual supper: Luke xiv. 21–23; Rev. iii. 20, etc. More apt is the remark of John Gerhard, "Christus hac sua prædictione fidem discipulorum confirmare et contra crucis scandalum eos munire voluit, ut magis ac magis intelligerent, nihil temere in urbe magistro eventurum. It was because the Lord willingly humbled Himself to keep the Passover, like any other Israelite, that He caused His glory to pervade the manner in which He ordered the repast.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The value of trifles in general, and in sacred matters, and especially in the history of the Passion.—We men are often little in great things; the Lord is great in little things.—It was by His greatness in little things that He showed Himself to be, 1. the image of the invisible God, 2. the perfect Redeemer of the world, 3. the best guide of His people, 4. the noblest model for imitation. —The Lord, even on the last day of His life, faithful to the principle He expressed on His first appearing, Matt. iii. 16.—Peter and John here, as frequently, united: John xx. 1; Acts iii. 1, iv. 19.—In every perplexity, disciples must apply to Jesus.—Even the man bearing the pitcher of water must not be wanting in the history of the Passion.—The importance of seemingly mean and subordinate persons in the carrying out of God's counsels; e.g., 2 Kings v. 2; Acts xii. 13, xxiii. 16.—There is more evil, and also more good, than are apparent to the superficial glance.—Even in the most corrupt city, Jesus finds secret friends, and knows them.—"I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me:" Rev. iii. 20.—The best that His friends have in the house, is not too good for the Lord.—The obedience of faith is never shamed.—The true disciple of Jesus is faithful, not only in great matters, but also in trifles.—He loved His own unto the end: John xiii. 1.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: How ought we to prepare and dispose ourselves for the right participation of the Paschal Lamb of the New Testament, in His feast of love? 1 Cor. xi. 28.—Not our, but Thy will be done, O Lord! Acts xxi. 14.—God provides His people with food and dwelling, though they may have nothing of their own in the world, 1 Kings xvii. 9.—It is an indisputable proof of the truth and divinity of Scripture, that we find everything in the world such as the word of God describes it.—Heubner: In the midst of His great vocation, Jesus thought even of the smaller occasions of showing love.—The disciples obey willingly, and without making the objections they might easily have done.—Besser: They did, with beautiful simplicity, exactly as the Lord commanded; this was the right disposition for the Lord's Supper.—Fr. Arndt: 1. The meaning of the paschal feast; 2. the preparation for it.

3. The Passover and the Lord's Supper. (VERS. 14–23.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvi. 20–29; Mark xiv. 17–25; John xiii. 21–35.

14 And when the hour was come, He sat down, and the twelve apostles with Him. 15 And He said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: 16 For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. 17 And He took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves: 18 For I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. 19 And He took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is My body, which is given for you: this do in remembrance of Me. 20 Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in My blood, which is shed for you. 21 But, behold, the hand of him that betrayeth Me is with Me on the table. 22 And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom He is betrayed! 23 And they began to inquire among themselves, which of them it was that should do this thing.

Ver. 14. The δώδεκα of the Receptus is expunged by Lachmann and Tischendorf, on the authority of B.D. 157, Sahid. Ital. etc.

Ver. 16. I will no more eat it. Αὐτό for the ἐξ αὐτοῦ of the Receptus, according to the reading of Tischendorf (B.L. etc.).

Ver. 17. A cup. The τό which A.D.K.M.N. and some cursive manuscripts have, and which is also received by Lachmann, seems to have been early inserted in many manuscripts from the ritual form, but yet to be unauthentic.

Ver. 22. For truly. The Receptus has καί; Tischendorf, according to B.D.L. and others, ὅτι.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. A careful comparison of the Gospel of St Luke with the accounts of the other Evangelists, will convince us, on the one hand, that they all speak of the same repast and the same discovery of the traitor; while, on the other, we shall be obliged to concede that the chronological order in Luke is not strictly accurate. It is not without completing his narrative by those of his fellow-labourers, that we are able to picture to ourselves the whole occurrence. It is not the sequence of events, during each successive moment of the festal celebration, but the marked contrast exhibited between the disposition of the disciples and the words of their Master, to which prominence is given by our Evangelist, who, even now when he is leading us into the paschal chamber, shows more of the painter than of the strictly accurate historian.

2. The hour.—The ὥρα appointed by the law; in Matthew and Mark, ὀψίας. On the manner of celebrating the Passover, see Lange on Matt. xxvi. 20, and Friedlieb, Archäologie der Leidensgeschichte, § 18, etc. Compare Lightfoot, Wetstein, Sepp, and others; though it is very questionable whether all the practices adduced were in use in our Lord's days. It should also be remarked, that the Gospel narrative by no means gives the impression that the Lord celebrated the Passover, even in the smallest peculiarities, according to existing usage. The contrary might almost be supposed, when we remember that, while rendering all obedience to the law, He preserved a becoming liberty with respect to ritual tradition; and that He was now less concerned for a strictly arranged celebration, for its own sake, than for an hour of undisturbed intercourse, of tranquil leave-taking and prayer, with His disciples.

3. He sat down.—Though a standing participation of the Passover was originally prescribed, Exod. xii. 11, it was afterwards customary to recline at table, as at any other repast; probably as a symbol of the liberty which Israel had obtained by the departure from Egypt, since only slaves were accustomed to stand during meals. With regard to the order in which the present company were seated, little can be stated with certainty, except that it is apparent, from John xiii. 23, that John had the place nearest to the Lord, while Peter was not next to John, but only near him, since he did not speak, but merely beckoned to him (John xiii. 24), about what he wanted to ask him. The Lord Himself took the place of the presiding head of the family; and the moment of His commencing the celebration is that presented to us by St Luke, vers. 15 and 18. Perhaps He spoke the words, vers. 15 and 16, instead of the customary thanksgiving to God, who had given this day to His people.

4. With desire I have desired.—A Hebraism; ἐπιθυμίᾳ ἐπεθύμησα: comp. the LXX. Num. xi. 4; Ps. cvi. 14. Even this first word shows the frame of mind in which the Lord commenced the Passover, and which continued to be His prevailing disposition throughout the evening. His sufferings were so clearly before His eyes, that He no more expressly alluded to them, but took for granted that their approach was now sufficiently recognised. He had, for a long time, desired to eat this special Passover; and did not intend thereby the Supper of the New Testament (Tertullian, and other Fathers), but the Jewish festival, which, during one and twenty years, had been acquiring higher dignity and deeper significance for His heart. He had especially desired to eat it with His disciples: μεθ' ὑμῶν. He felt that He was not only the Redeemer, but the friend of His disciples; and He particularly longed for such a meeting, for the sake of the now approaching institution of the Lord's Supper. It is as though He forgot the presence of Judas, and knew Himself to be in the midst of a circle of faithful and sincere friends, from whom, however, He was soon to be separated. Hence, from the very beginning, He gave the festival the character of a parting repast, and thus prepared His disciples for the ordination of the feast that was to commemorate His death.

5. For I say unto you, etc.—It is evident that the Lord must, either before or after these words, have partaken of at least some part of the repast, as He Himself intimates (ver. 15.). He here only declares that He shall celebrate no Jewish Passover after the present, ἕως ὅτου πληρωθῇ ἐν τῇ βασιλ. τοῦ Θεοῦ, i.e., not till all is fulfilled which must be fulfilled in My kingdom of grace (Starcke); neither must ὁ χαιρός, or any such word, be supplied, but simply τὸ πάσχα. To conclude from this passage, that the Lord expected a paschal celebration, properly so called, at the manifestation of His kingdom in glory, is entirely arbitrary; since it is sufficiently evident that He is here, as frequently elsewhere, describing the joys of the perfected kingdom of the Messiah under the image of a feast. The Passover will not be fulfilled till its external form, being entirely abolished, the eternal idea—a perfect feast of liberation—shall be fully realized. The Lord is alluding to the "eternal festival of His glorified Church in His kingdom, to the bright image of the eternal supper, a foretaste of which He was now about to institute in the communion of the New Testament." Lange.—In the kingdom of God = ἐν παρουσίᾳ μου. As the Lord saw in the paschal lamb an image of His own spotless sacrifice, so did He see in the paschal solemnity a symbolical reference to the perfect joy of heaven.

6. The (A) cup.—Meaning no other than that with which the festival had, ex officio, begun. The word εὐχαριστήσας seems to denote that the Lord had already pronounced the accustomed blessing: "Praise to thee, O Lord, our God, the King of the world, who hast created the fruit of the vine." Perhaps we perceive its echo in the words of ver. 18, ἀπὸ τοῦ γεννήματος τῆς ἀμπέλου. The injunction, Take this and divide it among yourselves (ἑαυτοῖς), certainly seems to point out that the Lord declined partaking of the paschal cup; nevertheless, it may be concluded, from the following words (ver. 18), that as the Lord did not utter the words of vers. 15 and 16 till He had eaten, so neither did He say these till after He had drunk. In any case, the drinking of the paschal cup was not prescribed by the law, as the eating of the paschal lamb was; so that the Lord might easily disregard the customary forms without incurring the charge of irregular, irreligious, or offensive conduct.—Until the kingdom of God shall come, etc. Naturally, in glory, as ver. 16. That the Lord should repeat the same words, in a somewhat altered form, after the institution of the Lord's Supper, as related Matt. xxvi. 29 and Mark xiv. 25, cannot in itself be considered incredible.

7. And He took bread, etc.—The institution of the Lord's Supper, which Luke now proceeds to narrate, certainly did not precede the strife which should be the greatest, vers. 24–27, nor the washing of the disciples' feet, John xii.: see below. Luke evidently makes the sacrament, and not the Passover, the chief object in his narrative, and probably takes occasion to relate the strife, ver. 24, on account of the discord which arose touching the uncertainty with respect to the person of the traitor. A careful comparison of the Gospel narratives has led us to adopt the following sequence of events, during the time passed in the paschal chamber: 1. Commencement of the repast (Luke xxii. 15–18). 2. Almost simultaneously, or even before, the strife for precedence, vers. 24–27 (comp. John xiii. 1–17). 3. Further sayings of the Lord (John xiii. 18–20; Luke xxii. 28–30). Meantime the continuation of the repast, certainly more by the disciples than by the Lord, and the participation of the second cup, which is not expressly named in the Gospels. 4. Discovery of the traitor (Matt. xxvi. 21–25; Mark xiv. 18–21; Luke xxii. 21–23; John xiii. 21–30). 5. After his departure, the institution of the Lord's Supper, in which may very probably be inserted John xiii. 34, 35. Thus, although it might be inferred from the narrative of St Luke, independently and literally considered, that Judas was still present when the Lord's Supper was instituted, yet a comparison of all the accounts makes the reverse evident; and consequently, all doctrinal discussions on the reception of the Lord's Supper by the unworthy Judas, with all the inferences deduced therefrom, are without a firm historical basis.

8. This is My body.—The institution of the Lord's Supper took place, then, before the third cup, which was consequently consecrated as the cup of the New Testament. The Lord then took up one of the remaining Passover-cakes, and pronounced the words of institution. With regard to the report of the words, it is apparent, at the first glance, that Matthew agrees most closely with Mark, and Luke with Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 23, etc.; so that the genuine Pauline character of this Gospel is preserved in this passage also. Rather than agree to the notion that the Lord repeated the words of institution more than once, in more or less modified forms, we would consider the words which all the accounts concur in representing Him to have uttered as genuine; while those which each Evangelist reports differently, must be judged according to their internal probability. With the words, This is My body, Luke has τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν διδόμενον. These words are probable on internal grounds, on account of their parallelism with the subsequent, "which is shed for you," and are by no means discrepant with 1 Cor. xi. 24; since κλώμενον is decidedly unauthentic. In conformity with the context, διδόμενον may be understood merely of a surrender to death, while ὑπέρ need not here necessarily imply the idea of substitution, but may be translated in general terms, in commodum vestrum.

9. This do in remembrance of Me.—These words, at the distribution of the bread, are given only by Luke and Paul; but are internally probable, as well on account of those immediately following at the giving of the cup, as of the character of the solemnity, which was to be a perpetual memorial of Christ's death. If we were to accept the view (of Stier, Nitzsch, and others), that the words of St Paul, ἐγὼ γὰρ παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου, refer to a direct revelation, in which the glorified Lord dictated to His Apostle the form of institution which he delivered, the accuracy of Luke's account, with its Pauline colouring, would be raised above all doubt. There is, however, nothing in the Apostle's words to compel us to understand them of an extraordinary revelation, since he may have meant thereby, the evangelical tradition which had come to his knowledge.

10. Μετὰ τὸ δειπνῆσαι.—It was usual for the third cup to go round when the company had finished eating: hence, we are not obliged to conclude, from this expression, that the paschal celebration was entirely concluded for this evening; since a fourth, and even a fifth cup formed a part of it, as well as the singing of a hymn, Matt. xxvi. 30. The institution of the Lord's Supper may therefore be viewed as a separate act, during the course of the paschal solemnity, though it is not probable that the latter, at least so far as eating was concerned, was still continued according to the custom of the supper. The Lord (according to Matt. and Mark) now calls this cup τὸ αἷμα μου τῆς διαθήκης, while, according to Luke and Paul, He speaks of ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη ἐν τῷ αἵματί μου. Whichever expression, however, may have been the original, its meaning is not difficult to understand. As the Old Covenant was not instituted without blood (Exod. xxiv. 8, comp. Heb. ix. 16), so was the New Covenant, which God concluded with men (Jer. xxxi. 31–34), brought about and sealed by the blood of Christ. It is said of this blood (Matt. and Mark), that it is shed ὑπὲρ or περὶ πολλῶν; according to Luke, τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐκχυνόμενον. It might almost be supposed that the latter was the original, the former, on the contrary, a subsequent ecclesiastically appointed formulary. The purpose of His bloodshedding is, however, by no means limited by the πολλῶν, as though it had taken place for many, but not for all; on the contrary, the purpose is thereby extended as far as possible, by being made to embrace not only the Apostles, but also many besides.

On a review of the whole formula of the dispensation of the bread and wine, we feel constrained to understand the τοῦτο, of the piece of broken bread, and of the wine in the cup, which He delivered to His disciples. That the Lord did not once use the much discussed ἐστίν in His speech, is as certain, as that it must of necessity be supplied for its completion. He meant to say that the broken bread, which He at that moment was delivering to them, represented His body, and that they were to perform the act which they were just about to engage in (τοῦτο ποιεῖτε)—viz., to eat the bread delivered to them as a memorial of Him—"in remembrance of Me." The same was the case with the cup, etc. It is far plainer, from the accounts of Paul and Luke, than from those of Matthew and Mark, that the Lord was now prescribing an abiding memorial for those who should confess Him for all coming ages. Finally, we shall appreciate the adaptation of this symbolical act to the necessities of the moment, in the case of the disciples, if we, in some measure, place ourselves in their circumstances, and consider the severe trials which they were that very night to experience.

11. But, behold, the hand.—"Luke gives this allusion to the traitor (which is peculiar to him, and introduced without further notice) in the wrong place." Meyer. It is evident that he is merely intent on giving a summary notice of an isolated circumstance, which he is desirous neither to pass over in silence, nor to give in greater detail. We cannot possibly agree with Stier, that a preliminary notification of the traitor was given, Matt. xxvi. 21–25, before the institution of the Lord's Supper; and that this was followed by a second notification, communicated by Luke alone, ver. 22. The horror and whispered questionings of the eleven are only conceivable, if this was the first time they had heard of it. Least of all, can we suppose this twofold notification to have been uttered on two different evenings, or even a repetition of the information on the same evening. There remains, then, no other view than that Luke has reported the Lord's words concerning Judas more κατὰ διάνοιαν than κατὰ ῥητόν, which is also apparent from the incomplete form in which he has recorded (ver. 22) the woe pronounced upon Judas (comp. Matt. xxvii. 24; Mark xiv. 21). It is the commencement of the discovery of the traitor, as it is subsequently the commencement of the paschal solemnity, to which Luke gives special prominence.

12. With Me upon the table.—There is a very delicate distinction in the remark of Bengel: "With Me, mecum, non vobiscum ait. Proditorem igitur a reliquis discipulis segregans, sibi uni jam cum isto, tanquam hoste quidem, rem esse docet." If, however, we understand Luke to be merely referring to the principal matter, it is certainly unnecessary to paraphrase, with the above-named author, the words "manus quæ sacram cœnam sumsit." As justly may we insert the idea, that the hand which had just been used in partaking of the Passover, was now stretched over the table. Both the grief of the Apostles and the emotion of the Lord are evident from these words, while His long-suffering is specially manifested in His still bearing with the society of the traitor, whose base design He penetrates. The form πλὴν ἰδού, showing, as it does, that a fresh subject of discourse is introduced, justifies us in abstaining from seeking any direct connection between vers. 21 and 20. According to our view, this saying is but a freer version of what we read, Matt. xxvi. 21; Mark xiv. 18; John xiii. 21; while ver. 22 (see parallel passages) seems to have been spoken a few moments after.

13. For the Son of man, etc.—ὅτι gives the reason why the Lord, on this as on a former occasion (Matt. xxvi. 2), could speak of a παραδιδόναι. The Son of man verily goeth κατὰ τὸ ὡρισμένον, Matt. and Mark, καθὼς γέγραπται and indeed περὶ αὐτοῦ. According to the counsel of God, previously announced in the prophetic Scriptures, the Son of man must necessarily die; but this necessity by no means did away with the responsibility of him who willingly became the instrument of His death (πλὴν οὐαί). A word of warning for Judas, to open his eyes on the very brink of the precipice, before he takes the decisive step. It is with a wonderful mixture of compassion and indignation that the Lord reflects upon the fate which threatens the traitor. Fully conscious of His dignity, He feels that no other crime could be on a level with this; and, perfectly acquainted with the mysteries of eternity, He sees that no recovery from his dreadful misery is to be expected. The expression which He adds (according to Matthew and Mark) would have been too strong, if He had seen, in the extreme distance, a single ray glimmering across the darkness of Judas' eternal condemnation. "It is an inconceivable fall and an inconceivable curse which He thus distinguishes. The woe which He pronounces upon Judas, is a woe from the depths of His soul,—He mourns over the man from his very birth. He is so absorbed in the woe of this man, for time and for eternity, that He can, in contemplating it, forget His own, which the object of His concern is preparing for Him." Lange.

14. And they began (comp. Matt. xxvi. 22; Mark xiv. 19; John xiii. 22, etc.).—A graphic description of the disputation which now arose among them. The circumstance that Luke does not narrate the conclusion of the tragic scene, is a fresh proof that he is here by no means concerned for the completeness of his narrative. Comp. further the critical remarks on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See the reflections on the parallel passages in Matthew, Mark, and John.

2. The Lord's desire to eat this Passover with His disciples, is one of the most striking manifestations of His all-surpassing love for sinners, recorded in the Gospels. It is as though He were longing for the death that was to give life to the world. But the prospect, given on this occasion, of a perfect festival in the kingdom of God, encourages us to assert, that His own blessedness, capable as it is of infinite increase, will not be complete until the kingdom of God is fully come, and that He longs no less to have His people with Him, than they can to be with Him.

3. We cannot sufficiently admire the greatness and wisdom manifested by the Lord in the institution of His Supper. It was calculated to assure His disciples, who had never been able to believe in His death, that it was really at hand; to place this death, which was so abhorrent to them, in the most consolatory light, εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτ.; and, thus, to unite them in the closest manner to each other, to the Lord, and to believers in all subsequent ages. The institution of the Lord's Supper was not the fruit of a momentary suggestion, or of a sudden emotion, but evidently the result of a carefully devised plan. To the assured foreknowledge of His approaching sufferings, the Lord united a clear perception of the blessed effects of His death; to His love for His disciples, which made Him entirely forgetful of Himself, a wisdom which determined Him to provide, during this very repast, and at its most appropriate period, a means of strengthening their faith, their love, and their hope; and to care for them, a holy institution, for the refreshment, the union, and edification of His flock, in all after-ages. Never can His Church be sufficiently grateful for the rich treasure He has bequeathed to her in this holy ordinance.

4. That the Lord's Supper, which was designed for the union of all believers in Jesus Christ, should become the very cause of the most violent strife, is certainly one of the saddest phenomena which the history of Christendom and of the Reformation exhibits. Never did the apple of discord produce a sadder impression, than when it was thrown upon the table of love. Hence it is the more a matter of rejoicing, that the blessing of the Lord's Supper does not necessarily depend upon our interpretation of the words of its institution. With respect to the latter, we need only place ourselves on the stand-point of the disciples, and ask how they understood their Master, and we perceive immediately the absurdity of the doctrine of transubstantiation. To say this, is not, however, to assert, that there are not also many difficulties in the strictly Lutheran, or in the Old Reformed interpretation. Strauss was right when he wrote, with more impartiality than many dogmatists, "The bread of the Lord's Supper was, to the writers of the Gospels, the body of Christ; but if they had been asked, whether the bread was therefore changed, they would have denied it; if a partaking of the body, together with and under the appearance of bread, had been spoken of, they would not have understood it; if it had been inferred, that therefore the bread merely signified the body, they would not have been satisfied with such an inference." It were to be wished that all Christians were united in the view that, in the Lord's Supper, there is not merely a symbolical celebration of the death of Christ, but a real communication of Christ Himself to His believing people, so that He gives Himself to them, to be beheld and fed upon, in all the fulness of His redeeming love. That the idea of the Lord's Supper forms the background of John vi., though the instruction there given has no direct reference to that ordinance, cannot be doubted. If the mystery of real personal communion with Christ be but believingly recognised, as the mystery of the Lord's Supper, the subordinate question, whether this communication of Himself to His disciples takes place in a corporeal, or in an exclusively spiritual manner, need not really separate the members of the evangelical Church. That the strictly Zwinglian interpretation has its truth, but does not contain the whole truth, is more and more recognised by the orthodox Christian theology of the Reformed Church. Compare the excellent monograph of Ebrard, 1845, and, on the Lutheran side, that of Kahnis, 1851, not to mention the various treatises on this subject in Rudelb. and Guerike's Zeitschrift für lutherische Theologie. Critical researches on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper have been made, with a somewhat negative result, by L. J. Ruckert of Jena. A very important article on this subject has been contributed to Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, by Julius Muller. For further information, the history of doctrines must be referred to.

5. We might well believe that the discovery of the traitor was one of the most striking and extraordinary moments in the Lord's life, even if this were not made so apparent in the evangelical narratives, and even in the short report of St Luke. The tranquillity, the long-suffering, and self-command of Jesus, on the one hand, and His seriousness, indignation, and wrath, on the other, are so much the more worthy of our reverential admiration. The first separation which now took place between light and darkness, in the circle of the disciples, was the beginning of a continual process of purgation, and a prophecy of the κρίσις of the last day.

6. He heartily desired to die for us: should not we heartily desire to live to Him? Christ is more desirous to bestow His benefits upon us, than we are to receive them from Him.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The last evening passed by the Lord with His disciples.—The Lord's desire for the last Passover: 1. How it was shown; 2. whence it arose; 3. to what it should incite us.—The paschal cup, the Lord's last bodily refreshment before His sufferings.—The feast of the redeemed, in the kingdom of God, the fulfilment and explanation of the Jewish Passover.—We also have a Paschal Lamb, even Christ, who was sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. v. 7.—The agreement and difference between the Passover of the Old and the Supper of the New Testament. By both, 1. a completed deliverance was sealed, 2. a blessed communion instituted, 3. a glorious prospect opened: the Passover points to the Lord's Supper, the Lord's Supper to the marriage of the Lamb, Rev. xix. 9.—The noblest gifts of nature consecrated as symbols of grace.—The testament of love.—The institution of the Lord's Supper considered in its high importance, 1. to the Lord, 2. to His Apostles, 3. to all succeeding ages.—The communion, 1. of the Lord with His people, 2. of believers with each other, 3. of earth with heaven, in the Lord's Supper.—"Do this in remembrance of Me:" 1. A significant, 2. a holy, 3. a salutary command.—The feast of the New Testament, 1. a fulfilment of what was only intimated in the Old, 2. a prophecy of what will be one day enjoyed at the heavenly feast.—The institution of the Lord's Supper, a manifestation of the Lord's royal, priestly, and prophetic offices.—The high importance attributed by the Lord to His passion and death, beyond any other moment of His appearing upon earth.—The institution of the Lord's Supper, inexplicable to those who see in the Lord's death merely a corroboration of His teaching, a striking manifestation of the pardoning love of God, but no true sacrifice for sin.—The sacrament of the Lord's Supper, 1. a commemorative feast, 2. a covenant feast, 3. a love feast.—How the Lord, in His Supper, gives Himself, 1. to be looked upon, 2. enjoyed, 3. adored by His people.—The devil among the disciples, John vi. 70.—Jesus contrasted with Judas: 1. His spotless purity, with the enormous crime; 2. His infallible knowledge, with the deep delusion; 3. His unshaken tranquillity, with the tormenting restlessness; 4. His boundless love, with the burning hatred of the traitor.—Jesus acquainted with all hearts.—The discovery of the traitor shows us, 1. what the Lord once suffered on earth, 2. what He now is in heaven, 3. what He will do at the end of the world.—Jesus glorified by the way and manner in which He discovered the traitor: comp. John xiii. 30, 31. On this occasion He manifested, 1. a knowledge, not to be deceived by any appearance; 2. a grief, undefiled by any weakness; 3. a love, uncooled by any wickedness; 4. a wrath, unaccompanied by any ignoble passion.—The night of the betrayal, 1. on its dark, 2. on its bright side.—A greater than David is here: Ps. xli. 10.—When the Lord utters a general warning, none of His disciples must be indifferent, but each is bound to examine himself.

Starcke, Bibl. Wurt.: Oh, how great was the desire of Jesus for the salvation of men!—Quesnel: One communion paves the way to another; they who here receive Christ sacramentally, shall be united with Him in heaven.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: We should, after Christ's example, hallow all our food and drink by prayer, 1 Cor. x. 31.—If the foretaste of the divine goodness is so sweet and pleasant here, what will the full enjoyment of salvation be?—The Lord's Supper must be our best cordial and refreshment when oppressed by affliction, or threatened by death.—The Lord's Supper mutilated, if the cup be denied.—Everything is done according to the providence, but not everything according to the will of God.—Genuine proofs of a true Christian, to do good to his enemies, and to let them share his cup and sit at his table: Rom. xii. 20.—Nova Bibl. Tub.: Nothing more needful than self-examination.—We cannot answer for our own hearts without God's grace.—Many a one thinks that cannot happen to him, which yet does happen.—Heubner: In all partings, let the Spirit of Christ unite our hearts.—The hope of eternal reunion in the presence of Christ alleviates the pain of separation.—The righteous are always concerned lest there should be some secret evil in them.—Christ Himself attributes atoning power to His death.—The love of Christ will gather His people to Himself.—F. Arens: The Lord's Supper: 1. The blessed mystery; 2. the rich fount of blessings; 3. the required frame of mind.—Florey: The Lord's Supper, a feast of love: 1. Love instituted it; 2. it reminds us of love; 3. love celebrates it; 4. love blesses it.—The Lord's Supper, the happiest solemnity of God's house: 1. A time of holy remembrance, 2. of happy communion, 3. of brotherly fellowship.—Harless: The tree of the new creation of Christ.—Arndt: The institution of the Lord's Supper.—The unmasking of the traitor, a sign of, 1. divine omniscience, 2. holy love, 3. firm resolution.—Krummacher: The woe upon Judas: 1. The terror of this woe; 2. the limits of its application.—J. Saurin, Nouv. Serm. i. p. 45, Sur la sentence de notre Seigneur contre Judas,—van der Palm: The Lord's greatness manifested in the institution of the Lord's Supper.—W. Hofacker: Where does the Lord's Supper place us?—Thomasius: Judas. The descent to the abyss: 1. The evil desire in the heart; 2. the sin against the conscience; 3. the judicial obduracy.—Bockel: Jesus in the presence of His betrayer.

4. Discourse at Table, and Farewell Words. (VERS. 24–38.)

Vers. 31–38, partly parallel with Matt. xxvi. 30–35; Mark xiv. 27–31; John xiii. 36–38.

24 And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. 25 And He said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. 26 But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. 27 For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth. 28 Ye are they which have continued with Me in My temptations: 29 And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me; 30 That ye may eat and drink at My table in My kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. 31 And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat: 32 But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. 33 And he said unto Him, Lord, I am ready to go with Thee, both into prison, and to death. 34 And He said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest Me. 35 And He said unto them, When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye anything? And they said, Nothing. 36 Then said He unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one. 37 For I say unto you, That this that is written must yet be accomplished in Me, And He was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning Me have an end. 38 And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And He said unto them, It is enough.

Ver. 31. This abrupt commencement, like that in ch. vii. 31, is somewhat doubtful. See Tischendorf.

Ver. 34. Until, ἕως, according to the reading of B.L. cursive manuscripts, Lachmann and Tischendorf, which seems preferable to the πρὶν ἤ of the Receptus.

Ver. 37. Ἔτι is expunged by Lachmann and Tischendorf, according to A.B.D.H.L.X., etc. Perhaps it was an early addition, for the sake of giving this prediction more emphasis with relation to what precedes and follows. On the other hand, it is quite conceivable that it may have been early and involuntarily omitted on account of the immediately preceding ὅτι.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Vers. 24–30 are peculiar to Luke. Ewald rightly remarks, p. 348, "Luke here places together a number of sayings of Jesus, which, according to Matthew and Mark, were spoken, some later, some earlier; as though this sublime part of His history were specially adapted for uniting with the words with which the Lord's Supper was instituted, these thoughts on the fidelity of His disciples." It cannot be supposed that the contention of the disciples was renewed after the institution of the Supper and the discovery of the traitor. It must therefore be placed, together with the warnings accompanying it, before both these events. Perhaps it was the very thought of their Master's approaching departure which caused the inquiry among the disciples, which among them all was worthy to preside over their community; or, perhaps, some might have been displeased with the places they occupied at the table. This seems, to us at least, more probable than that the difference arose on the question, as to which should perform the hitherto postponed act of washing the feet of the others before the repast. For although it is highly probable that this strife may have given occasion to the washing of their feet by Jesus—before, or during which, the words, vers. 25–27, might well have been uttered—yet this act, and therefore these words of the Lord, seem to belong to the beginning of the meal, and not to have preceded it. However this may be, the strife of the disciples gave rise not only to a symbolical act, but also to a special exhortation.

2. The kings of the Gentiles.—A commencement well calculated to make them feel that the disposition they were now showing was, in fact, a heathen one, and, in this manner, to make them truly ashamed of it. It is well known how often the name, Euergetes, was bestowed on Roman emperors and other princes, e.g., Ptolemy Euergetes, and others. The Apostles were but too plainly showing that they were animated by the same spirit as those who were well pleased to receive such flattery.

3. But ye shall not be so.—The Lord acknowledges that His disciples are, in certain respects, kings; but He would have them distinguished, in a very important respect, from earthly princes, in the exercise of their royal rights. They were to consider it an exaltation to be abased, and to look upon loving service as the summit of true greatness; and not till they did this, would they be truly subject to the unchangeable and fundamental law of the kingdom of God, nor bear indeed the image of its King. He who was really the greatest among them, would know how to become as the younger, νεώτερος, whose office it would naturally be to serve the rest (Acts v. 6, 10); and, in like manner, the dux gregis must prove his superiority by showing himself the most zealous diaconus. Far from levelling all differences of rank and office in the circle of His disciples, the Lord here recognised an actual aristocracy within the sphere of Christianity; but it is an aristocracy of humility, which He indeed not merely required, but also exemplified in His own person.

4. For whether is greater, etc.—Though it is true that this reference to the washing of the disciples' feet is not necessarily a direct one, since the Lord might also have called Himself the διάκονος of His disciples, by reason of His behaviour during the whole meal, as well as of His entire self-surrender, yet, on the other hand, it is equally certain that no more fitting motto could be found for the picture drawn by St John of this act, than the saying, "I am among you as he that serveth," preserved by Luke alone. He appeals to the position which He, at this time, filled among them,—a position from which all appearance of superiority was absent. He had formerly expressed the same idea in words (Matt. xx. 25–28); He now adds the deed to the word.

5. Ye are they, etc.—If we view vers. 28–30 as spoken uno tenore with vers. 25–27, the most natural connection of ideas is certainly, that the Lord makes the true exaltation of His disciples follow upon this humiliation, by assuring them of their future glory in His Messianic kingdom. We do not, however, see what there is against the supposition that these latter words were uttered somewhat later in the evening. The assertion (De Wette, Strauss), that these words are found here, independent of any historical connection, and contain only a modified repetition of the promise given in Matt. xix. 28, is quite arbitrary. It seems to us far more probable that they formed part of the discourse after the washing, and before the discovery of the traitor, of which St John also has communicated some passages. They would not be unsuitably placed if joined to John xiii. 20, and well agree with the manner in which the Lord now praised and encouraged His faithful disciples, after He had cast a warning glance at the traitor, ver. 11, etc. He seems, in the midst of His increased emotion, to feel the necessity of turning His thoughts towards those who were faithful, and of showing them how dear they were to Him, in spite of the grief caused by the unfaithful Apostle.

6. Continued . . . in My temptations, πειρασμοῖς μου.—The very word for St Luke, according to whom (ch. iv. 13) Satan had but departed from the Lord, ἄχρι καιροῦ, after the forty days' temptation in the wilderness; so that the whole earthly life of Jesus is represented as a continuous temptation. This word, in Christ's mouth, points to those painful and trying experiences by which His obedience to the Father was exercised and perfected. In the midst of all these circumstances, it was no small praise to His disciples that they had held to Him so faithfully (διαμεμενηκότες). Without adding a word concerning their manifold weaknesses, He takes evident pleasure in doing justice to their sincerity and perseverance. This saying, indeed, is exactly the opposite of Luke ix. 41, yet each is natural and suitable in its respective connection.

7. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me.—After mentioning what the disciples had been to Him, the Lord alludes to what He destined for them. Διατίθεμαι denotes not only investing or insuring, but such a disposition as a dying man makes, by testament, in favour of survivors. It is not directly said that the Lord devised this kingdom to them by a special act of institution, namely, by the Lord's Supper; for, apart from such a relation to this sacred ordinance, the truth and force of the promise are complete. It is, however, self-evident that the verb, when used by the Lord of the Father, who cannot see death, καθὼς διέθετό μοι, must be interpreted cum grano salis. The sublimity of such an expression may be better felt than described. The poor Nazarene, who had not a farthing to leave to His followers, and whose very raiment was in a few hours to be shared by the soldiers, before His eyes, here makes over to His friends, as the reward of their fidelity, a more than royal inheritance, annulling thereby even the distance which still lay between Himself and them. There is a remarkable and too-little-heeded coincidence between this saying and that of His last prayer (John xvii. 22), affording a fresh proof of the identity of the Christ of St John's and the synoptical Gospels.

8. That ye may eat, etc.—A reference to the purpose, and consequently to the inestimable fruit, of this bequest, by which not only imperishable honour, but also rich enjoyment, was prepared for them. The honour, that they were appointed judges of the twelve tribes of Israel; the enjoyment, that the Lord would entertain them at His table in His Messianic kingdom. This well-known figure of speech is employed here with reference not only to the Lord's Supper, which had just been instituted, but also to the Passover feast then being partaken of. It is generally thought that the mention of the twelve thrones, found in Matt. xix. 28, was omitted here on account of the fall of Judas. It may be, however, that the alteration of the expression is merely indicative of the freer manner in which the Lord's discourse is reported in Luke. Bengel's question on the mention of the φυλαί, singuline singulas? is almost too minute a distinction. It is, moreover, well known that the glorified Saviour set the same prospect, with slight modification, before all His friends, Rev. ii. and iii.; and that the Apostle Paul also mentions the judging of the world as one of the privileges destined to all His saints by the Lord, at His appearing.

9. Simon, Simon.—We agree with those who believe that two predictions of Peter's denial took place—one in the paschal chamber, the other on the way to Gethsemane; which latter is related exclusively by Matthew and Mark. The former is mentioned in John xiii. 36–38, which seems parallel with vers. 31 and 32 of Luke. Hence it took place shortly after the institution of the Lord's Supper, which immediately followed the new commandment of brotherly love (John xiii. 34, 35). The Lord may very well have added to the serious warning of John xiii. 36–38, the words which Luke alone has preserved, and which were calculated, both by their matter and the form in which they were spoken, to make the deepest impression upon the heart of the Apostle. Even the reiterated Simon, Simon (comp. Luke x. 41; Acts ix. 4), must have made him feel deeply that he was not now like a rock, but like a weak reed. The figurative expression, Satan hath desired (entreated) to have thee, reminds us of the introduction to the book of Job. We should note also the difference between the plural, ὑμᾶς (ver. 31), and the singular, περὶ σοῦ, ver. 32. The most terrible danger was this day threatening all the disciples, without their being aware of it, but none more than Peter, who least feared it, and who yet had been the special object of his Master's intercession.—Τοῦ σινιάσαι. "The saying is nowhere else preserved, but its signification is not doubtful. The tertium comparationis is the trying ταράσσειν. As the wheat is shaken in the sieve, that the refuse may be separated, and fall from the corn, so does Satan design to disquiet and shake you by temptations, dangers, and calamities, in order to make you fail in your fidelity to Me." Meyer.

10. But I.—In this saying also, it is the Lord's own person which forms the immovable centre. His majestic ἐγὼ δέ opposes, on one hand, the threatening of Satan; while, on the other, it stands in contrast to the direct καὶ σύ which immediately follows. He first gives the disciples a glimpse of the treacherous designs of Hell, and then allows them a view into the heaven of a Saviour's heart. But for whom had the Lord prayed? This time, specially for Peter:

"Totus sane hic sermo Domini præsupponit, Petrum esse primum apostolorum, quo stante aut cadente ceteri aut minus aut magis periclitarentur." Bengel.—When? After He had penetrated the depths of Satan's treacherous designs. For what? The Lord does not use many words to express this. He had by no means prayed that Peter might entirely escape this sifting: comp. John xvii. 15. With what purpose? That (ἵνα) his faith might not fail (ἐκλείπῃ), since all his power of resistance would be gone if the faith which he had so often professed should no longer remain in him: comp. 2 Tim. iv. 7. With what result? The prayer was heard; Peter will indeed fall, but he shall rise again, καὶ σύ ποτε ἐπιστρέψας.

11. When thou art converted.—Thus an ἐπιστροφή, visible to others, the result of an inward μετάνοια, was predicted concerning Peter. The depths of misery and contrition through which would lie the way to this result, were, with great wisdom, not yet announced to him; he experienced them, however, that very night.—Strengthen thy brethren. The Lord does not here say, My brethren, as in John xx. 17, nor our, but thy brethren; because He here represents them as infected with the same weakness which would cause Peter so deep a fall. Thus the address returns "oblique" to the ὑμᾶς (ver. 31). How Peter subsequently strengthened his fellow-Apostles by his words and example, is shown in the Acts of the Apostles; how he strengthened his fellow-believers, is seen in his Epistles; but it is evident from the words in which he replied to this address, that he was now very far from being on the road to this conversion, and very unfit to strengthen others.

12. Lord, . . . with Thee.—Μετὰ σοῦ is emphatically placed first, to denote the source whence his confident feeling of strength arose. He thinks of the threatening danger under two forms—death and imprisonment; but love will give him strength to defy both. He almost seems to hint that the Lord's intercession was not so indispensable in his case.

13. I tell thee, Peter.—Not now Simon, doubly as he deserved it, but Peter; because the Lord places Himself on the stand-point of the man who was standing so firmly in his own eyes. He now announces to him, in plain words, what He had just said in figurative language; so that not even the possibility of misunderstanding Him might exist. Peter will himself deny that he knows his Master: ἀπαρνήσῃ μὴ εἰδέναι με, properly a doubly pleonastic negation, like ch. xx. 27; on which account, some manuscripts, though on insufficient critical grounds, have omitted the μή. On the prediction itself, see Lange on Matt. xxvi. 34.

14. And He said unto them (all).—After a short pause, the Lord turns again from Peter to the rest of the disciples. We consider it at least probable, that the words, vers. 35–38, were spoken after leaving the paschal chamber, and just before entering Gethsemane (Stier). It is the first and not the second prediction of the denial that preceded them: they are also of so confidential a nature, that they might well be supposed to have been spoken at the supper-table. We believe that they immediately follow vers. 31–34, the Lord thus following up His announcement of the inward danger which threatens His disciples by a description of the outward need which hangs over them. As friends, at the hour of parting, love to dwell upon the happier days of the past, so does the Lord remind the eleven of a period which, perhaps, seemed to them to be, at the time, one of difficulty; but which, in comparison with this night, might well be considered peaceful and delightful. He points them to the time when they first preached the Gospel in Galilee, and found many an attentive ear and open heart, ch. ix. 1–6. They had then suffered no kind of want, nor had they been oppressed by any care; but other times were now at hand. So ignorant were they, as yet, of what was now before them, that the Lord could in no other way bring them to a notion of it but by placing then and now before them in strong contrast. He commands them now to do the very reverse of what He had then enjoined them. Then, the least care was superfluous; now, the greatest would not be too much.

15. Then said He unto them.—Οὖν unites the contrast to their own confession, that then they had wanted for nothing.—But now he that hath a purse, let him take it; ἀράτω, let him not leave it at home, but take it with him on his journey, in order to secure himself, by this careful precaution, against the possibility of want. So also, let him who possesses a scrip, be sure to use it.—And he that hath none (German Version), neither purse nor scrip, let him sell his garment, of which he might otherwise incur the loss, and buy neither a purse nor a scrip, but, what would now be more indispensable than either food or clothing, a sword. Self-defence was now, not merely a pressing, but the first necessity. We must understand this last word, not in an allegorical, but a parabolical sense. If we take it to signify the spiritual sword (Eph. vi. 17, Olshausen), we shall then be obliged to give a spiritual meaning also to the purse and scrip. The Lord is simply enforcing upon His disciples, in a concrete and graphic form, the duty and right of self-preservation, that, by the contrast thus presented to His former commands (ver. 35), they might, at last, come to the conviction that a special danger was now imminent.

16. For I say unto you.—A direct and sufficient reason for the preceding apparently enigmatical command. When matters have once been carried so far that the Master is reckoned among the transgressors, the disciples may well fear the worst. Here we have another indication that the approaching fulfilment of the prediction is grounded upon an irrevocable must; and, at the same time, a proof of the light in which the Lord viewed the well-known prophecy (Isa. liii.). He reckons it among the περὶ ἐμοῦ sc. γεγραμμένα, of which He declares τέλος ἔχει. This expression would be singularly unmeaning, if it signified nothing more than there is an end with Me, as well as with the subject of Isaiah's prophecy. The Lord felt and knew that He was Himself the subject of this prophecy, and must therefore be using the word end, not in the ordinary sense, but in that of completion, in the sense of the τετέλεσται of John xix. 30. The Lord is stating the reason (γάρ) why He expected nothing less for Himself than the fulfilment even of Isa. liii. 12. Everything that is written concerning the Messiah must be fulfilled; and this will not be done till this saying also, which is, in a certain sense, the climax of the whole prophecy of the Passion, is realized in, and to Him. "When this (τοῦτο) comes to pass, because all must come to pass, then the fulfilment and the event will thereby have an end." Stier.

17. Lord, behold, here are two swords.—It is certainly striking that the disciples should, at once, have come by these swords, and improbable that they should have found them in the guest-chamber (Bengel). It is, however, known that Galileans were accustomed to travel with swords; and perhaps Peter and another disciple might have taken their swords with them on their journey to the capital this evening, in expectation of danger. It is certain, at least, that they had them now at hand, and were ready to use them at their Lord's word. It sounds strangely to understand by them the large sacrificing knives for the paschal lamb (Chrysostom).

18. It is enough, ἱκανόν ἐστι.—If it were possible for us to imagine the Lord Jesus, during any moment of this paschal night, with a melancholy smile upon His heavenly countenance, it would be at this proffer of the two swords. Two swords to oppose all the powers of the world, of hell, and of death, which were about to attack Him! He esteems it impossible to make the whole absurdity of the idea as evident to them as He feels it to be; and hence breaks off the conversation on this subject, in the tone of one who is conscious that he shall not be understood, and therefore esteems all further discussion useless. There is, indeed, no double meaning here (Olshausen, De Wette), but certainly a melancholy irony.

We imagine that after this conversation, 1. the great Hallel was sung, 2. the parting addresses delivered, 3. the paschal chamber left, and that, 4. on the way to Gethsemane, the second announcement of the unfaithfulness of Peter and his fellow-disciples, which was unanimously repelled by them all, took place. All this is passed over by Luke, who proceeds, without further delay, to the events of Gethsemane. See Lex Evang. Harm. p. 93.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. While, on the one side, the reiterated strife of the disciples, which of them should be the greatest, even on this evening, is a sad proof how deep are the roots of pride and selfishness even in believing and renewed hearts; on the other, the peculiar manner in which the Lord opposes this error, is a fresh manifestation of His wisdom, love, and faithfulness. Even His all but verbal repetition of a former, but already forgotten exhortation, must have doubly shamed His contending friends. He thereby recalls to their memories a time in which they had exhibited the same fault, and had been powerfully, but, as it now appeared, vainly reprimanded by Him. It is the fundamental law of His kingdom, and one which He would now again engrave and stereotype on the fleshly tables of their hearts. And the more deeply to impress it, He now enforces it by a visible act, which it was impossible they should ever forget.

2. "I am among you as he that serveth."—"This saying is, first, a short summary of the whole, and now almost ended, earthly life of the Lord Jesus in humiliation: comp. Matt. xx. 28; Phil. ii. 5–11; 2 Cor. viii. 9; secondly, a fit introduction to the suffering by which He was about to serve His disciples, in a manner wholly different from hitherto, even by humbling Himself more deeply than ever; and, finally, the key of His heavenly life at the right hand of God; for, even upon His throne, He rules by serving, and never manifests His glory more resplendently than by His condescending love."

3. We cannot sufficiently admire, even in this ante-chamber of the history of the Passion, the sublime and unique self-consciousness of the Lord. While He knows certainly, that He is just about to be numbered with the transgressors, He awards to His followers no less a rank than that of earthly kings and potentates (vers. 25 and 26). He has no spot on earth where He may lay His head, and yet He bequeaths to them the highest posts in the kingdom of God, and appoints them the future judges of the twelve tribes of Israel. With each instant He sinks more deeply into the night of His sufferings; and yet it is now that He specially shows that the secrets of the heart, of futurity, and of the spiritual world, are naked and open to Him. He feels that He is, in the fullest sense of the word, the Son, in whom the Father is well pleased (ver. 29); the Being in whom all the predictions of the prophets centre (ver. 37); the conqueror even of Satan (vers. 31 and 32); and yet all this does not hinder Him from being, in the midst of His disciples, as one that serveth, and from bearing their want of susceptibility with a patience which can never be sufficiently extolled by human tongues.

4. Even from these sayings of the Lord (vers. 31 and 32), it is evident that the kingdom of darkness was in a state of more than usual activity and excitement, as the night of Christ's betrayal drew near. It was not Judas alone, but also the faithful disciples, who were a mark for the fiery darts of Satan. The pure assumption of rationalism alone could view such expressions as merely figurative, and venture, in the very face of them, to deny the existence and agency of Satan. On the contrary, they show very plainly that the existence of a kingdom of darkness, inhabited by personal evil spirits, is nothing less than a terrible reality; and the conclusio a minori ad majus may certainly be conceded to us, that if Satan desired to sift the disciples as wheat, he would certainly not leave the Lord unmolested, either in Gethsemane or Golgotha.

5. The Lord's assertion, that He had prayed for Peter, is the solid foundation of the evangelical doctrine of His intercession for His people in heaven: Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25, ix. 24; 1 John ii. 1. At the same time, we are taught, that the highest and ultimate aim of the Christian's prayer for himself must be, that his faith fail not. He who makes shipwreck of his faith, suffers the loss not only of his property, but of his life.

6. The prediction of Peter's denial is one of the most sublime manifestations of Himself, made by the Lord in His humiliation. His wisdom, love, and faithfulness shine forth from these words, which cast even a brighter radiancy upon His divine wisdom. For He predicts, not only in general terms, that Peter will fall in the approaching trial,—such a prediction would not have been difficult to any one well acquainted with human nature,—but He states beforehand every detail—the threefold denial, the cockcrowing, the form of denial, ἀπαρνήσῃ μὴ εἰδέναι με—not only as possible, but as sure to occur, and thereby shows that His glance ranges over not only that which is secret, but that which is apparently accidental The assertions, that the expression, "before the cock crow," only meant before day dawns; that the "thrice," ver. 34, denoted merely a round number; and that the prediction subsequently received this strictly defined form ex eventu (Strauss and others), rest upon suppositions which have neither exegetical proof, nor historical foundation. No example can be cited of thrice importing anything else than what it expresses; while the cockcrowing was so little an unreal occurrence, that, according to Mark (ver. 30), it was to take place even twice. Far, however, from an inevitable fate being announced to Peter in this prediction, its purpose was rather that of warning him of danger. Peter did not deny the Lord because this act was foretold; but it was foretold to him in order that he might not do it. If it were Satan's design so to sift the wheat that nothing but chaff should remain, the Lord, on the contrary, would so sift it that it might come forth like good wheat, purified from the chaff. If the disciple had but comprehended the hint of the Master, and reconciled himself to the thought that He was to withstand the conflict without him! But, alas! he who thought himself stronger than ten other men, soon gives proof that he is weaker than a single woman.

7. The Lord would certainly have avoided even the expression concerning buying a sword, in case of pressing danger, if He had intended that His disciples should in no case think of defending themselves with external weapons. Their error consisted in their purpose of using ordinary arms at such a moment, and against supernatural enemies. It may be judged, then, how contrary it must be to the spirit and intention of the Lord, that the Romish Curia should boast of the possession of the two swords of Peter; and that even a Boniface VIII., for instance, should have endeavoured to prove, from this very passage, that the Papal See possessed the right of spiritual as well as temporal jurisdiction. The principle of such a misapplication is condemned even by the Lord's ἱκανόν ἐστι. "It is a sigh of the God-man, hovering like a lamentation over Romish swords and scaffolds, over the camps of the Paulicians and Hussites, over all the violence by which men have since sought to promote His cause.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

How little were the disciples in a condition, even in the paschal chamber, to comprehend the seriousness of the moment, and their Master's frame of mind!—How much did even the disciples help to embitter the peaceful enjoyment of their Lord's last quiet evening! —The old Adam does not die so soon.—The royal dignity of the Lord's disciples: 1. Their high rank; 2. their holy claim.—The wide difference between the flattering designations, titles, and prevailing character of many an earthly monarch.—Esse, quam videri. —The way of voluntary humiliation, the way to true greatness in the kingdom of God: 1. The old way; 2. the difficult way; 3. the safe way; 4. the happy way.—Christ in the midst of His disciples as one who serveth: 1. The character which He exhibits as such: a. condescending, b. active, c. persevering love. 2. The claims He makes as such: a. reverence His greatness therein; b. let yourselves be served by Him; c. serve others for His sake.—Unwavering fidelity, in the midst of great temptation, is, 1. well observed, 2. graciously appreciated, 3. rewarded a thousandfold, by the Lord. —The legacy of the dying Testator to His chosen friends.—The jurisdiction committed by the Lord in heaven to those who suffer with Him upon earth, 2 Tim. ii. 12.—The heavenly feast in the still future kingdom of God: 1. The glorified Master of the feast; 2. the completed number of the guests; 3. the infinite refreshment. —Simon Peter, 1. dangerously threatened, 2. invisibly protected, 3. powerfully converted, 4. abundantly active in the conversion of his brethren.—Satan concerned for the ruin, the Lord for the preservation, of Peter; Simon alone careless.—Jesus the intercessor for His weak but sincere disciples.—How many a danger is averted from us unnoticed, and before we are aware of even its approach!— The holy vocation of the converted to strengthen their brethren: 1. He only who is truly converted can do this; 2. but he ought, must, and will do it.—Unbelief would carry its point, even in the Lord's presence.—He who trusts in his own heart is a fool.—The danger of a superficial excitement of the feelings, instead of a deeply rooted life of faith.—Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall, 1 Cor. x. 12.—Even in treatment of those disciples who are admitted to closest intercourse with Him, the Lord often takes an entirely different way from that which He had formerly pursued.—Peace once enjoyed, no pledge of future safety.—The Lord's disciple must never reckon on superfluity,

1 Tim. vi. 6–8.—The Christian must prepare in extraordinary manners for extraordinary dangers.—The word of prophecy, the Lord's light upon His dark pathway to death.—All that is written concerning the glory and suffering of the Christian also, must be accomplished.—The continued incapacity of the disciples to understand the deep source of their Lord's secret sufferings.—Patience with unteachable friends a difficult art, but sanctified by the Lord's example.

Starcke, Cramer: Even great people fail.—Inward strifes have been more prejudicial to the kingdom of God than external attacks. —There is no more powerful motive to humility than Christ's example.—Where the mind of Christ is, there is also the imitation of Christ.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The cross becomes Christ's disciples better than authority.—He who would belong to Christ, must prepare for temptation.—He is approved whom the Lord commendeth, 2 Cor. x. 18.—Who can comprehend the dignity and privileges of a true disciple of Jesus?—The faithful servants of the Lord Jesus will reign and judge with Him in heaven.—Canstein: Ignorance, security, and presumption pave the way for Satan's temptations.— The devil can do nothing without divine permission.—Our faith must suffer shipwreck, but for the intercession of Christ.—Osiander: The flesh is bold before danger, and can only be truly convinced by the sad experience of its impotence.—It is not enough for a Christian to purpose rightly.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The Lord Jesus foreknew the sins we commit.—It is edifying to look back frequently on the way God has led us.—Brentius: The faithful servants of God have a rich and powerful Master.—We must accommodate ourselves to the times, be they good or bad.—The servants of God have not always sunshine in their callings.—Take good heed how thou understandest the words of Christ.—The temporal sword is committed to the magistracy, the spiritual to the ministry, Rom. xiii. 4; Eph. vi. 17.

Heubner: The attacks of the wicked must turn to the profit of the pious.—Intercession avails much.—How many a son, who has gone astray, has been saved through the prayers of a pious mother (Augustine and Monica).—The reason why sins are so dangerous is, that they may be the means of destroying our faith.—The Lord's service, with its freedom from care, makes life joyful.—God always helps through.—Palmer (vers. 35 and 36): Those things which occur in the life of the disciples in succession, must be in combination in ours, through faith: 1. The glorious and childlike confidence built upon experience; 2. the manly ability for defence, which wields the sword; but the sword, that of the Spirit.—Arndt (vers. 31–38): Christ's loving care: 1. His care in warning Peter; 2. His care for the safety of the other disciples.—F. W. Krummacher, Passionsbuch, p. 173, etc.: How this evening conversation discloses to us the mediator-heart of the great Friend of sinners: 1. In His conversation with Peter; 2. in His address to the assembled disciples.—J. Diedrich, A Sermon for St Bartholomew's Day, in his Evangel Predigt. auf das ganze Kirchenjahr, iii. p. 154.

A. The Increase of the Conflict. (CHAP. XXII. 39–XXIII. 45.)

1. Gethsemane.

a. The Agony of Prayer. (VERS. 39–46.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvi. 36–46; Mark xiv. 32–42.

39 And He came out, and went, as He was wont, to the Mount of Olives; and His disciples also followed Him. 40 And when He was at the place, He said unto them, Pray that ye enter not into temptation. 41 And He was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down, and prayed, 42 Saying, Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from Me: nevertheless, not My will, but Thine, be done. 43 And there appeared an angel unto Him from heaven, strengthening Him. 44 And, being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly: and His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. 45 And when He rose up from prayer, and was come to His disciples, He found them sleeping for sorrow, 46 And said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

Ver. 40. The disciples. The μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ of the Receptus is not sufficiently authenticated.

On the authenticity of vers. 43 and 44, see the Critical Notes.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And He came out.—Here also Luke preserves his individuality. The narratives of our Lord's agony in Gethsemane by Matthew and Mark, are more detailed and complete than his; and we cannot form a clear idea of the whole occurrence without comparing the three. Luke evidently condenses, mentioning neither the selection made by the Lord from among His disciples, nor the threefold repetition of His prayer, and omitting even the Lord's word of warning to Peter. On the other hand, it is to him that we are indebted for the account of the bloody sweat and the strengthening angel; as also for the psychological hint, ver. 45, that the disciples were sleeping ἀπὸ τῆς λύπης. He alone defines the distance between the Lord and the disciples as having been ὡσεὶ λίθου βολήν (ver. 41), and communicates the fact, that the Mount of Olives was the place where Jesus was accustomed to pray (ver. 39). From all these circumstances, the value of his account, in completing the certainly more detailed and better arranged narratives of his fellow-Evangelists, is very evident.

2. As He was wont.—Comp. ch. xxi. 37. The fact of the Lord's going to this very place is another proof that the time in which He sought to avoid His enemies was now past. For, according to John xviii. 2, this place was known also to Judas, who would certainly seek Him there, with the band, when he found that He was no longer in the paschal chamber. But it is, at the same time, a proof of the heavenly tranquillity of mind which the Lord always maintained. Not in the city, in the midst of the rejoicings of the paschal night, but without, in the bosom of open nature, and after being strengthened by communion with His Father, will He surrender Himself into the hands of His enemies.—At the place, the above-named place, at which He chose to be. It is, perhaps, because its name was already sufficiently known by evangelical tradition, that Luke does not name Gethsemane.

3. He said unto them, Pray, etc.—According to Luke, it would seem that the Lord spoke these words to all His disciples. From Matthew and Mark, however, we learn that He took three of their number into a more retired part of the garden with Him, and addressed them in a manner somewhat similar to this. As appears from the infinitive, the μὴ εἰσελθεῖν εἰς πειρασμόν was to be the subject-matter of their prayer. According to the context, the πειρασμός can be nothing else than the pressing danger of their making shipwreck of their most holy faith, by what they were about to experience.

4. And He was withdrawn, ἀπεσπάσθη ἀπ' αὐτῶν; Vulg., He was withdrawn from them.—Schöttgen rightly says: "eleganter dicuntur ἀποσπᾶσθαι vel ἀποσπασθῆναι, qui ab amicissimorum amplexu vix divelli possunt ac discedere." Naturally, we are not to understand the word as implying that the Lord departed from His disciples almost against His will, and impelled, as it were, by a mysterious power; but as simply describing that, following the impulse of His mind, He, with swift steps and visible emotion, sought a place of retirement.—Ὡσεὶ λίθου βολήν Accusative of distance. Since the Lord was not farther from the three disciples than a stone's cast, He was sufficiently near to be heard and seen in the moonlight.

5. And kneeled down, etc.—More strongly expressed by Matthew and Mark: He fell on His face, on the ground. He could not now pray standing, and with His eyes lifted up, as He had done in the paschal chamber. Luke evidently condenses the contents of the three prayers into one, though even he hints (ver. 41) that the Lord prayed, at least, more than once.—If Thou be willing, εἰ βούλει: If it be consistent with Thy counsel. Grotius: Si tua decreta ferunt, ut alio modo tuæ gloriæ atque hominum saluti acque consolatur."—Παρενεγκεῖν, not an infinitivus pro imperativo (Bengel), but an aposiopesis, strikingly expressing that the request was recalled, almost before it was quite uttered. Notice the difference between εἰ βούλει and τὸ θέλημά σου. On the meaning and purport of the request, see below.

6. And there appeared an angel unto Him, etc.—Many inquiries arise here. 1. Concerning the genuineness of the account. Vers. 43 and 44 are (as is well known) wanting in A.B. Sahid. and other authorities. Some have expressed their doubts by asterisks and obelisks. Lachmann has bracketed the verses. Most modern critics have, however, pronounced in favour of their authenticity. It is supposed that they were very probably omitted by the orthodox, who considered this account somewhat derogatory to the dignity of Jesus. See Epiph. Ancor. 31, and also Wetstein, on this passage. On the other hand, no tenable ground can be adduced for the insertion of these verses in the text, if they had not originally stood in St Luke's Gospel. 2. Concerning the manner and purpose of this strengthening by an angel. Various opinions have, at all times, been entertained; and the influence of doctrinal views upon exegesis has been very apparent in this matter. Olshausen has incorrectly accepted a merely inward manifestation, and spoken of the influx of spiritual strength bestowed upon the struggling Redeemer in His deepest desertion; though, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that the possibility of perceiving the appearing of the angel was dependent upon the inward agitation of the suffering and praying Redeemer. The text also says, ὤφθη αὐτῷ, not ὤφθη αὐτοῖς. To make the strengthening a merely bodily one (Hoffmann), is certainly as arbitrary as to view it only as a strengthening to prayer (De Wette). We cannot see any inconsistency in the idea that the holy ψυχή of the Lord, now oppressed beneath the heaviest suffering, was strengthened by the glorious prospect of future joy, symbolized by the appearance of the friendly angel. We believe, however, with Bengel, that the strengthening in question did not take place per cohortationem. 3. Concerning the time when this appearing of the angel took place. We can scarcely agree (with Dettinger) that it occurred between the second and third prayer of the Lord. An attentive collation of the evangelical narratives shows that the strengthening by the angel happened immediately after the first, and also the most fervent and agonized petition; and that, in consequence of it, the anguish of His soul was in some measure alleviated when the second was uttered. Independently considered, indeed, the account of Luke might lead to a different conclusion; but his design is rather to give us a view of the whole event, than to describe the course of incidents during their successive periods. The words, ver. 44, being in an agony, He prayed, etc., are not used to denote what followed the appearance of the angel, but what occasioned and necessitated this appearance. With Meyer, we take καὶ in the sense of namely, and consider it as indicating, not the result, but the reason of the appearance. 4. Finally, with regard to the credibility of the narrative. This is by no means lessened by the silence of the other Evangelists; and the very brevity, mystery, and apparent incompleteness of Luke's account speak for his credibility. They who deny the possibility of angelic appearings, on doctrinal grounds, will not receive this; but they who acknowledge the Lord to be The Being His believing people have in all ages esteemed Him, will soon feel that the light of an angelic apparition could scarcely make a more beneficial impression than in the darkness of these sufferings.

7. He prayed more earnestly, ἐκτενέστερον.—And no wonder; He was really in a mortal agony (ἀγωνία), and was therefore exerting all His strength in unintermitted wrestling in prayer: comp. Hosea xii. 4, 5. The best commentary on these words is given in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. v. 7–9),—an epistle whose colouring, at least, is Pauline,—where the strong crying and tears, wherewith the Lord offered up His prayers and supplications to Him that was able to save Him from death, are spoken of. It is remarkable that this last passage should have been adduced in support both of the view that the Lord was deprecating the suffering of death entirely, as also of that, that He was only entreating the removal of this momentary agony, πρὸς τὸν δυνάμενον σώζειν. The αὐτὸν ἐκ θανάτου has been cited for the first, the εἰσακουσθεὶς ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας for the second.

8. And His sweat.—A trait characteristic of the physician. The reading ὡσεί is preferable to ὡς, and expresses, like ch. iii. 23, a relative similarity. The inquiry, whether the Lord Jesus did actually sweat blood at Gethsemane, sometimes negatively, sometimes affirmatively answered, depends upon another, viz., whether the force of the comparison falls upon θρόμβοι or αἵματος. The latter is, at all events, the more probable; since, otherwise, it can scarcely be conceived why Luke should speak of αἷμα at all, unless to denote of what kind His sweat was. Ὡσεί forbids, indeed, our imagining actual drops of blood; but, in any case, we must conceive of them as thick, heavy drops, which, mixed with and coloured by blood, looked exactly like drops of blood. Compare, on this subject, the authors cited by Ebrard, Evang. Kritik, on this passage; as also what Hug has remarked (Gutachten on this passage), on historical grounds, on the difference between the thick and the thin sweat, which latter appears in persons in the agonies of death. When we add to this, the medically-confirmed case of bloody sweats in certain cases, and keep in mind the unique state of mind of the suffering Redeemer, it will be found equally unnecessary to suppose either poetical embellishment (Schleiermacher) or mystic invention (Strauss and others) in this case.

9. Sleeping for sorrow.—This is added, not as furnishing an excuse for the disciples, but as affording an explanation of their apparently strange condition; there is also no reason for rejecting this explanation as unsatisfactory. Sorrow sometimes indeed renders men sleepless; but, when it is very great, it may so exhaust both the inward and outward man, as to induce a state of stupefaction. The Evangelists do not say that it was an ordinary and healthy sleep: besides, there may have been, unconsciously to the disciples, some influence on the part of the powers of darkness, who, when they assaulted the Shepherd in Gethsemane, would certainly not leave the sheep unattacked.

10. Why sleep ye? etc.—A more exact report of the Lord's words to the sleepers is found in Matthew and Mark. The account of Luke is too brief to enable us to form from it a satisfactory conception of the matter. We must imagine that the Lord, after His third supplication, so entirely regained His tranquillity, that the sight of His still sleeping disciples no longer shocked and distressed Him. On the contrary, He allowed them this refreshment, of which they could no more partake during the rest of this terrible night, and even watched over their last transient repose for some moments (Matt. xxvi. 45). It was not till Judas arrived with his band that He bade them arise, because He knew that there was then not a moment to lose; and aroused them, that they might not only await their enemies in a wakeful condition, but might also courageously meet them. It is only the spirit, and not the form, of this last saying which is preserved by Luke, when he here repeats the principal contents of ver. 40. "We therefore impute this want of exactness in Luke to his more distant point of observation." Stier.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Arrived at the inner sanctuary of the Passion, a feeling similar to that experienced by Moses (Exod. iii. 5), or Elijah (1 Kings xix. 13), possesses us. The Evangelists only give us a few hints as to the nature of these sufferings, which have been in all ages not unjustly characterized as mental, because the struggle was carried on within the sphere of the ψυχή. The Lord Jesus had previously been grieved ἐν τῷ πνεύματι (John xiii. 21); but now His ψυχή was moved and shaken as it had never been before. His soul was troubled by the terror of approaching death, although His spirit was penetrated with the consciousness that this death was the way to glory. In His high-priestly prayer (John xvii.) it was His spirit which celebrated its triumph; in the first part of the prayer of Gethsemane, His soul uttered its complaint. The sufferings arising from His soul also overcame His body, and caused a struggle which might indeed be called, in a special manner, a mortal struggle. This agony of soul came unexpectedly upon Him; it rose and fell like a wave of the sea, and even attained to such a height that the Lord of angels could be refreshed by the strengthening of His heavenly servant; His sweat fell to the ground in streams, like drops of clotted blood (θρόμβοι); and the Lamb of God must writhe like a worm before He conquered like a lion. This is certainly a mystery, of whose complete solution we must almost despair; and we need not therefore be scandalized at finding that the most opposite explanations of this enigma have been attempted during the course of centuries (see on the parallel passage in Matt.). Nor can even we refuse to make an attempt at discovering a satisfactory answer to the question, Wherefore such unprecedented suffering?

2. We cannot be surprised that the Lord's agony in Gethsemane has been often represented as something quite peculiar; and that it has been asserted that the ποτήριον, whose passing away He entreated, signified not the sufferings of death in general, but this special agony, which, if it were not averted, might have hindered Him from worthily and courageously bearing the sufferings of death (so Lange on Matt. and Mark, and, among Dutch theologians, Heringa, Bouman, Vinke). On the other hand, however, it cannot be denied that the first interpretation of the request is powerfully supported by grammatical exegesis; on which account we need not be surprised at finding it defended by Calvin. The Lord generally applied the terms, the cup (ποτήριον) and the hour (ἡ ὥρα), not to a part, but to the aggregate of His impending sufferings. It is true that He here spoke of τὸ ποτήριον τοῦτο, but He had also prayed thus (John xii. 27) for deliverance, ἐκ τῆς ὥρας ταυτῆς, which certainly referred to nothing less than all the sufferings of death. According to Mark (ver. 35), He prayed in general terms, that ἡ ὥρα might pass from Him, which can surely mean nothing else but the same ὥρα as ver. 41: comp. Matt. xxvi. 45; John ii. 4, vii. 30, viii. 20, xiii. 1, xviii. 11; not to speak of Matt. xx. 22, 23; Mark x. 38. On account of all these passages, we cannot, with all submission to better judgments, forbear subscribing to the words of Bengel: Ubi solus calix memoratur, passio intelligitur universa. We must not, however, forget that the key to the perfect solution of this mystery is not to be found in the mere grammatical meaning of the passage, and that, in certain respects, the distinction between the momentary and aggregate sufferings of Jesus helps us but little. At every moment there was present to His mind the terrible image of His whole Passion, which had therefore actually begun in His own consciousness. It was with Him as when He partook of the first draught of vinegar on the cross, Matt. xxvii. 34. The inquiry concerning the possibility of such a condition, can only be answered by a glance both at the nature of His sufferings, and at His nature as the God-man.

3. The Lord's impending passion was, on the one hand, the most terrible manifestation of the power of sin, and, on the other, the great means of atonement for sin. Jews and Gentiles, friends and foes, Judas and Peter, the whole temporal power, all were united against Him. And in this power He was to feel, as it were, the whole curse of sin; as the substitute for sinful humanity, He was to expose Himself to the judgment of God; He was to be made sin though He knew no sin. Must not this prospect have filled His holy soul with unspeakable horror? He was the Word, who was with God, and was God; but this Word had become flesh, and been made in all things like unto His brethren, sin only excepted; hence we must strive in vain to form a just conception of what the approach of such a death and passion must have been to a Being thus divine and human! If the thought of death is something terrible to the merely human feeling, death was also unnatural to Him who had life in Himself. If death is to us only the end of a life which may justly be called a dying daily, the destruction of His bodily organism was, on the contrary, as much antagonistic to the nature of the pure and spotless Redeemer, as the annihilation of our immortality would be to ours. His sensitive humanity quailed before death; His holy humanity, before the power of darkness; His loving humanity, before the hatred which was now to attain its most fearful climax. His humanity, indeed, was of a finite nature; and standing, as He did, in the presence of the sins of millions, He might, as we believe, contemplate even the possibility of sinking under its terrible burden: surely His saying, ἡ δὲ σὰρξ ἀσθενής, was the fruit of His own fearful experience. Sin and death now appeared, in His sight, in quite another light than they did before His incarnation, when both, indeed, already stood before Him, but without having made any direct attack upon Himself. The God-man was now to become the victim of powers which the Logos, in His pre-existence, had looked upon as powerless rebels with respect to Himself. In fact, we comprehend and subscribe to the saying: "For our part, to speak foolishly, we could, so far as the psychological and Christological conceivability of the representations is concerned, sooner doubt the elevation of consciousness shown by the high-priestly prayer, than its depression in Gethsemane." Stier. We find here, indeed, not a trace of any change of intention concerning His sufferings, but certainly a change in His frame of mind, and one in which the feeling of anxiety for the first time obtained the upper hand, and the thought arose for a moment, whether it were not even possible that the cup should pass from Him. Luther, indeed, rightly says, in a sermon on this text, "We men, conceived and born in sin, have an impure, hard flesh, which does not soon feel. The fresher, the more healthy a man is, the more he feels what happens to him. Since, then, the body of Christ was pure and without sin, and ours impure, we scarcely feel the fear of death to two degrees, where Christ felt it to ten, seeing He was to be the greatest martyr, and to feel the greatest fear of death." Comp. Ullmann on the Sinlessness of Jesus, 5th ed. p. 164. Nor must it be forgotten how much the Lord's suffering must have been enhanced by His certain and exact knowledge of all that was to befall Him (John xviii. 4). That He was directly forsaken by the Father in Gethsemane, and that, besides the suffering of death, this special and mysterious suffering was required as an atonement for sin, is nowhere taught in the New Testament. There is, however, nothing to prevent our supposing that an unutterable sense of desertion, which reached its climax at Golgotha, now possessed Him,—a storm of anguish whose first murmurs had been already heard: John xii. 27, 28; Luke xii. 49–51. It must also be remembered that the kingdom of darkness was now in a state of more than usual activity (John xiv. 30); and no one can determine what might be the extent of its direct agency, upon both the soul and body of the Lord.

4. Gethsemane naturally recalls the wilderness of temptation. Here, as there, the Lord was tempted, yet again without sin. Unbelief, indeed, has sought for stones to cast at Him, even, as it were, from the very dust of the garden. "He (scoffed Banini when he was executed) sweat through fear of death, I die without the slightest fear." But if it were sinful to pray as He did, it was also sinful to be a real and holy man; for such a one could not but quail before such death-pangs. The incarnate Son of God might have one wish—the word will is almost too strong for a petition uttered with such a limitation—which, according to the eternal counsel of the Father, could not be fulfilled. Difference, however, is by no means opposition, and, in effect, His will is identical with that of the Father, though, for His own sake, He might naturally wish that the counsel of the Father could be carried out by some other means. His obedience and holiness are no more obscured by this petition, than His love and foreknowledge. There can be no more unfitting comparison than that drawn between the agony of the Saviour and the dying courage of the martyrs, who only derived the power by which they encountered an entirely different kind of suffering by looking to Him. "No martyr ever was in His situation, least of all was Socrates." The adorable majesty of the Lord Jesus is manifested, even in the midst of His deepest humiliation, both in His prayer to the Father and in His discourse with His disciples.

5. The importance of our Lord's sufferings in Gethsemane can scarcely be duly estimated. They cast a satisfactory light both on His work and person. He stands before us not only as a true and deeply sensitive man, who was to learn obedience and be perfected through sufferings (Heb. ii. 10, v. 7–9), but also in His spotless holiness and uninterrupted oneness with the Father, which are raised above all doubt. At the same time, they render apparent how justly both the monophysitic and monotheletic errors were condemned by the Christian Church; as also, that it is possible to ascribe to the God-man a limited and sensuous nature, without, in in the slightest degree, obscuring the doctrine of His sinlessness. With respect to the severity of His sufferings, nothing could give us a juster notion of it: Gethsemane opens our minds to understand Golgotha; for we thence learn that the dignity of His person, instead of rendering the weight of His sufferings less oppressive, did, on the contrary, but terribly enhance them. The necessity, too, of His sacrifice is apparent, when we consider that the Father, even after such a prayer, did not suffer the cup to pass from His beloved Son. The completeness, too, of the redemption wrought by Him, is abundantly corroborated by the contemplation of the high degree to which His love and obedience rose. And the crown which this combatant then obtained, is made precious to us by our knowing that it was through this suffering that He became our merciful High Priest, who can hence be touched with the feeling of our infirmity: Heb. ii. 16–18, iv. 15.

6. It is well known that the garden of Gethsemane has borne fruit for the propagation of the kingdom of God. Kajarnel, the first Greenlander who was converted, owed his conversion to a sermon on the Lord's agony in the garden. See Cranz, Gesch. von Grönland, p. 490.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

It was in a garden that the disobedience of the first Adam, and in a garden also that the obedience of the second Adam, was seen. —Comparison of the history of Jesus at Gethsemane, with that of Abraham at Moriah (Gen. xx. 5), and with David's departure over Kidron (2 Sam. xv. 23).—Even the Lord had, when on earth, His accustomed place of prayer.—Prayer, the best weapon against temptation for Christ's disciples.—The Lord's prayer for the removal of the cup, 1. affecting, 2. explicable, 3. never to be forgotten by His followers.—To will what God wills, the essence of true religion.—The strengthening by the angel in Gethsemane: 1. What it manifests: a. the depth of the suffering; b. the greatness of the Lord; c. the love of the Father. 2. It incites, a. to humble faith in the suffering Lord, b. to unshaken confidence in suffering, c. to the strengthening of other sufferers, to whom we may act as messengers of consolation.—What it must have been to the angel, to have performed such an office, for such a sufferer.—The hotter the conflict, the more ardent must be the prayer.—The bloody sweat of the second Adam, contrasted with the sweat of the face in which the first Adam and his descendants eat their bread, Gen. iii. 19.—Eo terra benedictionem accepit: Bengel.—The striking contrast between the watching Lord and the sleeping disciples.—He who is abundantly strengthened by God, can at last dispense with human consolation.—Compassion on weak friends incumbent on us, from our Lord's example.—Gethsemane, the school of acceptable prayer. The Lord teaches us, by His example, to pray, 1. in solitude and with urgency, 2. with submission and invincible perseverance, and the more earnestly the more our suffering increases, 3. with confident hope of being heard—a hope which the strengthening angel corroborates.—Gethsemane, the sanctuary of the Lord's agony: 1. The Priest kneeling in the sanctuary; 2. the sacrifice being consumed in the sanctuary; 3. the glory falling upon the sanctuary; 4. the warning voice from the sanctuary.—Gethsemane, the battle-field of the highest obedience: 1. The combatant; 2. the victory; 3. the crown.—The one cup of the Lord, and the three cups daily dispensed to His followers: 1. The foaming cup of temptation; 2. the bitter cup of affliction; 3. the last cup of death, Heb. v. 7–9.—How the Lord, 1. offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, 2. learned obedience, 3. was heard, 4. and thus became the author of eternal salvation to all that obey Him.

Starcke: He who would hold communion with God, does well to betake himself to solitude.—Brentius: We must learn to pray, even the third prayer, aright (Matt. vi. 10).—Cramer: As soon as any submit to the will of God, they find strength and refreshment.—Quesnel: God knows how to send an angel to strengthen us, at the right time, though it should be but a lowly brother or sister.—J. Hall: We must not despise even the comfort which comes from a lowly hand.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: By Thine agony and bloody sweat, good Lord deliver us.—Let no one mock at death, sin, and the devil; they caused the Son of God His bloody sweat.—Alas! we sleep, when we ought to watch.—Heubner: That an angel, a creature, should strengthen the God-man, is a miracle, but a great consolation for us.—We also are near to angels.—God will also strengthen us, in proportion to our temptations.—The pious are never weary of certain forms of prayer.—Prayer did not hinder

Jesus from giving proofs of love, nor must it ever hinder a single duty.—Arndt: The conflict of Christ in Gethsemane: 1. His agony; 2. His prayer; 3. His strengthening.—Krummacher: The conflict and victory of Christ in Gethsemane.—The significance and result of the sufferings of Gethsemane.—(On ver. 44): The blood of the Lamb (Sabbath-Glocke 1852): 1. its nature and importance; 2. its wonder-working power.—Standt in Kornthal: The Lord's threefold woe in Gethsemane: 1. What it brought upon the Lord; 2. what it brings upon us.—Tholuck: The mind of Jesus in Gethsemane. We perceive, 1. the human No, 2. the divine Yes, 3. the divine decision.—Lange: The Lord's sufferings in Gethsemane (Langenberger Sammlung 1852): 1. The nature of these sufferings; 2. our sufferings in the light of His.—J. J. L. ten. Kate, Zeugnisse der evang. Kirche Hollands v. p. 5, etc.: The sufferings of Jesus in Gethsemane: 1. The nature and manner of these sufferings: they were, a. unspeakable, b. holy, c. unprecedented. 2. Their cause: a. the cruel treachery, b. the imminent death, c. the present temptation. 3. The value of sufferings: Gethsemane is ever, a. a blessed token of a complete redemption, b. a holy lesson of Christian life and conflict, c. a comforting pledge of God's paternal mercy.

b. The Arrest. (Vers. 47–53.)

Parallel to Matt. xxvi. 47–56; Mark xiv. 43–52; John xviii. 3–11.

47 And while He yet spake, behold a multitude, and he that was called Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and drew near unto Jesus to kiss Him. 48 But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? 49 When they which were about Him saw what would follow, they said unto Him, Lord, shall we smite with the sword? 50 And one of them smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear. 51 And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far. And He touched his ear, and healed him. 52 Then Jesus said unto the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and the elders, which were come to Him, Be ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and staves? 53 When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched forth no hands against Me: but this is your hour, and the power of darkness.

Ver. 47. The δέ of the Receptus must be omitted. See Lachmann and Tischendorf.

Ver. 49. Αὐτῷ, though accepted by Luther, De Wette, and most others, is critically doubtful.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. One of the Twelve.—Judas is henceforth distinguished by this name, as by a brand. Luke gives artistic prominence to the rapidity and suddenness of the appearance of the enemies, though he only speaks generally of the ὄχλος, more specially defined by Matthew and Mark. We agree with Hess, Lucke, Olshausen, Tholuck, Ebrard, and others, that the question, whether the betrayal by Judas, communicated by all the Synopticists, preceded or followed the falling of the band to the earth, narrated by St John, ch. xviii. 3–9, must be answered in the first-mentioned sense. According to all the narratives, Judas pressed forward while Jesus was still speaking with His disciples, and gave the concerted sign too soon; on which account the band, whom he had preceded, neither perceived it, nor recognised Jesus. It would be needlessly increasing the guilt of this unhappy man, to suppose that he saw the falling of the band to the earth, and perhaps shared in it himself, and that then, as if nothing had happened, he gave the sign which had thus, moreover, become superfluous. Besides, the words, τοῦτο γὰρ σημεῖον δεδώκει, κ.τ.λ., which D.E.H.X., etc., still read before ver. 47, are certainly borrowed from Matthew.

2. To kiss Him.—If we only consult Luke, it might appear that Judas intended, indeed, to impress the kiss of treason upon the lips of innocence, but was prevented from executing his purpose by the address of Jesus. From Matthew and Mark, however, it appears that the kiss was actually given. All the accounts give the impression, that the Lord's reply as immediately followed the deed of shame, as the roar of the thunder does the glance of the lightning.

3. With a kiss, φιλήματι, the sacred sign of friendship.—This is made emphatically prominent by Luke. Mark omits this saying of Jesus; Matthew, on the contrary, has, "Friend, wherefore art thou come?" If Judas approached with the thought of being, perhaps, able to perform with impunity what would be but the work of an instant, he now learned that even this miserable consolation was taken from him. Brief as was his last sojourn in the Lord's presence, it yet testified that his wickedness was penetrated, and himself conquered and condemned. If we embrace the opinion that the ἑταῖρε, κ.τ.λ., of Matthew was spoken on the first approach of Judas a moment before, the φιλήματι, κ.τ.λ., of Luke immediately after the kiss, everything exactly coincides. It is as though the Lord would, in these last words, by which He gave Judas up to his freely chosen ruin, plunge a sword into his heart with every syllable. Φιλήματι—τὸν υἱὸν ἀνθρώπου—παραδίδως;—the emphasis may be laid on each word, and yet we shall only imperfectly render the full force of this crushing question, which loses by every attempt at paraphrase. Unhappily, however, the Lord could only manifest therein His own meekness, holiness, and majesty, but not win for heaven the wretch already devoted to hell. The traitor's heart remained as cold as his kiss; and from this time forth we find Judas not among the disciples, but among the foes: John xviii. 5. Even the Mohammedans have distinguished the place where this crime was committed, by a heap of stones. See Sepp a.a.O. iii. p. 460.

4. When they which were about Him, etc.—An unintentional but strong contrast between the faithful disciples and the traitor. They saw τὸ ἐσόμενον, that which must now happen. By the approach of the band of soldiers, and the act of Judas, they were at once convinced that there was not even a step between them and the dreaded hour. They felt as if they had hitherto been dreaming, and had now suddenly awoke. Whether they shall smite with the sword, was the question which, with a glance at the weapons they had brought with them from the paschal chamber, they addressed to their Master; and, before He had time to answer either negatively or affirmatively, the imprudent act had followed the inconsiderate question. None of the Synopticists say that it was Peter who did this deed: the act did not redound to his honour, and the account, with the mention of its author by name, might have brought the apostle into some difficulty. St John, however, who did not write his Gospel till after Peter's death, had no such motive for silence. If he, on the other hand, together with Matthew and Mark, passes over the healing of the servant's ear, it is not that this miracle—the last miracle of mercy wrought by Jesus—was, in itself, and compared with others, less worthy of mention, but because it was really self-evident that the Master would immediately repair the evil committed by the inconsiderate zeal of His disciple. Luke the physician, however, could not forbear adding, καὶ ἁψάμενος, κ.τ.λ. It is as arbitrary to declare that the ear was only injured (v. Ammon), as to deny the entire reality of the miracle, as is done by Neander, Theile, De Wette, Strauss, and others.

5. Suffer ye (Me) thus far.—In place of the longer address to Peter, Matt. xxvi. 52–54, Luke gives only a short, but most remarkable, saying of Jesus to the enemies: ἐᾶτε ἕως τούτου. For, that He was here addressing His disciples (Grotius, Bengel, Meyer, and others), in the sense of, suffer ye the multitude, nolite progredi, is proved by nothing, not even by ἀποκριθείς. It is more probable that the interrupted saying is to be explained by the immediately following deed of healing, as follows: The Lord saw that the soldiers were just preparing to take Him prisoner, and with so much the more exasperation, perhaps, now that blood had been shed; and not intending to offer any resistance to their designs, He only requested a moment's respite, that He might perform one more act of kindness. Leave Me alone, He says, in other words, for one moment, that I may—He does not say, but shows what He means —perform this. While thus speaking, He touched the wounded ear, and thus, by one deed, healed two men; the one of a bodily wound, the other of a spiritual malady. With this parting radiancy of beneficence did the sun of His miraculous agency set in Gethsemane.

6. And Jesus said, etc.—These words were probably spoken while they were taking and binding Him, or perhaps after this had been effected. From the fact that the Lord spoke comparatively much in Gethsemane, we may, in some measure, infer the tension of mind and composure of spirit in which He underwent the beginning of His sufferings; a conclusion which the matter of His words most strongly corroborates.

7. Unto the chief priests.—If we place ourselves in the midst of the exciting circumstances of the moment, it will not seem improbable to us that some of the high priests, as we learn from St Luke, should have been personally present in Gethsemane, in order to assure themselves that Jesus was actually taken, and to encourage their servants, if needful, by their presence. The servants were sent; their masters, however, were voluntarily present, and had, perhaps, but just entered the garden. (Ebrard, Lange.) Why might they not, in their impatience, have followed their dependants, when they found that they did not return from Gethsemane so soon as might have been expected? It is, however, at any rate, remarkable that they are mentioned only towards the close, and not at the commencement of the account of the arrest. The words addressed by the Lord to them, to the captains of the temple, and to the elders, were well calculated to shame them, if they had still been capable of such a feeling. Undoubtedly we find here an echo of the words which, according to John xviii. 20, He addressed to the high priest. Nevertheless, the difference is sufficiently great to repel the assertion (of Strauss), that we have here not two independent histories of the Passion, but only two variations of one and the same theme. In place of conceding this, we would rather point out how this expression of the Synopticists corroborates the truth of St John's narrative, ch. vii. 30, 44, viii. 20, 49; without referring to which, these words of the Lord could scarcely be understood.

8. As against a thief.—At this moment the Lord was feeling acutely both the indignity and injustice which were done Him, and hence He expressed His indignation that they should come out to take Him as a thief and assassin. He then directed their attention to the memorable past. I was daily with you, etc. These words must have reminded them of many a vain attack which they had planned, of many a rebuke they had incurred; though the Lord, who would not praise Himself, was silent concerning the miracles He had performed before their eyes, and the victories He had gained, by word or deed, over their perplexity and weakness. Finally, after reproaching them for the cowardice of the past month, now exchanged for despicable malice, He destroyed the delusion that they were really taking Him against His will, by saying (Matthew) that it was exactly in this manner that the Scriptures were fulfilled, and (Luke) that they were not serving the kingdom of light, but that of darkness.

9. This is your hour, etc.—The Lord here refers to the just commencing night, and states the reason why they took Him now, and not by broad daylight, in the temple, when He was there and teaching καθ' ἡμέραν. Your hour: not the hour favourable to you, and answering to your designs (De Wette), but the hour appointed to you for the carrying out of your work, according to the divine counsels (Meyer);—καὶ αὕτη (as it might be supplied) ἡ ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους; i.e., the power which is now manifested and active in you, is that which God, according to His eternal counsel, has permitted to the kingdom of darkness. Undoubtedly the Lord used this figurative expression with reference to the hour of darkness which had been chosen for the perpetration of this crime, and which rendered His words the more striking; but τὸ σκότος, of which He here spoke, could be nothing else than the kingdom of darkness, whose faithful accomplices Judas and his band, at this time, were. The whole of this address affords a proof of the clearness of mind with which the Lord, from the midst of the darkness now surrounding Him, surveyed the past, the present, and the future. St Luke, who has exclusively preserved this last saying of the Lord in Gethsemane, omits, on the other hand, the flight of the disciples, and that of the young man, Mark xiv. 48–52.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. If any proof were needed of the completeness of the strengthening which the Lord obtained by prayer in Gethsemane, it would be furnished by the tranquil yet dignified manner in which He met the traitor and his band. There, not a word too many or too few is spoken; even at such a moment He acts and speaks entirely as one that has power, though He lets it be plainly seen that He will not use His power for His own deliverance. The position which the Lord occupied in Gethsemane, between helpless friends on the one hand, and irreconcilable foes on the other, was, at the same time, of a typical and symbolical character.

2. The Lord's treatment of the traitor was a deed of the most lofty sublimity, in the midst of the deepest humiliation. He who could thus speak and act, might well speak, even in prayer, of the son of perdition, as the Lord actually did, John xvii. 12. The whole scene, in which heaven and hell were, so to speak, confronted with each other, did not last much longer than an instant; the Lord delayed no longer with these vipers who had glided, whispering, through the garden, and whom He cast off with a stroke, but went forward to meet the troop which had come to arrest Him. But His last words to Judas were heart-appalling enough to thunder in his ears throughout eternity.

3. The wound inflicted on Malchus by Peter, was the first of the innumerable wounds which mistaken and carnal zeal has inflicted on the Lord's cause. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, etc.: 2 Cor. x. 4. When this is forgotten, and men think to serve the cause of truth, not by dying, but by slaying for it (non moriendo sed interficiendo), it is no wonder if the Lord of the flock should often, in a very perceptible manner, resound a "non tali auxilio" in the ears of the combatants. The various misfortunes of the Crusaders, the defeat of the Protestants on the field of Kappel, etc., are, in this aspect, very remarkable. What would have become of the kingdom of God, if the Lord had not again and again interposed, as on this occasion, to repair, by His wisdom and power, the consequences of human indiscretion? "As Peter here cut off the servant's ear, so have they who boast of being his successors taken from the Church the hearing and understanding of the word of God; but Christ has touched the Church and healed it." J Gerhard.

4. How different was the condition in which the Lord left Gethsemane from that in which He entered it! and yet, now that He is led away a prisoner, He is far nearer to His crown than formerly, when He could speak with His disciples, and hold communion with the Father, in perfect liberty.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The sanctuary of prayer changed into an arena of wickedness.—Judas, the leader of those who took Jesus, Acts i. 16.—The Lord between helpless friends, on the one hand, and irreconcilable foes, on the other.—Gethsemane, at the hour of the Lord's arrest, 1. the scene, 2. the school of a great change.—The kiss of treachery: 1. How it was once given and answered; 2. how it is still continually given and answered.—The traitor in the Lord's presence: 1. His uneasiness before, 2. his falsehood during, 3. his change after his crime.—The Lord in the presence of the traitor: 1. His tranquil presence of mind; 2. His loving gentleness; 3. His judicial severity.—In Gethsemane we learn how the conflict with the kingdom of darkness must not, and how it must, be carried on; the first from Peter, the second from Jesus.—How often are we following our own will, even when we seem to consult the Lord's will!—Inconsiderate zeal in the Lord's service: 1. How it acts; 2. what harm it does.—Peter's zeal like Jehu's, 2 Kings x. 15, 16.—The sword of Peter, 1. thoughtlessly drawn, 2. authoritatively sheathed.—The disciple may forget himself, but the Lord never forgets him, nor Himself, for a single instant.—The last unfettered movement of the Lord's hand applied to the bestowal of a benefit.—The Lord's magnanimous love of His enemies, 1. warmly manifested, 2. coldly responded to.—How His enemies injured their own cause by the manner in which they sought to take the Nazarene.—Jesus free in His bonds; His enemies bound in their seeming freedom.—The cowardice of the armed, the courage of the bound.—The hour of darkness: 1. How menacingly it set in; 2. how brief was its duration; 3. how glorious the light by which it was followed.—Even darkness has its hour, but its power is of as short duration as its hour.—The power of darkness, 1. permitted by God, 2. used by God, 3. conquered by God.—God works most when He seems wholly inactive.—The Lamb bound, in order to be led to the slaughter, Ps. xxii. 17.

Starcke, Brentius: The authorities should not be against, but for Christ.—The hasty, especially need to learn of Christ.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Even zeal for Christ is sinful, when it is not according to knowledge, Rom. x. 2.—Where might prevails over right, it is our best wisdom to be quiet and patient.—When the world is acting against Christ, it is often indifferent for a time about its own convenience and dignity.—Rambach: When we consider the hour our own, we are often led thereby into many sins.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The binding of Jesus, our liberation.—Arndt: The arrest: 1. The superiority of Jesus to His enemies; 2. His care for His friends; 3. His forbearing kindness towards Judas.—Krummacher, Passionsbuch: 1. The kiss of Judas; 2. the separation; 3. the farewell.—The sword of Peter, and the cup of Jesus.—How the Lord surrendered Himself as a gift, and then as a sacrifice.—Braunig: The treachery practised against the person and cause of Jesus: 1. What we must think of such treachery; 2. how we must resist it. "Gratia sit vinculis tris, bone Jesu, quæ nostra tam potenter diruperunt." Bernhardus.

2. Caiaphas.

a. Peter's Denial. (VERS. 54–62.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvi. 69–75; Mark xiv. 66–72; John xviii. 15–18 and 25–27.

54 Then took they Him, and led Him, and brought Him into the high priest's house. And Peter followed afar off. 55 And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them. 56 But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire, and earnestly looked upon him, and said, This man was also with Him. 57 And he denied Him, saying, Woman, I know Him not. 58 And, after a little while, another saw him, and said, Thou art also of them. And Peter said, Man, I am not. 59 And about the space of one hour after, another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this fellow also was with Him; for he is a Galilean. 60 And Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest. And immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew. 61 And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter: and Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. 62 And Peter went out, and wept bitterly.

Ver. 55. According to the improved reading of Tischendorf, μέσος. The Receptus has ἐν μέσῳ.

Ver. 57. Γύναι should, according to Tischendorf, follow, instead of precede, the reply of Peter.

Ver. 61. The σημερον, which Tischendorf has here accepted, is accredited by B.M.L.X. and sundry cursive MSS.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Into the high priest's house.—To the question, What high priest is here meant? we can give no other answer than, Caiaphas:

and must, therefore, regard his palace as the scene of Peter's denial. If our Lord (according to John xviii. 13) passed some moments, after His arrest, in the house of Annas, it seems to have been merely that this aged man, who, though no longer the officiating high priest, still possessed important influence, might enjoy the spectacle of the Nazarene in bonds. We consider the view, that the unnamed high priest of St Luke, who plays so principal a part in the history of the Passion, should have been none other than Annas himself, as entirely unproved (Meyer). He is certainly represented as ἀρχιερεύς in Luke ii. 3 and Acts iv. 6; but this may be accounted for by his former rank, his great age, and enduring influence, if not, perhaps, also by the fact, that he exercised this office alternately with Caiaphas. There can be no reason for thus introducing a disturbing element into the history of the Passion, by maintaining that Luke, in opposition to the collective tradition of the Synopticists, intended any other than Caiaphas. Besides, it is self-evident that Luke passes over both the details of the examination before the spiritual authorities and those communicated by John, so that we cannot learn the historical sequence of events without a collation of the various accounts. We believe the following to be their correct order:—1. The leading away of Jesus, first to Annas, then to Caiaphas. Inquiry in the house of the latter concerning the doctrine and disciples of Jesus: John xviii. 12–14 and 19–24. 2. The first denial of Peter: Matt. xxvi. 69, 70; Mark xiv. 66–68; Luke xxii. 56, 57; John xviii. 15–18. 3. The false witnessing, the adjuration, the preliminary sentencing of Jesus in the night meeting: Matt. xxvi. 59–66; Mark xiv. 55–64. 4. The breaking up of this hasty judicial sitting, the mocking of Jesus by the servants: Matt. xxvi. 67, 68; Mark xiv. 65; Luke xxii. 63–65. 5. In the midst of, and partly before these events, the second and third denials of Peter took place. At the moment of the third denial, at the second crowing of the cock, the Lord was again led across the inner court into the hall of the high priest, where the last decisive meeting was to be held, and had thus the opportunity of casting on the fallen disciple that penetrating look which caused (6) Peter's repentance. Finally, 7. the morning meeting, which Matthew and Mark but briefly touch upon, and Luke more copiously describes—Matt. xxvii. 1; Mark xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66–71 and xxiii. 1; comp. John xviii. 28—and which was immediately followed by the bringing of Jesus before Pilate. Luke passes over all that was done to Jesus during the night in the high priest's palace, and directs our attention almost exclusively to Peter. The deeper glance of the psychologist is manifest even in the manner in which he describes the fall, the awakening, and the repentance of Peter.

2. Peter followed afar off.—It is scarcely possible to form a just conception of the frame of mind in which the inconsiderate disciple, urged by curiosity, uneasiness, and love, ventured to enter the high priest's palace. From John xviii. 15, etc., we learn how he obtained entrance. In explaining and judging of his threefold denial, we would bear in mind the hint of Bengel, "abnegatio ad plures plurium interrogationes, facta uno paroxysmo pro una numeratur," as a preservative against the absurdity of admitting, with Strauss and Paulus of Heidelberg, even eight denials.

3. And when they had kindled a fire, etc.—It is well known that the nights in Palestine, especially in spring, are often very cold. We need not, therefore, be surprised that the servants in the open court should be warming themselves; while Peter, assuming, as best he might, the appearance of an indifferent spectator, took a place among them, in order to be a closer eye- and ear-witness of all that was going on. The expression of Luke, περιαψάντων (Tischendorf, according to B.L.), seems to place us, as spectators, in the midst of the circle which had formed round the fire. According to all the Synopticists, Peter was sitting; according to John alone (ch. xviii. 18), he was standing by. Undoubtedly, the first account is the more accurate; while we must also take into account the uneasiness and restlessness of Peter, which would naturally induce him not to remain seated in one place, but sometimes, even involuntarily, to stand up. Besides, John xviii. 18 does not tell us what took place during, but after, the first denial. This very restlessness of Peter's demeanour may have had some effect in directing attention to him.

4. This man was also with Him.—According to Luke, the maid says this of Peter to others; Matthew and Mark represent her as addressing him directly; while John makes her speak, not affirmatively, but interrogatively,—"probably with somewhat of malicious humour, ignorantly, yet inimically disposed." Lange.—Luke says that she looked earnestly at Peter, ἀτενίσασα αὐτῷ (a favourite word with our Evangelist); and, undoubtedly, the more earnestly, since she, as θυρωρός (John xviii. 16, 17), well knew that it was a stranger whom she had just admitted. The suddenness of this charge necessitated prompt reply; and Peter, rejoicing at being able to preserve an outward appearance of tranquillity, gave a quick, cold, and vague answer: I know Him not, woman! For the original form of his answer, see Matthew and Mark; and comp. Lange on these passages.

5. Another.—The first cockcrowing (mentioned by Mark alone), immediately after the first denial, was not so much as noticed by Peter. Meantime, he seems to have succeeded in assuming so indifferent a manner, that, at first, he was subject to no further molestation. But the restlessness produced by uneasiness of conscience now urged him towards the door (Matt. xxvi. 71), which he unfortunately found closed. He did not venture to request its being opened, lest he should attract suspicion, and was therefore obliged to return to his former place. This very restlessness again aroused suspicion. According to Luke, another servant, according to Mark, the same, according to Matthew, another maid, now questioned him. The last-named discrepancy may, perhaps, be reconciled, by supposing that the portress of the προαύλιον, into which Peter went, is intended. The maid began, the ἕτερος followed, and various others (John) joined with them, diverting themselves with his anxiety, and asking, Art thou not one of His disciples? Man, I am not, said Peter, with the tone of a man who was seeking to free himself, as quickly as possible, from a troublesome inquirer; adding also an oath (Matthew). When we remember that the original source of this account must have been Peter himself, whose confusion would incapacitate him from recounting the occurrence with diplomatic fidelity, and in stereotyped form; and further, that, in a circle of servants, one word would naturally call forth another, and that when many are opposed to one, several might be speaking at once; we shall find these slight discrepancies, in the subordinate circumstances of the various accounts, rather favourable than otherwise to the credibility of the Gospels.

6. And about the space of one hour after.—So long, then, was the unhappy man left in peace. Attention was diverted from the disciple and directed towards the Master, whose trial was meantime progressing with terrible rapidity. The first denial would have taken place at about the same period that Jesus appealed to the testimony of His disciples, John xviii. 19–23; the second, during that in which He held His peace in the presence of the false witnesses. Much of this may have been both seen and heard by Peter; the court would command a view of the hall of justice, from which it was only separated by a colonnade. But now he also heard how the Lord was adjured and condemned; he saw Him, at the close of the sitting, in the hands of the servants, who thronged around Him, and commenced their first united ill-treatment. Peter was, from a distance, an eye-witness of all this, and perceived that His Master suffered all without resistance; and if He fared thus, what would become of His disciple? Thus this solitary hour still more emboldened and entangled Peter, instead of furnishing him with an opportunity of coming to himself. And now he was, for the third time, questioned, but found less prepared than ever. According to all the Synopticists, it was now the Galilean dialect of Peter that excited suspicion against him. On the peculiarities of this dialect, and the frequent misunderstandings thence arising, see Friedlieb, § 25; and Buxtorf, in his Chald. and Talmud. Lexicon, p. 435, etc. The fall of the Apostle was now completed by the attack of a relation of Malchus, John xviii. 26; and Peter denied his Master for the third time, uttering at the same time, according to Matthew and Mark, terrible oaths and self-imprecations.

7. The cock crew.—With respect to the possibility of Peter's hearing the crowing of a cock in the capital, it is obvious that it could not be exacted of the Romans that they should avoid keeping animals pronounced unclean by the Mosaic law. According to the Talmud, even the Jews, in after times, were accustomed, at marriages, to make presents of a cock and hen, as symbols of the matrimonial blessing. Interesting notices concerning the exact hour at which the gallicinium is usually heard in the East, will be found in Sepp, iii. p. 477. We may confidently look upon all figurative explanations of the cockcrowing as exegetical curiosities.

8. The Lord turned and looked upon Peter.—According to De Wette and Meyer, this striking trait is, on internal grounds, improbable. If, however, our above-mentioned view be correct, this objection disappears. Meanwhile, however, De Wette concedes that it is possible the Lord may have cast this glance upon Peter while He was being led away after His examination, ver. 66. If, however, we succeed in proving that Luke is really relating, vers. 66–71, a different examination from that recorded by Matt. xxvi. 59–66, there is then not the slightest pretext against the internal probability of a circumstance which may be accounted one of the most sublime in the history of the Passion.

9. And Peter remembered.—According to Luke, therefore, the repentance of Peter was caused by the joint influence of two different circumstances—the cockcrowing, and the look of Jesus. The πικρᾶς of Matthew and Luke, in some measure, explains the ἐπιβαλών of Mark, where it seems to us simplest to supply ἱμάτιον (Fritzsche). For other explanations, see Lange on Mark xiv. 73. —In the bitterness of his grief, Peter could not bear the sight of men, but rushed out, covering his face in his cloak, which he had thrown about him, and forcing his way through the crowd, which no longer detained him. Testimony to the depth of his contrition, and his desire for solitude, is furnished by the fact that, during the whole subsequent history of the Passion, not the slightest trace of him is found.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The strictness and accuracy with which the Evangelists relate the fall and repentance of Peter, deserve to be called one of the most indubitable, internal proofs of the credibility of the whole Gospel history.

2. We cannot possibly be surprised at the denial of Peter, when we consider his individual character, the force of circumstances, and the suddenness of the attack, and reflect that, after the first fatal step, it was almost impossible to restrain the second. It is, however, quite as unreasonable to excuse Peter, as has been attempted by Paulus of Heidelberg on the part of the Rationalists, and by Sepp, iii. p. 481, on that of the Roman Catholics. Even when we take into account the power of darkness (Olshausen) in explaining his fall, his denial is a crime which, both in itself, and by reason of its repetition, the warning which preceded, and the oath which followed it, was of a heavy and terrible nature. The guilt of this union of ingratitude, cowardice, and lies, was still further increased by the circumstances in which the Lord was now placed, and contributed not a little to the increase of His unutterable sufferings. The too zealous defenders of Peter make his repentance the mere exaggeration of a melancholy temperament, and, at the same time, imply that his subsequent treatment by the Lord, was almost too severe. On the other hand, it may certainly be adduced, in extenuation of his guilt, that he denied the Lord with his mouth only, and not in heart; and that he endeavoured to repair the error of a single night, by the fidelity of his whole life.

3. The fall and repentance of Peter have been the chief means of making him one of the most prominent of the Apostles. Such an individual as he, would never have risen so high, if he had not first fallen so low. Thus, the Lord makes even the sins of His people contribute to their further training, and (as is continually shown a posteriori), without lessening the guilt and moral responsibility of the repentant sinner, not only the severest afflictions which befall us, but even the evil deeds which we would least excuse, and have sincerely bewailed and repented, must afterwards work together for our good: Rom. viii. 28–30.

4. When the nature of true repentance is to be doctrinally described, a glance at the heart and life of Peter, the David of the New Testament, is indispensable. Peter becomes great by deeply humbling himself; while he who was subsequently the greatest of the Apostles, was so little in his own eyes, that he calls himself the least of all saints, and even nothing: 1 Cor. xv. 9; 2 Cor. xii. 11.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The union of courage and fear, strength and weakness, love and self-seeking, in the unstable, Peter-like character,—The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, Jer. xvii. 9, 10.—Peter's experience during this night, a proof of the truth of the two parables, Luke xiv. 28–33.—Beware of the first step.—How dangerous, hostile female influence may be to the Lord's disciple!—A ship without a rudder, is exposed to storms and waves.—How much do they risk, who venture, with unwatchful hearts, among the Lord's enemies!—The declivity of sin, the longer the more precipitous.—His speech betrays the Christian also.—The Lord's words are literally fulfilled.—True repentance leads us to seek solitude.—Blessed are they that mourn, Matt. v. 4.

Peter's denial remarkable, 1. in the Gospel history, 2. in the history of the human heart, 3. in the history of the Lord's death and Passion.—How should we judge of Peter's denial? Consider his crime, 1. in the light of his calling, and his guilt is decided; 2. in the light of his character, and his conduct is explicable; 3. in the light of circumstances, and his transgression is extenuated; 4. in the light of conscience, and the sentence we would pass, dies upon our guilty lips.—Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall, 1 Cor. x. 12, comp. Rom. xi. 30.—The history of the denial, as a part of the history of the Passion: 1. Peter's denial, an aggravation, 2. Peter's repentance, an alleviation, of the Lord's sufferings.—The preaching of the unfaithful disciple.—The repentance of Peter and Judas compared: Peter, 1. sorrowing, 2. sorrowing after a godly manner, 3. sorrowing to salvation, with a repentance not to be repented of, 2 Cor. vii. 10; in Judas, the sorrow of the world working death.—The history of Peter's fall, a revelation of the weakness of man.—How weakness, 1. brings men into danger, 2. hinders them from fleeing from danger, 3. when in danger, causes them to fall. It is a good thing that the heart be established by grace.—The Lord's look, the expression, 1. of a lasting remembrance: What did I tell thee? 2. of an inward grief: Is this thy sympathy for thy friend? 3. of a blessed consolation: I have prayed for thee; 4. of a timely hint to depart thence immediately.—The Lord turned and looked upon Peter: A lesson of preparation for the Holy Communion in Passion-week.—The tears of Peter, 1. honouring to Jesus, 2. refreshing to Peter, 3. significant to us.—The bitter tears of Peter do the Saviour no less honour than the cast-down pieces of silver of Judas.—Peter our predecessor on the way of true repentance.—The history shows us, 1. a sleeper who soon awakes, 2. a sinner mercifully looked upon, 3. a mourner sorrowing after a godly manner, 4. a fallen one who rises again.—The glorious harvest of Peter's sowing in tears, 1. for himself, 2. for the Church, 3. for heaven.—Striking expressions in Peter's epistles confirmed by the history of his fall and repentance; e.g., 1 Pet. i. 13, ii. 1, 11, iii. 12, 15, v. 5, 8, and other passages.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Forgetfulness of God's word, security, bad company, and presumption, cause heart-sorrow.—Quesnel: The more we trust ourselves and others, the farther does the strength of God depart from us.—The least opportunity, the weak vessel may cause even a rock to fall, when he depends upon himself, apart from God.—Brentius: The crowing of the cock should be a daily call to repentance.—J. Hall: Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound, Rom. v. 20.—Let us learn rightly to cherish and apply the gracious looks of God.—No sin so great, that it may not be blotted out.—Arndt: Denial of Christ: 1. Its sin; 2. its punishment.—F. W. Krummacher: The fall of Peter: 1. Its internal causes; 2. its outward particulars.—The tears of Peter.—Tholuck, Predigten iv. pp. 351–363: Passion-week teaches us, by the example of Peter, how great may be the inconstancy even of the man who has already confessed that Jesus has the words of eternal life, comp. John vi. 67–69.—J. Saurin, Nouv. Sermons i. p. 121: Sur l'abnegation de St Pierre.

b. The Lord mocked and condemned. (VERS. 63–71.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvi. 67, 68, xxvii. 1*a*; Mark xiv. 65–xv. 1.

63 And the men that held Jesus mocked Him, and smote Him. 64 And when they had blindfolded Him, they struck Him on the face, and asked Him, saying, Prophesy, who is it that smote Thee? 65 And many other things blasphemously spake they against Him. 66 And as soon as it was day, the elders of the people, and the chief priests, and the scribes, came together, and led Him into their council, 67 Saying, Art Thou the Christ? tell us. And He said unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe: 68 And if I also ask you, ye will not answer Me, nor let Me go. 69 Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God. 70 Then said they all, Art Thou then the Son of God? And He said unto them, Ye say that I am. 71 And they said, What need we any further witness? for we ourselves have heard of His own mouth.

Ver. 64. The ἔτυπτον αὐτοῦ τὸ πρόσωπον, καὶ seems to have been a marginal addition, which afterwards crept into the text. See Tischendorf and Meyer on this passage.

Ver. 68. The καὶ before ἐρωτήσω is expunged by Lachmann and Tischendorf, after B.L. cursive MSS.

Ver. 68. Μοι ἢ ἀπολύσητε. These words also excite, at least, the supposition of their being an inappropriate enlargement. See Tischendorf and Meyer.

Ver. 69. Δὲ must be inserted after ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, on the authority of A.B.D.L.X. and many others.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. The ill-usage which St Luke now proceeds to relate, seems to have been perpetrated immediately after sentence was pronounced at the night trial, and before its more legal confirmation by the morning assembly. In the interval, some of the Sanhedrists left the court, so that the prisoner remained in the hands of the servants. Sepp supposes, without reason, that Jesus was placed in prison, Sepp a. a. O. iii. p. 480; it seems more probable that He remained in the same room, in which He had stood before the council. On the mocking of Christ, see Lange on Matt. xxvi. 67. That no excuse can be found for this deed, cannot certainly need mention. Among all civilised nations, a condemned criminal is, as long as he lives, under the protection of the law, and even finds, in the sad fate which awaits him, a security against further ill-usage. In this instance, however, the course of the outraged law was too slow for His enemies, and the hall of justice was converted into a scene of wanton cruelty. The servants, who were entrusted with the care of the prisoner, had observed their masters' hatred of Him; and though they had been hitherto, perhaps, filled with some fear of His supernatural power, yet, when it appeared that He would make no use of it, their fear was exchanged for unbridled malice. It seems as if they had a mind to indemnify themselves for the repulse they had experienced in Gethsemane. They derided Him especially in His prophetic and kingly character. First, He was to declare, with His face covered, which of them had smitten Him. Then He was mocked and insulted, as a sign that He was too despicable to be the king even of these meanest servants. But amidst the comparatively slight variations of the different accounts, we consider it a superfluous concession, to assert that He received similar ill-treatment more than once, in the house of Caiaphas. Much less can we agree with Schleiermacher and Strauss, that it is absolutely improbable that even members of the council should have taken part in this mockery. When we remark how they who ill-treat Jesus, Matt. xxvi. 67, are not distinguished from those who judge him, ver. 66; and how, according to Mark xiv. 65, the men who mock Jesus are emphatically distinguished from the servants who, according to both Mark and Luke, strike Him in the face; we shall rather feel inclined to the notion, that the masters, in their hellish joy at the triumph they had obtained, made common cause with the servants, and even assisted in degrading their victim to the dust of the deepest indignity. By combining the various traits contributed by the several Evangelists, we obtain an image of derided majesty, inspiring us with horror, and, at the same time, forcibly reminding us of the prophetic saying, Isa. l. 4–8.

2. And as soon as it was day.—The view, that the Jewish council met but once for the trial of Jesus (Meyer, v. Hengel), has, when superficially considered, much to recommend it; but is, when more accurately reviewed, too much opposed to the contents of all the synoptical Gospels to be accepted. Apart from other considerations, it is very arbitrary to determine what was the sequence of events from St Luke, who, in the whole history of the Passion, pays far less attention to chronology than Matthew and Mark, places similar events in juxtaposition, and even, by his account of the mocking and ill-treatment of Jesus (63–65), tacitly presupposes that a sentence must have been passed, without which, so violent a deed could not possibly have taken place. The answer given by the Lord to the Sanhedrim, according to Luke (vers. 67 and 68), would have been unsuitable if He had now been addressing His enemies for the first time, and if nothing had preceded it which might justify so decided a tone. The account of Matthew, ch. xxvii. 1, and Mark, xv. 1, would be utterly without purpose, if the Sanhedrim had assembled but once, on this occasion. And though the narrative of Luke, vers. 66–71, coincides, in many particulars, with the night trial of Matthew and Mark, yet it has also its own distinctive colouring, sufficiently characterizing it as the second official and decisive sitting of the council. This partial coincidence is the very reason why Matthew and Mark speak only of the first sitting, and Luke only of the second. The assembly which pronounced the first sentence of death, bears every mark of precipitation, incompleteness, and invalidity; the high priest was present only in his ordinary garments, since the rending of his costly garments was not permitted. The Lord's bitterest enemies were hastily assembled at night, that they might commence proceedings without delay; in order, however, to avoid violating, at least, the forms of law, they assembled a second time in the early morning, at a more legal hour, not to make further investigation, but to confirm, so far as was possible, a resolution already taken. Undoubtedly, those who had taken the lead in the night trial, sufficiently apprised the other councillors of the matter, before the prisoner was again brought before them; and the proceedings of Caiaphas received their approval, so that the matter had merely to be taken up where it had been left by him. If we may conclude, from ch. xxiii. 51, that Joseph of Arimathea was present at this morning assembly, his vote, with that of a few others, could only prevent unanimity, which, in that case, according to all appearance, did not prevail.

3. Art Thou the Christ? etc.—We now see no more of the perplexity betrayed in every word a few hours ago. A firm starting-point had been attained in the declaration which the high priest's adjuration had elicited from the prisoner, and its repetition alone was needed for giving a legal form to the sentence already pronounced. These judges had not met to investigate, but to pass sentence; they therefore required merely a corroborative answer, which the Lord also gives them in a manner which implies that His previous answer was known to them. "Tell us, art Thou the Christ?" they asked, because they would all hear it from His own mouth. Comp. ver. 71. Wherefore, they at first craftily brought forward, not the political, but the religious side of the question. "They would have been too glad to extort more from Him, but they only obtained a repetition of what had already been heard."

4. If I tell you, ye will not believe, etc.—That this answer is "not a very fitting one" (De Wette), would only be true, if we were to make the two trials identical, and to forget all that had already taken place. The Lord does not directly say, but only infers from His former experience, what would happen if He were to think fit to reply. The highest aim of such a testimony, the production of faith, would not, by any means, be attained; and if He should begin to do as had been done to Him, and as He was conscious He should be perfectly justified in doing, viz., propose questions to His adversaries, they would never be able to answer these satisfactorily, and would but the more expose their own perplexity. Of the possibility of liberation, to which the critically doubtful reading, ἢ ἀπολύσητε refers, He no longer thought. Certainly "questioning belongs only to the examiner, not to the accused" (De Wette); but here was an accused of an altogether unusual kind, and He who had already spoken so many incomparable words, hors de ligne, to His judges, might well allow Himself so much freedom of speech, without giving modern criticism reason to shake its head.—Hereafter. The Lord would simply say that He abides by the words He formerly uttered, and contrasts the future glory with the present shame. Even the last time that He called Himself the Son of man, He manifested the tranquil glory of His dignity.

5. Art Thou then the Son of God?—The Jews evidently expected the Messiah to be the Son of God, in the theocratic sense of the word. They did not, however, now lay special emphasis on this word, as intending to express thereby anything radically different from ver. 67, but because they can scarcely trust their ears that one so deeply degraded, and already condemned to death, should attribute to Himself this highest of all dignities. They now took up the religious side of the matter, and expressed themselves as strongly as possible, for the purpose of better justifying the verdict of blasphemy. Jesus simply answered their question in the affirmative, vers. 68 and 69, sufficiently showing His reason for adding not another word. Hereupon, the court broke up, in a manner similar to the former one. If Caiaphas had formerly exclaimed, with respect to the two false witnesses, What need we any further witness? his partisans, who found his account corroborated by Christ's own words, now declared in reply, that they wanted no further testimony, since they had heard of His own mouth. No express sentence of death was now pronounced; they merely confirmed the preceding one, since the crime was now satisfactorily proved. But they thus, at the same time, witnessed against themselves, and deprived themselves of the last excuse for their sin.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. In the midst of the most barbarous ill-usage, as lately in the presence of the false witnesses, we see the Lord maintaining an imperturbable silence. Four times in the history of the Passion is a similar silence mentioned: before Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi. 63), before Herod (Luke xxiii. 9), and twice before Pilate (Matt. xxvii. 12; John xix. 9). It is one of the most profitable of exercises to interpret the full force of this silence; and it will not a little contribute to the growth of our knowledge of Jesus, to observe when He spoke, and when He held His peace.

2. As the Lord was silent when He might have spoken, He also spoke, before the Jewish council, when He might have been silent. With the marks of the ill-usage He had just suffered upon His face, He might have esteemed them unworthy of any further answer. With indescribable dignity, however, He bears His last testimony; and uniting with a divine condescension, which placed itself upon the stand-point of His enemies, an infinite forbearance, He, though thoroughly penetrating the designs of His enemies, leaves nothing untried which might conduce to their conviction and amendment. He forbears where He might upbraid, and only warns where He might crush; and even His last words to the Jewish Sanhedrim justify the saying, "Never man spake like this man."

3. On this occasion, the Lord points, as it were, with His own hand, even before His resurrection, as He did after it, ch. xxiv. 26, to the indissoluble connection between His sufferings and His glory. "Ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, ab hoc punto, quum dimittere non vultis. Hoc ipsum erat iter ad gloriam." Bengel.

4. It is obvious to all who will take the pains to follow somewhat strictly the course of the trial, that, in the condemnation of Jesus by the Sanhedrim, the grossest injustice was practised, and not even the form of justice respected. The validity of the sentence, which Salvador especially defends, has been satisfactorily disputed from a legal point of view by Dupin, l'ainé: Jésus devant Caiphe et Pilate, Paris 1829.

5. It is remarkable that sentence was once pronounced, in almost the same words, against Farel the reformer, when the infuriated priests cried out, in Ghent, "He has blasphemed God, we need no further witness; he is guilty of death;" so that Farel indignantly exclaimed, "Speak the words of God, and not of Caiaphas." See Lives and Select Writings of the Fathers and Founders of the Reformed Church, ix. p. 13 (Leben Farels und Virets, by Dr E. Schmidt, Elberfeld 1860).

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Holy One of God, the sport of unholy sinners.—Wickedness apparently humbled the Lord, but really degraded itself.—The Saviour blindfolded: 1. How much He sees! 2. how sublime is His silence! 3. how powerful His preaching!—Who is he that smote thee? I and my sins, etc.—Who, when He was reviled, reviled not again, 1 Pet. ii. 22, 23.—The morning of Christ's dying day illumined by the glory of His majesty: 1. He is silent when He might have spoken; 2. He speaks when He might have been silent; 3. He forbears when He might have rebuked.—The condemnation of Jesus by the Sanhedrim teaches us, 1. the power of sin, 2. the greater power of grace, 3. the supreme power of the divine government.—The Sanhedrim, which rejected Jesus, itself underwent the sentence of, 1. blindness, 2. obduracy, 3. rejection.—The Lord's deep humiliation contrasted with His future glory.—The depths of Satan penetrated by the Searcher of hearts.—The Lord carries His point even with the theologians of His days, because to the very last He takes His stand upon Scripture, Dan. vii. 12–14.—The Christian, too, after the unambiguous testimony of Jesus, needs no further evidence.

Starcke: Fret not when thou art injured in thy good name; He whose was the highest majesty, was even blasphemed.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Jesus stood before an unjust judge, that we might be able to stand before the just judgment of God.—We must show submission to rulers, however unjust they may be, Rom. xiii. 7.—The lowest step of Christ's humiliation was the one nearest to His exaltation, 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.—Brentius. Sincerity well-pleasing to God.—Quesnel: Oh, how various are Christ's hearers! Some rejoice at His words as the words of life; others chafe at them, and make them the words of death.—Arndt: Jesus before Caiaphas: 1. The confession; 2. the sentence; 3. the ill-usage.—Krummacher, Passionsbuch, p. 336, etc.: Prophesy unto us, Thou Christ.—Christ before the Sanhedrim.—C. Palmer: How the world tries to rid itself of the truth.

3. Pilate and Herod.

a. Jesus brought before Pilate, questioned by him, and pronounced innocent. (CHAP. XXIII. 1–4.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 1, 2, 11–14; Mark xv. 1–5; John xviii. 28–38.

1 And the whole multitude of them arose, and led Him unto Pilate. 2 And they began to accuse Him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king. 3 And Pilate asked Him, saying, Art Thou the King of the Jews? And He answered him, and said, Thou sayest it. 4 Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man.

Ver. 1. They led: according to the reading ἤγαγον, in Plurali after collectivum.

Ver. 2. With Lachmann, and Tischendorf, we read ἔθνος ἡμων, on the authority of B.D.K.L.M. cursive MSS.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And led Him.—The leading away and solemn delivery of Jesus to Pilate, is one of those particulars in the history of His Passion to which all the Evangelists give evident prominence. And no marvel; for the cause thus enters upon a new stage, and is transferred from the ecclesiastical to the temporal jurisdiction. On the period and manner of this leading away, compare, beside the authors mentioned by Hase, Leben Jesu, § 111, the Dutch Dissertatio of P. J. J. Mounier, de Pilati in causa servatoris agendi ratione, 1 B. 1825. With respect to the sources whence our knowledge of this event is derived, the Gospel of Nicodemus contains some particulars which seem, on internal grounds, to be probable: on the whole, however, it is only valuable as showing the manner in which this trial was supposed to have taken place in the fourth and fifth centuries. There are not wanting, either in the Acts or Epistles, remarkable references to what took place before the Roman procurator (Acts iii. 13, 14, iv. 27; 1 Tim. vi. 13). The four Evangelists are, however, our chief authorities; and in their accounts of this trial, each maintains, as usual, his characteristic peculiarity. For while the Synopticists narrate chiefly the public side of the trial, St John alone communicates the private conversations between the Lord and the governor. St Matthew, who, even from the beginning of his Gospel, speaks more of dreams and visions than the others, is the only one who relates the remarkable dream of Pilate's wife, as well as the truly Israelitish ceremony of washing the hands. St

Mark depicts, in his own brief and vigorous manner, how the Lion of the tribe of Judah hastened over the field of conflict towards His final triumph. St Luke has enriched his description of the legal transaction with a fresh particular, the appearance before Herod; but, at the same time, he relates circumstances more concisely, caring more for the grouping of events than for their chronological sequence, and even omitting the scourging and mocking of Christ by the Roman soldiers. John alone describes the actual commencement of the trial, ch. xviii. 28–32; while it is to Luke that we owe the very accurate statement of the actual indictment, with which the high priests opened their series of accusations.

2. To Pilate.—The inquiry, whether, by the πραιτώριον, we are to understand the well-known fort Antonia, or the palace of Herod, must, we believe, be answered in the former sense. The Roman garrison lay in fort Antonia; and the governor, during his temporary stay in the capital, would most probably take up his abode there. Tradition also forbids our considering these localities as identical, and it is mere assumption to regard the palace of Herod as the usual and appointed residence of the procurators. Josephus, de bello Jud. 11, 14, 8, and Philo, de Legatione Judæorum, p. 1034, who are usually cited in favour of the Herodian palace, leave it quite uncertain whether this palace was, at the time of Christ, or indeed ever, the residence of the governor. The fort was situated on the north-western side of the temple-mountain, while the place "Gabbatha" lay, even according to Josephus, between fort Antonia and the western corner of the temple, in front of the hall of justice.

3. And they began, etc.—It was not easy for them so to introduce the matter, as to make a favourable impression upon Pilate. The subject, as well as the tone of their address, shows plainly enough that this was their aim. Τοῦτον, at first δεικτικῶς, without indicating the name of the accused, and with audible contempt; εὕρομεν, with affected gravity, to which the subsequent saying of Pilate, that he had found no fault in Him, nor yet Herod, ver. 14, is a remarkable contrast; τὸ ἔθνος ἡμῶν, with the ardour of genuine patriots who cannot suffer the true interests of their country to be risked: comp. John vii. 49. The accusation itself is threefold: First, He perverts the people, διαστρέφοντα; properly, He gives them a false direction, leads them astray, brings them out of the right way, in which they, and the Romans with them, so much wished to see them walk. Next, He forbids them to give tribute to Cæsar, saying,—and this is the ground both of His first and second transgression,—that He is Christ, a king. It was not without a motive that they intentionally avoided saying, King of the Jews, although it was soon apparent that Pilate understood their indefinite expression in no lower sense. With evident tact did they bring forward, not the religious, but the political side of their accusation, and then waited, in the hope, in some measure at least, to prove their accusations, till Pilate should himself demand the grounds of their assertions. He, however, was already sufficiently acquainted with the Jews, and therefore turned, as quickly as possible, from the accusers to the accused.

4. Art Thou the King of the Jews?—Pilate, not ignorant of the prevailing expectations of the Messiah, expressed his question in a correct form, and endeavoured to ascertain whether Jesus were indeed the promised and long-desired King of the Jews. To this question the Lord could give no other answer than an immediate and unequivocal affirmative. To have denied, or to have been silent, would have been to act in contradiction to Himself. And if it be asserted that He ought to have defined His meaning more accurately, since it was possible He might be misunderstood by a Gentile, we may confidently maintain that the tone, as well as the manner, in which His answer was given, was well calculated to lead the governor to further inquiry. This aim, indeed, was even so far attained, that Pilate took Him aside, that He might further explain and confirm His affirmative answer.

5. I find no fault in this man.—According to Meyer, Pilate finds in the confession itself a mark of innocence: "it seems to him the fixed idea of an enthusiast." This is certainly possible, though no single proof can be adduced in favour of the notion. But it would then still be a question, whether such an instantaneous and purely subjective impression would have justified the procurator in thus, without further inquiry, pronouncing the prisoner innocent, and, consequently, if his decision should be accepted, exempting Him from all further prosecution. We rather conceive that Pilate, after the public examination related by all the Synopticists, entered upon the private one, which John alone has preserved, and pronounced, in consequence, that declaration of Christ's innocence related by Luke, ch. xxiii. 4, and John, ch. xviii. 38. In the private discussion between Pilate and Jesus, John xviii. 33–37, the preceding accusation, Luke xxiii. 2, is tacitly implied. And here also Luke cannot be thoroughly understood till his account is completed by John.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The leading of Jesus to Pilate is one of the most remarkable crises in the history of the Passion. It not only contributes to the fulfilment of the Lord's own words, ch. xviii. 32, but also brings His passion into direct connection with the history of the world, the reins of whose government God had at this time delivered, as it were, into the hands of the Romans. It was the means of bringing Him, according to His own words, to the death of the cross; but it also prepared, by the declarations which were elicited even from Pilate, for the manifestation of His innocence and majesty. The rejection of the Messiah by the Jewish nation, and the consequent fall of their city and temple, were now decided. The Sanhedrim, by delivering Him up to Pilate, declared that they would not accept this Messiah, and thus gave the promised salvation out of their own into unclean and Gentile hands. From this hour Israel's Passover became a vain ceremony, and Israel itself but impure leaven swept out of the house of God, the Church of Christ. But they thus contributed to the fulfilment of God's eternal purpose, "to gather together in one all things in Christ," Eph. i. 10. From the moment the Great Sufferer passed the threshold of the Gentile dwelling, the middle wall of partition was broken down, Eph. ii. 14–16, and the Gentile world invited to celebrate the feast of a greater deliverance than that of Israel on the night of the Passover. As the night recorded Acts xvi. 9, 10, was one which decided the spiritual fate of Europe, so did this morning that of the whole Gentile world.

2. It is one of the most adorable arrangements of God's providence, that, at the very time when Christ was to die, a man should be at the head of the government in Judea, who was in every respect peculiarly adapted to be, in his ignorance, the instrument of carrying out the counsels of God for the salvation of the world. On one hand, he was sufficiently susceptible of truth to recognise it, and courageous enough to express it, and acknowledge the Lord's innocence several times; but, on the other, so weak, that he loved the praise of man more than the praise of God, and so self-seeking, that he was more concerned for his own interest than for the rights of innocence. It is felt that the earthly judge under whom the world's Redeemer was to suffer death, must needs have been just such a character.

3. By the deliverance of Jesus to Pilate, the Gentile world was inculpated, with the Jewish nation, in the greatest crime ever perpetrated. It was then shown that the true light was as much hated by them that were under the law, as by them that were without law; and the judgment of Rom. iii. 19, 20, appears perfectly just; while the grace of God is also manifested as the same to all who believe, without respect of persons: Rom. iii. 21–31.

4. The manner and method in which the chief priests introduce this case to the secular power, shows plainly enough the part they had resolved to play. No means were too base, not even slander; for it can be called nothing else than conscious slander to affirm with unblushing brow, after what had taken place three days ago, that the Lord had forbidden the payment of tribute to Cæsar. Now they are cringing, now defiant, showing that they subscribe to the maxim, that the end justifies the means. And scarcely do they fail in one attempt before they proceed with desperate obstinacy to another. But the dazzling light of the Lord's innocence, to which Pilate was repeatedly constrained to bear testimony, does but shine more brightly in contrast with the darkness of wickedness. Together with other noises, resounding from the most opposite quarters, in praise of the moral purity of Jesus, even during the last hours of His life, the testimony even of Pilate contributes to strengthen us in our most holy faith, that the Lamb of God is in truth an ἀμνὸς ἄμωμος καὶ ἄσπιλος. It is the province of divinity to show the connection between the sinlessness of Jesus and the atoning virtue of His death.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The early morning of the most remarkable day in the world's history.—The dreadful injustice practised under the forms of justice.—The King of the Jews delivered into the hands of the Gentiles.—Christ, 1. the centre of union between Jews and Gentiles: a. He manifests, b. bears, c. covers the sins of both. 2. He reconciles both in one body, a. to God, b. to each other, c. to heaven, Col. i. 19, 20.—Slander against the Lord and His people, 1. inexhaustible as to weapons, 2. impotent as to victory.—Jesus, the faithful Witness, Rev. i. 5.—"Thou sayest it:" 1. The truth, 2. the dignity, 3. the demands of this saying.—The favourable impression at first made by the Lord upon His, as yet, impartial judge.—The spotless innocence of the sufferer, 1. slandered, 2. defended, 3. rewarded.—The praiseworthy manner in which Pilate opened the trial of Jesus, contrasted with the pitiable manner in which he concluded it.—Pilate, the type of the natural man, in his relation to Christ.

Starcke: They who otherwise hold no intercourse with each other, make common cause when one needs the other to carry out evil designs.—Quesnel: There is no course of life so just and innocent, that he who leads it cannot be accused and persecuted.—Brentius: Let us not judge directly, but hear also the other side.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: More justice is often found in a heathen than a Christian judge.—Osiander: Christ suffered not for His own, but for our sins, 2 Cor. v. 2.—Heubner: The preacher of obedience accused of sedition.—At all events, Jesus produced the greatest sensation.—Arndt: The first examination of Jesus before the governor: How Pilate treats, 1. the Jews, 2. the Lord.—Krummacher: Christ before Pilate: 1. Jesus led before Pilate; 2. Pilate's entry into the judgment-hall; 3. the commencement of the judicial proceedings.—The accusation.—Christ, a King.—The Lamb of God.—Tholuck, a. a. O. iv. p. 339, etc.: The history of the Passion teaches, by the example of Pilate, the degree of shallowness and perversion of which the heart of man is capable.—J. P. Haserbroek, preacher in Amsterdam: Pilate, 1. as a man, 2. as a judge, 3. as a witness against us.

b. Jesus before Herod. (VERS. 5–12.)

5 And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place. 6 When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilean. 7 And as soon as he knew that He belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent Him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time. 8 And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: for he was desirous to see Him of a long season, because he had heard many things of Him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him. 9 Then he questioned with Him in many words; but He answered him nothing. 10 And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused Him. 11 And Herod with his men of war set Him at nought, and mocked Him, and arrayed Him in a gorgeous robe, and sent Him again to Pilate. 12 And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together; for before they were at enmity between themselves.

Ver. 8. The πολλά of the Receptus is omitted by Griesbach and others, upon the authority of B.D.K.L.N. The supposition that it was inserted, a seriore manu, to strengthen the text, is probable.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And they were the more fierce, ἐπίσχυον, sensu intransitivo = κατίσχυον, ver. 23, invalescebant, Vulgata. The declaration of Pilate did not answer their expectation. Seeing that their last accusation, concerning His pretensions to royal dignity, found no response from the judge, they fell back with the more emphasis upon the first, viz., that He perverted the nation. That the governor might perceive that no less a matter than the public peace was involved, they accused Jesus of being incessantly occupied in stirring up the people (ἀνασείει, in præs.). The place where He commenced operations was indicated as being Galilee, ἀρξάμενος, Acts i. 21; but it was also stated that He had already penetrated to this place, into the very heart of the country. According to Matt. xxvii. 12–14, Mark xv. 3–5, they added many more accusations; but these were of so unimportant a nature, that the Evangelists pass them over in silence, and the Lord deemed them unworthy of reply. Pilate, however, became more and more perplexed; and, as soon as he heard the name of Galilee, seized upon it as a welcome expedient. It was not without malicious intentions that the Jews mentioned Galilee; the hatred of the governor towards Herod and the Galileans was well known to them, and they hoped thereby the more to prejudice him against Jesus, as a Galilean. But their desire, in this respect at least, was not attained. Pilate heard Galilee spoken of without any noticeable bitterness; and Herod, the tetrarch of this country, being at this time in Jerusalem on account of the Passover, he resolved, as soon as he understood that Jesus was, according to the superficial and popular notion, which knew nothing of His having been born at Bethlehem, a Galilean, to send Him immediately to that prince.

2. He sent Him to Herod.—The question is, for what purpose? According to the usual view, it was to get rid of the matter himself. Meyer says, that in referring to Herod, who might possibly send Him into Galilee, he was seeking to get himself out of the business. Certainly such a reference from the forum apprehensionis to the forum domicilii was lawful in itself, and not contrary to the custom of the Romans: comp. Acts xxvi. 3 and 4, and Friedlieb on this passage. The question, however, is, whether this were indeed the governor's intention. Nothing that Pilate says, proves that he was desirous of getting entirely free from this matter, which, at this juncture, had not become so repulsive or burdensome to him as to make him desire to get rid of it at any cost. The view (of Ewald) that he hoped, if possible, to receive from Herod an opinion favourable to the accused, or, more correctly, to receive from him some further information concerning a person and a matter becoming with every moment both more obscure and more interesting to him, is more probable. At the same time, he was thereby showing a politic courtesy to Herod; and, in case he should unreservedly transfer the decision of so important a matter to his hands, he would have conceded a privilege to him. The former, but not the latter, corresponds with the disposition of the governor, who had not sent the Galileans, whose blood he had mingled with their sacrifices (Luke xiii. 1), to Herod for execution, but had caused them to be slaughtered by his own soldiers. Thus also it is explained why the Lord should hold His peace in the presence of Herod, in whom He did not recognise a lawful judge. Thus also we comprehend why Pilate, after Christ's return from Herod, did not seem disappointed in his expectations, but merely expressed the opinion which the tetrarch, as well as himself, had formed of the prisoner, vers. 13–16. And thus, finally, it is evident why only one Evangelist should have considered it necessary to mention an occurrence which, even from its political results, was generally known. This was no decisive crisis in the judicial proceedings, as the leading of Jesus before Pilate was, but a simple attempt, on the part of the governor, to obtain some solution of the mystery which now perplexed him, by an expedient as wisely chosen as it was strictly lawful. It formed, however, no part of his design thus to expose the accused to fresh inquiry and insult, though the result showed that He experienced both from Herod.

3. Herod . . . was exceeding glad.—He had once trembled, when the fame of Christ's miracles reached his ear; but this arrow of conscience was blunted, and he could now mock and deride Him. It was the wish of the frivolous tetrarch to see something really exciting, and to let his court participate in the entertainment. For a long time he had entertained the desire (θέλων) to see Jesus, of whom he had been continually hearing, and hoped to be able to incite Him to the performance of some miracle. The nature of His examination, ver. 9, may be inferred from his well-known character, on the one hand, and from the Lord's imperturbable silence, on the other. As the Thaumaturgus whom he esteemed Him to be, he could have, at the most, approached Him with childish curiosity, but not with the slightest trace of respect. "Jesus must entertain him as a powerful magician, must amuse him, or, perhaps, predict success to his egotistical superstition. He sought nothing else from Him. It is a fearful symptom to see what a caricatured notion this prince had conceived of this greatest among his subjects, though Jesus had moved his whole country with His spirit. And he formed this mean idea, in spite of the fact that the Baptist had lived in his neighbourhood, and had given him an impression of the spirit of the prophet." Lange.

5. And the chief priests, etc.—From ver. 15, we perceive that Pilate had commanded them also to appear before Herod. Indeed, they would not willingly have lost this opportunity, nor let the prisoner escape them for even a moment. They well saw that it was their interest to blacken Him as much as possible before Herod; and therefore accuse Him with evident vehemence, εὐτόνως, comp. Acts xviii. 28, as if they feared that even Herod might be too favourably disposed towards their victim. It happened, however, more on account of his own disappointed expectations, than of their accusations, that Herod did not send the Lord back without heaping fresh insults upon Him.

6. Set Him at nought.—The priests accused the Lord, the soldiers mocked Him: hatred urged the former, contempt the latter. The mockery was the revenge of wounded pride, and was manifested in a peculiar form. A gorgeous robe was thrown over His shoulders, ἐσθῆτα λαμπράν, not exactly of purple, coccineam vestem, which the word does not express, but of dazzling white; perhaps to distinguish Him, after the Roman fashion, as a candidate for some post of honour (Kuinoel, Lange, and others), or to characterize him as a king, by enveloping Him in a robe similar to that in which generals marched to battle (Friedlieb, De Wette, Meyer). In the latter case, this was also an unmistakeable hint to Pilate, that such a pretended king deserved at most contempt, but not condemnation.

7. Pilate and Herod were made friends.—The reason of their enmity is unknown; perhaps it was the occurrence about the Galileans, ch. xiii. 1. To St Luke, however, who always writes like an acute psychologist, the event seems of sufficient consequence to deserve mention, since this unexpected reconciliation obtained general publicity. This notice affords, also, indirect proof of the truth of the narrative. It is asserted, but not proved, by De Wette, that St John was ignorant of this episode. If such were, however, the case, it would by no means shake the truth of the relation: it was quite possible that every circumstance that occurred might either not have come to his knowledge at the time, or might have been no longer remembered by him when he wrote his Gospel. When we consider the eclecticism of each Evangelist, it is dangerous, both in the history of the Passion and on other occasions, to lay too much stress on the argument e silentio. A narrative, in which Herod is depicted in such entire conformity to what we know of him from other sources, bears internal marks of truth, and may be very suitably inserted after John xviii. 38. The supposition of Strauss, that this account arose "from an effort to place Jesus before every tribunal that it was possible to locate in Jerusalem," has not even a shadow of proof; and if it had been his anti-Jewish interest which prompted Luke to hunt up the greatest possible number of testimonies to the innocence of Jesus, as Baur asserts (Kanon Evang. p. 489), he would undoubtedly have put a more direct declaration of this innocence in the mouth of Herod. In opposition to these unfounded doubts, it may be remarked, that, in Acts iv. 27, the names of Pontius Pilate and Herod are joined by the first believers, and that Justin Martyr also was acquainted with the circumstance in question. See Dial. cum Tryph. cap. 103.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. At the court of Herod, the Lord again encountered the same temptation, truly satanic in its origin, which He had on a former occasion, ch. iv. 9–12, triumphantly repelled. Once more, before He was lifted up upon the cross, was the prospect of easily obtaining the favour of the powerful tetrarch laid before Him. Could a more favourable opportunity have possibly been presented to Him—with the mocking courtiers on one hand, and the accusing priests on the other—of surprising the one, and confounding the other? But the Lord did neither; He remained faithful to His principles, performing no miraculous feat for His own advantage, and explaining, by His silence, the meaning of that precept in the Sermon on the Mount, "Give not that which is holy to the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine."

2. If there was one period during the whole course of Pilate's judicial proceedings which may be fixed upon, beyond all others, as that in which the Lord experienced the most intense agony of mind, it was surely that in which He appeared before Herod. We can form but a faint idea of what a glance into the depths of such a soul as Herod's must have been to the holy Searcher of hearts, and how much it must have cost Him to see the hands, stained with the Baptist's blood, caressingly stretched out towards Himself. But, in the midst of this deep degradation, in which He was, as it were, thrown like a ball from one unholy hand to another, the majesty of

His eloquent silence was but the more gloriously displayed. Jesus, even silent as He was before Herod, and working no miracles, was Himself a miracle, which might, indeed, be opposed, but could not but excite astonishment. Comp. Luke xi. 29, 30.

3. The silent Jesus, in the presence of the mocking court, was suffering for sins of the tongue, of vanity, and of derision; and the white garment of His humiliation was, contrary to the ideas of Herod, prophetic of His dazzling robe of glory.

4. The coalition of Pilate and Herod against the suffering Jesus, is the prototype of many a shameful alliance which has been formed, between enemies quite as irreconcilable, for the purpose of common opposition to the sect everywhere spoken against: Acts xxviii. 22. Scepticism and superstition, Pharisaism and Sadduceeism, ecclesiastical hierarchy and political liberalism, Romanism and republicanism, are, in their natures, just such antipodes as Pilate and Herod; and yet these have been just as inclined, from selfish interests, to form a temporary coalition, when efforts for self-preservation and irreconcilable hatred of vital Christianity have demanded it. Even in this respect, this ancient history of the Passion is always a modern one, and the past is but a mirror of the present.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The continued false accusation against Jesus, an involuntary testimony in His favour.—The Lord's sufferings before Herod, mentioned in the prayer of the first believers, Acts iv. 27, 28.—The sending of Jesus to Herod, and the circumstances therewith connected, a manifestation of the adorable providence of God, with respect to the suffering Lord. At first, we see here, 1. a dark night; afterwards, 2. a dim twilight; and, finally, 3. the dawning day.—The desire of Herod to see Jesus, contrasted with that of other kings, ch. x. 23, 24; comp. John viii. 56, xii. 21.—The Lord, in Herod's palace: 1. deeply humiliated; 2. sorely tempted; 3. found without spot or blemish.—The unrestrained desire for miracles not cherished, but checked, by Jesus.—The levity of the court, contrasted with the seriousness of the sufferer.—Herod in the presence of Jesus, and Jesus in the presence of Herod.—The many unprofitable questions with which the Lord and His Gospel are still assailed, by so many who neglect the one needful one, Acts xvi. 30.—A time is coming in which the Lord will no more answer His opponents.—A time to speak, and a time to be silent, Eccl. iii. 7.—The silence before Herod, 1. a wise, 2. a dignified, 3. an eloquent silence.—Jesus is often for a long time silent, but it is only to speak again.—Answer not a fool according to his folly, Prov. xxvi. 4.—Spiritual pride is filled with deeper enmity against the Lord, than worldly levity.—The High Priest of the New Covenant, as well as the high priest of the Old, clothed in white robes, on the great day of atonement.—How false policy still seeks to further its selfish ends by the name and cause of Jesus.—The Lord bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought; He maketh the devices of the people to be of none effect, Ps. xxxiii. 11, 12.—He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, Rev. iii. 9.

Starcke, Quesnel: The great ones of this world are always desiring to feast their eyes and hearts upon some new spectacle. —Nov. Bibl. Tub.: When people who have no religion will question, prate, and dispute about religion, it is best not to answer them, but to shame them by a humble silence.—It brings more loss than profit to meddle with courtiers.—Ungodly teachers are the most irreconcilable enemies of Christ.—Envy is zealously affected, but not in a good cause.—The friendship of the great is like an April shower, not to be depended on.—The upper classes often look upon religion and preaching as a diversion.—There have been Christians as well as mockers in courts.—Never employ thy gifts, talents, wit, and cleverness in jesting.—The friend of God should maintain his dignity in the society of railers, and even when in their power (as Haller before Voltaire). Luther: "Every true Christian, who faithfully preaches Christ, will have his Pilate and his Herod.—Rieger, Passionspredigten, p. 445: "When people have no ears to hear, Jesus has no mouth to speak."—Arndt: The behaviour of Herod toward Jesus: 1. his false expectation; 2. his great disappointment; 3. his vain revenge.—Krummacher: Christ before Herod. This narrative exhibits, 1. a picture of the world; 2. the fiery sacrificial flame; 3. the glory of Jesus, in opposition to the will of those who contribute to it.—Besser: Herod desired to see some miracle performed by the Lord. He really saw one, but he comprehended it not; for it was truly a miracle of love, which would expose itself to the depths of shame for us—which would suffer itself to be clothed in a white garment, that we might appear before the throne of God in white raiment; it was a miracle of mercy, that the Lord should withhold the curse, which otherwise might have fallen upon His mockers, as upon the mocking children at Bethel, 2 Kings ii. 24.—A. des Amorie van der Hoeven, Remonstrant, Prof. at Amsterdam, 1855: Jesus before Herod, an object, 1. of indifference, 2. of vain curiosity, 3. of slander, 4. of mockery, 5. of worldly policy.—J. Saurin, Nono Serm. i. p. 235: He perverteth the people.—Wolf: Worldly wisdom as judge, in the cause of Jesus.—Palmer: Three chief forms of sin: 1. despicable servility in Pilate; 2. mean levity in Herod; 3. deceitful malice in the high priests.

c. Vain Attempts of Pilate to set Jesus at Liberty. (Vers. 13–25.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 15–26; Mark xv. 6–15; John xviii. 39, 40.

13 And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests, and the rulers, and the people, 14 Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people; and, behold, I, having examined Him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse Him: 15 No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto Him: 16 I will therefore chastise Him, and release Him. 17 (For of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast.) 18 And they cried out all at once, saying, Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas: 19 (Who for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.) 20 Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them. 21 But they cried, saying, Crucify Him, crucify Him. 22 And he said unto them the third time, Why, what evil hath He done? I have found no cause of death in Him: I will therefore chastise Him, and let Him go. 23 And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that He might be crucified: and the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed. 24 And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required. 25 And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

Ver. 18. On the reasons for doubting the genuineness of this verse, see Critical Notes.

Ver. 25. The αὐτοῖς added to ἀπέλυσε by Griesbach, is from Matthew and Mark.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And Pilate, when he had called together . . . . the people.—It did not satisfy Pilate to communicate his special intentions merely to the Sanhedrim; he also called together the multitude—which, during the transmission of Jesus from one tribunal to another, had greatly increased, and took the liveliest interest in the affair—to announce to them his decision, which he would have them regard as ultimate. He introduced it by a more or less official address, in which he stated his motives for the conclusion he had arrived at. The judge summed up the acta before he declared them concluded. He returned to the first accusation (ver. 2), that this man perverteth the people (ὡς ἀποστρέφοντα). It was upon this ground that he had examined Him, in their presence; see ver. 3: comp. Matt. xxvii. 12–14, Mark xv. 3–5, which are by no means at variance with John xviii. 33, etc. (De Wette, Meyer), if we distinguish between the private conversation and the public examination, of which latter Pilate is here speaking. It is thus evident that he had taken up the matter in earnest; but in direct opposition to their εὕρομεν, he is forced to declare that, for his part, he has found nothing in Him which could furnish legal grounds of accusation before the temporal ruler. (On the peculiar construction of this passage, see Meyer.) Nor did even Herod, who, as ruler of Galilee, would certainly have known if there were real cause of complaint, find anything in their accusation that could stand the test of inquiry. On the contrary, both were convinced that, whatever reports might have been spread, this man had neither effected nor attempted (πεπραγμένον) anything that could be considered criminal. After this introduction, scarcely any other conclusion seems possible, than simply to set Him at liberty; but "hic cœpit nimium concedere Pilatus."—Bengel.

2. Chastise Him and release Him.—Chastise. Though the word scourge was not yet uttered, Pilate could hardly have intended any other chastisement. He made this proposal for the sake of neither too heavily burdening his conscience, on the one hand, nor of dismissing the Jews wholly unsatisfied, on the other. In his eyes the fanatic who, harmless as he might be to the Roman authority, had declared himself to be a king, well deserved a slight punishment of this kind. There is by no means any discrepancy between this passage and John xix. 1–4; but Luke is relating, in his summary account, the project of a scourging, whose execution is detailed by the three other Evangelists. It is further remarkable that Pilate, by uniting the two words chastise and release, already began to show himself inclined to do either too little or too much. Hitherto he had done three good things: he had instituted a strict inquiry, made a solemn declaration of Christ's innocence, and taken a lawful means of obtaining further information. The word "release" would have been the climax to these, if the simultaneously spoken and unjust "chastise" had not opened a way to three opposite measures, through which his weakness became criminal. A degrading compromise, a grievous scourging, a sad spectacle, were the steps that led to the most unjust sentence ever pronounced. Of these, Luke describes only the first.

3. For of necessity he must release one, ver. 17.—Though it is certainly possible that this verse was very early omitted, because it seemed to be more or less unsuitably placed, and interrupted the course of the narrative (De Wette), yet it seems more probable that it is unauthentic. It is wanting in A.B.K.L. Copt. Sahid. Verc., and is first placed before ver. 19 in D. Æth. Cant.; while, moreover, many various readings occur in different manuscripts. Thus it seems, after having been considered doubtful by Lachmann and Griesbach, to have been justly omitted by Tischendorf. The gloss, however, must have been tolerably ancient, since it found its way into by far the greater number of manuscripts and versions. But, however this may be, the fact itself—viz., that the governor was obliged to release a prisoner at the feast of the Passover—cannot be doubted, though the origin of this custom is involved in obscurity. Everything seems to us to favour the opinion, that this was rather Jewish than Gentile. Even the saying of Pilate, ἔστι δὲ συνήθεια ὑμῖν, John xviii. 39, seems to point to the former. The connection of this custom with the time of the Passover, was far more a Jewish than a Gentile notion. Its coincidence with the Romish Lectisternium and Thesmophoria, which has been referred to, is extremely slight; and it was far more in accordance with the spirit of Roman policy to allow the inhabitants of a province a national privilege than to press a foreign benefit upon them, especially when they had so strong a prejudice against what was foreign as the Jews had. And they might so much the more easily lay claim to the jus gladii, if they did not give, but still allowed to the nation, the apparently free disposal of life and death, on at least one day in the year. And, though neither the Scriptures nor the Talmud mention this usage in connection with the Passover, yet to a people so accustomed to symbolic acts as the Jews were, this connection would be self-evident. In this manner, it is also explained why the people so highly valued this prerogative, Mark xv. 6–8, that it was from them that the request first proceeded which gave Pilate the opportunity of making the most terrible compromise. Finally, this cry of the people affords substantial proof that this day was indeed the first day of the Passover, since the request would have been very unseasonable if the feast had not yet begun.

4. Away with this man.—Here also we cannot obtain a clear view of the matter without completing St Luke's narrative from those of the other Evangelists. The wild cry αἶρε, implies that the Lord was already standing before the multitude, together with the vile Barabbas. How this had taken place is narrated by Mark;

while Matthew, by relating the dream of Pilate's wife, solves the enigma, how it was possible that the people should, in so short a space of time, have been so filled with fanatical fury. The short absence of the governor had been most zealously used by the priests in working up the people to their own views, and the clue out of this labyrinth soon escaped the hands of Pilate.

5. Who for a certain sedition, etc.—Concerning Barabbas, see Lange on the parallel passage in Matthew. In all the Gospels, but especially in this, vers. 19 and 25, the deepest indignation at the blindness and obduracy of the Jews, in making such a choice, is expressed. An echo of this indignation is also found in the words of Peter, Acts iii. 14.

6. Spake again to them.—Προσεφώνησε, which in Acts xxi. 40 is used of a longer address, is here employed to designate one consisting only of a few words, and such indeed as do not essentially differ from those he is reported as using, both previously and subsequently, by the Synopticists. All things considered, the good intentions of Pilate cannot be mistaken. His proposal had a laudable end in view, and seemed at the same time to offer an extremely suitable expedient. Persuaded that personal malevolence was the motive of the chief priests, he sought to gain the voices of the people in favour of Jesus, and expected nothing else than that the result would fully answer his desires. Nevertheless his conduct is reprehensible, not only when judged according to the principles of justice, but even when tried by those of prudence. All the words with which he afterwards endeavoured to quell the rising storm meant little or nothing, because they were not followed up by the one deed which he had already proposed—ἀπολύσω.

7. Crucify Him, crucify Him!—This was the first time that utterance was given to the dreadful cry, which had hitherto been only the secret wish and idea of the chief priests, but which was now put into the mouths of the people, and raised by them with fanatic fury. According to John xviii. 40, they cried out again (πάλιν), Not this man, but Barabbas; though this Evangelist had mentioned no previous cry. A fresh proof how allowable and necessary it is to complete the account of the fourth Evangelist from the narratives of the Synopticists, with which he was acquainted. This cry was a direct answer to the question communicated in Matt. xxvii. 22 and Mark xv. 12.

8. The third time.—We are indebted to Luke alone for the remarkable and internally probable particular, that at this juncture the governor raised his voice, for the third time, in the Lord's favour. And no marvel; for he felt that if he were now to give in, the death of Jesus was virtually determined upon, and that, whatever further attempts he might make for the saving of his official dignity, would be fruitless after this great concession. He therefore repeated in substance what he had already said vers. 14 and 16, and assumed an appearance of firmness so much the greater, in proportion to his inclination to hesitate.

9. And they were instant, etc.—As if the one word of releasing, which he had ventured once more to utter, had but still more infuriated them. The high priests now joined in the sanguinary cries of the raging multitude. "Etiam decori immemores cum plebe clamabant." Bengel. Their voices determined the governor, κατίσχυον, the same word used Matt. xvi. 18 concerning the gates of hell with respect to the Church.

10. And Pilate gave sentence, etc.—'Επέκρινεν, decreed that their desire should be granted. In contrast with the preliminary sentence, already pronounced by the Sanhedrim, we have here the final sentence; and yet there is nothing in Luke's account which would lead us to suppose a formally pronounced judgment. On the contrary, the difference in Pilate's conduct, with respect to Barabbas and Jesus, is unmistakeable. The former he expressly released. Luke, in his just indignation, does not even mention the name, but merely alludes to the crimes of Barabbas. Probably the murderer was unbound before his eyes, and was now hastening through the streets of Jerusalem. The latter he delivered up, παρέδωκεν, not by a solemn ibis ad crucem, but simply by withdrawing the weak hand with which he had hitherto vainly endeavoured to protect the victim of priestly malice. The prisoner was surrendered, not to the pleasure of the judge, nor to the demands of the law, but to the will of the people, τῷ θελήματι αὐτῶν. Hence it is needless to inquire into the genuineness of the old sentence—Jesum Nazarenum, subversorem gentis, etc.—which Adrichomius, Theatr. terræ Sanctæ, Colon. 1593, p. 163, is said to have taken from old registers, and which Friedlieb communicates in his remarks on this subject.

11. Since we are not now dealing with the history of the Passion in general, but only with the account which Luke has given of it, we pass over those details which are not mentioned by him. With respect, however, to the sequence of the various stages of the judicial proceedings before Pilate, we believe that a correct harmony requires the following arrangement:—1. The leading away to Pilate, with the first accusation, of which Luke recounts the details. 2. The first public (Matt., Mark, and Luke), and, immediately after, the first private, examination of Jesus by the governor (John). 3. The more violent accusations, by the Jews, after Pilate's first declaration of Christ's innocence, which were immediately followed by His being sent to Herod. 4. Preliminary sentence of Pilate (Luke xxiii. 13–16), at which his first hesitation is visible. 5. His proposal to choose Jesus and Barabbas (all the Evangelists). 6. An interval occupied by the communication of the dream of Pilate's wife (Matthew), during which the multitude was stirred up by the priests. 7. Decision of the question, Barabbas or Jesus? in favour of the former (all the Evangelists). 8. The scourging, as the usual, but not indispensably necessary, preparation for crucifixion; which, however, according to Luke, was employed as a means of temporizing, as well as to incline the people to compassion, by the sight of Jesus after He had suffered this cruel usage (John xix. 6, 7). 10. Further, but vain, attempts still to release Jesus (John xix. 6–12). 11. Pilate's washing of his hands (Matt. xxvii. 24, 25); placed before the scourging by Matthew, who objectively represents this latter act as preparatory to crucifixion, which, regarded a posteriori, it really was, but which obviously loses its significance unless viewed as a closing act. Finally, 12. The scene recorded John xix. 13–16, which may be more rightly placed after than before Pilate's hand-washing (as Sturm, in an essay on an improved synopsis of the history of the Passion, in the Studien der evangelishen Geistlichkeit Wurtemburgs, 1841, i. p. 150, proposes). Immediately afterwards, the leading away to Golgotha, which Luke describes the most minutely. Hence it appears that Luke xxiii. 24, 25 cannot immediately follow the choosing of Barabbas, but must be regarded as the closing act of the judicial proceedings before Pilate, some of the subordinate particulars of which are passed over by Luke. On the exact period of the Lord being delivered up to crucifixion, which Luke also leaves unmentioned, compare Lange on Matthew xxvii. and Mark xv. 25. It is remarkable that, with the exception of ver. 44, Luke, in his narrative of the Passion, almost refrains from attempting any exact specification of time.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Not only is the Lord's innocence exhibited in the brightest light by Pilate's unequivocal declaration, but it is thereby shown how absurd is the notion of those Christians and theologians who venture, like the older Deists and Rationalists, to impute to Him political designs. Pilate and Herod as yet knew nothing of what was hatched up, concerning this matter, by the Wolfenbuttel Frugmentist during the last century. Even the Jews were not able to procure His condemnation by political accusations, but were soon obliged (John xix. 7) to pass on to complaints upon religious grounds.

2. The sad spectacle of Pilate sinking deeper and deeper at each moment is a striking contribution to Anthropology and Hamartology; at the same time, it offers, no less than his direct testimony to the innocence of Jesus, a convincing proof of the Lord's spotless purity. It teaches also, that weakness may, quite as readily as malice, lead men into the most terrible crimes. Pilate, who is at first only the friend of Herod, chooses at last to remain the friend also of Tiberius, and thus becomes the ally of the chief priests and people, and even the accomplice of Caiaphas. What testimony is thus offered to the truth of our Lord's words, "He that is not with Me is against Me!"

3. The choice between Jesus and Barabbas shows plainly how dangerous it is to suffer vital questions of truth and justice to be decided by popular suffrage. The history of the Passion enters an emphatic protest against the well-known proverb, "Vox populi, vox Dei," and corroborates the truth of the poetic saying,—

> "Was ist Mehrheit? Mehrheit ist ein Unsinn, > Verstand ist stets bei Wen'gen nur gewesen,
> Der Staat muss untergehen früh oder spät,
> Wo Mehrheit siegt und Unverstand entscheidet."

Even in Church history we see how often ecclesiastical and political democraticism has led to real Barabbas-like decisions. Comp. Ullmann's excellent treatise, die Geltung der Majoritäten in der Kirche, Hamburg, 1850.

4. For the typical signification of what here took place concerning Barabbas, the Mosaic law, Lev. xvi. 5–10, must be referred to. The importance of this part of the history of the Passion will not be comprehended till we perceive therein an historical symbol of the idea of substitution; and see, in the liberated Barabbas, an image of the sinner absolved from the guilt and punishment of sin, in consequence of the death of the spotless and holy One ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ. Thus also may we appreciate the significance of the imperturbable silence maintained by the Lord at this decisive moment, during which His behaviour was wholly passive. It was, in the fullest sense of the word, the silence of the Lamb of God, upon whom were laid the sins of the world: Isa. liii. 6.

5. The choice between Jesus and Barabbas is a striking image of the choice which has, in all ages, been presented to mankind—the choice between life and death, between blessing and cursing: Gen. ii. 15; Deut. xxx. 18, 19; Josh. xxiv. 15, etc. The motives which on this occasion seduced the people to so perverted a choice, were essentially the same which still induce the majority of mankind to choose the shadow instead of the substance, the curse instead of the blessing.

6. The moment when the choice between Jesus and Barabbas was offered to the multitude, was a crisis not only in the history of the Passion, but also in the history of Israel and the world: Rom. ix. 30–33.

7. It is something very different, and far worse, to reject the Lord, now that He has been rejected and become the foundation-stone of our salvation. These Jews had not, as yet, rejected Him who, in His infinite love, was lifted up upon the cross for our redemption. Woe to the betrayers of the Crucified!

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

In the mouth of two or three witnesses must every word be established, 2 Cor. xiii. 1, even when the Lord's innocence is to be expressed.—They who accuse Christ and His Gospel of perverting the world in political respects, are, in principle, beneath both Pilate and Herod.—Pilate, the man who would serve two masters.—The spurious desire of compromise condemned in the person of Pilate.—The sad triumph of persevering wickedness over hesitating weakness.—The unhappy choice of the Jews, an ancient yet always a modern history.—They who prefer sin to Christ, choose, like the Jews, 1. a robber instead of the dispenser of the richest benefits, 2. a stirrer of sedition instead of the Prince of peace, 3. a murderer instead of the Lord of life.—The choice of the service of the world instead of the service of Christ, 1. bears the same character, 2. betrays the same origin, 3. deserves the same condemnation, 4. needs the same atonement, as the wretched choice of the Jews.—The wretched choice still, as then, the fruit, 1. of want of consideration, 2. seduction, 3. weakness, 4. the enmity of the flesh.—The inconstancy of popular favour and the praise of men.—The cries of Crucify and Hosanna contrasted.—The first clamour for Christ's death viewed with respect to, 1. the judge who elicited it, 2. the people who uttered it, 3. the Lord who heard it, 4. the Father who suffered it, 5. the world which still repeats it in various forms.—O My people, what have I done unto thee? and wherein have I wearied thee? testify against Me: Micah vi. 3.—Christ's love most active when He seemed most passive.—The murder of the Messiah, the suicide of Israel.—How far concession and compromise may lead.—The blind policy of Pilate, who, 1. desired to save Jesus by evil means, 2. yielded Him up in order to save himself.—Jesus, 1. numbered among the transgressors, Isa. liii. 12; 2. debased below the transgressors; 3. thereby offered up for transgressors, 2 Cor. v. 21.—Jesus most deeply debased by being, 1. placed on a level with a malefactor, 2. with such a malefactor as Barabbas, 3. with a malefactor who was preferred to Him.—The different departures of the murderer and the Prince of life from Gabbatha.—The fearful defeat of wickedness, even in its seeming triumph.—To every man, as to Pilate, there is an hour in which he must decide for or against Christ.

Starcke, Brentius: Christ was taken from one unjust judge to another: be contented, O Christian, if a similar thing befall thee without thy fault, 1 Peter ii. 21.—Cramer: The Gospel of Christ must be truth; for the heathen, His enemies, bear witness to His innocence.—It is the innocence of Christ which gives its just weight to His Passion, before God's tribunal, Heb. vii. 26.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Innocence at length breaks through all accusations.—Compliance with sinful and evil customs should not be demanded of the government, but should be abolished, especially when they happen on Sundays and holydays.—Sentences against criminals who have transgressed the laws of God and men ought to be executed.—The unjust sentence of the world: Let the murderer live, let the Prince of life die.—Canstein: The world loves its own; it is a den of murderers.—Human wisdom teaches us to shift with every wind, and is partial.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Malice and envy are truly devilish.—Even evil things are often threefold, ver. 22.—I will, I will, is often the saying of the ungodly; but woe to them if they rest satisfied with this.—Where the multitude has more power than the government, there will be a perversion of judgment and a corrupt state.—The world judges not according to justice, but preference.—Osiander: It is nothing new in the world, that the guilty should escape and the innocent undergo punishment, Ps. lxxiii. 12.—Brentius: The event always shows how far human prudence reaches, and what is to be expected from it.—Arndt: The choice between Jesus and Barabbas: 1. What induced Pilate to propose it; 2. why it was frustrated; 3. how it turned out to the benefit of the world. —Krummacher: Pilate, our advocate, who clears us from the threefold accusation of seditious tendencies, irrational teaching, and immoderate consolations.—The liberation of Barabbas: 1. How it came to pass; 2. how the joyful announcement was received on the part of Barabbas.—The conclusion of the trial.—Tholuck, Predigt i. p. 127, etc.: The fearful exchange, 1. made by unbelieving Israel when, instead of Jesus, the Son of God and of man, they chose Jesus Barabbas; 2. made by the unbelieving world when, instead of Jesus, the Son of God and man, they chose Jesus the child of man (with an appendix well worth reading, p. 156).—Besser: In Barabbas, Pilate liberated the murderer of his soul; in the Lord Jesus, he rejected the Saviour of his soul.

4. Golgotha. (CHAP. XXIII. 26-43.)

a. Jesus led away to be crucified. (Vers. 26-31.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 31, 32; Mark xv. 20-22; John xix. 16, 17.

26 And as they led Him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus. 27 And there followed Him a great company of people, and of women, which also bewailed and lamented Him. 28 But Jesus, turning unto them, said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children. 29 For, behold, the days are coming, in the which they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck. 30 Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us. 31 For if they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?

Ver. 28. Also. Καὶ is omitted in A.B.C.D.L.X., also by Lachmann and Tischendorf.

Ver. 29. Ἐθήλασαν (Rec.) was probably an interpretation of the original ἔθρεψαν, the reading of Lachmann and Tischendorf, on the authority of B.C.K.L.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And as they led Him away.—With respect to the identity of the present via dolorosa (Haradell Alalun) with the Lord's way to crucifixion, it is, to say the least, doubtful. It runs from the Prætorium, three miles in a north-westerly direction, within the walls, towards the hill of Calvary. The actual road to the cross could scarcely have been so long, and seems also to have been in a more southerly direction. The spuriousness, at least, of the various so-called stations,—as, for instance, the spots whence the procession started; where Simon the Cyrenian met the Lord; where Mary sank speechless, and a "Salve mater" fell from His lips; where Veronica gave Him the napkin, upon which the features of His countenance were immediately, miraculously impressed, etc.,—scarcely deserve mention; though Chateaubriand, e.g., still defends their identity. Even Sepp, iii. p. 536, no longer ventures to defend these traditions, and Lamartine also confessed that he found here heaps of stones of later date. With respect to such details, the words of v. Schubert (Reise durch das Morgenland, p. 505) may be cited: "Perhaps innate and childlike devotion, when describing the separate particulars of the great picture, seems sometimes like a countryman whose cottage is situated near a battle-field, and who would relate, not in the words of an experienced warrior, and still less with the exactness of an eye-witness, what happened here, and there, in the much changed places: his narrative would always excite the most vivid interest, for it is an echo of what our ancestors really saw and experienced. This is the sixteenth century that has been spiritually edified and refreshed by the memorials of these great events, since the times of Constantine and Helena." On the identity, however, of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre, see Lange on Matthew xxvii., and the authors there quoted, with whose conclusions we entirely agree.

2. They laid hold.—The more exact expression, ἀγγαρεύειν, is found in Matthew and Mark, a word which only occurs in one other passage (Matt. v. 41) in the New Testament. The notion of a military compulsion is unmistakeable; a fact which has afforded the imagination of exegists a wide field for various conjectures, with regard to the manner of compulsion, the person compelled, and the reason why he was chosen above all others. The principal are mentioned in Lange on Matthew xxvii. Unless it is asserted that the notice in Mark, "the father of Alexander and Rufus," was wholly unintentional, the idea that this meeting with the Lord was a circumstance of the highest importance to Simon and his family, and the occasion of their subsequently bearing Christ's cross in a higher sense, is very probable. In this case, the King of the heavenly kingdom won, even on His road to the cross, another subject; and the well-known fiction of the Basilidians (mentioned Epiphan. Hæres. 24, 3) that Simon died on the cross instead of the Lord, then receives a beautiful symbolical meaning. Not his body, but his old sinful nature, was then crucified with Jesus, not instead of, but in fellowship with Him.

3. Coming out of the country (from the field).—"One of the traces of the crucifixion having occurred on a working-day, found in the synoptical Gospels." Meyer. To which it may be answered, that we are not told how far this field was from the town, nor even that Simon had been working in the field; also, that a feast-day was by no means more strictly kept than a Sabbath, but rather less so, by the Jews. Wieseler, therefore, justly remarks, "We Christians easily mistake the real relation by comparing our Sunday with the Jewish Sabbath, and then remembering that festivals are more holy, and kept with more Sabbath-like rest among us, than our ordinary Sundays." Among all the festivals and days of commemoration, the name of the greatest Sabbath (Lev. xvi. 31) is only given to the great day of atonement; on other festivals strict abstinence from all kinds of labour was not required, as on the Sabbath. Comp. Lev. xxiii. 31 with vers. 7, 21, 25, 35, where distinction is made between work and service. Even among modern Jews, the greater holiness of the weekly Sabbath and the great day of atonement, above other festivals, is sufficiently apparent from the circumstance, among others, that during the two former solemnities, but not during the latter, mourning for the dead was laid aside, and that on these days the dead might not be buried, while they might on others. Hence we consider it unnecessary to the explanation of the service which Simon was compelled to render, to suppose (Lange) that it was intended to make him thus expiate his desecration of the Sabbath.

4. On him they laid the cross.—Ἐπέθηκαν—φέρειν ὄπισθεν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ. The general expression of Matthew and Mark, ἵνα ἄρῃ τὸν σταυρόν, must be explained by the more definite one of Luke. It is not φέρειν ὑπέρ, but ὄπισθεν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, so that the Lord was only assisted, not relieved from bearing the cross. The cross was bound upon the shoulders with cords; and it is not probable that they would have taken the time to free Jesus from it, and to place it on Simon in His stead. An entire bearing of the cross is not, therefore, here described, but only assistance in bearing it, or rather, bearing its lower part. And if it be even asserted that the weight would thus be rather increased than lightened, since the upper part would but press the more heavily, this would only show that in this, as in many instances, the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. Moreover, we do not read, in any of the Gospels, that the Lord would have sunk under His load, unless Simon had assisted Him just at this crisis. Here, also, the Saviour bears the heaviest part of the burden, while the comparatively light part is laid on the shoulders of him who follows Jesus.

5. Women which also bewailed and lamented Him.—A beautiful trait of genuine humanity, quite in place in the third Gospel. As is usual at public executions, a large crowd had flocked together, among whom were also women of Jerusalem. It is Luke, in whose Gospel we hear most of such women as played any part in the events of Christ's life, who also relates how their pity cast a last flower in the Lord's thorny path. This circumstance was the more remarkable, since, at least according to subsequent Jewish traditions, it was forbidden to show any sign of pity towards a criminal on his way to execution. It would, however, be assigning too high a position to these women, to place them on a level with the Galilean friends of the Lord; and too low a one, to view them as merely shedding the tears of a superficial compassion, so easily excited by the aspect of any one in pitiable circumstances. In the latter case, the Lord would not surely have deemed them worthy of a special address; and why should it not be supposed that there were some, at least, among their number who were personally acquainted with Jesus, who had been struck by His preaching, or prepossessed in His favour, either by report, or by their own experience of His benefits? This view does not oblige us to regard them, as "high-minded matrons who had assembled for a work of love, and who were bearing in their hands the myrrh wine which was to be an opiate for the Saviour." It was not with wine of myrrh, but with their tears, that they watered the pathway to the cross; yet the sincerity of their compassion was a refreshment to the Lord upon this painful road; and He who had been silent in the presence of a light-minded Herod, now bestows one of His powerful admonitions upon these weeping women. It was on this occasion that His last connected address was uttered; after this, we only hear the single abrupt sayings preceding His death. Perhaps it was thus that He employed the moment of halting, caused by the laying hold upon Simon. This supposition also solves the difficulty, "that at such a moment an ear-witness could scarcely be supposed as present, to treasure up and record the words which might have been spoken by Jesus" (Weisse). What the Lord uttered with quiet dignity, and in a sufficiently comprehensible manner, might very well have been communicated to His disciples by a sufficient number of witnesses, or even by the women themselves.

6. Daughters of Jerusalem.—The Lord by no means overlooked the fact that it was Himself who was personally the object of the compassion of these women, which was not equally bestowed upon the three condemned prisoners. He did not therefore say, Weep not for us—the dreadful equalization was not made till afterwards, and that by His enemies—but, Weep not for Me. But He directs their attention from Himself to their own future fate, by the striking saying, Weep for yourselves, and your children. This latter clause was certainly not without reference to the imprecation of the Jews, Matt. xxvii. 25, whose fulfilment the children of these women also would be exposed to. Not to excite needless emotion, He did not now utter the woe upon them that should be with child, but more gently pronounced the blessedness of the barren, not, perhaps, without a reminiscence of the blessedness which a certain Galilean woman had once attributed to His mother, Luke xi. 27; yet this prophecy of coming evil is none the less fearful. He foretells days in which the supreme blessing of marriage will be looked upon as a curse; and a sudden, though terrible death, be regarded as a benefit: comp. Hos. ix. 14, x. 8; Rev. vi. 16. The moment when this desperate condition, here drawn from life, would commence (ἄρξονται), can be none other than that period in the destruction of Jerusalem when all hope of deliverance should be cut off. It is remarkable that the Lord, now that His sentence was passed, no longer warned against this misfortune, but spoke of it as inevitable, without adding even the slightest reference to a way in which it might, perhaps, still be avoided. The day of Jerusalem's visitation was past; and the Lord, now that His end was so near, would not even appear to be seeking to save either Himself or the nation, by demanding of them, even at this moment, belief in Him as the promised Messiah. This circumstance makes His address so much the more affecting.

7. If they do these things in a green tree, etc.—As long as the enemy who is invading a country spares the green wood, he will not, perhaps, even destroy the dry; but when he does not even spare fruitful trees, how is it to be expected that he will have pity on the unfruitful? This figurative language, which is sufficiently comprehensible in itself, is probably taken from Ezekiel xx. 47, and contrasts the fate of the guiltless Redeemer, as prophetic of destruction, to that of guilty Israel. We have here no mere contrast between old and young (Bengel), still less a continuation of the despairing cry of ver. 30 (Baumgarten-Crusius), as if they who utter it infer, from the fate which was falling upon them who are guiltless, what must be the lot of the guilty; but rather a striking allusion of the Lord Himself to what He was now experiencing, in which He laid down this as a standard by which the women were to measure their own impending fate. Comp. Jer. xlix. 12; Prov. xi. 31; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.—Εἰ ταῦτα ποιοῦσιν. He does not say what, in order not to agitate still more deeply the minds of the women, who would see it in a few minutes;—ποιοῦσιν, impersonaliter, denotes neither the Jews nor the Romans only, but is an indefinite expression for what was now about to be done by the hands of men.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The meeting of Simon the Cyrenian with the suffering Lord, is another of those striking proofs of a special providence, in which the history of His life and Passion is so unprecedentedly fruitful. It was not of importance to Simon alone, but also to the Lord, that a short pause should be granted Him on His way to the cross. Simon Peter was not at hand, though he had promised to follow his Lord to death; but another Simon was to pass that way, from distant Cyrene, to ease the painful path of the Lamb of God to the slaughter. The willingness with which Simon took up and bore the burden forced upon him, gives favourable testimony to his character, and, perhaps, to his awakening faith. The women also manifest a disposition towards the Lord, which, after all that had taken place, we could least have expected at this hour. "The first signs of an altered feeling were beginning to show themselves, the forerunners of a reverential affection for the cross." Lange.

2. The splendour of the Lord's heavenly majesty breaks wondrously through the obscurity of His path to the cross, in His address to the women who were bewailing Him. At an hour when everything was pressing upon Him, and when He had every reason to be entirely absorbed in His own sufferings, He wholly forgets them, to occupy Himself with the fate of individuals who had but shown a slight interest in Him. While the present was pressing upon Him with its whole weight, the future was bright and clear before His unprejudiced mind, and His eye already beheld the day which would extort far other tears. The feeling of His own innocence and dignity never for an instant forsook Him; He knew and declared Himself to be the green tree, in the very hour which was to see Him nailed to the dry tree of shame. No word of bitterness towards His oppressors mingled with the tones of love and compassion; He took to heart even the fate of the children, upon whom their own parents had ruthlessly invoked a curse. And, as if His own victory had been already obtained, He would have tears shed only over the fate of Jerusalem. Thus was His prophetic character manifested at the very hour in which He was going forth to fulfil His priestly office; and, like the good shepherd, He was still seeking that which was lost, when He was already on the road to lay down His life for the sheep.

5. "The wrath of God is heavier to bear than the cross of Christ." Rieger.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Compare, in this and the following sections, the Homiletical Hints on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

The leading away to Golgotha: 1. The victim of wickedness, led to Golgotha by the hands of men; the sin-offering of the world, led to Golgotha by the hand of the Father.—The via dolorosa: 1. How far it is trodden by the Lord alone; 2. how far His disciples must constantly tread the same, in imitation of Him.—The way of the cross, 1. strewn with the thorns of wickedness, 2. moistened with the tears of pity, 3. lighted by the majesty of Jesus, 4. terminated by the hill of death.—The bearing of the cross after Jesus by the Christian, as by Simon, a task, 1. seldom willingly performed, 2. best performed with submission, 3. never performed unrewarded. —How the Lord fulfils the office of Simon the Cyrenian, for His cross-bearing disciples.—In the whole Gospel history, not one woman is found ill-disposed towards Jesus.—The great distance between superficial feeling for the Lord, and living faith in Him. —Weep not for Me.—What value is to be attributed to the emotions, not unfrequently awakened in an audience by a sermon on the Passion?—The sight of Christ bearing His cross calls upon us to weep for ourselves: 1. The hands of men inflicted such suffering upon the most innocent and holiest One; 2. such a sacrifice was needed as an atonement for our sins; 3. such grace is often announced to many in vain;—and should we not weep for all this?—The fearful punishment for rejecting Christ was, 1. foreseen with infallible certainty, 2. executed with terrible severity,

3. is set forth as an example to all Christian nations who do not reverence the Lord's anointed.—Faith or despair, there is no other alternative.—How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation! Heb. ii. 2, 3.

Starcke: God well knows the cross-bearers.—The greatest and most splendid cities often contain the fewest who bear the cross after Jesus; small places often excel them.—Canstein: It is one of His hidden kindnesses when God suffers the cross, which we are unwilling to bear, and which is yet so profitable to us, to be laid upon us by the hands of others.—Rather help to bear thy neighbour's burden, than to increase its weight, Gal. vi. 2.—All true Christians are cross-bearers.—At the Passion of Jesus, His disciples became like women, and the women like men.—Cramer: The right manner of contemplating the sufferings of Christ, must then begin by weeping, together with our children, for ourselves, and our sins. —Nov. Bibl. Tub.: We generally weep most for what we should weep least, and weep least for what we should weep most, Joel ii. 12; Ps. cxix. 36.—In many circumstances, it is happier to be childless than to have children.—The wrath of God, when it breaks forth, is insupportable, Heb. x. 31.—God's justice must be satisfied: if it spared not His own innocent Son, how much less will it spare an impenitent sinner!—Heubner: This bewailing, ver. 27, was a fulfilment of the prophecy, Zech. xii. 10–14.—Christ showed His high dignity, while reproving the weeping women.—The sufferings of Jesus, the greatest warning to the impenitent.—The thought of their children's future lot should dispose fathers and mothers to repentance.—A day is coming to every deluded sinner, when he will curse his life.—Ver. 31 is by no means in opposition to the evangelical doctrine of atonement.—Arndt: The way of Jesus to Golgotha.—F. W. Krummacher: The path of agony.—Simon of Cyrene: 1. The Lord Jesus with the cross of the sinner; 2. the sinner with the cross of the Lord Jesus.—The daughters of Jerusalem.—Besser: And He went forth bearing His cross. The two thieves also bore their crosses, for such was the custom; but His was heavier than theirs externally and internally.—W. Hofacker, a. a. O. p. 283, etc.: Christ's sad road to Golgotha, 1. as a mirror of wholesome doctrine, 2. as a mine of peaceful consolation, 3. as an engagement to willing following, 4. as a warning against debt and suretyship.—Hagenbach: What disposition the solemnization of Christ's death should call forth.

b. Jesus on the Cross. (VERS. 32–38.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 33–44; Mark xv. 22–32; John xix. 18–24.

32 And there were also two others, malefactors, led with Him to be put to death. 33 And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified Him, and the malefactors; one on the right hand, and the other on the left. 34 Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted His raiment, and cast lots. 35 And the people stood beholding: and the rulers also with them derided Him, saying, He saved others; let Him save Himself, if He be Christ, the chosen of God. 36 And the soldiers also mocked Him, coming to Him, and offering Him vinegar, 37 And saying, If thou be the King of the Jews, save Thyself. 38 And a superscription also was written over Him in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew, THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Ver. 34. What they do.—See Critical Notes.

Ver. 35. Σὺν αὐτοῖς of the Receptus, is missing in B.C.D.L.Q.X., etc., and is therefore justly rejected by Tischendorf. It seems to have been added, to avoid the appearance of saying that the rulers alone derided Him, since, as appears from the parallel passage, the multitude joined in the act.

Ver. 38. Γεγραμμένη (Receptus) is very probably a spurious, as well as superfluous, exegetical addition. See Tischendorf on this passage.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Skull, κρανίον, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Golgotha.—On the probable reason of this name, as well as on the whole locality, see Lange on Matt. xxvii. 33, where, also, all necessary remarks on crucifixion have been already made. With regard to the nailing of the feet, much that is worthy of attentive consideration may be adduced both for and against it. It seems to us, however, that the reasons pro are by far the more numerous. The testimonies of Justin Martyr, c. Tryph. cap. 97, and of Tertullian, advers. Marc. iii. 19, may be reckoned first in rank. We can scarcely imagine that the latter should have written, after citing the words of Ps. xxii. 17, quæ propria atrocitas crucis, if he had not viewed them as descriptive of the peculiar cruelty of this death, viz., that the feet, as well as the hands, were pierced. The well-known drama too, Χριστὸς πάσχων, which is ascribed to Gregory Nazianzen, thus represents it, and is equally important as a proof in this matter, whether its spuriousness be proved or not. In the ordinary martyrologies, the nailing of the feet, as well as the hands, is either implied or described; it is also powerfully supported by the testimony of Cyprian, Hilary, Eusebius, Athanasius, and others. It has, indeed, been often asserted, but not proved, that the well-known passage of Plautus (Mostellaria ii. 1, 13), on a criminal condemned to crucifixion, bis affigantur pedes, bis brachia, denotes an unusual severity. It can scarcely be denied also, that Luke xxiv. 39 involves the idea of the feet having been pierced. The words of Thomas too, John xx. 25, "Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails," must be considered. Unless we suppose that Thomas is expressing his desire for a double assurance, with respect to the same nail-prints, to see them first, and then to touch them, we shall be obliged to understand his words as implying his wish first to see the marks of the nails in the Lord's hands, then stooping down to put his fingers in those in His feet, and finally, to thrust his hand into His side. Thus also, every appearance of tautology and of incorrigible unbelief disappears, while Thomas may then be numbered among the witnesses to the nailing of the feet.

2. Father, forgive them.—The first of the seven sayings on the cross; three of which are recorded by Luke alone. The authenticity of this prayer is not raised above all opposition, though it is so, above all fair objection. It is wanting in B.D*. 38, Sahid. Ital., etc., while other manuscripts also have various readings. Since, however, the words themselves bear indelible impress of reality and sublimity, their omission must be attributed to an exaggerated effort to harmonize the synoptical Gospels, at any cost. With respect to the meaning of the words, it is certainly a question, whom the Lord intended by ἄφες αὐτοῖς; but it certainly cannot be said, "Jesus did not make this intercession for the soldiers who nailed Him to the cross" (Gerlach). It is, however, even more arbitrary to limit the allusion of this prayer exclusively to the four executioners of the sentence (Euthymius, Paulus, Kuinoel, and others); since the Lord might have primarily, but not exclusively, intended them. Undoubtedly, He included the executioners, as well as the authors of His death, the Gentiles with their governor, the Jews with their high priest, in the same prayer. Of all these, even of the most malicious among them, it might, in certain respects, be said (as was, indeed, subsequently said by the first witnesses of Jesus, Acts iii. 14; 2 Cor. ii. 8), that a high degree of ignorance was mingled with their wickedness. But this ignorance, which, in strict justice, might have been imputed to their own guilt, since it by no means existed without their concurrence, was made by inventive Love the very plea for mercy towards the guilty ones. Indeed, inasmuch as the Lord saw in the Jews, who were the authors of His death, merely the representatives of the whole sinful human race, we may say that, in these words, He commended them, as the originators of His death, to His Father's mercy. He did now, what He emphatically did not do in His farewell prayer, John xvii. 9. How entirely such a prayer, spoken as it probably was during the terrible act of crucifixion (τί ποιοῦσιν), is in accordance with the spirit of the third, and Pauline Gospel, scarcely needs remark.

3. And they parted His raiment, and cast lots.—Luke mentions the parting of the raiment in a single word, omitting, as well as Mark, the remarkable quotation from Ps. xxii., which Matthew and John have added to their narratives. It seems as if he desired instead, to give prominence to a trait which is as strikingly represented in the same Psalm (Ps. xxii. 18), the unfeeling staring at the sufferer, by the indifferent or inimical multitude.

And the people stood beholding.—A contrast to the just uttered prayer of the Lord, so great and unprecedented that it could only have occurred in the history of the Passion. Luke does not deny that the people derided Him, but is merely silent on this point, for the sake of directing attention to the mockery of the rulers, which took place somewhat later, but in connection with that of the people. It seems that the standing and staring must be limited to the moment of crucifixion, and that which immediately followed. It is, moreover, in the nature of things, that such a status quo of so great a multitude, at such a moment, could last but a short time. Perhaps the ἄρχοντες, specially mentioned by Luke, set the multitude the example of this evil conduct. Our Evangelist, however, in this place also, less strictly observes the sequence of events than Matthew or Mark.

4. And the rulers also with them, etc.—If the καί be genuine (see Meyer on this passage), it is an indirect allusion to the fact that the rulers were by no means singular in this respect.—Derided Him: compare ch. xvi. 14. In Luke, they spoke of the Lord in the third person; while in Matthew and Mark, the passers-by addressed their derision directly to Him in the second person. Even here, they involuntarily announced the praise of the Lord, by acknowledging "He saved others;" but, at the same time, tempted Him by seducing Him to leave the cross of shame. Can there be, perchance, still a trace of their carnal notions concerning the Messiah, discoverable in their words? Could some among them have conceived the possibility of the crucified Jesus even now exerting His miraculous powers in His own behalf? After He had suffered things to go so far, and borne so much in silence, we can scarcely suppose that they either desired or expected the fulfilment of a condition, upon whose performance they professed themselves willing to believe in Him. As little can it be proved that they purposely took up the words of the 22d Psalm. In fact, the circumstance which in this unparalleled transaction most excites our astonishment, is that His enemies themselves, without knowing or intending it, were forced to bear testimony to the greatness of Him whom they were so deeply insulting. The effrontery of some sharpened the pungent wit of others, and a contest arose which of them could utter the most offensive blasphemies. Luke is the only Evangelist who communicates the fact, that the soldiers also shared in this mocking, which the example of the chief priests had excited. They quitted their hitherto quieter behaviour; drank to Him after the manner of soldiers; and now appropriating as willingly the words of the chief priests, as formerly the raiment of the condemned, they exclaimed, not without some bitterness against the despised Jews: If Thou be the King of the Jews.

This psychologically probable account could not be called a misunderstanding of Matt. xxvii. 48 (De Wette), unless we were told that they, at the same time, gave Jesus some restorative, and thus more or less mitigated His sufferings. But the narrative says nothing of any reed, by means of which the drink might really reach the lips of Jesus; and it is more likely that the right idea to form of the circumstance is, that they put the vinegar within a certain distance from Him (προσφέροντες), drank to Him in mockery, and thus even increased His bodily sufferings by the sight of the needed refreshment.

5. A superscription.—We would not assert that Luke reckoned this among the mockery properly so called. We rather suppose that he mentions this superscription, which he might, perhaps, otherwise have omitted, by way of supplement, and to indicate the reason why the soldiers also took part, in the manner they did, in these insults. It was the superscription which furnished them with an occasion for reproachfully casting upon the Lord the title of king, which was displayed over His head. On the custom of placing such a superscription upon the crosses of criminals, see Wetstein, and Lange on Matt. xxvii. 37. The various readings of the superscription are sufficiently accounted for by the fact, that it ran differently in the three languages in which it was written. In Latin, e.g., rex Judæorum, literally given by Mark, for his readers in Rome. In Greek, οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ βασιλ. τῶν Ἰουδ., reported almost without alteration by Matthew and Luke. Finally, in St John, we have the literal translation of the original Hebrew superscription. In neither does it contain any accusation, but simply a title, the aim of which, as is evident at the first glance, was less to cast dishonour at the crucified than to insult the whole Jewish nation.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The sublime simplicity with which the Evangelists relate the unprecedented event of the crucifixion of Jesus, without so much as a single communication of their own emotions or opinions, is one of the most telling proofs of the credibility of this portion of the sacred history. Indeed, the further we penetrate into this sanctuary, the more impossible do we feel it to utter, even in thought, the words: myth or fiction. Even in the account of the arrival at Golgotha, everything bearing the slightest appearance of the tragic or romantic is carefully avoided. The efforts of the imagination to fill up this seeming blank, have produced the legends of St Veronica, of the Wandering Jew, etc.

2. The crucifixion of Jesus was the realization of that dark anticipation of heathenism which Plato had already expressed, de Republ. ii., where he makes Glaucus say to Socrates, that a perfectly righteous man, if he were to appear upon earth, would certainly be loaded with chains, scourged, tortured, and, after having borne all this, crucified (ἀνασχινθυλευθήσεται). It was, at the same time, the end and completion of the Old Testament types, and of those prophecies of Messiah's sufferings, Isa. liii. and Ps. xxii. The latter was no direct prediction of what afterwards took place at Golgotha, but a typical and symbolical picture, in which David was describing his own sufferings, but, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, was doing so in such terms, and with such colouring, that, unconsciously to himself, he was giving a delineation which, regarded a posteriori, might be most fittingly appropriated to that perfectly unique and unprecedented fact which took place on Golgotha.

3. Christ's sayings on the cross have been not inaptly called one of His most precious legacies. The first, preserved exclusively by Luke, is, at the same time, the most popular. Inexpressibly striking in itself, it is rendered still more so by the circumstances under which it was uttered, and the contrast it presents to the behaviour of the multitude who were standing by and looking on. It is, at the same time, the best commentary on the most exalted precept of Gospel morality, and an unequivocal proof of the Lord's majesty in the midst of His deepest humiliation,—an appropriate conclusion to His earthly, and a striking symbol of His heavenly life. Examples, indeed, were not wanting, before His times, of saints who have prayed for the wicked, and even for their enemies (Abraham, Moses, Jeremiah, and others); and His example has been wonderfully followed (Stephen, St James the Just, Huss, H. v. Zütphen, and others). But none of His predecessors ever attained the height reached by His love, and it was in His power that His followers learnt thus to pray and to forgive. The reason on which this petition was based, viz., the ignorance of His enemies, could have arisen only in His loving heart; but His prayer was undoubtedly more strongly enforced than even by the striking "they know not what they do," by the blood which, during its utterance, was moistening the ground of Golgotha, and speaking better things than that of Abel. That it was heard, was testified by the facts, that the Gospel was again preached to the Jews at Jerusalem, the conversion of so many thousands, and the continuous work of grace in Israel. To us who read it, it is a new proof of His love and greatness,—a proof of a kind which occurs but once, even in our Lord's own history,—and, at the same time, a reminiscence of that feature of the prophetic portrait drawn Isa. liii. 12, that He made intercession for the transgressors. Compare, on this, and the subsequent sayings on the cross, Dr G. J. Vinke, Dissert. Theol. de Christi e cruce pendentis vocibus, Traj. ad Rhen. 1846.

4. The first saying on the cross is specially important in a doctrinal point of view, as pointing to the connection existing between the pardonableness of a sin and the ignorance of the sinner. It is here plainly declared, that when the sinner perfectly knows what he is doing, there is no hope of forgiveness, because the repentance which alone could make him capable of obtaining it is wanting. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that in almost every sin there is a minimum of ignorance, which may be reckoned an extenuation of guilt, and that even blindness, though self-incurred, becomes greater in proportion as bondage to sin increases in duration and obduracy. But least of all must we forget, that while everything that can contribute to the diminution of the guilt of others must be weighed and adduced, it must not therefore be used as a cloak for our own sins. J. Muller aptly says, Lehre von der Sunde i. p. 239, with respect to the sin of the first rejectors of Christ, "If this ignorance obliterated their guilt, they needed no forgiveness; if it did not lessen it, it would not have been urged as a motive in the prayer for their pardon.

5. The mocking on the cross, by four different classes of men, was not only a fearful revelation of the power of darkness, but, at the same time, a last renewal, to the Lord, of the temptation in the wilderness, ch. iv. 9–11.

6. Even in the lowest depths of His humiliation, God takes care that the royal dignity of His Son shall be announced by the superscription of the cross. Notwithstanding the earnest request of the Jews, not one jot or tittle must be altered; in three different languages, in the language of the government, the language of education, and the language of the nation, thousands read, upon the cross, the honour of Jesus and the shame of Israel. Under such a concurrence of circumstances, it is easy to conceive that certain fathers of the Church were of opinion, that Pilate composed and persevered in maintaining this superscription divinitus inspiratus, that he might contribute to the fulfilment of the prophetic word, Ps. ii. 6. In any case, this incident in the history of the Passion is a palpable proof of the truth of another prophecy, Isa. xlvi. 10.

7. The sacred narrative of the parting of Christ's garments might, indeed, seem to have been deserving of a better fate than that of becoming the occasion of one of the most pitiable pieces of superstition and priestly deception of modern times. The legends concerning the garments which were shared, and especially the seamless coat, cannot be all noticed here. Compare the writings of Dr J. Gildemeister and H. v. Seibel, The Holy Coat of Treves, and the Twenty other Seamless Garments, Dusseldorf 1844; and, The Advocates of the Holy Coat of Treves silenced, 1845.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Jesus, as the true sin-offering, suffered without the gate, Heb. xiii. 11, 12.—Jesus reckoned among the transgressors: this saying, considered in the light of our Lord's crucifixion, points to 1. Israel's shame, 2. Christ's honour, 3. the Father's counsel, 4. the Christian's boast, 5. the world's hope.—To which do we belong, in our own eyes? To the transgressors who deserved what He suffered, or to those justified and reconciled to God by His blood?—The Lord of glory at the climax of shame, the Prince of life among murderers. —The high value of Christ's sayings on the cross to His dearly purchased Church.—How each single word in the first saying on the cross is another pearl in the Redeemer's crown: 1. He prays during the time of crucifixion; 2. He prays to God as His Father; 3. at such a time He prays for others, 4. for enemies, 5. with ardent importunity, 6. with abundant results.—It was not the slaying of the Messiah alone, but the continued and obstinate rejection of the preaching of the Apostles, which was the final cause of Israel finding not forgiveness but punishment.—A greater than Elias is here, 2 Kings i. 10.—Oravit misericordia, ut oraret miseria.—The Lord's first prayer on the cross, a prayer standing entirely alone: 1. Alone in its sublimity: a. For whom does He pray? b. when? c. what? 2. Alone in its importance: this prayer is, a. the climax of His earthly life, b. the consecration of His cross, c. the image of His work in heaven. 3. Alone in its power: it serves, a. for our humiliation, b. for our consolation, c. for our sanctification.—Jesus on the cross, the intercessor for His enemies, and the example for His friends.—The crucified Jesus, the object, 1. of light-minded covetousness (the soldiers casting lots), 2. of cold indifference (the gazing multitude), 3. of cowardly insult (the deriding rulers).—The mockery of Golgotha, the crucifixion of Christ's heart.—How everything reached its climax in the mockery of Golgotha: 1. sin; 2. suffering; 3. the grace of God, who was delivering up His Son to misery.—The enemies of Jesus, even when they curse, are involuntarily compelled to praise.—God's way in the sanctuary, Hab. ii. 20.—At Golgotha we see, 1. a God who is silent, 2. a God who governs, 3. a God reconciling the world unto Himself.—Jesus on the cross tempted once more, yet without sin, Heb. iv. 15.—The Christian, who is crucified with Christ, must also often encounter the same temptation and repel it.—"Es liebt der Welt, das Strahlende zu schwärzen."—The various degrees of wickedness in those who were mocking in the same manner.—The superscription on the cross, a speaking proof of the adorable control of God. It announces, 1. the innocence, 2. the dignity, 3. the destination of the crucified Christ.—This superscription, 1. written in three languages, 2. read by all the Jews, 3. unaltered and unalterable.—What the superscription of the cross testifies, 1. of Christ, 2. of God, 3. of men, 4. of the way of redemption, 5. of the hope of the future.—This superscription was, 1. read of all; wilt thou pass it unheeded? 2. vexatious to many; wouldst thou at all alter it? obstinately defended by one; wilt thou not accept it?

Starcke, Osiander: Christ was willing to be numbered with the transgressors, that we might be numbered with the children of God.—It was, so to speak, the masterpiece of the Mediator to turn into an intercession what others would have made an accusation.—The best thing we can pray for, both for ourselves and others, is the forgiveness of sins.—It is just to have more compassion on those who sin from ignorance, than on those who sin from malice. —Nova Bibl. Tub.: The crucified Jesus, a stumblingblock to the Jews, foolishness to the Greeks, 1 Cor. i. 23, 24.—It is a dreadful sin to be the occasion of the name of God and of Christ being blasphemed among the heathen, Rom. ii. 24.—All languages and tongues have their share in the King, Jesus.—Heubner: Christ prays for all the authors of His sufferings.—The fullest answer to the prayer of Christ is yet to come, in the future conversion of Israel.—If Jesus then interceded for His enemies, He will now intercede for the penitent and believing.—Arndt: The superscription of the cross.—The parting of the garments.—Krummacher: The crucifixion: 1. The arrival of Jesus at Golgotha; 2. the act of crucifixion; 3. the erected cross.—The parting of the garments: 1. The testator; 2. His property; 3. the inheritors.—The superscription: Jesus a King on the cross: 1. His majesty; 2. His victory; 3. the foundation of His kingdom; 4. His jurisdiction; 5. His government.—"Father, forgive:" 1. The matter of this prayer; 2. the reason which justifies it; 3. the limits within which it is granted.—Van Oosterzee: The crucifixion an unparalleled union, 1. of triumph and baseness, 2. of disgrace and dignity, 3. of free-will and providence, 4. of condemnation and absolution, 5. of earth and heaven. To conclude, the twofold question, Dost thou belong to those who then crucified Christ, or to those who are truly crucified with Christ?—Vinet, Les complices de la crucification du Seigneur.—J. Saurin, Nouv. Disc. i. p. 365, sur la prière de Jésus Christ pour les hourreaux.—W. Hofacker, a. a. O. p. 311: The splendid sunset of Christ's life on Golgotha.—The death of Christ, its power and instrumentality in reconciling the world.—The sayings on the cross: Septem folia semper viventia, quæ vitis nostra, cum in crucem elevata fuit, emisit. Bernhardus. The first: res miranda, Judæi clamant: crucifige, Christus clamat: ignosce. Magna illorm iniquitas, sed major tua, o Domine, pietas. Idem.—A sermon by Dr J. J. Rambach, in Brandt's Homilet. Hulfsbuch iii. p. 527.—Schleiermacher, Pred. ii. p. 436: The mystery of redemption in connection with sin and ignorance: 1. The redeeming suffering of Jesus was the work of ignorance; 2. but the redemption which proceeds therefrom, annuls more and more, in proportion to the period of its agency, the excuse, they know not what they do.—Tholuck: The intercession: 1. The thoughts of the Redeemer when He uttered these words; 2. the thoughts they should call forth in us.—Nitzsch, Wittenb. Predigten, p. 229: The execution of Jesus, in its connection with other works of the world and worldliness.—Palmer: Christ between the thieves. See other authors cited in Lange on the parallel passages.

c. The Penitent Thief. (Vers. 39–43.)

39 And one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on Him, saying, If thou be Christ, save Thyself and us. 40 But the other answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? 41 And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss. 42 And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom. 43 And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise.

Ver. 39. Art Thou not the Christ? οὐχὶ σὺ εἶ, the reading of Tischendorf, according to B.C*.L. Scorn and contempt are more strikingly expressed by the interrogative form.

Ver. 42. The κύριε of the Receptus is wanting in B.C*.D.L.M. cursive manuscripts; and 'Ιησοῦ is supported by the authority of B.C*.L., Origen, the Coptic, and Sahid.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And one of the malefactors.—According to Matt. xxvii. 44 and Mark xv. 53, both the malefactors railed on Him; according to Luke, but one. The various attempts of harmonists to reconcile the two accounts, so as to avoid all appearance of contradiction, are well known. See Lange on Matt. xxvii. 44. The view of Lange, that a difference must be made between βλασφημεῖν and ὀνειδίζειν, and the former attributed to the impenitent malefactor alone, while the latter, on the contrary, may be said of the better-minded thief, who at first called upon the Lord to come down from the cross, but afterwards laid aside this carnal expectation, undoubtedly lessens, but does not wholly obviate the difficulty. For, even in this manner, the psychological objections, how so sudden a change could have taken place in the penitent thief, and whether it is not contrary to the nature of true conversion that its subject should reproach a fellow-sinner for the very fault which he had himself practised but a few moments before, are not obviated. We rather believe that Matthew and Mark expressed themselves indefinitely; that they only mentioned the genus, and not the number, of the last class of mockers; and that it was left to Luke to enlighten us concerning a particular so entirely in its place, in the Pauline Gospel of justification by free grace.

2. Dost not thou fear God?—It was not, then, his railing at Jesus, considered in itself, which occasioned this reproach; but the light-minded forgetfulness and want of reverence for God, expressed in the words of a man enduring the same punishment as Jesus, whom he was mocking, and who should, at least at such a time, have manifested greater seriousness. But at this moment the strong contrast to his own words, ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ κρίματι, struck his awakened conviction of sin, and he expressed, as strongly as possible, the infinite distance between the Lord and the companions of His fate.

3. And we indeed justly, sc. ἐν τῷ κρίματί ἐσμεν.—He acknowledged himself to be as guilty before God and man as his fellow-sufferer, though he condemned his blasphemy.

4. But this man hath done nothing amiss, οὐδὲν ἄτοπον, nothing blameable, wrong: comp. 2 Thess. iii. 2.—"The mildness of the expression the more strongly denotes His innocence." Meyer. If the thief had said nothing more than this, even then it might excite the deepest astonishment that, at a moment when every voice was literally raised against Jesus, and not one friendly word was heard in His favour, God should raise up a witness to His spotless innocence from one of the crosses near Him. This murderer was the last who gave an honourable testimony to Him before His death. He soon, however, exhibited a brighter and firmer faith, by directing his gaze to the middle cross, and no longer speaking of, but to, Him who hung upon it.

5. Lord, remember me.—He requested no immediate deliverance from the cross, on which, on the contrary, he is convinced he must die; but desired only that the Lord would graciously remember him, and receive him into His kingdom. Certainly he was not entirely free from carnal notions concerning the Messiah, and was not now thinking of the heaven in which the Lord would be after His death; but was picturing to himself the moment when Messiah would come in His royal glory to establish His kingdom upon earth, and desiring that, being raised from the grave, he might then enter into the joy of his Lord: comp. Matt. xvi. 28. But, even in this view, his prayer was certainly one of the boldest and most surprising which have ever been uttered. That a crucified malefactor should be the first who fully comprehended the deep meaning of the superscription of the cross, and become the herald of the Lord's kingly dignity, at the very moment in which the Messianic hopes of the Apostles themselves were most deeply shaken,—truly, such a phenomenon may be called one of the most brilliant incidents in the history of the last hours of Christ's life! And if we also believe that he had previously heard and seen Jesus; that, though a malefactor, he need not have been a hardened villain; that, during the last hours, he had attentively observed Jesus; and that the approach of death had filled him with the deepest seriousness; yet, even all these considerations explain but a part of this enigma, to which faith in the free grace of God, which abundantly glorified itself in the thief at that very moment, can alone offer a full solution. This free grace had undoubtedly prepared him, by the various circumstances of his life, for the frank confession of faith and sincere repentance, which he manifested in so surprising a manner on this occasion. (An essay on the psychological development of his inner life, recommended by its great originality, may be found in Lange's Leben Jesu ii. p. 1568.) Thus only is it explicable how he could thus surpass all others in clearness of perception, in strength of faith, and in frankness of confession, and recognise a fountain of life, and a kingly throne, in that very cross which was a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence, even to the most advanced disciples.

6. And Jesus said unto him, To-day, etc.—We are left to imagine what a saying such as this must have been to our suffering Lord. He had maintained an unbroken silence before all the blasphemy which had reached His ears, but such a petitioner was not made to wait a moment for an answer. He promised him something far beyond what he had requested—the greatest that he could ask or think—even Paradise, and that to-day, and in company with Himself. The combination of to-day with I say unto thee, spoken of even by Theophylact, and specially defended by Roman Catholic exegists, for the sake of weakening the force of the argument against purgatory, always furnished by this saying of the cross, is absurd. It is obvious that the Lord was speaking to-day, and not yesterday, and that He would never have used so pleonastic an expression; besides which, this interpretation would deprive this very definite promise of all precision. As it now stands, it included nothing less than the assurance, first, that the thief would die to-day, and with the Lord, while he perhaps feared that he might linger on the cross for one or more days; a promise which was fulfilled a few hours later by means of the crurifragium. At the same time, however, He promised him paradise,—a word whose full preciousness, from such a speaker, and to such a hearer, we could only realize by hanging there upon the cross with the Lord. We are not to understand by this paradise, the heavenly paradise, 2 Cor. xii. 4; Rev. ii. 7; but a part of Sheol, opposed to Gehenna, and called indifferently paradise and Abraham's bosom. He to whom this promise was made, and who had grown up amidst the popular notions of the Israelites, could have understood nothing else; and the Lord, who, from the moment of His death till His resurrection, remained in the separate state, could have intended nothing else. "Dubium non est, quin Christus ita locutus sit, quomodo sciebat, a latrone intelligi." Grotius. Finally, the promise of being with the Lord in paradise, was, to the penitent thief, a promise also of the resurrection of the just, and of a participation in the future blessings of Messiah's kingdom. On the Jewish popular notions of a future existence, see Sepp, iii. p. 557, etc.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The history of the penitent thief may, in the fullest sense of the words, be called a gospel within the Gospel. The internal truth and beauty of Luke's narrative are particularly striking, when we compare it with what the apocryphal Gospels have to tell us of this individual, whom tradition has called Titus, Demas, Picinus, and Matha. According to the Arabic Evangelium infantiæ, cap. 23, see Thilo, Cod. Apocr. i. p. 93, he defended the infant Jesus from the malice of the second thief, even during His flight into Egypt; and the Lord then, as a recompense for this service, predicted to His mother what would happen to these two persons thirty years afterwards on Golgotha. The Gospel of Nicodemus, ch. xxvi., even speaks of the meeting between the penitent thief and Enoch and Elias, in the other world. Can it be possible that no further difference exists between these narratives and the account of St Luke, than that between secondary and primary mythical representations?

2. The blessing accorded to the thief seems to have preceded the commendation of Mary to the care of John (John xix. 25–27); so that this may be reckoned, not the third, but the second of the sayings on the cross. According to the course of the synoptical narrative, the mockery followed so closely upon the crucifixion, and this incident of the thief so immediately upon the mockery, that it seems somewhat forced to insert the account of St John between these two events. On internal grounds, too, it seems more probable that the Lord should not have provided for His mother till after He had saved this sinner, than the reverse; the spiritual always preceding the natural, in His case. The first saying on the cross was for His enemies, the second for a penitent sinner; it was the third that was dedicated to His mother, while the fourth expressed His own anguish of mind: thus progressively narrowing the circle.

3. Few as were the words of the penitent thief, nothing essential to the invariable requisites of true conversion was wanting. Conviction of sin, confession, simple faith, active love, supplicating hope,—all these fruits of the tree of new life are here seen to ripen in a few moments. The Lord's address, on the other hand, condenses, in a short summary, all the riches and glory of redemption. The first saying on the cross affords us a glimpse into the heart of our compassionate High Priest; His royal character is manifested in the second,—grace and majesty thus suddenly darting their bright beams through the darkness of His deepest humiliation. We are not surprised to hear nothing of any reply made by the favoured malefactor to the Lord's promise. Not much could be spoken upon a cross; and how also could he have found words to express his thankfulness? But undoubtedly the comfort of this promise spread a glory over his last hours; and he stands before us as the first fruits of the millions of subjects whom the King of heaven has obtained from and by means of His cross.

4. The possibility of conversion, even during the last moments of life, is undoubtedly confirmed by the history of the penitent thief; while his impenitent fellow-sufferer preaches quite as powerfully, by his terrible end, the danger of postponing repentance till such a time.

5. The Lord's second saying on the cross contains a very significant hint with respect to His descensus ad inferos, with which the more developed teaching of 1 Pet. iii. 18, iv. 6, etc., is by no means at variance. At the same time, however, it affords, together with Phil. i. 23, Rev. xiv. 13, and many other passages of the New Testament, powerful testimony against the Romish doctrine of purgatory.

6. The two thieves on the cross are the representatives of the whole human race, in its different relations to Jesus. Even upon His cross, Jesus was set for the fall of one and the rising of another: Luke ii. 34. The blessing pronounced upon the penitent thief was a foreshadowing of the great day of judgment.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The three crosses.—The hill of death, a place of triumph. Golgotha shows us, 1. the triumph of persevering malice, 2. the triumph of penitent faith, 3. the triumph of redeeming love.—The sight of death cannot, of itself, break the hardened heart.—The rebuking of our neighbour's sins, a difficult but a holy duty.—The different ways in which two sinners meet the terrors of eternity.—The despairing cry for help, and the believing prayer for salvation.—How the penitent looks to the Lord, and how the Lord looks upon the penitent: 1. The sincere penitent is, a. humble in confession of guilt, b. anxious for salvation in approaching Christ, c. bold in confessing Christ. 2. The Lord, a. accepts the confession of guilt, b. grants the humble petition, c. fulfils the bold hope.—A display of mercy on the arena of justice.—The place of execution changed into a place of grace.—How much repentant faith may expect after the hour of death: 1. The joys of paradise; 2. the joys of paradise with Jesus; 3. the joys of paradise immediately after death.—The Son, as well as the Father, does exceeding abundantly, above all we ask or think, Eph. iii. 20.—A death-bed conversion, 1. certainly possible, 2. yet very rare, and 3. only to be expected when the drawings of God's preparing grace have not been obstinately and wilfully withstood.—The wonderful leadings of God's providence, causing, 1. a sinner to find his Saviour, 2. the King of heaven His subject, even at the very limits of life.—No sinner too vile for God's grace.—Salvation and condemnation, in a certain sense, decided, even before the hour of death.

Starcke: Men are not alike, either in life or death.—Brentius: It is an infallible sign of true repentance, to acknowledge, and openly to avow our conviction of the righteousness of the judgments with which God visits us.—A Christian is under an obligation to declare the innocence of the guiltless.—How profitable is it to converse with the suffering Christ!—The eye of hope must look further than the visible matters of this world, 1 Cor. xv. 19. "Through Me" takes precedence of "with Me."—The hearing of God is not denied to earnest supplication.—After death, man will be either with Christ or with the devil.—Christ opened again the closed gates of paradise.—He who remains constantly united to Christ in His sufferings, shall also be united to Him in glory.—Heubner: The suddenness of this conversion need excite no scruple; for, 1. conversion is not limited by conditions of time; 2. everything was found in the thief which genuine conversion produces; 3. and this was certainly a miracle of grace, designed to manifest the power of Christ's death to future generations.—Every poor sinner should daily pray, Lord, remember me.

Compare the well-known epitaph of Copernicus: "non parem Paulo veniam requiro, gratiam Petri neque posco, sed quam in crucis ligno dederis latroni, sedulus oro."—The sermon of Chrysostom, de latrone; that of Melancthon in Bretschneid. Corpus Reform. xi. p. 478–487.—Rieger's Passionspredigten, pp. 641–643.—F. Theremin: The cross of Christ, third sermon.—F. Arens, preacher in Osnabruck: Grace glorified at Golgotha, in one of the crucified thieves.—Thomasius: Our own dying hour, in the light of this history.—Dr J. J. Rambach: 1. The malefactor's prayer; 2. the Lord's answer.—Palmer: Christ between thieves.—Krummacher: The thief: a glance, 1. into the hearts of both thieves, 2. into the royal sentence of Immanuel.

B. The End of the Conflict. (CHAP. XXIII. 44–56.)

1. The Rest of Death. (VERS. 44–46.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 45–50; Mark xv. 33–37; John xix. 28–30.

44 And it was about the sixth hour, and there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. 45 And the sun was darkened, and the veil of the temple was rent in the midst. 46 And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, He said, Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit: and having said thus, He gave up the ghost.

Ver. 44. Already about the sixth hour. Ἤδη may safely be admitted into the text.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Synoptical.—The nearer the history of the Passion draws to its close, the more evidently does Luke condense his narrative. The commendation of Mary to the care of John, the Lord's complaint upon the cross, the last cordial given to the dying Redeemer, are passed over by him in silence. He mentions the rending of the veil of the temple, immediately before Christ's death, though it appears from Matthew to have taken place contemporaneously with that event, or even a moment after. The close succession of incidents, however, makes it almost impossible to speak of a prius and posterius. To Luke alone do we owe the seventh and last saying on the cross. In his report of the prodigies during the Lord's death, though expressing himself very briefly, he coincides more with Mark than with Matthew; and while omitting, with the other Synopticists, the breaking of the malefactors' legs, and the piercing of the Lord's side, he unites with the other Evangelists in a tolerably detailed account of His burial.

2. A darkness.—On the reason, character, and historical certainty of this darkness, comp. Lange on Matt. xxvii. 45. It is entirely without reason that the Jews, in the Gospel of Nicodemus, assert to Pilate (ch. xi.), that an ordinary eclipse of the sun had taken place. We certainly would not venture to adduce the well-known testimony of Phlegon, in proof of the accuracy of the Gospel narrative; since he speaks rather of a natural, though unusually obscure, eclipse of the sun, while it is also uncertain in which year of the 202d Olympiad it occurred. But they who believe the Lord to be what He Himself declared, will find this mourning of nature, at the death of Jesus, anything but incredible or unimportant. Tradition, indeed, speaks of similar natural phenomena, even at the deaths of Romulus, Cæsar, and others; but that which is but fiction in the province of profane history, need not, on that account, be the less truth in that of sacred history. And if the deaths of eminent persons are compared in certain rabbinical writings to a darkening of the noon-day sun, these expressions are more modern than our Gospel histories, and may well have arisen from the analogy of the fact here recorded. In a word, the strikingly expressed idea in the well-known:

"Sol tibi signa dabit, solem quis dicere falsum audeat," etc., became on this occasion a reality. With respect to what specially concerns St Luke's narrative, it might appear, from a literal interpretation, as if the sun had, till the ninth hour, remained visible, though in the midst of continually increasing obscurity, and that then, at the moment of Jesus' death, it became invisible. But even allowing that the genuineness of the words, καὶ ἐσκοτίσθη ὁ ἥλ., were beyond all doubt,[1] there would be no actual difficulty in so uniting the ideas, that the true cause of the σκότος, κ.τ.λ. (ver. 44), is announced with καὶ (ver. 45). It frequently occurs, that two phenomena are expressed in immediate sequence, the second of which forms the natural cause of the first. The very same idea seems to be the foundation of the reading, τοῦ ἡλίου ἐκλείποντος, which appears in B.C.L. cursive MSS., and in Origen. The participial sentence points out a causal connection, and it is not improbable, on internal grounds, that Luke intends to speak of a great darkness, during which the sun continued visible, for three hours.

[1] They are questioned by De Wette, and omitted by Griesbach.

3. And the veil of the temple, etc.—The attempt has been made to explain even this occurrence upon natural grounds, as a mere result of the earthquake, of which Luke has told us nothing else. But is it possible to imagine an earthquake, by means of which a curtain, thirty ells long and of a finger's breadth in thickness, woven in purple and scarlet, and, according to the testimony of Jewish scholars, renewed from time to time, could be torn in half—not from the bottom to the top, but from the top to the bottom? How could anything of the kind have happened, without the other buildings in the capital, and even the temple itself, suffering, and being reduced to ruins by the shock? Equally arbitrary are the suppositions, that the veil was old and worn out (Kuinoel), or that it was too tightly stretched, and too strongly fastened both to the ground and the two sides (Paulus). Even in the latter case, it could not possibly have been rent by an earthquake, without damage being, at the same time, done to the walls or roof of the temple. For the rest, Luke entirely omits the resurrection of "the saints which slept," mentioned by Matthew; while the fact that John passes over all these occurrences in silence, seems best explained by the whole character of his Gospel, which is less occupied with the external manifestation of the glory of the Logos, than with the spiritual significance of His appearance and ministry. The remark of Lange on Matthew's Gospel applies also, though in a less degree, to the narrative of Luke. "The Evangelist has collected and condensed his reminiscences of this event into words which have indeed a hymn-like tone, without thereby losing their historical character. For history itself, on this occasion, assumed the character of a hymn."

4. Father, into Thy hands, etc.—It is in the nature of things that this saying must be placed after the τετέλεσται of St John, who gives its substance in the following παρέδωκεν τὸ πν. According also to both Matthew and Mark, the dying Christ cried out with a loud voice, while Luke alone records the words of this cry. This saying also is a quotation from the Psalms: Ps. xxxi. 6.[1] Παρατίθεσθαι is not here to be understood in the vague sense of recommend, but in the definite one of deliver, tradere. The Lord now delivers His spirit, which was just about to separate from the body, as a precious deposit into the Father's powerful hands, and enters with confidence and hope upon the separate state, before the penitent thief, and all the rest of the redeemed family.

[1] The reading of Tischendorf, παρατίθεμαι, is preferable to παραθήσομαι (Receptus), which seems derived from Ps. xxxi. 6, LXX.

5. He gave up the ghost, ἐξέπνευσεν.—So also Mark; rather more strongly expressed in Matthew, ἀφῆκεν τὸ πνεῦμα, emisit spiritum, He dismissed His spirit. Even when, in the very nature of things, He was in a state of extreme dependence, He yet manifested and exercised His true freedom (John x. 18), and so freely chose to do that which was now prescribed by the course of nature, that death was not merely His present lot, but also the highest act of love and obedience.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Compare Lange on the parallel passages.

2. The last saying on the cross sets a seal upon all the others, and indeed upon His whole life. With a tranquil and unruffled spirit did He encounter the spotless purity of eternity. With child-like confidence, He surrendered His spirit into His Father's keeping, and looked forward with the joyful hope to the peace and joy of death. Not till He had, in the sixth saying, rendered up an account of His now completed work, did He make any allusion to His personal feelings. A text of Scripture was the torch which lighted Him in the valley of the shadow of death. As He had always lived in the Scripture, so did He die with its words upon His lips. Hence, it is unnecessary to ascribe any direct Messianic signification to the 31st Psalm. The Lord merely adopted a single saying of Scripture, as the expression of His own feelings; and it was not unintentionally that He omitted what the writer added immediately afterwards, "because Thou hast redeemed me." That which was, in a certain sense, the motto of David's life, Christ makes the motto of His death.

3. The darkening of the sun at the moment of Jesus' death, directs us to a deep and secret connection between the kingdoms of nature and grace, still too little investigated by theologians. It was not merely that nature enveloped herself in a robe of mourning, "as though she were mourning in sympathy with the greatest of her sons" (Hase); but when the incarnate Word, by whom all things were made, expired, nature, shaken by the event, gave unequivocal testimony to His greatness. And with regard to the rending of the veil, the Epistle to the Hebrews points very clearly (ch. ix. 8) to the symbolical meaning of this fact. It is probable that terror at what had occurred, was the cause of its first involuntary announcement on the part of the Jews, who would otherwise have desired to conceal this incident. Various Jewish traditions, with respect to the signs which took place at this very time, about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, may be found in Sepp, a. a. O. iii. p. 536; they present faint traces of the truth of an occurrence whose particulars are given in the Gospel history. Finally, with respect to the objection, that there are in Holy Scripture no other actual allusions to the prodigies here related as accompanying the Lord's death, we may partially admit it, without deducing therefrom any conclusion unfavourable to the evangelical record; but would refer, at the same time, to Rev. xi., where the resurrection of the two witnesses, a vision connected therewith, the opening of the heavenly temple (= the rending of the temple veil), and other prodigies, are spoken of in a manner which involuntarily reminds us of the occurrence here related.

4. The last words of Stephen, Huss, Luther, and others, were an echo of those of their Lord.

5. The last saying on the cross is an unequivocal proof of the personality of God, as well as of the personality of the human spirit, and its individual immortality. "They who could imagine that Jesus breathed out His life for ever into empty air with these words, not only, as yet, know nothing of the true and living spirit, but nothing perfectly of the living God, nor of the lifegiving power of the crucified Jesus." Ullmann.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

" Wenn selbst die Kreatur sich regt,
So sei auch du, mein Herz, bewegt."

Light and darkness united in the Lord's dying hour at Golgotha: 1. The dark night of nature, and therein the light of providence; 2. the dark night of suffering, and therein the light of Jesus' greatness; 3. the dark night of death, and therein the light of a lively hope.—The rent veil: 1. To what it gives testimony: a. that a new dispensation had begun, b. a perfect atonement been effected, c. a blessed communion been instituted. 2. What it requires: a. believing contemplation, b. boldness of approach, Heb. x. 19, c. holy surrender.—The death of Jesus, 1. the lowest point of His humiliation, 2. the beginning of His elevation.—Let us also go, that we may die with Him, John xi. 16.—A pilgrimage to Golgotha on the day of our Lord's death: 1. What dost thou see there? 2. what dost thou feel there? 3. what dost thou acknowledge there? 4. what dost thou promise there?—The ninth hour: the high importance of this moment, 1. to the Lord, 2. to His friends and enemies, 3. to the world, 4. to the Father.—Ye do show the Lord's death till He come, 1 Cor. xi. 26.—Golgotha, a school of Christian living, suffering, and dying: Christ, 1. dead, 2. dead for us, 3. dead for us, that we might die with Him.

Starcke: Darkness is at last punished by darkness: remember this, ye children of darkness.—Since the death of Christ, we need no more sacrifice for sin.—Christ passed from the deepest desertion to the highest reliance—no longer in the hands of His enemies, but in those of His Father.—The pious pray not only at the commencement, and during the course, but at the conclusion of their sufferings.—Canstein: Jesus dies like a corn of wheat, to bear much fruit, John xii. 24.—Be willing to die where God wills: Jesus did not die under a splendid canopy, but poor and naked on the cross. —Brentius: The souls of the righteous are in God's hands, and no evil touches them; what can we wish more?—Heubner: As all that Jesus did, He did for us, so in this prayer He commended our souls, with His own, to His Father.—Steinmeyer: The last saying on the cross announces, 1. the glory of a happy death, 2. the glory of the dying Son of God, 3. the glory of His priestly sacrifice.—Dräseke: The death of Jesus, the highest perfection of His life. It shows, 1. the greatest tranquillity of mind, 2. the highest love to man, 3. the greatest mediatorial power, 4. the greatest glory of the Son.—Tholuck: How the Lord dies: 1. With inward liberty; 2. with clear consciousness; 3. with perfect confidence.—Arndt, L. J. vi. p. 71, on ver. 46, as the conclusion of the last sayings: 1. The two first sayings, sayings of mercy; 2. the two next, sayings of consolation for the outwardly and inwardly bereaved; 3. the three last, words of strengthening, for the dying.—Krummacher: Father, into Thy hands, the how and why of Christ's death.—Harms: Reflections on the words, "for you:" 1. The faith which the words demand; 2. the repentance they produce; 3. the consolation they afford.—Schmid, Zeugnisse der evang. Wahrheit i. p. 134: How holy and honourable was the Saviour's death!—Van der Palm: 1. The death of Jesus, the fulfilment of all the promises of God; 2. the death of Jesus, the chief matter of apostolical preaching; 3. the death of Jesus, the completion of His teaching, and the climax of His life; 4. the death of Jesus, our life.

2. The Mourning of Nature and Humanity. (VERS. 47–49.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 51–56; Mark xv. 38–48.

47 Now, when the centurion saw what was done, he glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man. 48 And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts, and returned. 49 And all His acquaintance, and the women that followed Him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Now when.—Luke mentions the mourning of nature in a single sentence, vers. 44 and 45. Matthew and Mark connect it, more closely than he does, with the signs of some great convulsion manifested at the death of Jesus. According to our Evangelist, the forerunner of all the witnesses to the glory of Christ's death was the Gentile centurion who saw τὸ γενόμενον. Without excluding the occurrences of the preceding hours, this word seems chiefly to refer to the moment of the death of Jesus, in connection with the remarkable natural phenomena accompanying it. Τὰ γενόμενα (ver. 48) certainly looks somewhat further back, and includes all which had taken place upon and around Golgotha, since the moment of crucifixion.

2. The centurion.—Comp. Lange on Matthew and Mark. The impression, produced by what had occurred, on a noble and soldier-like mind such as his, is very easily accounted for on psychological grounds. The proud Roman, though he had often looked upon death and its victims in various forms, had never yet witnessed such dying as this. In the midst of the three hours' darkness, light began to dawn upon his mind: the loud voice with which the last words from the cross had been uttered, resounded in his ears, like the voice of God; and the moment of Christ's death was to him the first moment of a new birth to a higher life. He must surely have heard that this Jesus had been condemned as a blasphemer, but could not possibly believe it; he remembered the testimony of Pilate, and entirely agreed with what the penitent thief had but just before uttered in praise of Jesus. Luke communicates the principal matter of his confession by making him call the Lord δίκαιος, but Matthew and Mark seem to have preserved its original form; though the possibility of the one expression being as genuine as the other, must certainly be conceded. On the probable sense of his words, see Lange. Above all, it must not be lost sight of, that this is less the expression of a deliberate decision of the judgment, than the outpouring of a deeply excited emotion, and that it is unfair not to recognise in it both the echo of superstition and the voice of sincere faith.

3. And all the people, etc.—We can scarcely form too large a notion of the number of the witnesses of Christ's death, and the events connected therewith. At the time of the Passover, between two and three millions of Jews, from all countries, assembled in the capital,—a multitude about as large as that which once departed from Egypt; and of these, it may be supposed that there was not even a stranger who had not heard of Jesus of Nazareth. All the hills and plains around Golgotha, so far as they afforded a prospect, were covered with spectators, who were now, however, in a very different disposition from that described ver. 35. As the centurion had, in fact, glorified God by his confession (a doxological trait, quite in the spirit of the third Gospel, ch. xiii. 17, xvii. 15), so do these spectators accuse themselves as sharers in the guilt of Christ's death, and as objects of the righteous displeasure of God. Such a transition in the disposition of a mixed multitude is, in itself, not unusual; and the objection (Strauss), that we are here told, not so much what the Jews felt and did, as what, according to Christian views, they ought to have done and thought, depends upon a very unpsychological, and therefore very uncritical suspicion. The death of the Messiah was a deed of national intoxication and delusion, which must, of necessity, be followed by an hour of awakening; the extraordinary appearances of nature, therefore, spoke so much the more loudly to their consciences; and the remembrance of all the Lord had done that was great and good, gave Him the greater dignity in their eyes, inasmuch as they felt that they had been guilty of rejecting Him. Even the horror at death, exhibited upon so many countenances, was an involuntary homage offered to the dead Christ; and the sad and serious paschal cry of so many smitten hearts, was a prelude to the pentecostal question: Men and brethren, what shall we do?

4. All His acquaintance.—Luke mentions these, besides the people and the women, of whom he speaks as well as Matthew and Mark. "Luke alone has this notice, which is so summary, that it does not contradict the ἀπομακρόθεν of St John's account, ch. xix. 25." Meyer. We may understand, in the wider sense of the word, His acquaintances at Jerusalem, and in its neighbourhood; among whom were also, for instance, the owners of the foal at Bethphage, and of the upper chamber at Jerusalem. With respect to the women, compare ch. viii. 2 and the parallel passages. Their feelings, now that their nearer approach was no longer prevented by the derision of the crowd, may be better imagined than described. With bitter grief for their own irreparable loss, uncheered as yet by any hope of resurrection, were united a melancholy joy that the fearful conflict was at length over, and a desire to pay the last honours to the lifeless remains. In various frames of mind, according to the measure of their spiritual development, their susceptibility, and their several relations to the Lord, they lingered in the neighbourhood of the place which had witnessed His last sigh, while as yet we do not read that any of the disciples were among them. John had led Mary home, Peter was wandering about solitarily, and the rest of the scattered sheep had disappeared without leaving any trace, now that the Shepherd was smitten: the fidelity of female affection alone remained at its post when all seemed lost.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The death of Christ was surrounded by a glory, and, at the same time, received a confirmation, such as no death has since been accompanied by. A right understanding and interpretation of the prodigies by which it was accompanied, both in nature and among human beings, would surely lead us to a higher Christology than the Nazarean and Ebionite views of ancient and modern Rationalism.

2. The Gentile centurion was the first-fruits of the Gentile world, which is one day to bow the knee before Jesus. His agreement in the confession of the Jewish thief was the first union of Jew and Gentile, hitherto separated by the wall of partition between them, Eph. ii. 14–16, and the foretokening of the communion of saints. If we may suppose him to have belonged to the legio germanica, which, as is well known, was at that time employed by the Romans in Palestine, German Christianity may look upon him, in a still stricter sense of the word, as its representative and pioneer.

3. The awakening repentance of the people was a preliminary fulfilment of Christ's own words, John viii. 28, and, at the same time, a prophecy of the time in which Israel, as a nation, shall recognise what they did when they rejected the Son of David: Zech. xii. 10–12; Rev. i. 7. In this instance malice maintained its character to the very end. It was only the people, and not the scribes and Pharisees, who returned from Golgotha smiting their breasts. These first penitents may, however, be rightly regarded as a first-fruit of the granting of Christ's prayer on the cross (ver. 34).

4. Never was the power of Love more strikingly manifested than on the day of the Lord's death. She kept her place when Faith suffered shipwreck, and Hope was entirely baffled. Rightly might Paul exalt her as the greatest of the three, 1 Cor. xiii. 13.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The dead Christ honoured, 1. by God, 2. by man.—What the wonders in the kingdom of nature tell us in honour of the dead Saviour: 1. Jesus, the spotless, guiltless sufferer; 2. Jesus, the perfect atonement for sin; 3. Jesus, the resurrection and the life.—The New Covenant considered in the light of this miracle: 1. A ministry of the Spirit, when that of the letter is abolished; 2. a ministry of reconciliation, replacing the ministry of condemnation; 3. a ministry which remains, in contrast to that which is done away, 2 Cor. iii. 6–11.—The centurion beneath the cross, a type of the calling of the Gentiles and rejection of the Jews.—The impression produced by the sight of the dying Jesus upon a candid mind.—The triumph of Christ's enemies concluding in a total overthrow.—The impression of the death of Jesus upon the female heart.—How the sight of the dead Saviour calls us to, 1. a fuller confession than that of the Gentile centurion, 2. a deeper humiliation than that of the repentant multitude, 3. a firmer faith than that of the Galilean women.—Heaven and earth unite in paying homage to the dead Christ.—The first witness of Christ's death: 1. Wherein we should imitate him; 2. wherein we should differ from him; 3. wherein we should surpass him.

Starcke: Confess Christ, even when He is on the cross, and when His Church seems in its lowest state.—If the first-fruits of the power of Christ's death were so remarkable, what great things will not the full harvest produce?—Brentius: Miracles, both of nature and grace, have no other end than the conversion of man.—J. Hall: They must surely have hard hearts whom Christ's sufferings cannot move to repentance.—Cramer: God's strength is made perfect in weakness, 2 Cor. xii. 10.—There is an abundance of testimony to the cross of Christ: they who will not believe have no excuse.—Schulz, on the miracles at Christ's death: They show, 1. wherein consists the salvation which He purchased for us by His death, 2. what are the dispositions which this salvation must beget in us.—Gerok: The sacred evening rest on Golgotha: 1. The quiet rest of the perfected sufferer; 2. the quiet repentance of the startled world; 3. the quiet work of the loving friends; 4. the quiet rest of the holy grave.—Ahlfeld: What dost thou see in the cross of Christ? 1. Love wooing us; 2. love dying for us; 3. love which never faileth.—Thym: The cross on Golgotha, 1. as a sign of grace for us, 2. as a sign of justice against us.—Rautenberg: The death of Christ, the death of my sins, John xix. 1–30.—My Saviour dies, how ought I to live?—Bohe (on ver. 47): How believing Christians stand at the foot of the Redeemer's cross.—Ackermann: The Redeemer's death in its tranquillizing effect upon our death.—Alt: The death of Christ, a powerful summons to conversion from sin.—Schmid: The preaching of the crucified Saviour, 1. the preaching of repentance to sinners, 2. of joy to believers, 3. of homage to the Lord.—Arndt: The miracles at Christ's death: 1. The miracles, signs of God's omnipotence in nature, 2. of God's grace in the hearts of men.—Krummacher: The funeral: 1. How it was tolled for from above; 2. how it was performed on earth.

3. The Sabbath of the Grave. (Vers. 50–56.)

Parallel passages: Matt. xxvii. 57–66; Mark xv. 42–47; John xix. 38–42.

50 And, behold, there was a man named Joseph, a counseller; and he was a good man, and a just: 51 (The same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them:) he was of Arimathea, a city of the Jews; who also himself waited for the kingdom of God. 52 This man went unto Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. 53 And he took it down, and wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone, wherein never man before was laid. 54 And that day was the preparation, and the Sabbath drew on. 55 And the women also, which came with Him from Galilee, followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how His body was laid. 56 And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the Sabbath-day, according to the commandment.

Ver. 52. The words καὶ—καὶ αὐτός, of the Receptus, must be omitted; and, on the authority of B.D.C.L. 69, etc., we would, with Tischendorf and Lachmann, read merely ὅς προσεδέχετο.

Ver. 55. And the women, which came, etc. According to Lachmann, αἱ γυναῖκες, preferable to the καὶ of the Receptus, and the γυναῖκες of Tischendorf, which, according to ver. 49, is internally improbable.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Joseph. Compare Lange on Matt. xxvii. 57.—Luke depicts his character as peculiarly that of a good and just man; the latter, naturally, not in the judicial, but the theocratic sense of the word. "Omnis homo ἀγαθος est etiam δίκαιος, non contra. Lucas totum laudat ante partem." Bengel. Whether he was the only member of the Jewish council who voted against the sentence passed upon the Lord, cannot be stated with certainty; it is, however, clear that he is here distinguished from Nicodemus, who is, indeed, called ἄρχων, but not βουλευτής, and who seems to have had no vote in this matter. With regard to Arimathea, this town is by no means identical with Rama in Benjamin, mentioned Matt. ii. 18, as Friedlieb has, without adducing any reason, asserted. It is also highly improbable that Ramathaim in Ephraim, the birth-place of Samuel, situate not far from Lydda or Diospolis, is here intended. See Wieseler in Herzog's Real Encycl. ad vocem. The trait with which this notice of Joseph concludes, viz., that he waited for the kingdom of God, gives him a right to be reckoned a member of the spiritual family mentioned Luke ii. 30.

2. Went unto Pilate.—Further particulars are found in Mark. According to Cicero in Verrem v. 45, 51, the Roman procurators often granted such a favour for money. Besides, the Roman law decreed: corpora eorum qui capite damnantur, cognatis ipsorum deneganda non sunt. That Pilate should have required no money from so rich a man as Joseph, who also was no relation to Jesus, may have been occasioned by a secret joy that His death had so speedily occurred, or perhaps also, by a wish to testify his good-will to that member of the Sanhedrim who showed reverence for Jesus, and thus indirectly to annoy the priests, who had forcibly extorted the sentence of death from him. In this instance, as well as in that of his refusal to alter the superscription of the cross, Pilate showed himself great in trifles, while he had so lamentably shown himself to be too little in the most momentous affair.

3. In linen.—Fine Sindon, a stuff made of cotton, which was cut into strips, called elsewhere clean linen, because the priests' dresses were usually made of this material. The head especially was wrapped in a σουδάριον of the same material: John xx. 7. The preliminary and costly anointing is omitted by Luke, probably, because the anointing of the women so soon superseded it. There might be some reason for speaking of "the enormous consumption of spices" (Strauss), if we did not know how great an expense was often incurred, in this respect, in the East; as, for instance, at the funeral of Herod the Great, when, according to Josephus, Ant. Jud. xvii. 8, 3, not less than 500 servants were employed in carrying the spices (ἀρωματοφόροι).

4. A sepulchre that was hewn in stone.—If the general identity of the modern with the original Golgotha be conceded, the Holy Sepulchre is found in its immediate neighbourhood; and is still shown as such, in the church of this name. Compare the excellent remarks of v. Schubert, a. a. O. iii. p. 509.

5. And the day was the preparation, παρασκευή,—the preparation for the Sabbath, and indeed, that particular part of Friday which was looked upon as the commencement of the Sabbath (προσάββατον, Mark xv. 42). Meyer says, "Here also the day of Jesus' death bears no trace of having been a festival;" but it may be asked, on the other hand, whether the Jewish council would have displayed so untiring an activity, throughout this whole day and even on its evening, if the paschal lamb were still to be bought, slain, and eaten, on this very evening. It is highly probable that a late hour of Friday afternoon, between five and six o'clock, is intended. Ἐπέφωσκε here points, not to the drawing on of the Saturday, but of the legal Sabbath.

6. And the women also . . . followed after, etc., κατακολουθήσασαι.—The strengthened expression, in this connection, seems to point out a following downwards, κατά, as far as into the sepulchre: see Lange, Leb. Jes. iii. p. 521. They accompanied the obsequies as far as possible. The sacred history does not tell us that, according to the usual view, they were present and active at the taking down from the cross. According to all the Synopticists, they first joined the procession after the body had been taken down, and decently enveloped. In this work, Joseph and Nicodemus were probably assisted by servants or acquaintances, but not directly by the women. It is therefore very probable, that they did not even know of the quantity of spices brought by Nicodemus; but even if this were not the case, Love does not ask how little will suffice, but how much it may do. The very sight of the superfluity, which betokened the love of these two men, would dispose them to equal zeal, and make the idea insupportable, that they who had ministered with their substance to their Master while living, should perform no service for Him when dead. Their observation also, that though no expense had been spared in these arrangements, they had yet, of necessity, been comparatively hasty, must naturally have involved the idea that there might still be room for their care. Hence, after the men had returned to their homes, they remained alone beholding the sepulchre (ver. 55), and departed with the resolution of bringing spices and ointments as soon as possible; while they rested on the Sabbath according to the commandment.

According to Mark's more detailed account, the spices were not bought and prepared till the Sabbath was over (Mark xvi. 1), i.e., according to our method of computation, on Saturday evening after six o'clock. This is also internally probable, since the Sabbath had, indeed, already begun, when they returned from beholding the grave to Jerusalem. Luke does not directly say that the purchase took place after their return, though he does not deny it (ὑποστρέψασαι δὲ ἡτοίμασαν); he merely indicates that they did not allow themselves to be hindered from their work of love, by their strict observance of the law of the Sabbath. Ver. 56 of his account is immediately connected with ch. xxiv. 1; and the contrast between μέν and δέ would peculiarly point out, that only a comma must be placed at the end of ch. xxiii. The sense is: After beholding the grave, they purchased spices (it is uncertain when), and rested indeed on the Sabbath, according to the commandment; but when it was past, they went as soon as possible to the sepulchre, with the spices, now first said to have been bought.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. If ever it were plainly shown that crises in the kingdom of God serve to bring to light its secret friends, and that a great sorrow is capable of uniting men of different ranks, positions, and ages, this was the case at the Lord's burial. We look in vain for the eleven; so scattered were the sheep, that even care for the Shepherd's body was unable to assemble them; but love for the Lord changed women into heroines. And if, until this moment, no single voice had been raised in the Jewish Sanhedrim against the crime committed by its members, it is yet evident that all were not animated by the spirit of Annas and Caiaphas.

2. The certainty of Christ's death before interment is raised above every rational doubt, and partly corroborated by the very manner and fashion of His burial. Only the modern romance of unbelief, which has sought in late years to seduce a credulous public in a magnificent manner, by the production of quasi-ancient manuscripts, which were to make the connection of Jesus with Essenism as clear as day, could venture to assure us that Joseph of Arimathea discovered traces of life in the apparent corpse, and bestowed the greatest care upon it. See, e.g., Jesus der Essäer, oder die Religion der Zukunft, Leipzig 1849; das Buch Jesu, Kassel 1850; and the important discoveries concerning the manner of the death of Jesus and others, made some years ago, which were propagated among thousands, and which, though now partly forgotten, are still used as weapons by the most absurd kind of scepticism, 2 Thess. ii. 11.

3. The burial of Christ forms a transition between His state of humiliation and His elevation, and may therefore be reckoned as belonging partly to the one and partly to the other. It was, together with its accompanying events, a fulfilment of prophecy (Isa. liii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4) and extremely remarkable in all its details. A new sepulchre received the Lord, as formerly an ass's foal whereon man had never sat had borne Him; a grave in the rock made so secure, that only angelic strength could open it,—with only one entrance, so that the very locality forbids the supposition that the body was stolen; in a garden, so that sin was carried to the grave in a place similar to that in which it was born. Thus all worked together to prepare an undisturbed resting-place and a glorious resurrection morning for the Lord.

4. With regard to the condition of the Lord during the period which His body passed in the grave, we venture to make a free application of the saying of St John, that "that Sabbath-day was an high day" (John xix. 31). It was undoubtedly a state of perfect consciousness, refreshing rest, incipient joy, in company with the penitent thief, and happy expectation of the resurrection morning. The question of when the preaching to the spirits in prison (1 Pet. iii. 19–21) took place, depends upon another, viz., how far we can speak of any ministry of the Lord during the separate state. We believe that the Apostle places it between the resurrection and ascension.

5. The Sabbath spent by the Lord in the sepulchre was the last Old Testament Sabbath, and was therefore passed, even by His friends, in the sadness of those who knew not that the day of the New Testament, in which light and immortality were brought to light, had dawned. His enemies were embittering their Sabbath rest by the anxious exertions they were making to watch the corpse, as Matthew alone relates. It was the sad lot of those who had so often accused the Lord of breaking the Sabbath, at last to desecrate this day themselves. Scarcely, indeed, had it begun (i.e., the legal Sabbath, which began on Friday evening after six), than they came to Pilate to make their proposal, Matt. xxvii. 62. They would not leave the corpse unwatched one single night, nor rest till the watch was stationed in Joseph's garden. But their very care contributed to the manifestation of their own shame, of the Lord's resurrection, and of God's glory.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

See Homiletical Hints on the parallel passages in Lange.—Joseph of Arimathea, the representative of an honourable minority.—Just when all seems lost, the courage of faith awakens.—The dead Christ, the point of union of His male and female friends.—Love stronger than death, Cant. viii. 6.—"They beheld the grave" (an excellent text for Good Friday evening): 1. How far our observations of the grave may differ from those of His first friends; 2. how far they must coincide with them.—The grave of Jesus viewed in the light of faith: 1. The memorial of the malice of the enemies; 2. the termination of the Lord's sufferings; 3. the scene of the working of God's providence; 4. the scene of the burial of the sins of the world; 5. the pledge of the Christian's rest in the grave.—The great Sabbath: 1. The history, 2. the importance, 3. the warnings of this ever important day.—The great Sabbath: 1. A festival of delusive rest to Israel; 2. a day of refreshing rest to Jesus; 3. a pledge of recovered rest to sinners; 4. a time of active rest to the Father; 5. a type of the rest remaining to the people of God, Heb. iv. 9.—The Sabbath, 1. of Christ, 2. of Christians.

Starcke: Say not, If all are so corrupt, how can I live a pious life alone?—They who are inwardly concerned to act rightly, must do so outwardly, at the right time.—There is no fear in love, etc.—We must render all due respect to the powers that be, Rom. xiii. 7.—Jesus is the best and dearest treasure of believers.—We still can and must clothe Jesus, in His members who are naked.—Hedinger: We must show love even to the dead, and inter them in a Christian manner.—It is great gain to lose one's money for Christ's sake.—J. Hall: A true Christian will not rest satisfied that others should show love to their neighbours, but will also do it himself.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: It is the way of pious souls to be God-fearing, loving, and busy.—Arndt: The burial of Jesus: 1. Its possibility; 2. its glory; 3. its importance; 4. its obligation.—Krummacher: The burial: 1. The descent from the cross; 2. the laying in the grave; 3. the securing of the grave.—J. C. Stern: The confession of the Christian, at the Lord's grave.—Wolff: A comforting glance at the Lord's sepulchre.

SECOND SECTION.

THE COMPLETE TRIUMPH.

CHAPTER XXIV. 1–48.

A. Over the Power of Death and Sin. (VERS. 1–12.)

1 Now, upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them. 2 And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre. 3 And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. 4 And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments: 5 And as they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead? 6 He is not here, but is risen: remember how He spake unto you when He was yet in Galilee, 7 Saying, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again. 8 And they remembered His words, 9 And returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things unto the eleven, and to all the rest. 10 It was Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, which told these things unto the Apostles. 11 And their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. 12 Then arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre; and stooping down, he beheld the linen clothes laid by themselves, and departed, wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.

Ver. 1. Καί τινες σὺν αὐταῖς of the Receptus is probably, as Kuinoel supposes, an interpolation from ver. 10. The words are wanting in B.C.L. 33, Vulgata, Ital., and others, and are expunged by Lachmann and Tischendorf.

Ver. 5. Τὰ πρόσωπα, according to the reading of Tischendorf, supported by B.C.D.G.L.X., etc.

Ver. 12. Though ver. 12 is wanting in Cod. D., and also in the Syrian, Hier. Ital., and other MSS., it seems authentic, and to have been merely omitted because it seemed at variance with ver. 24. An interpolater would surely not have omitted mentioning the ἄλλος μαθητής for the sake of harmonizing with John xx. 1–10. The very incompleteness and fragmentary nature of this notice are evidences of its authenticity.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. In his history both of the resurrection and ascension, Luke maintains the same character which we have already had occasion to remark. In that which he communicates in common with the other Synopticists, he is less accurate and less copious than they are; so that his narrative must rather be completed from theirs, than theirs from his. On the other hand, however, he furnishes fresh contributions to our knowledge of our risen and glorified Lord, the nature and tendency of which are in most beautiful accordance with the catholic and humanistic character of his Gospel, as will appear in our consideration of these several narratives. He relates the appearing of Christ on the evening of the resurrection day (ver. 36, etc.) more copiously than John; while it scarcely needs mention that our historic faith in a visible ascension into heaven rests almost exclusively upon his testimony, both at the end of his Gospel and at the beginning of the Acts of the Apostles. On the history of the resurrection, and the objections that have been raised against it, see Lange on Matt. xxviii. After what has been so excellently said there, it will be our part to confine ourselves exclusively to the narrative of Luke. "In resurrectione et vita, quam ostendit quadraginta diebus, reficimur et delectabilibus pascimur argumentis." Bernhard of Clairvaux.

2. Very early in the morning, ὄρθρου βαθέος, or, according to the reading of A.C.D., with an unusual ancient Genitive βαθέως: see Tischendorf on this passage.—The narrative is immediately connected with ch. xxiii. 56; and the women, whom Luke here mentions, can be none other than those of whom he said, ver. 55, that they came with Jesus from Galilee. Hence the assertion of Bengel, aliæ quæ non venerant e Galilæa, is purely gratuitous. Since Luke, in ver. 10, mentions three of these women by name, and then adds, αἱ λοιπαὶ σὺν αὐταῖς, the company, according to his account, consisted of at least five. All the Evangelists name Mary Magdalene; Matthew and Mark speak also of the other Mary, the mother of James; Mark names Salome as the third, while Luke gives the name of Joanna instead. It may be that this difference is to be explained by the fact that they went to the grave in two separate parties (Lange); though, on the other hand, it is questionable whether it be not psychologically more probable that they should go together at so early an hour. It is difficult here to determine anything with certainty; but it is, in any case, unreasonable, where the account of one Evangelist completes but does not exclude that of another, to regard variety and contradiction as synonymous.

3. The stone rolled away, τὸν λίθ.—Thus implying that its placing before the sepulchre was known of, though not mentioned in Luke's account. Matthew informs us who rolled it away; while Mark relates the unnecessary proposals and cares which occupied the women, on their way to the sepulchre. As soon as Mary Magdalene perceived that the stone was rolled away, she hastened back to the city, to give this information to Peter and John (John xx. 2, etc.). Luke omits this circumstance; while, on the other hand, he graphically portrays the fear and joy of the other women.

4. Two men.—"The angels are described according to the form in which they were visible to the women." Meyer. With regard to the well-known controversy concerning the number of the angels, we would, in place of all ancient and modern harmonistic expedients, cite the well-known words of Lessing, who exclaims, with a liberality unusual in modern critics, "Can you not see, ye cold seekers after discrepancies, that the Evangelists do not count the angels? The whole sepulchre, the whole neighbourhood of the sepulchre, was swarming with invisible angels. There were not here merely two angels left behind, like two grenadiers before the habitation of a departed general, but millions. It was not always one and the same that appeared, not always the same two. First one appeared, and then another; first in this place, then in that; now in company, now alone; now they said one thing, now another."

5. Why seek ye.—In Luke's account of the angels' address, the unreasonableness of seeking in the habitation of the dead Him who was really among the living, is made prominent. The variations in the report of the words are an internal proof of truth, it being impossible that the women, in the excitement of the moment, should afterwards repeat the information they had received, with diplomatic accuracy. It is enough that all the Evangelists agree concerning its matter. "Thus the fact of the first announcement of Christ's resurrection is represented to us, not in the form of its abstract objective particulars, but in connection with its living actors, and in the lively record of the first Easter tones it produced. These, however, are not presented in the measured manner of a chorus in unison, but in the form of an animated fugue of four voices." Lange.

6. When He was yet in Galilee.—The recalling of what the Lord had specially said when He was in Galilee, takes the place, in Luke, of the reference to Galilee as the place where the risen Saviour should be seen. This Evangelist also reports only one appearance in Galilee. The announcements of His sufferings, which the women had forgotten, were known to the angels. Why it should be psychologically improbable that the women should not, till now, have remembered the Lord's predictions of His resurrection (Meyer), passes our comprehension.

7. And told all these things, in obedience to the express command of the angels, as given in Matthew and Mark.—The frame of mind in which they returned from the sepulchre, is not more expressly communicated by Luke; while, on the other hand, it is to him that we owe the information, that they spread the joyful news amongst a far larger circle than the eleven, as we shall soon (vers. 22–24) more closely perceive from the travellers to Emmaus. On the women here mentioned, see the remarks on ch. viii. 2, 3.

8. As idle tales, ὡσεὶ λῆρος, joke, superstitious folly and delusion. Hall.—It is certainly possible that they may have carried their intelligence to the brethren of the Lord (Acts. i. 14), with the same result (De Wette). This, however, is by no means proved. The special experiences of Mary Magdalene, who is joined with the other women (ver. 10), and who, according to John xx. 18, confirmed their testimony, are omitted by Luke for the sake of brevity. It appears, however, from his summary account, that she met with no better reception than the other announcers of His resurrection.

9. But Peter.—Comp. John xx. 2–10. John is not mentioned here; though it appears, from ver. 24, that several of the disciples visited the sepulchre on this morning. If Luke had, as Baur supposes, been desirous of giving prominence to the appearing vouchsafed to the travellers to Emmaus, to the prejudice of that granted to Peter, he might as easily have omitted the visit of that Apostle to the sepulchre. For the rest, the brevity of our Evangelist may well be the reason why, though he speaks of μόνα, he omits all mention of the σουδάριον (John xx. 7).

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See Lange on the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

2. "The resurrection of Jesus is, humanly speaking, so sublime, touching, and beautiful, that if it were a fable, which it is not, one might wish it were historical truth." Herder. To have viewed and described the great miracle on its purely human side, and thus to have brought it nearer to us than has been done by Matthew and Mark, is one of the indisputable services performed by this Evangelist.

3. The announcement of Christ's resurrection, as well as that of His birth, by angels, was worthy of God; and the susceptibility of the women for perceiving the objective and present angelic appearance was limited by their subjective disposition. No writer of fiction would have been satisfied with one or two heavenly messengers, especially as on the night of the birth a multitude of the heavenly host descended to earth. A resurrection unaccompanied by such extraordinary circumstances would be a spring without flowers, a sun without beams, a triumph without a crown.

4. There is a remarkable coincidence between the beginning of our Lord's first and of His second life on earth. In both we see the doubting and troubled calmed by a heavenly messenger; in both the accessory circumstances are related in detail, while a veil of mystery is spread over the beginning itself, both of His life and resurrection. He was raised by the power of the Highest, by which also He had been begotten (Luke i. 35; Rom. vi. 4). By His resurrection He was declared to be the Son of God (Rom. i. 4),—a title bestowed upon Him even before His birth (Luke i. 32).

5. The Lord's resurrection was, first, the restoration of a life, which seemed quite terminated, by the reunion of the broken link between soul and body; secondly, a continuation of the former life, with which the consciousness of its identity revived (Luke xxiv. 39), memory returned, and the objective and present fact received subjective reality for Him who was risen; lastly, the glorification of the former existence, all the burdens of which were removed, so that the risen Saviour now appeared to be quite different from what He had formerly been, without being therefore another individual.

6. Scripture testifies that Christ rose from the grave, in the literal sense of the word, with a genuine human body, from a real state of death. Hence it condemns the Docetic view, according to which, either the reality or the identity of His body is doubted, or the manner and means of His resurrection so represented that it is utterly impossible to hold its true corporeity. (See, e.g., the tract of F. Kühn, Wie ging Jesus durch des Grabes Thur, Bonn 1838.) Not less, however, are both the coarse and more refined rationalistic notions, which represent the Lord's resurrection as a mere revival from a trance, opposed both to Scripture and Christian conviction. How should it be possible that the double expression of the Lord's self-consciousness (Rev. i. 18), "I am He that liveth and was dead," should contain in its first part objective, and in its second, only subjective truth? Finally, we reject also the partial and symbolic interpretation, according to which the history of the resurrection is regarded only as a non-essential involucrum of religious ideas, and not as an independent fact (Spinoza, Kant, Hegel, Strauss).

7. The possibility of the Lord's resurrection from the dead is opposed, a priori, by those who ignore, either on pantheistic or material grounds, all essential difference between spirit and matter. In opposition to this, we have simply to remember that the justice of the anthropological principles of unbelief is by no means proved. To demand that the possibility of the resurrection should be so fully demonstrated as to make it evident that, according to natural laws, this event not merely might, but must take place, is irrational; since by such a demonstration the fact would be deprived of its miraculous character, and degraded from the class of the miracula to that of the mirabilia. Enough, that the said possibility is founded on the absolute peculiarity of the Lord's personality, to which, as we have before remarked, death, no less than sin, must have been something entirely unnatural. It is folly to contend for this possibility with such as deny the miracles of the former periods of His history. It is not till these are proved or conceded that it will be found admissible or rational that He, though corporeally laid in the grave, could see no corruption. Whether we have to conceive of the resurrection as the result of a quiet but gradual development in the grave, somewhat as the incipient life of the butterfly is formed in the dead pupa, as in a hidden laboratory; or whether we have rather to suppose a magnificent transition, in consequence of which the hitherto utterly insensible body was instantaneously suffused, as it were, with divine life,—is a question, for whose decided answer we have no solid historical data. Enough, that we have to view the Lord's resurrection both as the Son's own work (John x. 18), and as a miracle of the Father (Acts ii. 24). They who esteem the Lord to be what, according to His own words and those of His Apostles, He really is, regard the resurrection of the God-man, miraculous as it is, in the highest sense of the word, as perfectly natural; since the supposition that He should have been holden of death is christologically absurd. On the idea of miracles, compare the important remarks of Schenkel in Zelzer's protestant. Monatsbl. 1833, and of Rothe in his treatise on divinity in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit. 1858, i.

8. To the Lord Himself, the resurrection hour was undoubtedly an hour of holy joy and glorious triumph; but also an hour of hopeful preparation for the various manifestations of Himself which He granted, on this first day, to various persons, in different places. We are now on the threshold of one of the most remarkable transitions in His inner and outer life—a transition almost similar in nature to that which occurred in His twelfth or thirteenth year. From this time forth, He entered into entirely new relations with His friends and foes, with the world of spirits and the kingdom of darkness, with death and the grave, and even, in a certain measure, with the Father. Hitherto, we have known Him as the Son, being made perfect and learning obedience by the things which He suffered (Heb. ii. 10, v. 8); now we find Him perfected and justified at the foot, as it were, of His throne. He had, as yet, never lived such an hour as this on earth; and He would, no less than at His baptism (Luke iii. 21), consecrate His new life by prayer to the Father. Yes, as His whole life might be called a preparation for His sufferings and death, so did His second life become a preparation for His ascension. Erroneous as it is to identify the resurrection and ascension in principle (Kinkel and Weisse), we must not forget that they are most intimately connected. With every day that the Lord withdrew Himself farther from His vacated grave, He approached the nearer to the crown that awaited Him, and the solemn celebration of His conquest was blended in lovely harmony with the quiet preparation for His enthronement; so that, even from the first day, He could speak of an entering upon His glory, ver. 26. But scarcely can we venture to penetrate farther into this sanctuary: if we cannot express even the glory and delight reflected from the Lord's resurrection, what must their experience have been? To our finite eyes, it is in the various appearings of the risen Saviour to His disciples, that His glory was most clearly manifested; and it is to these, therefore, that we must give our chief attention, if we would learn to know Christ in the power of His resurrection. The copiousness with which St Luke details the fourth of these appearings, amply atones for his silence concerning the first and second, and his slight mention of the third. On the number and sequence of these appearings, see Lange on Matthew xxviii.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

In a general point of view.—The resurrection of the Lord,—I. In its relation to the history of the world. The conquest of the power of sin and death, which was manifested in various forms, both in Israel and the Gentile nations; the implantation of a new principle of life, in men and in humanity. The empty sepulchre, the boundary between the old and new times, 2 Cor. v. 17. The triumph of the power of light over the power of darkness, in the course of the world's history, typically and symbolically depicted in the triumph of the second Adam over all the powers of death and darkness.—

II. In its relation to Israel. The most sublime expectations of the Old Testament fulfilled in this event (Ps. xvi. 10, and other passages), and the truth portrayed in the histories of Joseph, David, and of Israel, viz., that the way of humiliation leads to triumph, realized in a manner never before attained. The triumph of the King of Israel, the commencement of the temporal downfall, rejection, and judicial hardening of Israel, and yet the pledge of Israel's future restoration. The empty sepulchre, the silent yet eloquent accuser of the murderers of the Messiah.—III. In its relation to the Apostles and first friends of the Lord. His resurrection, the foundation of their renewal to a life of faith, hope, and love, after all had seemed lost by His death. Easter morning, the commencement of a new era to each individually, and to all collectively. The certainty that their Master was alive, gave new life to their spirits, new joy to their hearts, new strength to their feet, new hope to their future. Even unbelief has been forced to acknowledge that such a change as took place in the disciples, between Good Friday and Easter Day, can only be explained by their having believed in the great fact which Easter Day announced. But how this subjective certainty could have arisen, except from the objective actual occurrence, no apostle of unbelief has as yet been able to explain, with any degree of probability, on psychological, much less on historical grounds.—IV. In its relation to Jesus Himself, the resurrection is, a. the satisfactory solution of the otherwise entirely inexplicable occurrences of His life, by which the disturbed harmony of His life is restored; b. the climax of His miracles, and especially of His raisings of the dead; c. the seal of His declarations with regard to His own person and His condition after death; d. the decisive step on the way to glorification, the status exinanitionis being now for ever at an end.—V. In its relation to the founding of the kingdom of God, the Lord's resurrection was the indispensably necessary condition, without which the appearance of the Apostles, the conversion of thousands of Jews, and the union of many thousand heathen with them in one spiritual body, must ever be totally inexplicable.—VI. Even in the whole doctrine of salvation the resurrection of Jesus was the conditio sine qua non of the personal redemption, renewal, and resurrection of all His people. The certainty of reconciliation was not perfectly secured, until it was manifest that the sacrifice of the Son was accepted by the Father; on which account, St Paul lays more stress on the Lord's resurrection than even on His death (Rom. v. 10, viii. 34). We find, a. the image,

b. the reason, c. the power of our renewal offered to us only by faith in Christ, as personally raised from the dead; and it is just in proportion to our faith in the great fact of Easter morning, that a. the possibility, b. the certainty, c. the glory of our own resurrection are triumphantly corroborated. All these considerations offer to Christian homilists so inexhaustible a treasury of points of view and reflections, that we can scarcely imagine how any one who has even incipiently experienced the truth of the Apostle's saying, Gal. ii. 20, should ever have to complain, on this festival, that he has exhausted his subject.

On our section.—The first Easter morning. The kingdom of nature, a symbol of the kingdom of grace: a. The dark night; b. the hopeful twilight; c. the dawning day.—The first pilgrims to the holy sepulchre: a. How sadly they approached! b. how joyfully they departed!—The experience of these female friends of the Lord, on the day of His resurrection, a proof of the truth of the saying, Heaviness may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning, Ps. xxx.—The rolled-away stone.—How light dawned on Easter morn, 1. in the garden, 2. in hearts, 3. on the cross, 4. for the world, 5. in the regions of the dead.—The first Easter Gospel: 1. The hearers; 2. the preacher; 3. the message; 4. the result of the message.—How unbelief deplores the very circumstance which should be its chief ground of hope.—The empty sepulchre, contemplated not with joy, but with perplexity.—Easter morning, a festival also for the angels of heaven.—The fruitless search for the living among the dead; 1. for the living Christ in the sepulchre, 2. for the living Christian in the dust of earth.—"He is not here:" Christ's absence, for the first and only time, a source of inestimable joy.—The coincidence and diversity between the messages of Christmas night and Easter morning.—The resurrection of Jesus, the corroboration of His former, and the pledge for the fulfilment of His subsequent words.—Of how many of his Master's words does His empty grave remind the Christian!—No commandment was so frequently given on the morning of the resurrection, as that of announcing the joyful message to others.—The difference between the unbelief of the first Apostles and friends of Jesus in His resurrection, and that of modern criticism.—None but the risen Saviour Himself could put an end to the doubts and sorrows of His first friends.—They doubted, that we might not need to doubt.—The empty grave viewed by a fallen Apostle: 1. He entered it inquiringly, 2. searched it narrowly, 3. found it empty, 4. left it thoughtfully.—The charming harmony of Easter evening arose from the various discords of Easter morning.

Starcke, Quesnel: What we do out of love to Christ, must be done liberally, quickly, and carefully.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: No stone is too great for the mighty providence of God to roll away.—Believers often find Jesus not such as they sought for.—Canstein: The angels ministered to Christ ten times, between the time of His manifestation in the flesh and His ascension.—God has many ways and means of comforting the affrighted; if He does not do it by the holy angels, He does it by the angels of the Church.—Bibl. Würt.: There is no respect of persons with God: a woman is as dear to Him as a man, Gal. iii. 28.—The holy angels abide by the words of Christ.—Canstein: Forgetfulness of Christ's words brings trouble.—Sometimes weak women are evangelists to men, who ought to be strong.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: The mystery of the resurrection surpasses all the thoughts and reasonings of men.—Jesus, the supreme good, is worth seeking for, without intermission, till He is found.—Osiander: Faith and unbelief sometimes struggle with each other, in the same individual.

Arndt: The first beams of Christ's glory in the prime of Easter morn: 1. The rolled-away stone; 2. the dazzling angel; 3. the hastening women.—Krummacher, Kirchl. Lehrst. i. p. 209: In the miracle of the resurrection, we behold, 1. the glory of the Father, 2. the glory of the Son, 3. the glory of the elect.—Nitzsch: The happiness of the disciple of Jesus quickened by the resurrection of his Head.—Flatt, Zeugn. evang. Wahrheit i. p. 167: The morning of Christ's resurrection: 1. How it spreads the most brilliant dawn over earth; 2. how the morning of eternity beams with its light.—Rieger: How God would not have us seek and anoint a dead Jesus, in the sepulchre.—Ahlfeld: The celebration of the first Easter festival. —Souchon: The Easter sermon of the angels.—Stier: Christ's resurrection, the true consolation of all believers, 1. in tribulation, 2. in sin, 3. in death.—Rautenberg: Easter at the graves: 1. The stone of the curse is rolled away from them; 2. angels abide in them; 3. the dead are departed from them.—The great Easter comfort, 1. for careful love, 2. for a troubled conscience.—Schmid: Easter, the most glorious festival: 1. the most glorious joy, 2. the most glorious victory, 3. the most glorious faith, 4. the most glorious hope.—Jaspis: How to celebrate Easter aright.

B. The Complete Triumph over the Doubts of Unbelief. (VERS. 13–45.)

1. Christ's Appearing to the Disciples at Emmaus. (VERS. 13–35.)

13 And, behold, two of them went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about threescore furlongs. 14 And they talked together of all these things which had happened. 15 And it came to pass, that, while they communed together, and reasoned, Jesus Himself drew near, and went with them. 16 But their eyes were holden, that they should not know Him. 17 And He said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad? 18 And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering, said unto Him, Art Thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days? 19 And He said unto them, What things? And they said unto Him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people: 20 And how the chief priests and our rulers delivered Him to be condemned to death, and have crucified Him. 21 But we trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel: and besides all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done. 22 Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre; 23 And when they found not His body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that He was alive. 24 And certain of them which were with us went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said; but Him they saw not. 25 Then He said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! 26 Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into His glory? 27 And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself. 28 And they drew nigh unto the village whither they went: and He made as though He would have gone further. 29 But they constrained Him, saying, Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And He went in to tarry with them. 30 And it came to pass, as He sat at meat with them, He took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them. 31 And their eyes were opened, and they knew Him; and He vanished out of their sight. 32 And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures? 33 And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, 34 Saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. 35 And they told what things were done in the way, and how He was known of them in breaking of bread.

Ver. 21. Καί after ἀλλά γε has been rightly adopted by Tischendorf and Lachmann, on the testimony of B.D.L.

Ver. 30. Already far spent—ἤδη, the reading of B.L. cursive MSS., Vulgate, Coptic, Sclav. and Tischendorf. Lachmann brackets it.

Ver. 32. As He opened to us. The καί of the Receptus seems inserted for the sake of connecting the sentences. B.D.L. 33, Cant. Or. omit it. See Lachmann and Tischendorf.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Two of them,—not of the Twelve, from whom they are specially distinguished by ver. 33, nor even necessarily of the Seventy, who are not to be looked upon as a firmly organized community, but of the wider circle of followers, who were now gathered at Jerusalem. Cleopas, who is incidentally mentioned ver. 18, because he was then the spokesman, is not the same as Cleophas, John xix. 25, but =Cleopatrus. With regard to the other disciples, conjectures are legio. Nathanael (Epiphanius), Simon (Origen), Luke (Theophylact, Lange), Peter, on account of ver. 34, and many others, have been mentioned. The last-named supposition is founded on a misunderstanding; the last but one has in its favour, the copiousness and evident predilection with which Luke describes the whole circumstance. Perfect certainty is, however, as needless, as it is impossible.

2. Emmaus, mentioned also by Josephus, de bello Jud. 7, 6, 6, cf. 4, 1, 3, must not be confounded with the town of Emmaus, in the plain of Judea, situate 176 stadii from Jerusalem, which was, in the third century, called Nicopolis, and regarded as the birthplace of Cleopas, through a misunderstanding of certain ancient expositors. Even the Fathers Eusebius and Jerome confounded the above-mentioned town with the village in question, whose situation was for a long time uncertain. It seems that the Emmaus here mentioned, is none other than the modern Kulonieh, which is rather more than a two hours' journey from Jerusalem. Compare, among others, Sepp, a. a. O. iii. p. 653, and Robinson iii. 281.—Threescore furlongs = about seven and a half miles: see Winer in voce. It lay west of the capital, and thus the road went towards the graves of the Judges, and the ancient Mizpeh, the dwelling-place of Samuel, through a charming tract of country. But if ever it was manifest that the charms of nature alone, cannot possibly satisfy the heart which has lost Christ, it was so on this day. These travellers take with them the remembrance of the scenes of blood and murder, of which they had lately been witnesses, even into the sanctuary of creation. We have the subject of their conversation more copiously detailed by themselves, ver. 18, etc. It is probable that the Lord first appeared behind them, in the garb of an ordinary traveller, and soon afterwards overtook them.

3. But their eyes, etc.—According to Mark xvi. 12, the Lord appeared to them ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ; and even this word would sufficiently explain why they did not immediately recognise Him. In no other form was He so ineffaceably impressed upon their minds as in that of a dying sufferer. Besides, they were not thinking of His resurrection, and still less of His immediate presence; and how should they immediately recognise, in this tranquil, vigorous, and dignified traveller, their expiring and crucified Master? It is, however, certain, that a supernatural cause must have been combined with this natural reason, or rather, that the Lord made use of this ἑτέρα μορφή as a means of so appearing to them that they might not immediately know Him. The expression, ἐκρατοῦντο τοῦ, indicates a definite purpose of His love: He desired to remain concealed for a short time, before making their joy complete: comp. ver. 31. Had He desired to be immediately recognised, He would have so manifested Himself as to render doubt impossible.

4. And are sad (and why are ye sad? Germ. Ver.).—If we strike out, with Tischendorf, on the authority of D. Syr. Cant. (B. and L. have variations), the words καί ἐστε, we have then but a single, instead of a double question. What are these speeches which you are interchanging with one another, as ye walk sadly along? In any case, it is evident that He who interrupted their conversation, intended to give them an opportunity of making Him a sharer of their sorrow. What He already knew, He desired to hear from their mouth; and therefore began with a question of the same kind as that with which He had, shortly before, introduced His appearing to Mary Magdalene. He then made a significant pause, till Cleopas, now speaking alone, now assisted by his companion, had told Him all that lay so heavily on their hearts. Undoubtedly, He was not only silently displeased at their unbelief, but rejoiced at their love; though, in the beginning of the speech of Cleopas, a certain amount of annoyance at the sudden and troublesome interruption of a third party, is plainly evident.

5. Only a stranger in Jerusalem.—He takes the inquirer for a παροικῶν, not because of a somewhat peculiar pronunciation (De Wette), but because he could not imagine so utter an ignorance of the things that had lately occurred, in an habitual resident in the capital; and perhaps, also, because this traveller, now that the Passover had been eaten, seemed, like themselves, about to leave the city. They seem to think, however, that there could be no doubt that even a stranger would, under ordinary circumstances, have heard of the event which filled their hearts, and indeed the whole capital.

6. Concerning Jesus of Nazareth.—Free vent is now given to their disappointed expectations. It appears from οἱ δὲ εἶπον, that both spoke; while it is not possible to distinguish exactly between the several words spoken by each, as some have attempted (Paulus, Kuinoel). The outpouring of their hearts was remarkable, as showing what the Lord had been, and still was, in their eyes, even at the moment when they saw their fondest hopes vanish. They did not utter His official name, Christ, but they inferred that the name of Jesus of Nazareth was sufficiently known, both in and out of Jerusalem. They were persuaded that, though numbered with the transgressors, He was such a prophet, one so specially sent of God, as had not been in Israel for centuries, with the exception of John the Baptist. Such He had proved Himself by word and deed, not only in the eyes of the people, but also before God (ἐναντίον); and, even after His death, it was impossible for them to pronounce the name of this ἀνήρ but with reverence and affection. They did not shun saying that there was an irreconcilable difference of opinion, with respect to Him, between themselves and the rulers of the nation. These latter had delivered Him to death; they had trusted that He had been He which should have redeemed Israel (ἠλπίζομεν, in Imperf.). They did not more closely define the nature of their hope, and of the expected redemption. But whether their expectation had taken a more political or spiritual direction, the grave had been the rock against which it had suffered shipwreck. Perhaps, after a short pause, they went on, rather thinking aloud than giving information to the stranger, to whom their words, supposing Him to have been entirely unacquainted with the matter, would have been wholly incomprehensible.—But indeed (ἀλλά γε), though we entertained such a hope, and had not even yet given it up, it is also, etc. This, then, besides all this, increased their feeling of disappointment. They had still had a faint hope on the first and second days; but now that the third day also had almost elapsed without the enigma being solved, they no longer ventured to cling to this hope.

7. Yea, and certain women.—They thus began, at the very same moment that they were lamenting the failure of their hope, to speak of that which had that very day somewhat rekindled the almost extinguished sparks, but only to conclude with an acknowledgment of utter uncertainty and discouragement. Certain women of the company of the Nazarene's friends (ἐξ ἡμῶν) had astonished them, ἐξέστησαν (comp. Acts ii. 12); so that they were quite beside themselves, and no longer knew what to think of the whole matter. Early in the morning they had gone to the grave, and had hastily returned with the intelligence that they had seen a vision of angels, who said that He was alive (καὶ ὅπτ.; besides not finding what they sought, they had, moreover, seen what they had not sought, and heard what they could not believe). The disciples at Emmaus corroborated, in the most artless way, the account of the visit to the sepulchre, and the experience of the Galilean women. At the same time, it appears, from what immediately follows—καὶ ἀπῆλθόν τινες τῶν σὺν ἡμῖν—that, even according to Luke, Peter did not go to the grave alone (ver. 12), but that others went also; so that this plural silently confirms the account of the visit to the sepulchre (John xx. 2–10). According to Stier, we are to understand by τινὲς ἐξ ἡμῶν, that not only the Apostles, but also the members of that wider circle, to which these two disciples belonged, had undertaken the necessary researches; so that great confusion and separation had taken place on this day. This is certainly possible. But, however this might be, these researches had led to no satisfactory result. They had certainly found τὸ μνημεῖον, as the women had said, i.e., κενόν, and so far they could by no means impugn the credibility of their story. But they had seen nothing either of angels or of the Lord; and if He were really risen, would no one have seen Himself?—But Him they saw not. These last words sufficiently explained why they felt they must bid farewell to their hopes.

8. Then He said unto them.—There must have been something in this supposed stranger which irresistibly attracted them to talk to Him with increasing confidence, while He suffered them to pour out their hearts unchecked. Nothing would have been easier than, as in the case of Mary, to change their sorrow into joy by the utterance of a single word; but the Lord would bestow upon them something far more valuable than a sudden surprise. It was now His turn to speak; and when they thought to hear Him condole with them, He began, on the contrary, by seriously reproving them. He assumed the manner of an experienced teacher, and gave them to understand that the cause of their sorrow was entirely in themselves. He calls them ἀνόητοι, deficient in understanding, insensible in an intellectual sense,—καὶ βραδεῖς τῇ καρδίᾳ, τοῦ πιστεύειν ἐπὶ πᾶσιν, κ.τ.λ.: the emphasis being evidently put upon the latter. He does not deny that they had believed something, but their belief had been partial, and could therefore kindle no light in the darkness of their minds. Here also ignorance and indolence, unwillingness of heart and mind, stand simply in juxtaposition, but so that we have to regard the latter as the chief cause of the former. Their eyes were thus darkened, because their hearts had been so slow to believe the whole truth. The progress of divine truth is not so much from the head to the heart, as from the heart to the head; and no one is capable of understanding what he has not himself passed through and experienced.

9. Ought not, etc.—The Lord spake of a necessity founded on the fact that all these things were foretold. That which proved a stumblingblock to them was, according to a higher arrangement, inevitable; nor would it have been possible for them to have been so shaken, if they had paid due attention to the prophecies concerning the suffering Messiah.—And (thus) to enter into His glory. That which seemed to them incompatible with the glory of the Messiah, was exactly the prescribed way to it. The Lord did not intend to say that He has already entered into His glory (Kinkel and others), but spake as one who was now thus much nearer to this glory, that His sufferings were already past (supple. δεῖ, Meyer); εἰσελθεῖν, marking the glory as a heavenly condition.

10. And beginning, ἀρξάμενος.—An emphatic intimation of the successive nature of His discourse. He began with Moses, and afterwards went through all the prophets, pointing out to them all that in these Scriptures referred to His work and person. It is indeed "much to be wished that we knew what prophecies of Jesus' death and glory were here meant" (De Wette); but when the critic goes on to say, "There are not many which can be so applied," the question is, whether his hermeneutics are in full accordance with those of the Lord Jesus; and if not, whether it is not the former, instead of the latter, which need revision. They who consult the teaching of Jesus and His Apostles with respect to the prophecies concerning the Messiah, need not grope in uncertainty, but should, nevertheless, remember that the Lord probably directed the attention of the disciples, on this occasion, less to isolated scriptures, than to the whole tenor of the Old Testament in its typical and symbolical character. Truly, one hour spent in the school of this Master is better than a thousand elsewhere.

11. He made as though, προσεποιεῖτο: ἅπαξ λεγόμενον in the New Testament (still admitted in a gloss, John viii. 6).—We have by no means to understand this of any deception, which would necessitate a more or less evident defence of the Lord's sincerity. He could act no otherwise, if He desired to maintain the character He had hitherto assumed; He would act no otherwise, because He desired not merely to enlighten their minds, but also to prove their hearts; He would really have gone further, had they not constrained Him by the force of love. He probably seemed about to bid them farewell with the usual blessing; but they already felt united to Him by so holy a tie, that the thought of a separation was quite insupportable. They therefore most earnestly besought Him (παρεβιάσαντο: comp. Luke xiv. 23; Acts xvi. 15), and pointed to the declining sun, with a conviction that their spiritual light would also set if they should lose His company. They reminded Him that it was impossible for Him to proceed in the night (comp. Gen. xix. 23; Jud. xix. 9), and requested that He would enter their abode,—one of them being probably the owner of a dwelling at Emmaus, where a simple supper was prepared.

12. He took bread.—It can scarcely need remarking, that an ordinary δεῖπνον, not the Lord's Supper, and still less a communio sub una specie, which Roman Catholics endeavour to prove by a reference to this passage (e.g., Sepp, iii. p. 656), is here spoken of. We rather find here a proof that the κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου (ver. 35), in the New Testament, does not usually signify the Lord's Supper. The guest, by virtue of His silently recognised superiority, simply took upon Himself the office of the master of the house, and pronounced the customary thanksgiving, which, according to the Jewish ritual, was prescribed, if as many as three were taking a meal together. See Berac. f. 45, 1. But whether there were anything peculiar in His manner of breaking and blessing the bread, which reminded them of their intercourse with the Master in former days, or whether they now perceived the wounds in His opened hands, or whether He Himself alluded to some saying which He had uttered before His death, their eyes were now opened. Διηνοίχθησαν, according to the contrast with ver. 16, an intimation of a sudden opening of their eyes, effected by the Lord Himself, by means of the breaking of bread, in consequence of which they now recognised their hitherto entirely unknown Friend; being not only fully convinced of His identity with Jesus of Nazareth, but also inwardly acknowledging His dignity and greatness.—And He vanished out of their sight, ἄφαντος ἐγένετο, ex ipsorum oculis evanuit. This expression, considered not simply in itself, but in connection with all that we subsequently hear concerning the corporeity of the risen Saviour, seems certainly to point out a sudden disappearance, a vanishing of the Lord, in an extraordinary manner, not αὐτοῖς, but ἀπ' αὐτῶν (Beza); though this certainly need not exclude the notion, that the Lord profited by the joy and surprise of the first moment after the discovery. See Doctrinal Remarks.

13. Did not our heart burn within us? καιομένη, expressive of unusual emotion: Ps. xxxix. 4; Jer. xx. 9.—If it were possible to ask the travellers to Emmaus, whether they meant an affectus gaudii, spei, desiderii, or amoris, on which point interpreters are divided, they would perhaps be bound to give a satisfactory answer. It is enough for us that they desire to express that, while listening to the Lord's instruction on the road, they experienced such an unknown and overwhelming feeling (loquebatur NOBIS, id plus est quam NOBISCUM: Bengel), that they might have known it was He, and that it was now perfectly incomprehensible to them that their eyes were not opened before. It was a good sign of their inward growth, that it was not so much the breaking of the bread, as the opening of the Scriptures, that was impressed upon their me mories.

14. The same hour.—The hour was certainly later than in ver. 35; but even had it been midnight, they would now have felt obliged to return to Jerusalem to announce the joyful intelligence. What the women did by the angels' express command, and Mary Magdalene by that of the Lord, they performed from the impulse of their own hearts. They probably left their meal untouched (comp. John iv. 31–34), and now felt no other desire than that of communicating what had happened. As usual, the work of love was rewarded with a fresh blessing. They came to give; they received an unexpected and longed-for confirmation of their faith. We have here, indeed, one of the few cases in which we may really doubt whether it is more blessed to give or to receive.

15. The eleven gathered together, with locked doors, as appears from John xx. 19; which would, however, be quickly opened to these brethren, though demanding admission so late. Then would they be greeted with the jubilant strain, "The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared unto Simon!" "One of the most glorious moments in the history of the resurrection, an antiphony composed by God." Lange. On their part, they would answer by the narration of all that had occurred to them upon the road (ver. 35), and how the Lord had been recognised by them in (ἐν), not by, the breaking of bread, which would less accord with the miraculous nature of the representation, ver. 31. Thus they would pass an hour of holy festival, which, without their being aware of it, was a preparation for another appearing of the Lord.

16. And hath appeared to Simon (comp. 1 Cor. xv. 5).—There is no reason for understanding this ὤφθη of a merely passing and momentary sight (as Stier insists). Undoubtedly, this refers to an appearing which no less deserves the name than those accorded, e.g., to the women. He was thus the first of all the disciples to whom this privilege was vouchsafed; according to Chrysostom: ἐν ἀνδράσι τούτῳ πρώτῳ, τῷ μάλιστα αὐτὸν ποθοῦντι ἰδεῖν, or μάλιστα χρήζοντι. In any case, this appearing was one which preceded that to the disciples at Emmaus, after Peter had heard of the kind καὶ τῷ Πέτρῳ (Mark xvi. 7). Distracted by fear and hope, he had probably wandered alone outside the city. Perhaps he had just returned from the visit to the grave, related by Luke, ver. 12, and John, vers. 2–10, and might be asking himself, whether, if his Master were even alive again, there were any hope of his seeing Him, when this high privilege was vouchsafed to him. What passed between him and his risen Lord remained a holy secret between them, which his fellow-Apostles respected, and abstained from investigating. The subsequent appearance to Peter at the Sea of Tiberias, and his reinstatement in his apostolic office, were not, however, rendered superfluous by it; and thus we must regard the consolation and refreshment now vouchsafed, rich and blessed as they were, as merely preliminary.

DOCTRINAL REMARKS.

1. The appearings of the risen Lord were of inestimable value to His first disciples. Their understandings were thereby cured both of doubts and injurious prejudices; their hearts, oppressed as they had been by sadness, conviction of sin, and care for the future, were comforted; and their lives dedicated to spiritual communion with Him, mutual love towards each other, powerful activity and immutable hope. The forty days after the Lord's resurrection were, so to speak, the second period in the history of the education and development of His Apostles, and one which remarkably differed from the first.

2. The various appearings of the risen Saviour present, on one side, a remarkable coincidence; on the other, a remarkable diversity. All agree in being within the reach of the senses, in beginning and ending in a more or less mysterious manner, and in showing that the Lord was really alive, and was the same for His friends as He had been before His death. Hence they may all be called, in the fullest sense of the word, manifestations of His glory; now of His love, now of His wisdom, then again of His knowledge or of His faithfulness; yet each has at the same time its own characteristic, distinguishing it from others, as the colours of the rainbow are distinct, though melting into each other. The Risen One did not partake of food in the presence of Mary Magdalene; she recognised Him by a single word. The instruction in the Scriptures, vouchsafed to the disciples at Emmaus, was not bestowed upon Thomas, whose unbelief arose from another source, and developed itself in a manner differing from theirs. Only one appearing (John xxi. 1–14) was accompanied by a miracle; in the others, the First-begotten from the dead Himself appears as the miracle of miracles. On one occasion, He instructed the erring before, on another after, the moment of recognition; now His presence glanced past like a ray of lightning, then it resembled the soft and pleasant rays of the morning sun. With Mary, we see Him especially in His priestly, with the disciples at Emmaus, in His prophetic character; while, in His appearing on the evening of the same day, He manifested Himself as the King of Heaven, commissioning and authorizing His ambassadors. Even the form under which He appeared to His disciples was diverse (Mark xvi. 12), as well as the manner in which He convinced them that He was still alive. All were prepared for His appearing in different manners, yet each found an individual need supplied in the meeting. With the travellers to Emmaus, He went a distance of sixty furlongs; He slowly passed before the women like a vision from another world. His appearing to the women and to Mary bore the tenderest character; those to the disciples, both with and without Thomas, the most composed; those to James and to Peter, at the Sea of Tiberias, the most mysterious; that upon the mountain in Galilee (= that to five hundred brethren at once, 1 Cor. xv. 6), the most sublime; that to the disciples at Emmaus, the most human. It is no wonder that John should sum up the appearings of the Lord under the general notion of His σημεῖα (John xx. 30), and that the history of these various manifestations should at all times have been considered one of the most powerful supports of our faith in the historical reality of His resurrection.

3. The whole narrative of the appearing to the disciples at Emmaus bears an internal impression of truth, better felt than described. It is unreasonable to control the short notice of Mark xvi. 12, 13, from word to word by the copious narrative of Luke; it is, however, plain enough that both are relating the same event; while with respect to the discrepancy between Mark xvi. 13 and Luke xxiv. 34, they must be utter novices in psychology, who do not at once perceive, that in a circle such as this, belief and unbelief might each strive for, and each obtain, the mastery in the course of a few moments. Whether, then, we suppose, with Bengel, that they at first believed (Luke), and afterwards doubted (Mark), or with Calvin, that they first doubted, and afterwards believed, there will be nothing contradictory in the representation, that the eleven, and those with them, at first received the disciples from Emmaus with believing joy, but still, till they themselves saw the Lord, were disturbed by so many doubts and objections, that the Lord might well upbraid them with ἀπιστία, in a relative sense, Mark xvi. 14. Mere sticklers for words will never comprehend the deep harmonies of the history of the resurrection. If we would strive to do the latter, we shall find, in the copiousness with which Cleopas speaks of his hopes and fears, in the only half-comprehensible mention of the third day, in their reckless condemnation of their chief priests and elders before an entire stranger, in their mention of their hearts burning within them, such marks of truth, freshness, and nature as will dispose us to inscribe the history of the resurrection also, with the saying of the Apostle, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables," etc., 2 Pet. i. 26. The same remark may apply to the appearing to Peter, of which scene, worthy the pencil of a Raphael, we have unfortunately no further account; some compensation for this loss, however, is offered by the remembrance, that this very scantiness of our Evangelist, in a point whose embellishment would have presented almost irresistible attractions to writers of fiction, furnishes a fresh proof of his faithfulness and credibility. Each appearing, when more closely considered, shows the same internal character in a greater or less degree. And the force of this proof is far from being weakened by the often repeated objection, that the Lord did not show Himself to His enemies (see even Origen, contra Celsum, ii. cap. 63, and elsewhere). The fact that He did not, being but a fresh specimen of His wisdom, holiness, and love. For His holiness could but esteem them unworthy of such an honour, who had opposed Him who was the light of this world, even to the death. His wisdom forbade Him to force them, by an external appearing, to a belief which, even in the more favourable instances, would but have filled them with fresh carnal expectations; while He also plainly foresaw, that no appearing would have produced the desired effect upon Caiaphas, the chief priests, and rulers (comp. Luke xvi. 31; John xii. 10; Matt. xxviii. 11–15). And even His love was manifested, in concealing the full glory of His resurrection from the eyes of His enemies. Their rejection of the Son of man, when appearing under the form of a servant, might yet be forgiven; but to have seen Him in the glory of His resurrection life, and then to have rejected Him, could only have been requited by irrevocable condemnation. Consequently, had the Lord appeared before His enemies without result, He would have rendered the preaching of the Gospel quite impossible among them: for how could He, consistently with His own honour, or with any hope of success, send His ambassadors again to those who should, after mature deliberation, have again despised and rejected Him? Would not an appearing to His enemies have been at direct variance with the peculiar nature and special purpose of His new life? And would the testimony of the Sanhedrim have been really more convincing to any one, than that of the disciples, whose obstinate unbelief in the fact of His resurrection was only overcome with much difficulty, and which therefore, in any case, forbids us to regard them as credulous on this point? All these things considered, there is not, in fact, a single reason why the jubilant strain, "The Lord is risen indeed!" should resound in any weaker tones than those in which it was uttered on the first Easter evening.

4. The appearing to the disciples at Emmaus is one of the strongest proofs of the high value which the Lord put upon the prophetic Scriptures, and their predictions of His sufferings and glory. He who denies either the existence or importance of these vaticinia, finds himself placed in opposition not only to the believing Church in all ages, but even to the Lord Himself.

5. The Lord's whole intercourse with these disciples bears a strongly symbolical character, which Christian teachers and homilists have always dwelt upon with evident preference. See below.

6. "When, in times of temptation, Jesus holds the eyes, so that the soul neither can nor must see Him, it is well; for light, joy, and consolation will soon follow: but when the sinner holds his own eyes, and will not see Jesus, it is ill; for he incurs the danger of eternal blindness and darkness." Starcke.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! Ps. cxxxiii. 1.—The way from Jerusalem to Emmaus, a wrong way upon which the good Shepherd (Heb. xiii. 20) seeks the erring sheep.—What the Lord's disciples best like to speak about, in their confidential intercourse with each other.—The living Christ, the third in every Christian friendship.—Jesus is near to us, even when we think Him far off.—The invisible witness of our friendly conversation.—Why are you sad? The question of the risen Saviour, on the festival of His resurrection, to all the weary and heavy laden.—The publicity of the Lord's history, a palpable proof of its truth.—The Lord requires the full confidence of His people, not for His sake, but for their own.—The prophetic office of Jesus, accredited not less by His deeds than His words.—The complaint of disappointed hope: 1. How painfully it sounds, while the Lord abides in death; 2. how quickly it is silenced, when it is manifest that He is risen indeed.—Love to the Lord stronger than shaken faith and disappointed hope.—Him they saw not: 1. The deepest sorrow of Easter morning; 2. the source of the highest Easter joy.—How good it is not to go from Jesus with our unbelieving doubts, but to take them to Him!—The reproaches of the risen Saviour no less loving than His kindest visitations.—Want of understanding in spiritual matters, the fruit of slowness of heart.—One-sidedness in faith.—The Scripture cannot be broken, John x. 34.—The connection between suffering and glory, for Christ and the Christian: 1. Suffering prepares a path to glory; 2. suffering is exchanged for glory; 3. suffering endured, increases the enjoyment and value of glory.—Word and spirit: 1. We must become acquainted with the Scriptures, even if the Lord has to explain them to us; 2. the Lord must explain them to us, if we are to understand the Scriptures.—The severest trials of faith often immediately precede the most glorious manifestations of grace.—"Abide with us:" What this request, 1. implies, 2. requests, 3. effects.—The prayer in the evening hour, 1. of the day, 2. of the kingdom of God, 3. of life.—The Lord does not let Himself be entreated in vain.—Our eyes must be opened, if we are to recognise the Prince of Life.—The Lord still manifests Himself to His people in a surprising and unmistakeable manner, but often for short and fleeting moments.—How the Lord still manifests Himself to His disciples in the breaking of bread (for the Easter celebration of the Lord's Supper). It may hence be shown how the risen Lord, 1. still seeks similar disciples, 2. still satisfies similar necessities, 3. still demands similar dispositions, 4. still affords similar surprises at the Lord's Supper, as at and after His appearing to the disciples at Emmaus.—The burning heart of the Lord's genuine disciple.—The communion of saints, 1. anxiously sought, 2. happily enjoyed, 3. richly rewarded.—The appearing to Peter,—1. a proof of the love of Jesus; a. Jesus appears to the fallen Peter, b. to Peter first, c. to Peter alone;—2. an inestimable benefit to Peter; it gave him, a. light instead of darkness, b. pardon instead of guilt, c. hope instead of fear;—3. a welcome message for the disciples from Emmaus; it served, a. to strengthen their faith, b. to determine the behaviour of all with respect to Peter, c. to prepare them for new manifestations;—4. a lesson for us, a. of faith, b. of love, c. of hope.—Christ our life: 1. What life would be without Christ, vers. 13–24; 2. what it may be through Christ, vers. 25–31; 3. what it must be for Christ, vers. 32–35.—The living Christ, the best leader. Come and see, 1. how kindly He seeks, 2. how lovingly He listens to, 3. how graciously He instructs and corrects, 4. how wisely He tries, 5. how unspeakably He surprises and rejoices His people.—The manner in which the Lord manifested Himself to the disciples at Emmaus, a foreshadowing of the surprise which He is reserving for His people in heaven.—The disciples returning from Emmaus teach us, 1. to look back with gratitude, 2. to look around us with love, 3. to look forward and upwards with hope.

Starcke, Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Where Jesus and His death are spoken of, and His resurrection thought of, He abides.—Canstein: When the heart is full, the mouth overflows.—In sorrow and temptation Christ seems to be absent, but is present; it is we who do not recognise Him.—With melancholy people, we must always seek into their cause of grief, if we would heal and restore them.—O that Christ were not a stranger among so many Christians! John i. 26.—Confidential intercourse between the teacher and the taught does not remain unblessed.—If great ones would have no ill spoken of them, they must do no ill.—Brentius: Faith and unbelief often have a hard battle in time of temptation.—The soul wants Jesus Himself.—Comfort is not for the erring till they are brought to full confession of their error.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Nothing is more difficult than faith.—The prophetic Scriptures are the foundation of our faith, 2 Peter i. 19.—Hedinger: The sun is indeed bright, but it is not so to a blind man.—Christ is the best interpreter of Holy Scripture.—Let the way of life be as difficult as it may, we reach the goal at last.—Langii Opera: Oh, how rare are they who so receive reproach as to gain a teacher thereby!—Prayer is the firm band which constrains the Almighty, who is willing to be thus constrained.—The opened eyes of the understanding distinguish natural from spiritual men.—When Jesus hides Himself, it is time to arise, and to hope for neither peace nor joy till He is found again.—Even unbelievers may become believers; let not the weak be despised.—Every Christian for whom God has done great things, is bound to declare them.—Luther: Observe how wonderfully God leads His people.

Heubner: Love to the risen Saviour, the true bond of friendship.—Often Jesus is not with us, because we do not speak of Him.—God is often long hidden from us, and His ways mysterious.—Jesus well knows what is pressing upon thee.—Jesus extracts from His disciples a confession of their faith.—They who live only upon earthly hopes, deceive themselves.—The heart of man hopes when there is nothing to be hoped for, and desponds when hope is near.—The glory of the risen Saviour, the reward of His sufferings.—The pious are never more zealous, and never cleave more closely to God, than when they fear to lose Him.—Christ, the best consolation in the evening of life,—better than Cicero de senectute.—The more unbelief spreads, the more should we pray the Lord to abide with us.—Every enjoyment is sanctified through Christ.—After trials and darkness, the blessed hour of manifestation comes at last.—A time is coming when Jesus will disappear no more.—The words of Jesus make the heart burn, the words of Christless men are cold and powerless.—The journey of the disciples to Emmaus, a type of the journey of life.—The new life of the disciples of Jesus after His resurrection, a prefiguration of the happy life to come.—Progress from weak to strong faith.

On the paragraph.—Arndt: The twofold celebration of Easter, 1. by those whose eyes were holden, 2. by those whose eyes were opened.—Rudelbach (Bibl. Wegweiser ii. p. 40, etc.): The soul-winning art of Jesus.—Chr. Palmer: How we may recognise the presence of the living Saviour, though we do not see Him.—Brastberger: The happy condition of a soul that knows and believes that the Lord is risen indeed.—Fresenius: True Christians, spiritual pilgrims, now weak, now strong.—Ahlfeld: The pilgrims of Easter even.—Palmer: The leadings by which the risen Saviour causes His disciples to profit.—Souchon: Jesus dispels sadness.—Stier: When mayest thou, and when oughtest thou to think that the risen Saviour is especially near thee?—Dr W. Hoffmann (ver. 26): The divine ought.- Rieger: The risen Saviour, a travelling companion, who is certainly willing to accompany us, and the manner in which He accompanies us.—Dietz: The gradual rise of the light of Easter in the soul of man: 1. How sad life is without this Easter light; 2. what hinders it from entering our hearts; 3. how twilight begins to dawn; 4. how the full light rises in the heart.—Bohe: The intercourse of the risen Saviour with the disciples of Emmaus, considered as a hint how we must seek and find the Lord.—Burk: The abiding of Christ longed for by His disciples.—The holy occupation of the living Jesus.—Von Harless: The way to faith in the risen Saviour. —Rautenberg: The Easter time of our journey through the world. It is Easter when our risen Lord 1. bears us company, 2. instructs us, 3. gives us strength for our homeward way.—Shall not we also constrain our risen Lord to abide with us?

2. The Evening Appearing. (Vers. 36–45.)

Parallel passages: Mark xvi. 14–18; John xx. 19–23.

36 And as they thus spake, Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. 37 But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit. 38 And He said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? 39 Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself: handle Me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see Me have. 40 And when He had thus spoken, He showed them His hands and His feet. 41 And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, He said unto them, Have ye here any meat? 42 And they gave Him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey-comb. 43 And He took it, and did eat before them. 44 And He said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me. 45 Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures.

Ver. 36. The Ἰησοῦς of the Receptus, accepted by Scholz, is omitted by some authorities, and replaced by ἔστη by others.

Ver. 37. There is no reason for viewing this salutation as unauthentic (with Tischendorf). But the ἐγώ εἰμι, μὴ φοβεῖσθε, bracketed by Lachmann, according to G.P., etc., is introduced from John vi. 20.

Ver. 39. Ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ is the internally probable reading of Lachmann and Tischendorf, after B.D. Ital.

Ver. 44. Οἱ λόγοι μου. Tischendorf, after A.D.K.L.N. 33, Copt. Cantabr., etc.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. Jesus Himself stood in the midst,—though the doors were locked, as appears from John xx. 17. He was suddenly there, though no one knew how He had entered: ἐν μέσῳ, id significantius quam in medium: Bengel. They recognised the voice, which they would have known among thousands, uttering the customary salutation, which, however, had an infinitely higher signification from those lips, and at such a time, and involuntarily reminded the disciples of His parting words (John xiv. 27). With these words began that evening appearing, which we are bold to call the climax of all His appearings on His resurrection day. Hitherto, He had only satisfied individual cravings; but now He entered the united circle, the first congregation of His people. There was no other appearing so long and so carefully prepared for as this; all else that was heard or seen on this day seemed but so many separate rays destined to blend together in this central point. In no other appearing did the Lord show Himself to His disciples by so many infallible proofs (Acts i. 3), and so victoriously conquer the unbelief of His first witnesses, as on this occasion. This evening was of the highest importance and greatest value, in contributing to the foundation of the kingdom of God upon the empty sepulchre as its foundation and corner-stone; and we need not, therefore, be surprised that no less than three Evangelists should bear testimony, each in his peculiar manner, to what took place on this occasion. Mark, who evidently condenses as he draws to a close, does so but briefly, ver. 14, and proceeds, ver. 15, to his general conclusion. John relates the occurrence in its internal and more spiritual aspect, and also communicates the fact that Thomas was not with the disciples. Luke also maintains his character as a historiographer by communicating the external course of circumstances, and especially details, as a physician, the visible and palpable proofs of the new life and corporeality of the Lord. Without making any further distinction between days and hours, he blends this evening appearing with those last commands, and that parting blessing, so all-confirming for the inner and outer life of the Apostles. Modern criticism, which would prove from Luke that the Lord ascended to heaven on the very day of His resurrection, and from Mark, from a room with locked doors, has, from the fragmentary character of these last lines of the Gospel history, a very easy task; but has also shown an unmistakeable want of goodwill in blending these fragments into a regular whole. We feel justified in regarding Luke's account of this appearing as concluding with ver. 43, and in viewing ver. 44 as the commencement of the last promises and precepts which the Lord, according to all the Synopticists, delivered to His disciples shortly before His departure from the earth.

2. But they were terrified and affrighted.—From John xx. 20 also, it appears that the disciples were not joyful till after the Lord had shown them His hands and His feet, and that they were, therefore, even the moment before, terrified and affrighted. The very manner of His entrance must have contributed to this feeling; and, however much the events of the day might have prepared them for this meeting, yet this surprise must have been so much the greater, from the fact that the message of the angel had directed them to Galilee, and that hence they could not have expected a visit from their Lord this very evening in Jerusalem. A blending of light and darkness, such as takes place in the natural evening, was at this time prevailing in their hearts. There was no longer the hopelessness of spirit, the confusion and uneasiness of the early morning. The desire which they felt of talking over together the various mysterious, and even contradictory experiences of the day, had assembled them. A spark of faith had been kindled in the hearts of some by the account of Peter. These were they who so joyfully greeted the disciples from Emmaus. The minds of others still hesitated, even after hearing their narrative, to credit what their hearts were desiring above all things to believe. With these doubts were united fear of the Jews and anxiety for the future—reasons enough why the Lord should, at His appearing, upbraid them in His own peculiar manner (Mark xiv. 14).

3. Why are ye troubled?—His reproach of their unbelief began with this question. They thought they were beholding a separate spirit returned from Hades—a φάνтασμα, an umbra, clothed in the appearance of a body, and therefore, in certain respects, a dead man. He would show them that it was He Himself who stood alive before them, not in a seeming, but in a real, though incipiently glorified body. To appreciate the full value of that kindness with which He stooped to the little faith of His disciples, we need to imagine the infinite distance between the frame of mind of the Lord, who had peace and bestowed peace, and the emotions of those who would, with trembling hands, have dismissed, as it were, the supposed phantom to the world of spirits, and who troubled the happiest evening of the Lord's life with their unbelief. He asked them why thoughts—i.e., considerations of a discouraging kind, doubtful and opposing thoughts—arose in their hearts, since, but for such subtilties, they could not have failed to recognise Him as their own living Master. And then He encouraged them to do what He had not permitted to Mary. To convince them, not merely of the reality, but of the identity of

His appearing, He would have them handle His hands and feet, His body, and especially the places which bore the marks of the crucifixion wounds. "But it was not merely as the marks of His crucifixion, and for the identification of His person, that the Saviour showed His wounds, but as signs of His victory, and proofs of His triumph over death. And therefore also—and this is the deepest sense of His salutation at entering—as signs of that peace which was the fruit of His sacrificial death, of His complete atonement."

4. He showed them.—To the words He added the act of love. It is probable that they now actually touched with reverence the places pointed out. Hence, John could afterwards correctly speak of that which their hands had handled (1 John i. 3); and hence, too, it becomes doubly accountable why Thomas should so decidedly have required this very sign. He desired to be in no respect behind the others.

5. And while they yet believed not for joy.—A deeply psychological expression, betraying the hand of the evangelist-physician, and making evident the prevalence of the joy which St John so strikingly describes (ver. 20), not without an indirect reference to the Lord's promise, "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice." At first, the matter seemed too fearful for them to be willing, now it is too glorious for them to be able, to believe it. Anxiety lest they might still possibly be deceived, was the last obstacle that restrained the flow of their joy. A state of mind similar, perhaps, to that of Jacob, Gen. xlv. 26. But now that He had gone so far, the Lord did not rest till He had perfected His work in His own people.

6. A piece of a broiled fish and of an honey-comb, ἀπὸ μελισσ.—Honey of bees, such as was plentifully found in Palestine, in the clefts of rocks or hollows of trees, so that the country might literally be called a land flowing with milk and honey; very distinct from the honey of grapes and dates, which is still prepared and exported thence, and which is spoken of Gen. xliii. 11. The food here mentioned was, perhaps, the remains of the evening repast of the disciples, who may have had places of meeting in the upper chamber of the unknown host, where the Lord had celebrated His last Passover, and elsewhere in the city. The objection, that in the Old Testament angels have also eaten, without possessing real human bodies, could not arise in the hearts of the disciples after the "handling" which had preceded this action. Without further delay, the Lord took the food, and ate it before them, while they drank full draughts of the chalice of holiest rapture.

In these words, in this deed, and in this sign, consisted, in our opinion, the upbraiding of their unbelief mentioned by Mark (ver. 14) as the characteristic mark of this very appearing. At least, we consider this much more probable than that the Lord, after and besides having spoken and acted as Luke describes, should have embittered the joy of this evening by a severe address, when they had recognised and believed Him. We should then have to suppose also, that they adduced something in their defence (as was indeed the case, according to Jerome, Advers. Pelagium II. in quisbusdam exemplaribus et maxime in Græcis codicibus, where we read of the Apostles, "et illi satisfaciebant dicentes: sæculum istud iniquitatis et incredulitatis substantia est, quæ non sinit per immundos spiritus veram Dei apprehendi virtutem, ideirco jam nunc revela justitiam tuam"). The internal improbability of this addition is self-evident. But it is worthy of remark, that the very part of this evening appearing which John exclusively relates, again reveals the spirit of this Apostle, evidently refers to a passage in the farewell discourse, and is in unison with the contents of the synoptical Gospels. Compare ver. 21 b. with Matt. x. 40; ver. 22 with Matt. x. 21, 22; and ver. 23 with Matt. xxviii. 18. The second, Peace be unto you, which he mentions ver. 21, must be placed after all that Luke relates, and considered as the commencement of the farewell which the Lord actually took, vers. 21–23, by His command and promise. Peace, in its fullest sense, was thus the first, and peace the last note of the harmonious resurrection-peal.

7. And He said unto them, ver. 44.—So far in accordance with Mark, as that he also makes certain promises and commands of the Lord, spoken shortly before His ascension, follow immediately upon the evening appearing. Though it is certainly possible that vers. 44 and 45 may also belong to the history of this evening, yet the inward connection of the various clauses of this discourse makes it more probable, that Luke is here merely referring in anticipation to what took place immediately before His departure. Comp. Acts i. 4–8. It is not, then, the whole course of instruction of the risen Saviour which is here generally described (Ebrard), but the third Evangelist communicates to us certain sayings from the rich treasure which He bequeathed, without making it possible to point to the passage in vers. 44–49, where the mention of the forty days of Acts i. 3 should be inserted. We consider it, however, very questionable that Luke followed different traditions, in the Acts of the Apostles and in his Gospel, with respect to the close of the Lord's history.

At least, we find in the two narratives of the ascension no single feature which contradicts other features; for our Evangelist by no means asserts, at the end of his first work, that the Lord ascended to heaven on the day of His resurrection. He merely leaves the time entirely unmentioned, while in his second he gives particulars concerning it.

8. These are the words which I spake, etc.—A somewhat abrupt beginning, which does not, however, therefore refer to that which immediately precedes it. The Lord was here rather taking a large revue retrospective of His now almost concluded earthly course, before parting from His disciples. Even at their last meeting, He held up before their eyes the mirror of the Scriptures, to which He had so often referred them, and spoke of the days when He was still with them, as of a period now for ever terminated, and which was no longer to be continued by corporeal appearings.

9. In the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in (the) Psalms.—As the Lord had on former occasions not been contented with citing special predictions from particular parts of Scripture, but had, even before His death, borne witness to the Old Testament in its entirety (Matt. xxiii. 35), so did He now adduce the three component parts of the canon, to point out thereby that He was referring to the Scriptures in their mutual connection. The Psalms are here mentioned without the article, both as the commencement of the Hagiographa, and, at the same time, as that book among them which contains the most direct Messianic elements. The prophets are, for the same reason, mentioned without the addition of the article.

10. Then opened He their understanding, etc.—It is made emphatically prominent in Luke, as well as in other parts of Scripture, that, for the right understanding of truth, the Scriptures must not only be opened to the heart, but the heart and understanding for the Scriptures. See ver. 32; Acts xvi. 14; comp. Eph. i. 18. Whether the Evangelist here intends a direct or indirect opening of their understanding, cannot be decided, in consequence of the brevity of the expression; but it was certainly such a one as was directly brought about by the risen Saviour. How surpassingly needful this benefit was to the Lord's Apostles, was abundantly shown by the offence they had taken at His death, and by their unbelief in His resurrection; what fruit it bore, may be seen on the day of Pentecost, and subsequently in their Epistles. If it were indisputably certain that Luke was here relating what occurred on the evening of the resurrection, we might perhaps suppose that he had in view the symbolical action of the Lord, described John xx. 22. The brevity and abruptness of the sacred narrative make it difficult, however, to assert this.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. See remarks on the parallel passages in Mark and John.

2. The evening appearing gives us important disclosures concerning the corporeity of the risen Redeemer. At one time, an ordinary human body has, as is well known, been ascribed to the Lord, and all that the sacred narrative describes as mysterious concerning His coming and going, attributed to the subjective condition of the Evangelists; at another, it has been asserted that He appeared to His disciples in a body which merely seemed to be such (Kuhn, Marheineke, Zeibig, and others). In opposition to both these views, this appearing especially gives us reasons for the view, that He was clothed in a real but not an ordinary, a glorified but not a merely seeming, human covering; in other words, the same body, but with entirely different properties. To become acquainted with the nature of this His body, our part should not be to make our own conceptions of such a vehiculum the standard by which we judge of the Gospel narrative; but, on the contrary, to form our notions of a fact, with which we are otherwise so utterly unacquainted, entirely from, and according to, the Gospel narratives. The whole polemics of scepticism (e.g., Strauss, ii. p. 674) proceed upon the undemonstrable assumption, that what holds good concerning a man not yet dead, holds good also of one risen from the dead. It is just because all analogy is in this case wanting, that it is utterly inadmissible to adduce against a narrative relating to an entirely peculiar condition, proofs derived from our everyday experience. With far more justice might a proof of their strict objectivity be deduced from the seeming contradiction in the records of the Evangelists,—a fact of which they must themselves have been fully conscious. If, then, we inquire what notion we have to form, from their historical and credible accounts, concerning a glorified body, and especially that of the Lord, the answer we receive is somewhat as follows: It is tangible, not only in its whole, but also in its several parts; superior to space, so as to be able to pass from place to place far more quickly than we can; and endowed with the property of becoming now visible, and now invisible, in submission to the dictates of a more powerful will. It bears the unmistakeable traces of its former condition, but, is at the same time, raised above its confining limitations. It is, in a word, a spiritual body, no longer subject to the flesh, but filled with the Spirit, led and borne by the Spirit, and yet still a body. It can eat, but does not need nourishment ("Aliter absorbet terra a quam sitiens, aliter solis radiis candens:" Augustine, Ep. 49. "Cibo minime utebatur ad necessitatem, sed ut veritatem humanæ suæ naturæ suis comprobaret:" Zwinglius, in hist. dom. resurr. p. 60); it can manifest itself in a place, but is not bound to the place; it can show itself within this mundane sphere, but is not limited to it. Thus the Lord's resurrection body appears to us adorned with the triple characteristics of truth, freedom, and beauty; and we are not surprised to find that, in the midst of the delight experienced at the appearings of their Lord by His disciples, their minds should always have been pervaded by a certain sense of mystery concerning His person, which they were unable to account for. See, e.g., John xxi. 12.

3. The evening appearing also deserves to be regarded as a brilliant manifestation of the inner life of the risen Saviour. A reflection of heavenly peace is shed over His whole being; and the comparison between the forty days of His second life and those of His temptation in the wilderness, affords materials for a continuous antithesis. His whole former life lay before Him in its completeness, and the prints of the nails which it bore were the honourable badges of His love. And yet it is plainly apparent that His saying, "It is I Myself," was, in its most extended signification, the truth; and that death, while it had altered His condition, had not changed His heart. As the appearing at the Sea of Tiberias, John xxi. 1–14, exhibits a remarkable coincidence with the miraculous draught of fishes, Luke v. 1–11, so does this evening appearing with the Lord's prayer at night, by the borders of the sea, John vi. 15–21. There also He found His disciples affrighted, but comforted and rejoiced them with the assurance of His presence, and calmed the storm which had arisen in their hearts with a single word. It was just such appearings as this which subsequently enabled His witnesses to speak in the decided tone which Peter, e.g., takes up, Acts x. 40–42.

4. Christian anthropology is indebted to these appearances of Christ for decisions which confirm the distinction between spirit and body; define the notion of spirit; and put beyond doubt not only the objective, but also the subjective identity of man, before and after death.

5. We see in the Lord an image of the perfection prepared for all His people in another world. A peace which nothing can destroy; a glorified body, no longer obstructing but serving the spirit; a clear but no longer painful remembrance of the former life and its past conflicts; a happy communion and reunion with all who were united to us by the ties of the Spirit; an unimpeded continuation of that work for God's glory, which death had interrupted;—this, and far more, even what eye has not seen nor ear heard, will the resurrection-life be for the subjects of the kingdom of God, as well as for its King.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

"At evening time it shall be light," Zech. xiv. 7.—The King of Peace in the midst of His troubled subjects.—The Easter festival, a festival of peace.—How faith in the risen Saviour gives peace amidst, 1. the doubts of unbelief, 2. the disquietudes of the conscience, 3. the sorrows of life, 4. the fear for the future, 5. the prospect of death.—Unbelief embitters the happiest hours of life.—How the Lord gradually raises His people to a participation of His joy.—"It is I Myself:" 1. The Lord felt that He was the same; 2. He showed that He was the same; 3. He will be recognised and honoured as the same by His disciples.—When the Lord's disciple doubts, his risen Saviour still shows him His hands and His feet, pierced for His salvation.—All unbelief is not equally guilty.—"While I was yet with you;" the retrospect of the present from the future life.—The prophetic Scriptures, the best key, 1. to the enigma of Christ's appearing, 2. to the enigma of Christ's life.—Holy Scripture must be regarded and honoured as a whole.—To combine, not to isolate, the way to the recognition of truth.—The Lord, 1. kindles the light for the eye, 2. opens the eye to the light.

Heubner: Jesus Himself seeks His disciples, to strengthen them.—We must well distinguish between unbelief, superstition, and faith, in our contemplations of the spiritual world.—The Christian should be unterrified, even in his anticipations of another world.—The Lord will again be recognisable as man.—The marks of Jesus' wounds are terrible to His enemies, precious to His friends.—The difficulty of belief in Christ enhances its worth and power.—The love of Christ is not changed by His exaltation.—He received from them bodily food, and they received from Him spiritual food.—The resurrection of Christ puts the seal of truth upon His words.—Understanding the Scripture indispensable to Christianity.

On the paragraph.—Heubner: The first evening spent by the risen Saviour in the midst of His disciples.—The blessed results of the resurrection of Jesus for His disciples.—The certainty of the testimony of the Apostles to the resurrection of Jesus.—Arndt: Easter evening; what did it bring to the Apostles, and what does it bring to us? 1. Full certainty, 2. deep peace, 3. apostolic power. —Palmer: The Lord's, 1. salutation, 2. commission, 3. promise (John xx. 19–23).—Dietz: What is the way to attain the peace of Easter?—Albrecht: What a glorious gift Christ brought with Him at His resurrection! 1. Peace over us, 2. in us, 3. among us, 4. around us.—Kraussold: Where shall we find the peace of God, which the world cannot give?—Ahlfeld: What the Lord brought from the grave for His disciples: 1. Himself; 2. His peace; 3. the last seal of His resurrection: comp. John xx. 22.—Couard: The blessed ministry of the risen Saviour in the midst of His disciples. —Bohe: How may we attain to the blessed assurance of faith?— See further, hints on John xx. 19–23.

C. On the Opposition of Israel and the Heathen World. (Hinted at, in VERS. 46–48.)

46 And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day: 47 And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. 48 And ye are witnesses of these things.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. And said unto them.—A remarkable climax is presented to us in the different elements of this last chapter of Luke. Having pointed out to us, in his account of the first Easter message, the victory obtained by the risen Saviour over the power of sin and death, he depicts, in three appearings, the triumph which He celebrated over the doubt and unbelief of His disciples. But the nearer the Lord approaches to the termination of His manifestation on earth, the more obvious does it become that the Lion of the tribe of Judah is pressing on continually ad altiora. His last discourse but one does, indeed, but hint at the hope of victory with which His parting glance at the whole Jewish and heathen world was animated, before His last farewell was uttered to His disciples. Even on this occasion also He began with the mention of the word, and concluded with the promise of the Spirit, to abide with and instruct His disciples.

2. Thus it is written.—Another γέγραπται, as at the commencement of His second life. We might accede to the view (of Meyer), that ὅτι points out the reason why He opened their understandings, but that the links uniting the several elements of the narrative are here so loose, that it seems perhaps better to renounce all attempts at connecting them. The mention of the resurrection on the third day, is perhaps an indirect proof that these words of the Lord were not spoken on the day of His resurrection. Here also, as well as in ver. 26 and throughout the apostolical writings, suffering and glory are indissolubly united.

3. And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached.—Κηρυχθῆναι both depends upon γέγραπται, and represents the preaching of the Gospel, among Jews and Gentiles, as a result of the divine fore-appointment, and of the fulfilment of prophecy.—According, also, to Matthew and Mark, the Lord, before His departure from the earth, gave commandment for a universal publication of the Gospel; but in Luke this command bears a peculiar character. It is first a κήρυγμα ἐπ' ὀνόματι 'Ιησ., i.e., a preaching which is based upon this name, depends upon this name; and hence derives all its importance and authority from Him, in whose name and at whose command it takes place. They must also proceed from Jerusalem, and thence spread themselves over all nations: comp. Acts i. 8;—a proof, on the one hand, of the Lord's great love for sinners; and, on the other, of the world-subduing destination of His Gospel, entirely in its place in the Pauline and catholic narrative of St Luke. Finally, while elsewhere the preaching of the Gospel is only spoken of in general terms, μετάνοια and ἄφεσις τῶν ἁμαρτ. are here mentioned, as also took place in the cases of John the Baptist and the Apostles (see Acts ii. 38, iii. 19, xxvi. 18).

4. Witnesses of these things.—Meyer, who perhaps adheres on this occasion too strictly to the letter, makes τούτων refer not only to the death and resurrection of the Lord, but also to the above-mentioned commission to preach the Gospel. But the very fact that they were the executors of the latter, prevented their being at the same time witnesses of it; and if the expression is to be thus strictly interpreted, the ascension, which had not at this moment taken place, would be excluded from their testimony. The Apostles are nowhere represented as witnesses of what they themselves performed, but always as witnesses of what their Master had done.

Hence it is better to refer τούτων to all the facts of the Lord's life on earth, concluding with His ascension to the Father, the great central-point of which was the resurrection. Comp. Acts i. 8, 22.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The preaching of the Gospel among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, was the fulfilment of the prophetic sayings, Ps. cx. 2; Isa. ii. 2–4; Micah iv. 2–4.

2. The preaching of repentance and forgiveness are most intimately connected. Μετάνοια is a change of mind preceding πίστις, which latter is followed by the ἄφεσις τῶν ἁμαρτ. Faith, however, in this latter, which is freely bestowed and accepted, must lead to ἁγιασμός, i.e., continued μετάνοια.

3. The Christian mission is here set before us as the Lord's own appointment, and as the holy vocation of the Church. The Apostles were not to remain at Jerusalem till the last Jew should have received their testimony; but, on the contrary, after having made a beginning there, they must, as quickly as possible, extend the circle of their activity to its widest possible limits, and found the kingdom of God by means of their testimony. Everything in the ministrations of the actual or supposed successors to the apostolical commission that does not accord with this office of witnessing, is here indirectly but evidently excluded. It is when the messengers of the Gospel are neither more nor less, in word and deed, than witnesses, that they walk in the footsteps of Him who was the faithful and true Witness upon earth: John xx. 22; 1 Tim. vi. 13; Rev. i. 5.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The institution of the preaching of the Gospel, the Lord's last and best command.—The command to begin the preaching of the Gospel at Jerusalem, 1. surprising to the Lord's enemies, 2. beneficial to His friends, 3. honourable to Himself.—This command, a proof of, 1. the historical truth, 2. the heavenly origin, 3. the blessed purpose of the Gospel.—As the Gospel went out from Jerusalem, so will it also return to Jerusalem.—The inward renewing must still begin from the sinful Jerusalem, in the heart.—The commission to preach the Gospel: 1. What must be preached? 2. in what name? 3. whence must it proceed? 4. and how far?—What the world owes to the Lord's last command.—The preaching of the word, a testimony; 1. of whom? 2. through whom? 3. for whom?

Starcke: Christ refers His friends, no less than His enemies, to the Scriptures.—Nov. Bibl. Tub.: Repentance, forgiveness, etc., the blessed fruits of Christ's resurrection.—Without repentance, no forgiveness.—The writings of the Apostles concerning Jesus, a true testimony; for they testified what they saw and heard, and also what they received from heaven: who would not believe it?—Heubner: The chief matter of Christian preaching is repentance and the forgiveness of sins.—The risen Saviour, the Lord of the earth.—He who contradicts the Apostles, contradicts Jesus.

THIRD SECTION.

THE DAZZLING CROWN.

Verses 49–53.

The Prophetic Promise, the Priestly Blessing, the Kingly Glory.

Parallel passages: Mark xvi. 19; Acts i. 3–9.

49 And, behold, I send the promise of My Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high. 50 And He led them out as far as to Bethany; and He lifted up His hands, and blessed them. 51 And it came to pass, while He blessed them, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven. 52 And they worshipped Him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy; 53 And were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God. Amen.

Ver. 49. The Ἱερουσαλήμ of the Receptus is decidedly unauthentic.

Vers. 51 and 52. The words καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανον, and προσκυνήσαντες αὐτόν, have been, remarkably enough, omitted by the same authorities, D. Cant. Ver. Verc. etc.; see Tischendorf. Probably the eye of the transcriber passed on from καὶ ἀ(νεφέρετο) to καὶ α(ὐτοί), overlooking προσκυνήσαντες, and confusing αὐτόν with αὐτοί. We can thus more easily conceive how these words might be omitted, if they were genuine, than added if they were not. (De Wette is of the contrary opinion.)

Ver. 53. In some manuscripts, αἰνοῦντες καὶ, in others καὶ εὐλογοῦντες, are wanting. The errors, perhaps, of a tired hand at the end of the Gospel. The number and importance of the authorities, however, are by no means so great as to induce us, with Griesbach, to suspect the former, or, with Tischendorf (in the Synopsis), to omit the latter.

CRITICAL NOTES.

1. I send the promise of My Father, etc.—The Lord is speaking of the Holy Spirit, comp. Acts i. 4–8, whom He had repeatedly promised before His death; and He calls this an ἐπαγγελία πατρος, not quia sibi promissum (Grotius), nor merely inasmuch as God had promised the endowment of the gifts of the Spirit in the prophetic Scriptures (Meyer), but with a retrospect of such sayings as John xiv. 16, and others, and of the symbolic action, John xx. 22. That this first actual, but still preliminary and prophetic communication of the Spirit, did not exclude a subsequent, and also abundant outpouring on the day of Pentecost, is but natural. The Lord's meaning is expanded by St Luke in Acts i. 4, where he makes Him speak of the promise of the Father, ἣν ἠκουσατέ μου.

2. Καθίσατε.—The command to remain in the capital, communicated by Luke, is not in contradiction with Matthew (De Wette), unless we take the silence of the former, concerning the appearing in Galilee, for a denial; and forget that this last command was not given till afterwards, and immediately before the Lord's ascension. The tarrying at Jerusalem was to be not only a μένειν, but a quiet though but temporary καθίζειν, because they were to wait there till the promise of the Father was fulfilled. And they were not to wait in vain, but to be endued with δύναμις ἐξ ὕψους, in consequence of the fulfilment of the Father's promise. It is remarkable, how Luke, at the end as well as the beginning of his Gospel, ch. i. 35, thus intimately connects the notions of the Spirit and of power, without, however, entirely identifying them. For the rest, Acts i. especially must be compared with this parting discourse, and with the account of the ascension; both which will be more copiously treated of, in commenting on this book of the New Testament.

3. And He led them out.—Out of Jerusalem, where He was with His disciples on the fortieth, as well as on the first day.—As far as to Bethany (ἕως εἰς, as far as to the neighbourhood of Bethany. The reading of Lachmann, who has πρὸς B., seems to us inadmissible). The account in Acts i. 12, that the disciples returned from the Mount of Olives, is but apparently opposed to this. When we consider that the road to Bethany lay over this mountain, and that the town was situate on its eastern declivity, a departure to this mountain, from whose summit the ascension took place, might well be called a leading out unto Bethany, even though the Lord did not enter the last-named place. Perhaps also, the name of Bethany was given not only to the village itself, but also to the whole of the district to which the Mount of Olives belonged. Such a supposition corroborates the tradition, which points out not the plain, but the central summit of Olivet, as the locality of the ascension, and the highest of its three summits as that of the appearing of the angels after the ascension. See Schubert, a. a. O. ii. p. 519.

4. He lifted up His hands.—Comp. Lev. ix. 22. The prophetic promise is followed by the priestly blessing, from the threshold, as it were, of the heavenly sanctuary, while He was in the act of entering. "Jam non imposuit manus." Bengel. The Pauline-like epistle to the Hebrews fills up the details of this charming picture, in which the nature and purpose of the Lord's earthly and heavenly life are, as it were, fully symbolized. During (ἐν), not after (μετά) this blessing, He was parted from them. Διέστη ἀπ' αὐτῶν, He went back some steps from them, and was immediately afterwards received up. The passive ἀνεφέρ. does not oblige us to think of angels, or any other means of lifting Him from the earth, but leaves space for the cloud, which Luke mentions in his more copious narrative, Acts i. 9.

5. With great joy.—Even in these small adjuncts, Luke preserves his fresh and Pauline character. That they could now rejoice, not merely in spite of the separation, but even at the departure of their Lord to heaven, because He had entered into His glory, and they would now soon receive the promise of the Father, is a speaking proof of the great progress they had made, during these forty days, in the school of the best of masters.

6. In the temple,—more closely defined, Acts i. 12, ii. 1, as the upper chamber, which probably belonged to the buildings of the temple. Even in the doxological conclusion of his Gospel, Luke shows himself a genuine Paulinist: comp. Rom. xi. 36.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Although the account of the ascension, at the conclusion of this Gospel, viewed independently and in a strictly historical sense, is not perfectly satisfactory, it yet affords us the important advantage of a better understanding of the connection between the resurrection and ascension. In opposition to the historical assumption, which would so nearly identify these two events as to make the fortieth day produce scarcely any essential change in the Lord's condition, is the superficial view, that the Lord passed the forty days after His resurrection on earth, among a more or less select circle of disciples, or even in seclusion, and that, on the fortieth day, He exchanged the society of men for that of angels. Neither of these opinions does full justice to the miracle of the ascension. Undoubtedly it must be regarded as a peculiar, and indeed as the last moment in the history of the Lord's appearance on earth, but at the same time as the necessary consequence and sublime climax of His resurrection. "The Lord's ascension is the conclusion of the resurrection, and the full manifestation of His exaltation." Martensen. Or, as Tholuck says, "His resurrection was a glorification, though not the full glorification." From this point of view, the fact that St Luke does not sharply distinguish that appearing of Christ, at the conclusion of which the ascension took place, from others, offers comparatively but slight difficulty. If the Lord's last appearing had not concluded with the ascension, it must have been tacitly inferred that the last but one had ended with some such miracle, either visible or invisible. "The opponents of the history of the ascension would gain nothing, even if they should succeed in getting rid of the account of the ascension, properly so called. The entire history of the resurrection bears an ascension-like character; the whole history of the resurrection must be looked on as the gigantic tree of the ascension in its wider sense, whose crown is the ascension properly so called. Hence, by its removal, opponents would merely have cut off the top, or, more properly speaking, have only lopped one of the branches. To the Apostles the ascension was self-evident from the resurrection." Lange, Leben Jesu ii. p. 1766.

2. This, however, is by no means to say that the fact of a bodily and visible ascension on the fortieth day is either doubtful or of subordinate importance. It has been remarked (by Meyer among others), that two traditions soon arose with respect to this event. According to the first, the Lord ascended into heaven on the evening of the resurrection (Mark and Gospel of St Luke); according to the second, not till the fortieth day after that event (Acts). The indefinite account of Mark, however, ch. xvi. 19, μετὰ τὸ λαλῆσαι αὐτοῖς), does not oblige us to conclude that the Lord went into heaven immediately after the address which precedes it. We might as well infer, from ver. 20, that the disciples began to preach and work miracles that very night, or the following morning. And, with respect to Luke, is it conceivable that in his Gospel he should have given such a statement as would represent Jesus as leaving the earth in the night, since it was already evening when He appeared to the disciples at Emmaus, and must have been at least three hours later when He appeared to the eleven afterwards? In fact, unless we attribute absurdities to our Evangelist, we shall be obliged to entertain the view that he does not contradict, but complete, his Gospel by the more definite indication of time which he gives in the Acts. How otherwise, supposing his earlier narrative had contained any actual error, would he have omitted rectifying it by a single word? If his more copious narrative is to be ascribed to subsequent, and more or less fabulous traditions, the pious fiction would never have invested the closing act of the Lord's life with so little of pomp and eclat. And if Luke, at the conclusion of his first work, had already entertained the notion of subsequently narrating the acts of the Apostles, he might surely have felt it desirable, even for the sake of his historic interests, to touch but very slightly on the Lord's ascension, and to give a more copious treatment of this subject in the history of the kingdom of God. Nor does the event itself offer any overwhelming discrepancy or grounds for doubt. To speak of the laws of gravity and attraction with respect to the Lord's body in this incipient state of glorification, may be looked upon as absurd. The heavens, which declare the glory of God, are indeed everywhere; but Scripture offers no obstacle to our forming a conception of a locality in creation where He still more immediately manifests His majesty than elsewhere, and imagining our Lord as proceeding thither. Though it has been a thousand times repeated, that we must think of heaven not as a place, but as a state, and must hence speak here, not of the πού, but of the πῶς, yet we confess that we only imagine the enjoyment of this state as experienced in some locality, when we are separated from this visible world. An exaggerated spirituality might here easily seduce us into Acosmism and Pantheism. And with respect, finally, to the frequently advanced objection, deduced from the partial silence of the sacred writers, this silence appears to us to be neither so general nor so inexplicable as has been asserted. On that of Matthew, see Lange on St Matthew's Gospel in loco. John plainly knew of a visible ascension, ch. iii. 13, vi. 62, xx. 17, and must have believed in it, unless he had doubted the fulfilment of his Master's own words in this respect. In 1 Pet. iii. 22 it is as much distinguished from His resurrection, as a separate event, as His descent into Hades is. In the Epistles also of St Paul (Eph. i. 19, 20, ii. 5, 6, iv. 8–10; Rom. viii. 34; Col. iii. 1), and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, greater emphasis is laid upon the Lord's ascension than even upon His resurrection. In short, with regard to most of the Epistles, we must agree with the opinion, that, "if we do not find the external fact, we find all the more, throughout the whole of the New Testament, and in expressions which point also to the event itself, the doctrinally important consequence of this exaltation, the session at the right hand of God" (Schmidt, Bibl. Theol. of the New Test. i. p. 189). And with respect to the Gospels, all represent to us the risen Redeemer in His glory, though two are silent concerning the moment in which this reached its climax. Yet this ascension itself, the goal of the Lord's earthly appearing, what is it but a transition to a new, but by no means the final, period of His miraculous history? It is in this fact that we find, at least in our opinion, the true solution of the apparently enigmatical fact, that greater prominence is not given to the miracle of Olivet. It was but a halt, and not a termination. The Lord departed indeed, but it was only to return; and the whole of that heavenly life into which the ascension introduced Him, is but a long interval of centuries between His first and second advents. The angels themselves told us that the Lord's history was not concluded with respect to the earth, but only temporarily interrupted, in order to be subsequently continued. When John and Matthew saw the Lord ascend with this hope, why need they have felt constrained to depict the last moment of their intercourse with Him with diplomatic accuracy, as if all connection between the Saviour and this earth had terminated therewith?

3. It is the province of theology, and of the history of theology, to speak of the ascension in connection with the Lord's corporeity, and of the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed views. "Oh that we knew the right place to leave off at!" R. Stier.

4. The bodily and visible ascension of Jesus is a fitting climax to His earthly history. Many a word that He had spoken, then received its most striking corroboration (John vi. 62, xx. 17; Matt. xxviii. 18, and others); and the harmony existing between the various events of His life, is incomplete without this miracle. A second death, had it been of ever so easy a nature, would have destroyed the whole significance of His resurrection, and the poetical saying of Hase, "His grave, like that of Moses, was never seen," can only evoke the tone of wonder and indignation. "His grave, His who swallowed up death in victory." (Olshausen.) They who content themselves with saying, that He departed to the Father, though it is not exactly known how, whence, or when, make His history conclude with an unsatisfactory query, and ungratefully neglect the satisfactory answer furnished by His first witnesses. His appearing now seems like a ring whose end is entwined in its beginning, while both Bethany and the Mount of Olives bear an impress of silent and hidden, but at the same time of heavenly greatness. And as it was not till His ascension that a perfectly satisfactory light was thrown upon the Lord's person (John vi. 62, xvi. 28), this event is directly connected both with the conclusion of the first part of His redeeming work, and with its successful continuation. But for this miracle, the Apostles would never have been completely free from the last remains of their carnal expectations; but now, on the contrary, they were rendered capable, by this event, of receiving the Spirit of love, of truth, and of power. Never, so long as their Lord's visible presence had remained on any spot of earth, could a kingdom have been founded and extended which should embrace all nations; and as little, in this case, could the Church have been maintained without a continuance of miraculous interpositions. But now the Lord, being raised above all finite boundaries, reigns wherever His word is preached, by the power of His Spirit; and His departure, far from being any detriment, is a source of inestimable gain to His people (John xvi. 7). This event manifests the full splendour of the kingdom of God, assures its highest blessings, and announces its infinite perfection.

5. The homage of worship paid by the Apostles to the glorified Redeemer, superficially considered, might seem more or less similar to the honour often rendered in the East to kings, and especially to that King of kings, the Messiah. See Matt. ii. 2, xx. 20. When we consider, however, that this worship was offered by the Lord's disciples at the moment when they saw Him crowned with unearthly splendour, and were more than ever reverencing Him as the bearer of the divine nature and majesty, we can scarcely be satisfied with the assertion, that the Lord was, on this occasion, honoured exclusively in His Messianic character; but must, on the contrary, recognise that it was not for His royal rank alone, but, above all, for His divine nature, that worship was due to Him. Thus we find in Luke xxiv. 52, a hint how the commandment, John v. 23, must be understood and obeyed.

6. The Lord's direction to His followers, before His departure, to remain at Jerusalem, as much testifies to His wisdom, as His last promise of the Holy Ghost bears witness to His love and power. But, at the same time, the manner in which they obeyed this command (Acts i. 12–14) contains an apologetic element which must not be overlooked. The disciples remained together with one accord. This was the first advantage resulting from the Lord's exaltation; their visible centre of union being absent, the infant flock felt the necessity of cleaving all the more closely to each other. They remained together ten days publicly, and yet were unmolested,—a proof that they had not stolen the body, and that the Jewish council did not believe in their own accusation. They waited calmly and quietly, as no fanatics would have done. They continued in prayer for the fulfilment of the Lord's promise; so that the pentecostal miracle was a direct answer to prayer, the inestimable blessing of which will be rendered evident by an examination of the Acts of the Apostles.

HOMILETICAL HINTS.

The Lord's disciples have to learn the lesson of waiting; their moral education was thereby perfected: it was so then, it is so now, it has ever been so (Jacob, Moses, David, etc.).—" I send the promise of My Father upon you." Not a servant, but the Son of the Father alone, could thus speak.—The parting salutation of the departing Lord: 1. The crown of His whole earthly appearing; 2. the symbol of His heavenly life; 3. the prophecy of His coming in glory.—The Lord departs that He may remain.—The exalted King, the worthy object of reverential homage.—How could the disciples return to Jerusalem with great joy? 1. Faith sees in this departure the highest glorification of Jesus; 2. Love thinks of His gain, not of her own loss; 3. Hope stedfastly expects the fulfilment of all His promises.—Jerusalem, the grave of the Old, the cradle of the New Covenant.—The internal connection of the New Church with the Israelitish temple.—Ascription of praise to God, the last words of our narrative, and at the same time the end of the whole Gospel, and the last note of the world's history.—The Lord's ascension, considered in its high importance: 1. To Himself; as, a. the confirmation of His own words, b. the solution of the events of His life, c. the commencement of His most mighty and most blessed work: 2. To His Apostles; as, a. the completion of their training, b. the strength for their work, c. the prophecy of their future: 3. For all His people; as, a. an honour put upon human nature (Heb. ii. 5, 9), b. the way to the renewing of the sinner (John xvi. 7), c. the source of the joy, peace, and hope of Christians.—The ascension, an answer to the Lord's own prayer, John xvii. 5.—The Festival of the Ascension, the festival of the Lord's coronation.—The crowning of Jesus, 1. the conclusion of the hardest conflict, 2. the commencement of the highest honour, 3. the source of the richest blessing, 4. the pledge of the most blessed hope.—What does the Christian, looking by faith towards heaven, behold on the morning of Ascension Day (comp. Acts vii. 56)? 1. The glorified Son of man; 2. the Almighty King; 3. a friend always at hand; 4. an open place of refuge; 5. an impending triumph. But to see all this, we must, like the first Christian martyr (ver. 55), a. be disciples of the Lord, b. be filled with the Holy Ghost, c. and have our eyes directed towards heaven.—Heaven and earth contemplated in the light of the Ascension morning.—The ascension, the last palpable manifestation of the Lord upon earth: 1. His majesty; 2. His wisdom,—a. the time, b. the place, c. the witnesses, d. the circumstances, e. the results, of the ascension; 3. His faithfulness to His people (comp. Matt. xxviii. 20).

Starcke, Osiander: God furnishes with the necessary gifts those whom He sends forth to the sacred office of preaching.—Patient waiting in prayer and in meditation on the Word, connected with the reception of the Holy Ghost.—He whom Jesus blesses is blessed.—It is right and edifying that parents should give their blessing to their children, before they leave this world.—Brentius: Christ, at His ascension, left us His blessing; why should we any longer fear the curse?—Bibl. Würt.: Jesus is gone to prepare a place for us.—It is thus that we have a safe and open entrance into the holiest, in heaven, Heb. x. 19, 20.—J. Hall: Rejoice, O holy soul, for thy last conflict shall also be crowned with triumph.—The communion of the Spirit causes community of worship.—The servants of God unite in working, praying, suffering, and praising God.—Osiander: Jesus and all His blessings are ours; let us, then, praise and bless Him, together with the Father and the Holy Ghost.

Heubner: The place of Christ's sufferings, the place also of His glorification.—He came with a blessing; He departed with a blessing.—What a different departure from that on the cross!—After the resurrection, the Apostles exhibited much more reverence towards Jesus: they were finding out His divinity; hence we read here, for the first time: "they worshipped Him."—Worship is Christ's due, or He would not have accepted it.—The disciples returned unseparated from Christ through prayer, no longer alone, no longer forsaken.—Arndt: The ascension of Christ, the perfection, 1. of His prophetic, 2. of His priestly, 3. of His kingly office.—Schleiermacher: The promises of the departing Redeemer.—Palmer: The happy position in which the departing Redeemer has left us in the world: a. Over our heads, an open heaven; b. before our eyes, a happy home; c. under our feet, a path smoothed and sanctified by the Lord's footsteps.—Harms: The ascension of Jesus in its deep signification.—Ruperti: Why stand we gazing up to heaven after the Lord has ascended?—Schmid (Zeugn. Evan. Wahrh. i. p. 260): What earth is to those who are looking towards heaven, after the ascended Saviour.—Steir: Why does our Lord, at His ascension, refer us to the Holy Spirit?—Steinmeyer: The separation by means of the ascension, the true source of reunion.—Souchon: The consolation afforded by Christ's ascension.—Tholuck: The comforting thoughts suggested by the history of the ascension: 1. The place of Christ's sufferings, the place of His departure; 2. His beginning concealed—His departure concealed; 3. the close of His sojourn, a blessing to His people; 4. He departed from us, yet He remains with us; 5. He is hidden from His people, only to be the more clearly manifested.—W. Hofacker: The import of Ascension Day, 1. as a day of the richest and most glorious blessing, 2. as a day of the noblest homage, 3. as a day of the most joyful encouragement.—Von Kapff: The ascension of Christ, 1. the glorification of Jesus, 2. of humanity, 3. of the whole earth.—Schnur: Set heart and mind on heaven! 1. Here it is dark, there it is light; 2. here we are strangers, there is our home; 3. here there is conflict, there palms of victory; 4. here there is sorrow, there delight. —Florey: The Lord's ascension His crown of glory.

On this whole section, compare also the excellent paper of Dr H. G. Hasse, The Life of the Glorified Redeemer in Heaven, viewed according to His own Sayings, a contribution to the Bibl. Theol., Leipsic 1854; and Die Christl. Glaubenslehre, published by the Calwer Union, Part II. sec. ii. pp. 266–286, Stuttgart 1857.

NOTES TO VOLUME I.

It has been considered desirable to give the Notes on various readings. They have been given in their proper place in the present volume, and those for the first volume are here given.

Chap. I. 5–25.

Ver. 5. And he had a wife. According to Lachmann and Tischendorf, on the authority of B.C*.D.L.

Chap. I. 26–38.

Ver. 28. And he came in unto her. Tischendorf, after B.L. Usual reading, "the angel came," etc.

Ver. 29. But she was troubled. Tischendorf and Griesbach, according to B.D.L. Usual reading, "When she saw him, she was troubled," etc.

Ver. 35. "Which shall be born of thee." Of thee is not satisfactorily authenticated.

Chap. II. 1–7.

Ver. 5. Γυναικί is expunged by Lachmann and Tischendorf, on both external and internal grounds.

Chap. II. 13–20.

Ver. 15. Usual reading, "the shepherds;" but the reading οἱ ἄνθροποι, οἱ ποιμένες, seems sufficiently accredited to justify its reception. It is accepted by Tischendorf, De Wette, and Meyer; and adds a natural beauty to the narrative, by the antithesis between angels and men.

CHAP. II. 22–40.

Ver. 33. And His father and His mother. The wide-spread reading, Ἰωσὴφ καὶ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ, has arisen from doctrinal difficulties, and is evidently a correction of the more popular than diplomatically exact expression of Luke.

Ver. 37. Ἕως; usual reading, ὡς. The former is preferable. See Meyer.

Ver. 38. Usual reading, "And she." Lachmann and Tischendorf rightly omit this pronoun, on the authority of A.B.D.L.Δ. and others; it seems to have been inserted from ver. 37.—Waxed strong: the ordinary reading is, "waxed strong in spirit." It is at least doubtful whether the more or less stereotyped formula is not derived from ch. i. 80.

CHAP. II. 41–52.

Ver. 43. It is more probable that the original reading, οἱ γον. αὐτ., was altered, on account of doctrinal difficulties, into the subsequent Ἰωσὴφ καὶ ἡ μήτ. αὐτοῦ, than that the contrary took place. For this reason we give the preference, with Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tischendorf, to "His parents."

Ver. 45. And when they found (Him) not. The usual text contains an addition a seriore manu, which is self-obvious.

CHAP. III. 1–22.

Ver. 19. His wife. The usual text inserts the name of Philip from Mark vi. 17, which, according to the best and oldest testimony, was not originally in Luke.

Ver. 22. Λέγουσαν must be expunged, according to D.B.L. and many others.

CHAP. III. 23–38.

Ver. 38. There are several various readings of the proper names, but none sufficiently authenticated to justify a departure from the text. Rec. It must be mentioned, however, that, according to Tischendorf, we should read in ver. 33, not τοῦ Ἀράμ, but τοῦ Ἀδμείν, τοῦ Ἀρνί. The Receptus seems to be an arbitrary correction from Matt. i. 4, 1 Chron. ii. 9.

CHAP. IV. 1–13.

Ver. 2. "He afterward hungered," is the ordinary reading; but the adverb is wanting in B.D.L. and A., and is rightly omitted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Meyer, as being probably derived from the parallel passage Matt. iv. 2.

Ver. 5. And he, taking Him up, showed, etc. The genuineness of the ordinary reading is at least doubtful, and may be regarded as a paraphrastic emendation from Matt. iv. 8; hence it is expunged by Tischendorf.

Ver. 8. "Get thee behind Me, Satan, for," etc., is probably an interpolation from Matt. iv. 10. At all events, it is wanting in B.D.L., in most versions, and in the principal Fathers; and is, besides, a considerable, though a critically doubtful, obstacle in harmonizing the Gospel narratives.

Chap. IV. 14–30.

Ver. 18. "To heal the broken-hearted," which seems to be an addition from the LXX. (Isa. lxi. 1), has been rightly bracketed by Lachmann. It has been rejected by De Wette and Meyer.

Ver. 26. Sarephtha—usual text, "Sarepta"—in Sidonia, usual reading "of Sidon."

Chap. IV. 31–44.

Ver. 34. Ἔα, "Let us alone,"—marg., "Away,"—is critically doubtful. See Lachmann in voce.

Ver. 41. The Son of God. Ordinary reading, "Christ, the Son of God,"—a somewhat superfluous paraphrase, wanting in B.C.D.L.F.X., Vulgata, Origen, Griesbach, De Wette, Meyer, and others.

Chap. V. 1–11.

Ver. 1. And heard the word of God. Ordinary reading, "to hear the word of God." We read, with Tischendorf, καὶ ἀκ., instead of τοῦ. It took place then, while the people were occupied with ἐπικεῖσθαι αὐτῷ καὶ ἀκ. It is their condition, not their purpose, which is expressed.

Ver. 2. Small ships. We must probably read πλοιάρια for πλοῖα.

Chap. V. 12–26.

Ver. 15. "To be healed by Him of their infirmities" is the ordinary reading; but ὑπ' αὐτοῦ must be omitted, after the example of Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, and others, not only on account of weighty authorities, but also of its uncertain position.

Ver. 20. "Unto him," is probably only a gloss.

Chap. V. 27–39.

Ver. 30. Pharisees and scribes. The usual reading is, "Scribes and Pharisees." The last words of this verse, "and sinners," are omitted by Tischendorf, on the authority of Cod. D., but, as appears to us, on insufficient grounds.

Ver. 34. The interrogative form of the Textus Receptus, "Why eateth," etc., seems derived from the parallel passage in Matt. According to the most strictly correct reading of Luke, we have here, not a direct question, but an affirmative objection.

Ver. 38. The words, "And both are preserved," omitted by Tischendorf, chiefly upon the authority of B.L., are probably borrowed from Matt. ix. 17; and hence rightly declared by Griesbach to be, at least, doubtful.

Ver. 39. Whether the word εὐθέως really stood in the original Greek text may indeed be questioned; but, viewed even as an interpretamentum, it is undoubtedly in accordance with the Lord's spirit.

Chap. VI. 1–11.

Ver. 2. "Unto them," is insufficiently supported. "To do," correct as an interpretamentum, but doubtful as a reading.

Ver. 4. "How." Justly expunged, as it seems to us, by Tischendorf, on the authority of B.D. Cantabrig. and some cursive MSS. It is more comprehensible that πῶς should have been inserted from Matthew, than that it should have been omitted if it had really formed part of the original text.

Ver. 6. A man was there.

Ver. 7. With Lachmann and Tischendorf, we prefer the reading θεραπεύει to θεραπεύσει. The latter seems borrowed from Matthew.

Ver. 8. The words, "and he arose and stood forth," are omitted by De Wette in his translation, entirely without reason.

Ver. 9. I ask you. With Tischendorf, we prefer the Present, which is supported by B.L. 157, and by five ancient versions, and adds to the graphic power of the scene. The reading εἰ before τί is supported by the same authorities.

Ver. 10. "Whole as the other" is an addition from the parallel passage in Matthew.

Chap. VI. 12–16.

Vers. 14 and 15. And James, and Philip. B.D.L. and others are in favour of the admission of καί—καί also, before the names of James and Philip. It seems that this particle should also stand before the other names. Luke thus gives the names of the Apostles singulatim, and not in pairs.

Ver. 16. Judas Iscariot, who was the traitor καὶ is not, critically, sufficiently authenticated (see Tischendorf). There is at least room for the conjecture, that it is taken from the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

Chap. VI. 17–49.

Ver. 18. And they that were vexed with unclean spirits were healed. The ordinary reading has A.B.D.L.Q. and thirty-three other cod. against it. These all omit the word καί before ἐθεραπ. The independent sense of ver. 18, arising from this omission, directs the attention more exclusively to these possessed persons, as a peculiar kind of patients.

Ver. 23. Ταὐτά, or τὰ αὐτά, must be read for κατὰ ταῦτα, according to not only Lachmann and Tischendorf, but even Beza and Casaubonus.

Ver. 25. Ὑμῖν must be omitted, according to B.K.L.S.X. and other codices.

Ver. 26. Ὑμῖν is unauthentic in this verse also.

Ver. 26 b. See note on ver. 23.

Ver. 28. Pray for them. The usual reading, "and pray for them," is critically untenable.

Ver. 34. Λαβεῖν, the reading of Tischendorf, seems preferable to the ἀπολαβεῖν of Lachmann.

Ver. 34 b. Sinners also lend to sinners. The ordinary reading, "for sinners," etc., seems borrowed from ver. 33.

Ver. 36. "Be ye merciful." Οὖν seems to have been soon interpolated for the sake of connecting the phrases.

Ver. 37. Καί must be preserved in the commencement of ver. 37, and omitted in its second part (contrary to the Receptus).

Ver. 38. The repetition of καὶ—καί, before the last two adjectives, may be omitted, without endangering the purity of the text.

Ver. 40. Above the master. Ordinary reading, "above his master."

Chap. VII. 1–10.

Ver. 7. Tischendorf has καὶ ἰαθήτω, after B.L., instead of the καὶ ἰαθήσεται of the Receptus. The former seems more suitable to the humble tone of the suppliant.

Chap. VII. 18–35.

Ver. 18. To the Lord. Usual reading, "to Jesus."

Ver. 22. And He answered. Usual reading, "and Jesus answered."

Ver. 28. I say unto you. Usual reading, "for I say unto you."

Ver. 31. It is very probable that the words at the beginning of ver. 31, "and the Lord said," are unauthentic, and arose with some copyist who made a new address commence here, from regarding vers. 29, 30, as an interpolated remark of the Evangelist, and not as containing a dictum of the Lord,—a notion, however, which we cannot accept.

Chap. VII. 36–50.

Ver. 37. Which was a sinner in the city. According to the most probable order of the words: ἥτις ἦν, after γυνή.

Ver. 42. When they had nothing. The δέ must be omitted.

Ver. 44. With her hair. Usual reading, "with the hairs of her head."

Ver. 45. Luther had εἰσῆλθον instead of εἰσῆλθεν, which is also recommended by Griesbach. The first person is, however, supported both by the number and importance of critical testimonies in its favour. The third seems an unsuccessful correction, according to ver. 36.

Chap. VIII. 1–3

Ver. 3. Which ministered unto them. Usual reading, "unto Him." Αὐτοῖς is supported by overwhelming authority. See Tischendorf on this passage. The singular was more natural to transcribers, partly because preceded by ἦσαν τεθεραπ., partly from reminiscences of Matt. xxvii. 55, Mark xv. 4 (Meyer).

Chap. VIII. 4–21.

Ver. 9. Λέγοντες is at least doubtful.

Chap. VIII. 22–25.

Ver. 25. 'Εστιν is, according to Tischendorf and Lachmann

(A.B.L.X. cursive MSS.), an addition whose authenticity is doubtful.

Chap. VIII. 26–39.

Ver. 38. But He sent him away. Usual reading, "but Jesus," etc.

Chap. VIII. 40–56.

Ver. 47. Declared before all the people. Αὐτῷ must be expunged.

Ver. 48. Daughter, thy faith, etc. Usual reading, "Be of good comfort;" θάρσει, which the Lord may have said, according to Matt. ix. 22, and perhaps also Mark v. 34; but certainly not according to the original text of Luke. See Meyer and Tischendorf.

Ver. 49. Αὐτῷ is not sufficiently authenticated.

Ver. 51. The words σὺν αὐτῷ are sufficiently authenticated to be admitted into the text, though wanting in the Receptus.

Ver. 52. For she is, etc. Ordinary reading, "She is." The evidence for γάρ in Luke, is too great to allow us to regard it as a copulative borrowed from Matt. ix. 24.

Ver. 54. The words ἐκβαλὼν ἔξω πάντας are, as it seems to us, rightly expunged by Lachmann and Tischendorf, as they had already been thought doubtful by Griesbach. They are wanting in B.D.L.X. and other MSS.; and it is much easier to explain how they may have been added from Matthew and Mark, than how they should have been omitted, if they had really formed a part of the original text of Luke. Even the uncertainty in the order of the words (C*. does not read ἔξω at all, and several manuscripts and versions place it after πάντας) seems to confirm the view that they are an interpolation.

Chap. IX. 7–9.

Ver. 7. Heard of all that was done. The reading of B.C*.D.L. 69, 157. Usual reading: ὑπ' αὐτοῦ.

Chap. IX. 10–17.

Ver. 10. Among the variety of readings of this passage, that of Tischendorf, εἰς πολ. καλουμ. Βηθσ., accepted also by Meyer, seems to us, especially on internal grounds, to be the most probable. Lectio difficilior præferenda. "Εἰς πολιν" excites some doubt, because what follows did not take place in a town, but in the desert.

CHAP. IX. 18–27.

Ver. 22. Ἀναστῆναι instead of ἐγερθῆναι, according to the reading of Lachmann and Tischendorf.

CHAP. IX. 28–36.

Ver. 28. John and James. See Tischendorf.

Ver. 35. Ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἐκλελεγμένος, according to the reading of B.L., recommended by Griesbach, Schulz, Tischendorf, and Meyer. The reading of the Receptus, though strongly supported, seems borrowed from the parallel passages in Matthew and Mark.

CHAP. IX. 37–50.

Ver. 38. Ἐβόησεν, Lachmann and Tischendorf, after B.C.D.L. cursive MSS. The compound ἀνεβόησεν occurs but once more, viz., in Matt. xxvii. 46.

CHAP. IX. 51–62.

Ver. 56. See Critical Remarks.

Ver. 62. And Jesus said. Ordinary reading: "And Jesus said to him."

CHAP. X. 1–24.

Ver. 1. The δύο, added after ἑβδομήκοντα, here, and in ver. 17, accepted in the Vulgate, and bracketed by Lachmann, has too little critical support to be included in the text, and has hence been rightly rejected by most.

Ver. 2. And said unto them. Δέ, instead of οὖν, according to the improved reading. See Tischendorf.

Ver. 11. Which cleaveth to our feet. We agree with Griesbach and Tischendorf, that the words εἰς τοὺς πόδας ἡμῶν should undoubtedly be admitted into the text. They are only omitted in several MSS. as seeming superfluous.

Ver. 11 b. The kingdom of God is come nigh. The reading ἐφ' ὑμᾶς of the Receptus is only a repetition from ver. 9, weakening the force of the parting words, here put in the mouths of the Seventy.

Ver. 12. I say unto you. Δέ must be omitted.

Ver. 15. The reading of Tischendorf, μὴ ἕως τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ὑψωθήσῃ, has indeed the important testimony of B.D.L. Æth. Copt. Ital.; and, superficially considered, the pathos of the address might seem increased by the interrogative form. On the other hand, however, such a reflection seems less suitable, and is even of a somewhat sarcastic character, little in accordance with the seriousness of the occasion, or the disposition of the Lord.

Ver. 20. The word μᾶλλον, accepted by Elzevir, and transferred from his Greek text into several versions, is critically untenable and logically obstructive, as needlessly weakening the force of the fine contrast.

Ver. 22. And, turning to His disciples, He said. There is no reason whatever for omitting this commencement of the 22d verse, as is done, among others, in Luther's translation, A.V., and by Griesbach. The words have but few witnesses against them (D.L. cursives), and seem to have been overlooked by these, by reason of the similar commencement to ver. 23. That they have not, however, been borrowed from ver. 23, is evident, from the fact that κατ' ἰδίαν is here wanting.

Chap. X. 25–37.

Ver. 35. Ordinary reading, "On the morrow, when he departed," ἐξελθών (vox molestissima, Schulz). It is possible that it was omitted on account of the following ἐκβαλών (Meyer), but more probable that it is an explanatory addition, since the mention of the αὔριον would necessarily lead to the idea of the continuation of the journey.

Ver. 37. And Jesus said. Usual reading, εἶπεν οὖν. The reasons in favour of δέ are overwhelming.

Chap. X. 38–42.

Ver. 41. And the Lord answered. Usual text, "And Jesus answered." The reading ὁ κύριος is supported not only by B.L., but also by the context, and the diction of St Luke in several other passages.

Ver. 42. The reading, ὀλίγων δέ ἐστιν χρεία ἢ ἑνός (B.C.*L.I. 33, Copt. Æth., the Fathers), and similar ones, have arisen from the idea that a judgment is here delivered.

Chap. XI. 1–13.

Ver. 2. Father, hallowed, etc. Usual reading, Our Father (which art) in heaven.

Ver. 3. Thy kingdom come; give us, etc. The usual text inserts, "Thy will be done, as in heaven so in earth."

Ver. 4. Ordinary reading, "But deliver us from evil." These three additions are apparently borrowed from the more copious edition of the Lord's Prayer in St Matthew; no sufficient reasons existing to prove their genuineness as forming part of the text of St Luke. On the state of the subject, see Tischendorf in loco.

Ver. 6. A friend. Usual reading, "A friend of mine."

CHAP. XI. 14–28.

Ver. 22. A stronger, without an article, according to the reading of Lachmann, after B.D.L.

Ver. 28. Αὐτὸν after φυλ. must be expunged from the Receptus, upon overwhelming grounds.

CHAP. XI. 29–36.

Ver. 29. This generation is an evil generation, according to the amply supported reading of Tischendorf: ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη γενεὰ πονερά ἐστιν.

Ver. 29. The sign of Jonas. The usual text adds, "the prophet," borrowed from the parallel passage in Matthew.

Ver. 34. The light of the body is thine eye. Usual reading, "the eye," Matt. vi. 22. Σου is, however, sufficiently supported, and recommended by Griesbach.

CHAP. XI. 37–54.

Ver. 44. The Receptus has here, γραμματεῖς καὶ φαρισαῖοι, ὑποκριταί, probably taken from the parallel passage in Matthew.

Ver. 48. The words αὐτῶν τὰ μνημεῖα (Recep.) are wanting in B.D.L., Copt., Cantabr., and others; and are therefore inserted in brackets by Lachmann, and rejected by Griesbach, Tischendorf, and others. It has been rightly conjectured that they are a marginal addition, since οἰκοδομεῖτε can well stand alone.

CHAP. XII. 1–34.

Ver. 12. We find no sufficient grounds for concluding that the words ἢ τί εἴπητε are taken from the parallel passage in Matthew.

Ver. 15. Beware of all covetousness. Usual reading, "Beware of covetousness."

Ver. 22. For the life. Usual reading, "For your life:" comp. Matt. vi. 25.

Ver. 25. The words μεριμνῶν and πῆχυν ἕνα are not, critically speaking, sufficiently supported, to refute the notion of their having been borrowed from Matthew.

Ver. 27. Ordinary reading, πῶς αὐξάνει· οὐ κοπιᾷ, οὐδὲ νήθει. D., on the contrary, as also the corresponding clause in ver. 24 and Clement, are in favour of πῶς οὔτε νήθει οὔτε ὑφαίνει. So Tischendorf. Though the reading has no preponderance of external testimony, it is, nevertheless, internally more probable, since the Receptus is, on the other hand, borrowed from the parallel passage in Matthew.

Ver. 31. Seek ye His kingdom. Usual text, "the kingdom of God." Αὐτοῦ is supported by B.D*.L., Copt., Schid., Æth., and others; while τοῦ Θεοῦ (Receptus), on the contrary, is exposed to the suspicion of being derived from the parallel passage, as, probably also, the superfluous πάντα after ταῦτα.

Chap. XII. 35–48.

Ver. 38. Since the words οἱ δοῦλοι are wanting in B.D.L., Cant., Corb., and others, they may probably have been inserted from ver. 37. We would therefore expunge them, as Lachmann and Tischendorf have done.

Ver. 41. "Unto Him." Perhaps an addition, perhaps genuine, but omitted by B.D.L.X., probably as seeming superfluous.

Ver. 42. Καὶ before φρόνιμος is of later origin.

Chap. XII. 49–59.

Ver. 53. Διαμερισθήσονται, the very probable reading of Lachmann and Tischendorf, according to B.D.L.V. cursive MSS., Schid., Vulg., Codd. It., and several Fathers. The singular of the Receptus was naturally furnished by the immediately following substantive. The symmetry, however, requires the verb.

Ver. 54. Τὴν νεφέλην, the cloud (arising). The original τήν seems to have been involuntarily omitted in A.B.L.X.Δ. cursive MSS. on account of the preceding ἴδητε (Meyer).

THE END.

MURRAY AND GIBB, PRINTERS, EDINBURGH.